I-SAY. The Chinese mob used to call the English soldiers A'says or I'says, from the frequency of this apostrophe in their mouths. (The French gamins, it is said, do the same at Boulogne.) At Amoy the Chinese used to call out after foreigners Akee! Akee! a tradition from the Portuguese Aqui! 'Here!' In Java the French are called by the natives Orang deedong, i.e. the dites-dono people. (See Fortune's Two Visits to the Two Countries, 1853, p. 52; and Notes and Queries in China and Japan, ii. 176.)

1863.—"The Sepoys were... invariably called 'Achans.' Acha or good is the constantly recurring answer of a Sepoy when spoken to..."—Fisher, Three Years in China, 146.

ISKAT, s. Ratlines. A marine term from Port. escada (Roebuck).

[ISLAM, s. Infn. of Ar. salm, 'to be or become safe'; the word generally used by Mahomedans for their religion.]

ISTOOP, s. Oakum. A marine term from Port. estopa (Roebuck).

ISTUBBUL, s. This usual Hind. word for ‘stable’ may naturally be imagined to be a corruption of the English word. But it is really Ar. istabīl, though that no doubt came in old times from the Latin stabulum through some Byzantine Greek form.

ITZEBOO, s. A Japanese coin, the smallest silver denomination. Itsī-bītā, ‘one drachm.’ [The N.E.D. gives itsē, itche, ‘one,’ bī, ‘division, part, quarter’]. Present value about 1s. Marsden says: ‘Itzebo, a small gold piece of oblong form, being 0‘6 inch long, and 0‘3 broad. Two specimens weighed 2 dwt. 3 grs. only’ (Numism. Orient., 814–5). See Cock’s Diary, i. 176, ii. 77. [The coin does not appear in the last currency list; see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 90.]

[1859. — ‘We found the greatest difficulty in obtaining specimens of the currency of the country, and I came away at last the possessor of a solitary Itzibu. These are either of gold or silver; the gold Itzibu is a small oblong piece of money, intrinsically worth about seven and sixpence. The intrinsic value of the gold half-Itzibu, which is not too large to convert into a shirt-stud, is about one and tenpence.’ — L. Oliphant, Narr. of Mission, ii. 232.]

IZAM MALUCO, n.p. We often find this form in Coreea, instead of Nizamaluco (q.v.).

J

JACK, s. Short for Jack-Sepoy; in former days a familiar style for the native soldier; kindly, rather than otherwise.

1853. — ‘. . . he should be leading the Jacks.’ — Oakfield, ii. 66.

JACK, s. The tree called by botanists Artocarpus integrifolia, L. fil., and its fruit. The name, says Drury, is “a corruption of the Skt. word Tchacka, which means the fruit of the tree” (Useful Plants, p. 55). There is, however, no such Skt. word; the Skt. names are Kantaka, Phala, Panasa, and Phalasa. [But the Malayāl. chakkā is from the Skt. chakra, ‘round.’] Rheede rightly gives Tsajaka (chakkā) as the Malayālam name, and from this no doubt the Portuguese took jaca and handed it on to us. “They call it,” says Garcia Orta, “in Malavar jaeas, in Canareese and Guzerati panas” (f. 111). “The Tamil form is sakkēi, the meaning of which, as may be adduced from various uses to which the word is put in Tamil, is ‘the fruit abounding in rind and refuse.’” (Letter from Bp. Caldwell.)

We can hardly doubt that this is the fruit of which Pliny writes: “Major alia pomo et susvitate praecellentior quam sapientiores Indorum vivunt. (Folium alas avium imitatur longitudinum trinimum cubitorum, latitudinum duum). Fructum eortice mitit admirabilis succi dulcedine; ut uno quaternos satiet. Arbori nomen palaec, pomo ariena; plurima est in Sydracis, expeditionum Alexandri termino. Est et alia similis huic; dulcior pomo; sed interaneorum valetudine infesta” (Hist. Nat. xii. 12). Thus rendered, not too faithfully, by Philemon Holland: “Another tree there is in India, greater yet than the former; bearing a fruit much fairer, bigger, and sweeter than the figs aforesaid; and whereof the Indian Sages and Philosophers do ordinarily live. The leaf resembleth birds’ wings, carrying three cubits in length, and two in breadth. The fruit it putteth forth at the bark, having within it a wonderfull pleasant juice: insomuch as one of them is sufficient to give four men a competent and full refection. The tree’s name is Pala, and the fruit is called Ariena. Great plenty of them is in the country of the Sydraci, the utmost limit of Alexander the Great his expeditions and voyages. And yet there is another tree much like to this, and beareth a fruit more delectable that this Ariena, albeit the guts in a man’s belly it wringeth and breeds the bloudie flux” (i. 361).

Strange to say, the fruit thus described has been generally identified with the plantain; so generally that is about two cubits. . . . (3) There is another tree the fruit of which is long, and not straight but crooked, and sweet to the taste. But this gives rise to colic and dysentery ("“Allò té éstidv oð ó karpòs makròs kai ovd eídòs ãlll ñkldòs, éstú- mev éçv klykvs. Ótòs én òy kàkla dýgymò pòvì kai ðùvètevàm . . .") wherefore Alexander published a general order against eating it."—(Hist. Plant. iv. 4-5)

It is plain that Pliny and Theophrastus were using the same authority, but neither copying the whole of what he found in it.

The second tree, whose leaves were like birds’ wings and were used to fix upon helmets, is hard to identify. The first was, when we combine the additional characters quoted by Pliny but omitted by Theophrastus, certainly the jack; the third was, we suspect, the mango (q.v.). The terms long and crooked would, perhaps, answer better to the plantain, but hardly the unwholesome effect. As regards the uno quaternos satiet, compare Friar Jordanus below, on the jack: "Sufficiet circiter pro quinque personis." Indeed the whole of the Friar’s account is worth comparing with Pliny’s. Pliny says that it took four men to eat a jack, Jordanus says five. But an Englishman who had a plantation in Central Java told one of the present writers that he once cut a jack on his ground which took three men—not to eat—but to carry!

As regards the names given by Pliny it is hard to say anything to the purpose, because we do not know to which of the three trees jumbled together the names really applied. If pala really applied to the jack, possibly it may be the Skt. phalasa, or panasa. Or it may be merely phala, ‘a fruit,’ and the passage would then be a comical illustration of the persistence of Indian habits of mind. For a stranger in India, on asking the question, ‘What on earth is that?’ as he well might on his first sight of a jack-tree with its fruit, would at the present day almost certainly receive for answer: ‘Phal hai khudàwàn! ’—

‘It is a fruit, my lord!’ Ariena looks like hiranya, ‘golden,’ which might be an epithet of the jack, but we find no such specific application of the word.

Omitting Theophrastus and Pliny, the oldest foreign description of the Jack that we find is that by Hwen T'sang, who met with it in Bengal:

C. A.D. 650.—"Although the fruit of the pan-wa-so (Panasa) is gathered in great quantities, it is held in high esteem. These fruits are as big as a pumpkin; when ripe they are of a reddish yellow. Split in two they disclose inside a quantity of little fruits as big as crane's eggs; and when these are broken there exudes a juice of reddish-yellow colour and delicious flavour. Sometimes the fruit hangs on the branches, as with other trees; but sometimes it grows from the roots, like the fo-ling (Radix Chiniae), which is found under the ground."—Julien, iii. 75.

c. 1328.—"There are some trees that bear a very big fruit called chochi; and the fruit is of such size that one is enough for about five persons. There is another tree that has a fruit like that just named, and it is called Bloqui [a corruption of Malayul varikka, 'superior fruit'], quite as big and as sweet, but not of the same species. These fruits never grow upon the twigs, for these are not able to bear their weight, but only from the main branches, and even from the trunk of the tree itself, down to the very roots."—Friar Jordanus, 13-14.

c. 1390.—"And there be also trees which produce fruits so big that two will be a load for a strong man. And when they are eaten you must oil your hands and your mouth; they are of a fragrant odour and very savoury; the fruit is called chabassi." The name is probably corrupt (perhaps chacassài!). But the passage about oiling the hands and lips is aptly elucidated by the description in Baber's Memoirs (see below), a description matchless in its way, and which falls off sadly in the new translation by M. Pavelet de Courteille, which quite omits the "haggises."

c. 1385.—"The Shaki and Barki. This name is given to certain trees which live to a great age. Their leaves are like those of the walnut, and the fruit grows direct out of the stem of the tree. The fruits borne nearest to the ground are the barki; they are sweeter and better-flavoured than the Shaki . . . " etc. (much to the same effect as before).—Ibn Batuta, iii. 127; see also iv. 228.

c. 1350.—"There is again another wonderful tree called Chake-Borukel, as big as an oak. Its fruit is produced from the trunk, and not from the branches, and is something marvellous to see, being as big as a great lamb, or a child of three years old. It has a hard rind like that of our pine-cones, so that you have to cut it open with a hatchet; inside it has a pulp of surpassing flavour, with the sweetness of honey, and of the best Italian melon; and this also contains some 500 chestnuts of like flavour, which are capital eating when roasted."—John de' Marignolli, in Cathay, &e., 363.

c. 1440.—"There is a tree commonly found, the trunk of which bears a fruit resembling a pine-cone, but so big that a man can hardly lift it; the rind is green and hard, but still yields to the pressure of the finger. Inside there are some 250 or 300 pippins, as big as figs, very sweet in taste, and contained in separate membranes. These have each a kernel within, of a windy quality, of the consistence and taste of chestnuts, and which are roasted like chestnuts. And when cast among embers (to roast), unless you make a cut in them they will explode and jump out. The outer rind of the fruit is given to cattle. Sometimes the fruit is also found growing from the roots of the tree underground, and these fruits excel the others in flavour, wherefore they are sent as presents to kings and petty princes. These (moreover) have no kernels inside them. The tree itself resembles a large fig-tree, and the leaves are cut into fingers like the hand. The wood resembles box, and so it is esteemed for many uses. The name of the tree is Cachi" (i.e. Çachi or Tzaachi).—Nicolo de' Conti.

The description of the leaves . . . "foliis de medium palmini interiectis"—is the only slip in this admirable description. Conti must, in memory, have confounded the Jack with its congenor the bread-fruit (Artocarpus incisa or incainfollis). We have translated from Poggio's Latin, as the version by Mr. Winter Jones in India in the XVth Century is far from accurate.

1530. "Another is the kadhil. This has a very bad look and flavour (odour?). It looks like a sheep's stomach stuffed and made into a haggis. It has a sweet sickly taste. Within it are stones like a filbert. . . . The fruit is very adhesive, and on account of this adhesive quality many rub their mouths with oil before eating them. They grow not only from the branches and trunk, but from its root. You would say that the tree was all hung round with haggises!"—Leyden and Kirkine's Babur 325. Here kadhil represents the Hind. name kathal. The practice of oiling the lips on account of the "adhesive quality" (or as modern mortals would call it, 'stickiness') of the jack, is still usual among natives, and is the cause of a proverb on premature cautions: Gitch meh kathal, honth meh tel! "You have oiled your lips while the jack still hangs on the tree." We may observe that the allusion of the Indian cuckoo is in some of the Gangetic districts rendered by the natives as Kathal pakkâ! Kathal pakkâ! i.e. "Jack's ripe," the bird appearing at that season.

[1547.—"I consider it right to make over to them in perpetuity . . . one palm grove and an area for planting certain mango trees and jack trees (mangueiras e jaqueiras) situate in the village of Calanguta. . . ."—Archivo. Port. Orient., fasc. 5, No. 86.]

c. 1590.—"In Sircar Hajypoor there are plenty of the fruits called Kathul and Buddhal; some of the first are so large as to be too heavy for one man to carry."— Glazvon's Ayen, ii. 25. In Blochmann's ed. of the Persian text he reads barhal, [and so in Jarrett's trans. (ii. 152),] which is a Hind. name for the Artocarpus Lakoocba of Roxb.

1563. — "R. What fruit is that which is as big as the largest (coco) nuts?
"O. You just now ate the chestnuts from inside of it, and you said that roasted they were like real chestnuts. Now you shall eat the envelopes of these .

"R. They taste like a melon; but not so good as the better melons.
"O. True. And owing to their viscus nature they are ill to digest; or say rather they are not digested at all, and often issue from the body quite unchanged. I don't much use them. They are called in Malavar jacas; in Canarin and Guzeratí sans. . . .
"The tree is a great and tall one; and the fruits grow from the wood of the stem, right up to it, and not on the branches like other fruits."

—Garcia, t. 111.

[1598.—"A certain fruit that in Malabar is called iaca, in Canara and Gussurate Panar and Panasa, by the Arabians Penaz, by the Persians Panaz."
—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 20.]

1810. — "The jack-wood . . . at first yellow, becomes on exposure to the air of the colour of mahogany, and is of as fine a grain."—Maria Graham, 101.

1878.—"The monstrous jack that in its eccentric bulk contains a whole magazine of tastes and smells."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49-50.

It will be observed that the older authorities mention two varieties of the fruit by the names of shakí and barkí, or modifications of these, different kinds according to Jordanus, only from different parts of the tree according to Ibn Batuta. P. Vincenzo Maria (1672) also distinguishes two kinds, one of which he calls Giacha Barco, the other Giacha papo or girasuol. And Rheede, the great authority on Malabar plants, says (iii. 19):

"Of this tree, however, they reckon more than 30 varieties, distinguished by the quality of their fruit, but all may be reduced to two kinds; the fruit of one kind distinguished by plump and succulent pulp of delicious honey flavour, being the saraka; that of the other, filled with softer and more flabby pulp of inferior flavour, being the Tajakapu."

More modern writers seem to have less perception in such matters than the old travellers, who entered more fully and sympathetically into native tastes. Drury says, however, "There are several varieties, but what is called the Honey-jack is by far the sweetest and best."

"He that desireth to see more hereof let him read Ludovicus Romanus, in his fifth Booke and fifteene Chapter of his Navigacions, and Christopherus a Costa in his cap. of iaca, and Gracia ab Horto, in the Second Booke and fourth Chapter," saith the learned Paladanus . . . And if there be anybody so unreasonable, so say we too—by all means let him do so! [A part of this article is derived from the notes to Jordanus by one of the present writers. We may also add, in aid of such further investigation, that Paladanus is the Latinised name of v.d. Broecke, the commentator on Linschoten. "Ludovicus Romanus" is our old friend Varthema, and "Gracia ab Horto" is Garcia De Orta.]

JACKAL, s. The Canis aureus, L., seldom seen in the daytime, unless it be fighting with the vultures for carrion, but in shrieking multitudes, or rather what seem multitudes from the noise they make, entering the precincts of villages, towns, of Calcutta itself, after dark, and startling the newcomer with their hideous yells. Our word is not apparently Anglo-Indian, being taken from the Turkish chakal. But the Pers. shaghál is close, and Skt. srigála, 'the howler,' is probably the first form. The common Hind. word is qídar, ['the greedy one,' Skt. grídh]. The jackal takes the place of the fox as the object of hunting 'meets' in India; the indigenus fox being too small for sport.

1554.—"Non procul inde audio magnum clamorem et velut hominum irritantiumque voces. Interrogro quid sit; . . . narrant mihi ululatum esse bestiarum, quas Turcae Giacales vocant . . . ."—Busbog, Epist. i. p. 78.

1615.—"The inhabitants do nightly house their goates and sheepe for fear of Iaccales (in my opinion no other than Foxes), whereof an infinite number do lurke in the obscure vaults."—Sundys, Relation, &c., 205.

1839.—"The mention of Jackal-hunting in one of the letters (of Lord Minto) may remind some Anglo-Indians still living, of the days when the Calcutta hounds used to throw off at gun-fire."—Sat. Rev. Feb. 14.

JACK-SNIPE of English sportsmen is Gallinago gallinula, Linn., smaller than the common snipe, G. scolopacinus, Bonap.

JACKASS COPAL. This is a trade name, and is a capital specimen of Hobson-Jobson. It is, according to Sir R. Burton, [Zanzibar, i. 357], a corruption of chakazi. There are three qualities of copal in the Zanzibar market. 1. Sandarusi m'iti, or 'Tree Copal,' gathered directly from the tree which exudes it (Trachylophium Mossambicense). 2. Chakazi or chakazzi, dug from the soil, but seeming of recent origin, and priced on a par with No. 1. 3. The genuine Sandarusti, or true Copal (the Anima of the English market), which is also fossil, but of ancient production, and bears more than twice the price of 1 and 2 (see Sir J. Kirk in J. Linn. Soc. [Botany] for 1871). Of the meaning of chakazi we have no authentic information. But considering that a pitch made of copal and oil is used in Knutch, and that the cheaper copal would naturally be used for such a purpose, we may suggest as probable that the word is a corr. of jahāzi, and = 'ship-copal.'

JACQUETE, Town and Cape, n.p. The name, properly Jakad, formerly attached to a place at the extreme west horn of the Kathiawar Peninsula, where stands the temple of Dwarka (q.v.). Also applied by the Portuguese to the Gulf of Cutch. (See quotation from Camoes under DIUL-SIND.) The last important map which gives this name, so far as we are aware, is Aaron Arrow-smith's great Map of India, 1816, in which Dwarka appears under the name of Jugcut.

1555.—"Whilst the tide was at its greatest height we arrived at the gulf of Chakad, where we descried signs of fine weather, such as sea-horses, great snakes, turtles, and sea-weeds."—Sidai 'Ali, p. 77.

1726.—In Valentyne's map we find Jaquete marked as a town (at the west point of Kathiawar) and Enceada da Jaquete for the Gulf of Cutch.

1727.—"The next sea-port town to Buet, is Jigat. It stands on a Point of low Land, called Cape Jigat. The City makes a good Figure from the Sea, showing 4 or 5 high Steeples."—A. Hamilton, i. 135 ; [ed. 1744].

1813.—"Jigat Point . . . on it is a pagoda; the place where it stands was formerly called Jigat More, but now by the Hindoos Derecur (i.e. Dwarka, q.v.). 1841.—"Jigat Point called also Dwarka, from the large temple of Dwarka standing near the coast."—Horsburgh, Directory, 5th ed., i. 480.

JADE. s. The well-known mineral, so much prized in China, and so wonderfully wrought in that and other Asiatic countries; the yaskum of the Persians; nephrite of mineralogists.

The derivation of the word has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. We were at one time inclined to connect it with the yada-tash, the yada stone used by the nomads of Central Asia in conjuring for rain. The stone so used was however, according to P. Hyakinth, quoted in a note with which we were favoured by the lamented Prof. Anton Schiefer, a bezar (q.v.).

Major Raverty, in his translation of the Tabakât-i-Nâşiri, in a passage referring to the regions of Tukhâristân and Bâmiân, has the following: “That tract of country has also been famed and celebrated, to the uttermost parts of the countries of the world, for its mines of gold, silver, rubies, and crystal, bejâdah [jade], and other [precious] things” (p. 421). On bejâdah his note runs: “The name of a gem, by some said to be a species of ruby, and by others a species of sapphire; but jade is no doubt meant.” This interpretation seems however chiefly, if not altogether, suggested by the name; whilst the epithets compounded of bejâda, as given in dictionaries, suggest a red mineral, which jade rarely is. And Prof. Max Müller, in an interesting letter to the Times, dated Jan. 10, 1880, states that the name jade was not known in Europe till after the discovery of America, and that the jade brought from America was called by the Spaniards piedra de ijâda, because it was supposed to cure pain in the groin (Sp. ijada); for like reasons to which it was called lapis nephriticus, whence nephrite (see Bailey, below). Skeat, s.v.: “It is of unknown origin; but probably Oriental. Prof. Cowell finds yeâl a material out of which ornaments are made, in the Divyâvadâna; but it does not seem to be Sanskrit.” Prof. Müller’s etymology seems incontrovertible; but the present work has afforded various examples of curious etymological coincidences of this kind. [Prof. Max Müller’s etymology is now accepted by the N.E.D. and by Prof. Skeat in the new edition of his Concise Dict. The latter adds that ijâda is connected with the Latin ilia.]

1730.—“Jade, a greenish Stone, bordering on the colour of Olive, esteemed for its Hardness and Virtues by the Turks and Poles, who adorn their fine Sabres with it; and said to be a preservative against the nephriticick Colick.”—Bailey’s Eng. Dict. s.v.

JADOO, s. Hind. from Pers. jâdâ, conjuring, magic, hocus-pocus.

[1820.—“‘Pray, sir,’ said the barber, ‘is that Sanscrit, or what language? ’ ‘May be it is jadoo,’ I replied, in a solemn and deep voice.”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 127.]

JADDOGUR, s. Properly Hind. jâdâghar, ‘conjuring-house’ (see the last). The term commonly applied by natives to a Freemasons’ Lodge, when there is one, at an English station. On the Bombay side it is also called Shaitân khâna (see Burton’s Sind Revisited), a name consonant to the ideas of an Italian priest who intimated to one of the present writers that he had heard the raising of the devil was practised at Masonic meetings, and asked his friend’s opinion as to the fact. In S. India the Lodge is called Talai-vetta-Koivil, ‘Cut-head Temple,’ because part of the rite of initiation is supposed to consist in the candidate’s head being cut off and put on again.

JAFNA, JAFNAPATÁM, n.p. The very ancient Tamil settlement, and capital of the Tamil kings on the singular peninsula which forms the northernmost part of Ceylon. The real name is, according to Emerson Tennent, Valpoorann, and it is on the whole probable that this name is identical with the Galaba (Prom.) of Ptolemy. [The Madras Gloss. gives the Tamil name as Tâşhpânam, from yâzâ-pânan, ‘a lute-player’; ‘called after a blind minstrel of that name from the Chola country, who by permission of the Singhalase king obtained possession of Jaffna, then uninhabited, and introduced there a colony of the Tamil people.’] 1553.—“... the Kingdom Triquinamalé, which at the upper end of its coast adjoins another called Jafnapatam, which stands at the northern part of the island.”—Barros, III. ii. cap. i.

c. 1666.—In Cesare de’ Federici it is written Gianifanpatan.—Ramusio, iii. 390v.
[JAFFRY, s. A screen or lattice-work, made generally of bamboo, used for various purposes, such as a fence, a support for climbing plants, &c. The ordinary Pers. zafrār is derived from a person of the name of Yafrār; but Mr. Platts suggests that in the sense under consideration it may be a cor. of Ar. zafrār, zafrī, ‘a braided lock.’

[1832.—“Of vines, the branches must also be equally spread over the jaftry, so that light and heat may have access to the whole.”—Trans. Agri. Hort. Soc. Ind. ii. 202.]

JAGGERY, s. Coarse brown (or almost black) sugar, made from the sap of various palms. The wild date tree (Phoenix sylvestris, Roxb.), Hind. khujār, is that which chiefly supplies palm-sugar in Guzerat and Coromandel, and almost alone in Bengal. But the palmyra, the carota, and the coco-palm all give it; the first as the staple of Tinnevelly and northern Ceylon; the second chiefly in southern Ceylon, where it is known to Europeans as the Jaggery Palm (kistal of natives); the third is much drawn for toddy (q.v.) in the coast districts of Western India, and this is occasionally boiled for sugar. Jaggery is usually made in the form of small round cakes. Great quantities are produced in Tinnevelly, where the cakes used to pass as a kind of currency (as cakes of salt used to pass in parts of Africa, and in Western China), and do even yet to some small extent. In Bombay all rough unrefined sugar-stuff is known by this name; and it is the title under which all kinds of half-prepared sugar is classified in the tariff of the Railways there. The word jaggery is only another form of sugar (q.v.), being like it a cor. of the Skt. sarkara, Konkani sakkarā, [Malayāl. chakkār, whence it passed into Port. jagara, jagrā].

1516.—“Sugar of palms, which they call xagara.”—Barbosa, 59.

1553.—Exports from the Maldives “also of fish-oil, coco-nuts, and jagara, which is made from these after the manner of sugar.”—Barros, Dec. III. liv. iii. cap. 7.

1561.—“Jagre, which is sugar of palm-trees.”—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 592.

1563.—“And after they have drawn this pot of cura, if the tree gives much they draw another, of which they make sugar, prepared either by sun or fire, and this they call jagra.”—García, i. 67.

c. 1567.—“There come every yeere from Cochín and from Cananor tenne or fifteene great Shippes (to Chaul) laden with great nuts . . . and with sugar made of the selfe same nuts called Giagra.”—Caesar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 344.

1598.—“Of the aforesaid sura they likewise make sugar, which is called jagra; they seeth the water, and set it in the sun, whereof it becometh sugar, but it is little esteemed, because it is of a browne colour.”—Linnehoten, 102; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

1616.—“Some small quantity of wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Raak (see ARRACK), distilled from Sugar, and a spicy rinde of a tree called Jagra.”—Terry, ed. 1695, p. 365.

1727.—“The Produce of the Samorin’s Country is . . . Cocoa-Nut, and that tree produced Jaggery, a kind of sugar, and Copera (see COPRAH), or the kernels of the Nut dried.”—A. Hamilton, i. 906; [ed. 1744, i. 308].

c. 1750-60.—“Arrack, a coarse sort of sugar called Jagree, and vinegar are also extracted from it” (coco-palm).—Grose, i. 47.

1807.—“The Tarti or fermented juice, and the Jargory or insipissated juice of the Palmira tree . . . are in this country more esteemed than those of the wild date, which is contrary to the opinion of the Bengalese.”—F. Buchanan, Mysore, &c., i. 5.

1880.—“In this state it is sold as juggery in the bazaars, at about three farthings per pound.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, iii. 524.

JAGHEER, JAGHIRE, s. Pers. jāgār, lit. ‘place-holding,’ A hereditary assignment of land and of its rent as annuity.

[1617.—“Hee quittes divers small Jaggers to the King.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 449.]

c. 1666.—“ . . . Not to speak of what they finger out of the Pay of every Horsemans, and of the number of the Horses; which certainly amounts to very considerable Pensions, especially if they can obtain good Jah-ghirs, that is, good Lands for their Pensions.”—Bernier, E.T. 66; [ed. Constable, 213].

1673.—“It (Surat) has for its Maintenance the Income of six Villages; over which the Governor sometimes presides, sometimes not, being in the Jaggea, or diocese of another.”—Fryer, 120.

“Jageah, an Annuity.”—Ibid. Index, vi.

1678.—“I say, Madam, I know nothing of books; and yet I believe upon a land-carriage fishery, a stamp act, or a jaghire, I can talk my two hours without feeling the want of them.”—Mr. Lofty, in The Good-Natured Man, Act ii.
1778.—"Should it be more agreeable to the parties, Sir Matthew will settle upon Sir John and his Lady, for their joint lives, a jaghire.

"Sir John.—A Jaghire?

"Thomas.—The term is Indian, and means an annual Income."—Foote, The Nabob, i. 1.

We believe the traditional stage pronunciation in these passages is Jag Hire (assonant in both syllables to Quag Mire); and this is also the pronunciation given in some dictionaries.

1778.—"... Jaghires, which were always rents arising from lands."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 52.

1809.—"He was nominally in possession of a larger Jaghire."—Ed. Valentinia, i. 401.

A territory adjoining Fort St. George was long known as the Jaghire, or the Company's Jaghire, and is often so mentioned in histories of the 18th century. This territory, granted to the Company by the Nabob of Arcot in 1750 and 1763, nearly answers to the former Collectorate of Chingalput and present Collectorate of Madras.

[In the following the reference is to the Jirgah or tribal council of the Pathan tribes on the N.W. frontier.

[1900.—"No doubt upon the occasion of Lord Curzon's introduction to the Waziris and the Mohmuns, he will inform their Jagirs that he has long since written a book about them."—Contemporary Rec. Aug. p. 282.]

JAGHEERDAR, s. P.—H. jagir-där, the holder of a jagheer.

[1813.—"... in the Mahatta empire the principal Jaghiredars, or nobles, appear in the field. ..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 328.]

1826.—"The Resident, many officers, men of rank... jagheerdars, Brahmins, and Pandits, were present, assembled round my father."—Pandurang Hari, 389; [ed. 1873, ii. 259].

1883.—"The Sikhs administered the country by means of jagheerdars, and paid them by their jagheers: the English administered it by highly paid British officers, at the same time that they endeavoured to lower the land-tax, and to introduce grand material reforms."—Bowsworth Smith, L. of Ld. Lawrence, i. 373.

JAIL-KHANA, s. A hybrid word for 'a gaol,' commonly used in the Bengal Presidency.

JAIN, s. and adj. The non-Brahmanical sect so called; believed to represent the earliest heretics of Buddhism, at present chiefly to be found in the Bombay Presidency. There are a few in Mysore, Canara, and in some parts of the Madras Presidency, but in the Middle Ages they appear to have been numerous on the coast of the Peninsula generally. They are also found in various parts of Central and Northern India and Behar. The Jains are generally merchants, and some have been men of enormous wealth (see Colebrooke's Essays, i. 378 seqq.; [Lassen, in Ind. Antiq. ii. 193 seqq., 268 seqq.]). The name is Skt. jaina, meaning a follower of jina. The latter word is a title applied to certain saints worshipped by the sect in the place of gods; it is also a name of the Buddhists. An older name for the followers of the sect appears to have been Nirgranthaka, 'without bond,' properly the title of Jain ascetics only (otherwise Yatis), and in particular of the Digambara or 'sky-clad,' naked branch. (Burnell, S. Indian Paleography, p. 47, note.)

[c. 1590.—"Jaina. The founder of this wonderful system was Jina, also called Arhat, or Arhant."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, iii. 183.]

a. A title borne by certain chiefs in Kutch, in Kathiawar, and on the lower Indus. The derivation is very obscure (see Elliot, i. 495). The title is probably Bilāch originally. There are several Jams in Lower Sind and its borders, and notably the Jām of Las Bela State, a well-known dependency of Kelat, bordering the sea. [Mr. Longworth Dames writes: "I do not think the word is of Balochi origin, although it is certainly made use of in the Balochi language. It is rather Sindhi, in the broad sense of the word, using Sindhi as the natives do, referring to the tribes of the Indus valley without regard to the modern boundaries of the province of Sind. As far as I know, it is used as a title, not by Baloches, but by indigenous tribes of Rājput or Jat origin, now, of course, all Musulmans. The Jām of Las Bela belongs to a tribe of this nature known as the Jāmhāt. In the Dera Ghāzī Khān District it is used by certain local notables of this class, none of them Baloches. The principal tribe there using it is the Udhāna. It is also an honorific title among the Mochis of Dera Ghāzī Khān town."]

b. A nautical measure, Ar. zâm, pl. awwâm. It occurs in the form gleme in a quotation of 1614 under JASK. It is repeatedly used in the Mohit of Sidi 'Ali, published in the J. As. Soc. Bengal. It would appear from J. Prinsep's remarks there that the word is used in various ways. Thus Baron J. Hammer writes to Prinsep: "Concerning the measure of awwâm the first section of the IIId. chapter explains as follows: 'The zâm is either the practical one (ârîfî), or the rhetorical (istîlâhî—but this the acute Prinsep suggests should be oštârlâbî, 'pertaining to the divisions of the astrolabe'). The practical is one of the 8 parts into which day and night are divided; the rhetorical (but read the ostrolabic) is the 8th part of an inch (îsâba) in the ascension and descension of the stars; . . . an explanation which helps me not a bit to understand the true measure of a zâm, in the reckoning of a ship's course.' Prinsep then elucidates this: The zâm in practical parlance is said to be the 8th part of day and night; it is in fact a nautical watch or Hindu pahar (see Puhan). Again, it is the 8th part of the ordinary inch, like the jau or barleycorn of the Hindus (the 8th part of an angul or digit), of which jau, zâm is possibly a corruption. Again, the isâba or inch, and the zâm or ¼ of an inch, had been transferred to the rude angle-instruments of the Arab navigators; and Prinsep deduces from statements in Sidi 'Ali's book that the isâba' was very nearly equal to 96° and the zâm to 12°. Prinsep had also found on enquiry among Arab mariners, that the term zâm was still well known to nautical people as ¼ of a geographical degree, or 12 nautical miles, quite confirmatory of the former calculation; it was also stated to be still applied to terrestrial measurements (see J.A.S.B. v. 642-3).

"Un marin m'a rapporté qu'il avait fait la traversée de Sériba (Sarbaza) à la Chine dans un Semboug (see SAMBOOK). 'Nous avions parcouru,' dit-il, 'un espace de cinqante zâmâ, lorsqu'une tempête fondit sur notre embarcation . . . Ayant fait de l'eau, nous remîmes à la voile vers le Senf, suivant ses instructions, et nous y abordâmes sains et saufs, après un voyage de quinze zâmâ."—Ibid. pp. 190-91.

1554.—"26th Voyage from Calicut to Kardâfun." (see GUARDÂFUI.)

". . . you run from Calicut to Kolsaini (i.e. Kalpeni, one of the Laccadive Isds.) two zâms in the direction of W. by S., the 8 or 9 zâms W.S.W. (this course is in the 9 degrees channel through the Laccadives), then you may rejoice as you have got clear of the islands of Fâd, from thence W. by N. and W.N.W. till the pole is 4 inches and a quarter, and then true west to Kardâfun."

"27th Voyage, from Diâ to Malucca."

"Leaving Diâ you go first S.S.E. till the pole is 5 inches, and side then towards the land, till the distance between it and the ship is six zâms; from thence you steer S.S.E. . . . you must not side all at once but by degrees, first till the jâfri'd din (28 and ã in the Little Bear) are made by a quarter less than 8 inches, from thence to S.E. till the jâfri'd din are 7 inches, from thence true east at a rate of 18 zâms, then you have passed Ceylon."—The Mohît, in J.A.S.B. v. 495.

The meaning of this last routier is: "Steer S.S.E. till you are in 8° N. Lat. (lat. of Cape Comorin); make then a little more easterly, but keep 72 miles between you and the coast of Ceylon till you find the ß and ã of Ursâ Minor have an altitude of only 12° 24' (i.e. till you are in N. Lat. 6° or 5°), and then steer due east. When you have gone 216 miles you will be quite clear of Ceylon."

1625.—"We cast anchor under the island of Kharg, which is distant from Cais, which we left behind us, 24 giam. Giam is a measure used by the Arab and Persian pilots in the Persian Gulf; and every giam is equal to 3 leagues; insomuch that from Cais to Kharg we had made 72 leagues."—P. della Valle, ii. 816.

JAMMOO, JUMBOO, s. The Rose-apple, Eugenia jambos, L. Jambosa vulgaris, Decand.; Skt. jambh, Hind. jâm, jambh, jambrîl, &c. This is the use in Bengal, but there is great confusion in application, both colloquially and in books. The name jambh is applied in some parts of India to the exotic guava (q.v.), as well as to other species of Eugenia; including the jâmun (see JAMMOON), with which the rose-apple is often confounded in books. They are very different fruits, though they have both been classed by Linnaeus under the genus Eugenia (see further remarks under JAMMOON). [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is applied by the Malays both to the rose-apple and the guava, and Wilkinson (Dict. s.v.) notes a large number of fruits to which the name jambū is applied."

Garcia de Orta mentions the rose-apple under the name Iambos, and says (1563) that it had been recently introduced into Goa from Malacca. This may have been the Eugenia Malaccensis, L., which is stated in Forbes Watson's Catalogue of nomenclature to be called in Bengal Malābā Jamrā, and in Tamil Malākā maram i.e. 'Malacca tree.' The Skt. name jambū is, in the Malay language, applied with distinguishing adjectives to all the species.

[1598.—"The trees whereon the Iambos do grow are as great as Plumtrees."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 31.]

1672.—P. Vincenzo Maria describes the Giambò India with great precision, and also the Giambò di China—no doubt J. malaccensis—but at too great length for extract, pp. 351-352.

1727.—"Their Jambo Malacce (at Goa) is very beautiful and pleasant."—A. Hamilton, i. 255; ed. 1744, i. 258.

1810.—"The jumbo, a species of rose-apple, with its flower like crimson tassels covering every part of the stem."—Maria Graham, 22.

JAMES AND MARY, n.p. The name of a famous sand-bank in the Hooghly R. below Calcutta, which has been fatal to many a ship. It is mentioned under 1748, in the record of a survey of the river quoted in Long, p. 10. It is a common allegation that the name is a corruption of the Hind. words jał mari, with the supposed meaning of 'dead water.' But the real origin of the name dates, as Sir G. Birdwood has shown, out of India Office records, from the wreck of a vessel called the "Royal James and Mary," in September 1694, on that sand-bank (Letter to the Court, from Chuttanuttac, Dec. 19, 1694). [Report on Old Records, 90.] This shoal appears by name in a chart belonging to the English Pilot, 1711.

JAMMA, s. P.—H. jāma, a piece of native clothing. Thus, in composition, see PYJAMMAS. Also stuff for clothing, &c., e.g. mom'-jama, wax-cloth. ["The jama may have been brought by the Aryans from Central Asia, but as it is still now seen it is thoroughly Indian and of ancient date" (Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187 seq.)]

1813.—"The better sort (of Hindus) wear...a jama, or long gown of white calico, which is tied round the middle with a fringed or embroidered sash."—Forbes, Or. Mon. 2nd ed. i. 52.

JAMOON, s. Hind. jāmun, jāman, jāmlī, &c. The name of a poor fruit common in many parts of India, and apparently in E. Africa, the Eugenia jambolana, Lamk. (Calyptroanthes jambolana of Willdenow, Syzygium jambolanum of Decand.) This seems to be confounded with the Eugenia jambos, or Rose-apple (see JAMBOO, above), by the author of a note on Leyden's Baber which Mr. Erskine justly corrects (Baber's own account is very accurate), by the translators of Ibn Batuta, and apparently, as regards the botanical name, by Sir R. Burton. The latter gives jamlī as the Indian, and zam as the Arabic name. The name jambū appears to be applied to this fruit at Bombay, which of course promotes the confusion spoken of. In native practice the stones of this fruit have been alleged to be a cure for diabetes, but European trials do not seem to have confirmed this.

c. 13.—"The inhabitants (of Mombasa) gather also a fruit which they call jamāi, and which resembles an olive; it has a stone like the olive, but has a very sweet taste."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. Elsewhere the translators write thumunūn (vii. 128, iv. 114, 220), a spelling indicated in the original, but surely by some error.

c. 1530.—"Another is the jaman...It is on the whole a fine looking tree. Its fruit resembles the black grape, but has a more acid taste, and is not very good."—Baber, 325. The note on this runs: "This, Dr. Hunter says, is the Eugenia Jambolana, the rose-apple (Eugenia jambolana, but not the rose-apple, which is now called Eugenia jambu.—D.W.). The jaman has no resemblance to the rose-apple; it is more like an oblong sloe than anything else, but grows on a tall tree."

1562.—"I will eat of those olives,—at least they look like such; but they are very astrigent (ponticus) as if binding,—and yet they do look like ripe Cordova olives.

"O. They are called jambolones, and grow wild in a wood that looks like a myrtle grove; in its leaves the tree resembles the arbatus; but like the jack, the people of the country don't hold this fruit for very wholesome."—Garcia, f. 111y.
1859.—"The Indian jamli... It is a noble tree, which adorns some of the coast villages and plantations, and it produces a damson-like fruit, with a pleasant sub-acid flavour."—Burton, in J.R.G.S. ix. 36.

JANCADA, s. This name was given to certain responsible guides in the Nair country who escorted travellers from one inhabited place to another, guaranteeing their security with their own lives, like the Bhâts of Guzerat. The word is Malayâl. channâdagâm (i.e. changndgam, [the Madras Gloss. writes channntam, and derives it from Skt. sanghâta, 'union'],) with the same spelling as that of the word given as the origin of jangar or jangada, 'a raft.' These jancadas or jangadas seem also to have been placed in other confidential and dangerous charges. Thus:

1643.—"This man who so resolutely was one of the jangadas of the Pagode. They are called jangadas because the kings and lords of those lands, according to a custom of theirs, send as guardians of the houses of the Pagodes in their territories, two men as captains, who are men of honour and good cavaliers. Such guardians are called jangadas, and have soldiers of guard under them, and are as it were the Counsellors and Ministers of the affairs of the pagodes, and they receive their maintenance from the establishment and its revenues. And sometimes the king changes them and appoints others."—Correa, iv. 328.

c. 1610.—"I travelled with another Captain... who had with him these Jangai, who are the Nair guides, and who are found at the gates of towns to act as escort to those who require them. Every one takes them, the weak for safety and protection, those who are stronger, and travel in great companies and well armed, take them only as witnesses that they are not aggressors in case of any dispute with the Nairs."—Pyraer de Lasal, ch. xxv.; [Hak. Soc. i. 339, and see Mr. Gray's note in loco].

1672.—"The safest of all journeyings in India are those through the Kingdom of the Nairs and the Samorin, if you travel with Giancadas, the most perilous if you go alone. These Giancadas are certain heathen men, who venture their own life and the lives of their kinsfolk for small remuneration, to guarantee the safety of travellers."—P. Vincazo Maria, 127.

See also Chungathum, in Burton's Goa, p. 193.

JANGAR, s. A raft. Port. jangada. ["A double platform canoe made by placing a floor of boards across two boats, with a bamboo railing." (Madras Gloss.)] This word, chiefly colloquial, is the Tamil-Malayâl. shanggadam, channâtam (for the derivation of which see JANCADA). It is a word of particular interest as being one of the few Dravidian words, [but perhaps ultimately of Skt. origin], preserved in the remains of classical antiquity, occurring in the Periplus as our quotation shows. Bluteau does not call the word an Indian term.

c. 80-90.—"The vessels belonging to these places (Camara, Poduèc, and Sopatmos on the east coast) which hug the shore to Limyricê (Dimyricê), and others also called 2âyga ïra, which consist of the largest canoes of single timbers lashed together; and again those biggest of all which sail to Chryse and Ganges, and are called Kolavdroforvo."—Periplus, in Müller's Geog. Gr. Mén., i. "The first part of this name for boats or ships is most probably the Tam. kûñinda= hollowed : the last 8âdam=boat."—Burnell, S.I. Palæography, 612.

c. 1504.—"He held in readiness many jangadas of timber."—Correa, Lendas, i. 476.

c. 1540.—"... and to that purpose had already commanded two great Rafts (jangadas), covered with dry wood, barrels of pitch and other combustible stuff, to be placed at the entering into the Port."—Pinto (orig. cap. xli.), in Cogan, p. 56.

1558.—"... the fleet... which might consist of more than 200 rowing vessels of all kinds, a great part of them combined into jangadas in order to carry a greater mass of men, and among them two of these contrivances on which were 150 men."—Barros, ii. i. 5.

1598.—"Such as stayed in the ship, some tooke bords, deals, and other pieces of wood, and bound them together (which ye Portingals call Jangadas) every man what they could catch, all hoping to save their lives, but of all those there came but two men safe to shore."—Linschoten, p. 147; [Hak. Soc. ii. 181; and see Mr. Gray on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 53 seq.].

1602.—"For his object was to see if he could rescue them in jangadas, which he ordered him immediately to put together of baulks, planks, and oars."—Costo, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

1756.—"... having set fire to a jungodo of Boats, these driving down towards the Fleet, compelled them to weigh."—Capt. Jackson, in Dalrymple's Or. Rep. i. 199.

c. 1793.—"Nous nous remimes en chemin à six heures du matin, et passâmes la rivière dans un sangarie ou canot fait d'un palmier creusé."—Haafner, ii. 77.

JANGOMAY, ZANGOMAY, JAMAHEY, &c., n.p. The town and state of Siamese Laos, called by the Burmese Зимрень, by the Siamese Xieng-
JAPAN

Mr. Giles says: "Our word is from Jeh-pun, the Dutch orthography of the Japanese Nippon." What the Dutch have to do with the matter is hard to see. ["Our word 'Japan' and the Japanese Nihon or Nippon, are alike corruptions of Jih-pun, the Chinese pronunciation of the characters (meaning) literally 'sun-origin.'" (Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 221.)] A form closely resembling Japán, as we pronounce it, must have prevailed, among foreigners at least, in China as early as the 13th century; for Marco Polo calls it Chipan-gu or Jipan-ku, a name representing the Chinese Zhi-pen-Kwo ('Sun-origin-Kingdom'), the Kingdom of the Sunrise or Extreme Orient, of which the word Nipon or Niphon, used in Japan, is said to be a dialectic variation. But as there was a distinct gap in Western tradition between the 14th century and the 16th, no doubt we, or rather the Portuguese, acquired the name from the traders at Malacca, in the Malay forms, which Crawford gives as Japing and Japang.

1505.—"... and not far off they took a ship belonging to the King of Calichut; out of which they have brought me certain jewels of good value; including Moccece pearls worth 8,000 ducats; also three astrological instruments of silver, such as are not used by our astrologers, large and well-wrought, which I hold in the highest estimation. They say that the King of Calichut had sent the said ship to an island called Saponin to obtain the said instruments..."

—Letter from the K. of Portugal (Dom Manuel) to the K. of Castile (Ferdinand). Reprint by A. Burnett, 1881, p. 8.

1521.—"In going by this course we passed near two very rich islands; one is in twenty degrees latitude in the antarctic pole, and is called Cipanghu."—Pigafetta, Magellans Voyage, Hak. Soc., 67. Here the name appears to be taken from the chart or Mappe-Monde which was carried on the voyage. Cipanghu appears by that name on the globe of Martin Behaim (1492), but 20 degrees north, not south, of the equator.

1545.—"Now as for us three Portugals, having nothing to sell, we employed our time either in fishing, hunting, or seeing the Temples of these Gentiles, which were very sumptuous and rich, wherewith the Benza, who are their priests, received us. very courteously, for indeed it is the custom of those of Jappon (do Japão) to be exceeding kind and courteous."—Pinto (orig. cap. xxxiv.), in Cogan, E.T. p. 173.

1563.—"After leaving to the eastward the isles of the Legnions (see LEW CHEW) and of the Japons (dos Japões), and the great province of Meaco, which for its great size we know not whether to call it Island or Continent, the coast of China still runs on, and those parts pass beyond the antipodes of the meridian of Lisbon."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1572.—"Esta meia escondida, que responde De longe a China, donde vem buscar-se, De Japão, onde nasce la prata fina, Que ilustrada será o' a Lei divina,"—Cambões, x. 131.

By Burton:

"This Realm, half-shadowed, China's empery afar reflecting, whither ships are bound, is the Japan, whose virgin silver mine shall shine still sleeker with the Law Divine."— 1727.—"Japan, with the neighbouring Islands under its Dominions, is about the magnitude of Great Britain."—A. Hamilton, ii. 306; [ed. 1744, ii. 305].

JARGON, JARCOON, ZIRCON, s.

The name of a precious stone often mentioned by writers of the 16th century, but respecting the identity of which there seems to be a little obscurity. The English Encyclopaedia, and the Times Reviewer of Emanuel's book On Precious Stones (1866), identify it with the hyacinth or jacinth; but Lord Stanley of Alderley, in his translation of Barbosa (who mentions the stone several times under the form giagonza and jagonzas), on the authority of a practical jeweller identifies it with conordum. This is probably an error. Jagonzas looks like a corruption of jacinthus. And Haiy's Mineralogy identifies jargon and hyacinth under the common name of zircon. Dana's Mineralogy states that the term hyacinth is applied to these stones, consisting of a silicate of zirconia, "which present bright colours, considerable transparency, and smooth shining surfaces. . . . The variety from Ceylon, which is colourless; and has a smoky tinge, and is therefore sold for inferior diamonds, is sometimes called jargon" (Syst. of Mineral., 3rd ed., 1850, 379-380; [Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. xxiv. 789 seq.]).

The word probably comes into European languages through the Span. azarcon, a word of which there is a curious history in Dozy and Engelmann. Two Spanish words and their distinct Arabic originals have been confounded in the Span. Dict. of Cobarruvias (1611) and others following him. Sp. sarca is 'a woman with blue eyes,' and this comes from Ar. saraka, fem. of asrak, 'blue.' This has led the lexicographers above referred to astray, and azarcon has been by them defined as a 'blue earth, made of burnt lead.' But azarcon really applies to 'red-lead,' or vermilion, as does the Port. sarado, azarado, and its proper sense is as the Dict. of the Sp. Academy says (after repeating the inconsistent explanation and etymology of Cobarruvias), "an intense orange-colour, Lat. color aureus." This is from the Ar. zkank, which in Ibn Baithear is explained as synonymous with salikân, and asranj, "which the Greeks call santisx,' i.e. cinnabar or vermilion (see Sontheimer's Elm Beithar, i. 44, 530). And the word, as Dozy shows, occurs in Pliny under the form syricum (see quotations below). The eventual etymology is almost certainly Persian, either zargun, 'gold colour,' as Marcel Devic suggests, or azargun (perhaps more properly azargun, from azar, 'fire'), 'flame-colour,' as Dozy thinks.

"Inter facticia est et Syricum, quo minium sublini diximus. Fit autem Sinopide et sandyce mixtis."—Ibid. XXXV. vii.

1796.—"The artists of Ceylon prepare rings and heads of canes, which contain a complete assortment of all the precious stones found in that island. These assemblages are called Jargons de Ceilan, and arc so called because they consist of a collection of gems which reflect various colours."—Fra Paolino, Eng. ed. 1800, 393. (This is a very loose translation. Fra Paolino evidently thought Jargon was a figurative name applied to this mixture of stones, as it is to a mixture of languages).

1813.—"The colour of Jargons is grey, with tinges of green, blue, red, and yellow."—I. M'Gee's Treatise on Diamonds, &c. 119.

1860.—"The 'Matura Diamonds,' which are largely used by the native jewellers, consist of zircon, found in the syenite, not only uncoloured, but also of pink and yellow.
tints, the former passing for rubies."— Tennent's Ceylon, i. 38.

JAROOL, s. The Lagerstroemia reginææ, Roxb. H.-Beng. jàrât, jàral. A tree very extensively diffused in the forests of Eastern and Western India and Pegu. It furnishes excellent boat-timber, and is a splendid flowering tree. "An exceedingly glorious tree of the Concans jungles, in the month of May robed as in imperial purple, with its terminal panicles of large showy purple flowers. I for the first time introduced it largely into Bombay gardens, and called it Flos reginææ"—Sir G. Birdwood, MS.

1850.—"Their forests are frequented by timber-cutters, who fell jarooll, a magnificent tree with red wood, which, though soft, is durable under water, and therefore in universal use for boat building."—Hooker, Hym. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 318.

1855.—"Much of the way from Rangoon also, by the creeks, to the great river, was through actual dense forest, in which the jarooll, covered with purple blossoms, made a noble figure."—Blackwood's Mag., May 1856, 538.

JASK, JASQUES, CAPE, n.p. Ar. Râs Jîshak, a point on the eastern side of the Gulf of Ómân, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, and 6 miles south of a port of the same name. The latter was frequented by the vessels of the English Company whilst the Portuguese held Órmos. After the Portuguese were driven out of Órmos (1622) the English trade was moved to Gombroon (q.v.). The peninsula of which Cape Jask is the point, is now the terminus of the submarine cable from Bushire; and a company of native infantry is quartered there. Ðâsk appears in Yâkût as "a large island between the land of Ómân and the Island of Kish." No island corresponds to this description, and probably the reference is an incorrect one to Jask (see Dict. de la Perse, p. 149). By a curious misapprehension, Cape Jasques seems to have been Englished as Cape James (see Dunn's Or. Navigator, 1780, p. 94).

1553.—"Crossing from this Cape Moçandan to that opposite to it called Jaque, which with it forms the mouth of the strait, we enter on the second section (of the coast) according to our division..."—Barros, i. ix. i.

1572.—"Mas deixemos o estreito, e o conhecido Cabo de Jaque, ditto já Carpella, Com todo o seu ferreno mal querido Da natura, e dos dons usados della..."—Camões, x. 105.

By Burton:

"But now the Narrows and their noted head Cape Jask, Carpella called by those of yore, quit we, the dry terrene scant favoured by Nature niggard of her normal store...."

1614.—"Per Postscript. November 22, 1614, in India Office; [Printed in Foster, Letters, ii. 177, and compare ii. 145].

1617.—"There came news at this time that there was an English ship lying inside the Cape of Rosalgate (see ROSALGAT) with the intention of making a fort at Jassaques in Persia, as a point from which to plunder our cargoes..."—Boccaro, 672.

1630.—"Jasques." (See under JUNK.)

1727.—"I'll travel along the Sea-coast, towards Indostan, or the Great Mogul's Empire. All the Shore from Jassques to Sinda, is inhabited by uncivilized People, who admit of no Commerce with Strangers..."—A. Hamilton, i. 115; [ed. 1744].

JASOOS, s. Ar.-H. jâsûs, 'a spy.'

1803.—"I have some Jasoosees, selected by Col. C—'s brahmin for their stupidity, who might not pry into state secrets, who go to Sindia's camp, remain there a phaur (see PUHUR) in fear..."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 62.

JAUN, s. This is a term used in Calcutta, and occasionally in Madras, of which the origin is unknown to the present writers. [Mr. H. Beveridge points out that it is derived from H.—Beng. yàn, defined by Sir G. Hanghton: "a vehicle, any means of conveyance, a horse, a carriage, a palkee." It is Skt. yâna, with the same meaning. The initial ya in Bengali is usually pronounced ja. The root is ya, 'to go.' It is, or was, applied to a small palanquin carriage, such as is commonly used by business men in going to their offices, &c.

c. 1836.—

"Who did not know that office Jaun of pale Pomegranate, With its drab and yellow lining, and picked out black between, Which down the Esplanade did go at the ninth hour of the day. . . ."

Bote-Ponjia, by H. M. Parker, ii. 215.

To Jaun Bazar she came."

R. Kipling, Ballad of Fisher's Boarding House.

JAVA, n.p. This is a geographical name of great antiquity, and occurs, as our first quotation shows, in Ptolemy's Tables. His ίααβαίον represents with singular correctness what was probably the Prakrit or popular form of Yava-dvipa (see under DIU and MALDIVES), and his interpretation of the Sanskrit is perfectly correct. It will still remain a question whether Yava was not applied to some cereal more congenial to the latitude than barley, or was (as is possible) an attempt to give an Indian meaning to some aboriginal name of similar sound. But the sixth of our quotations, the transcript and translation of a Sanskrit inscription in the Museum at Batavia by Mr. Holle, which we owe to the kindness of Prof. Kern, indicates that a signification of wealth in cereals was attached to the name in the early days of its Indian civilization. This inscription is most interesting, as it is the oldest dated inscription yet discovered upon Javanese soil. Till a recent time it was not known that there was any mention of Java in Sanskrit literature, and this was so when Lassen published the 2nd vol. of his Indian Antiquities (1849). But in fact Java was mentioned in the Râmâyana, though a perverted reading disguised the fact until the publication of the Bombay edition in 1863. The passage is given in our second quotation; and we also give passages from two later astronomical works whose date is approximately known. The Yava-koti, or Java Point of these writers is understood by Prof. Kern to be the eastern extremity of the island.

We have already (see BENJAMIN) alluded to the fact that the terms Jâva, Jâvi were applied by the Arabs to the Archipelago generally, and often with specific reference to Sumatra. Prof. Kern, in a paper to which we are largely indebted, has indicated that this larger application of the term was originally Indian. He has discussed it in connection with the terms "Golden and Silver Islands" (Suvarna dvîpa and Râppa dvîpa), which occur in the quotation from the Râmâyana, and elsewhere in Sanskrit literature, and which evidently were the basis of the Chrysê and Argyrê, which take various forms in the writings of the Greek and Roman geographers. We cannot give the details of his discussion, but his condensed conclusions are as follows:—

(1.) Suvarna-dvipa and Yava-dvipa were according to the prevalent representations the same; (2.) Two names of islands originally distinct were confounded with one another; (3.) Suvarna-dvipa in its proper meaning is Sumatra, Yava-dvipa in its proper meaning is Java; (4.) Sumatra, or a part of it, and Java were regarded as one whole, doubtless because they were politically united; (5.) By Yava-koti was indicated the east point of Java.

This Indian (and also insular) identification, in whole or in part, of Sumatra with Java explains a variety of puzzles, e.g. not merely the Arab application of Java, but also the ascription, in so many passages, of great wealth of gold to Java, though the island, to which that name properly belongs, produces no gold. This tradition of gold-produce we find in the passages quoted from Ptolemy, from the Ramâyana, from the Holle inscription, and from Marco Polo. It becomes quite intelligible when we are taught that Java and Sumatra were at one time both embraced under the former name, for Sumatra has always been famous for its gold-production. [Mr. Skeat notes as an interesting fact that the standard Malay name Jâva and the Javanese Jâva preserve the original form of the word.]

* The Teutonic word Corn affords a handy instance of the varying application of the name of a cereal to that which is, or has been, the staple grain of each country. Corn in England familiarly means 'wheat'; in Scotland 'oats'; in Germany 'rye'; in America 'mattza.' (Ancient).—"Search carefully Yava dvipa, adorned by seven Kingdoms, the Gold and Silver Island, rich in mines of gold. Beyond Yava dvipa is the Mountain called Sisira, whose top touches the sky, and which is visited by gods and demons."—Rāmdāvana, IV. xl. 30 (from Kern).

A.D. c. 150.—"Ibadiu (I'azādīou), which means 'Island of Barley,' most fruitful the island is said to be, and also to produce much gold; also the metropolis is said to have the name Argyrē (Silver), and to stand at the western end of the island."—Ptolomy, VII. ii. 29.

414.—"Thus they voyaged for about ninety days, when they arrived at a country called Ya-va-di [i.e. Yava-deva]. In this country heretics and Brahmans flourish, but the Lw of Buddha hardly deserves mentioning."—Fošan, ext. in Groenewold's Notes from Chinese Sources.

A.D. 500.—"When the sun rises in Ceylon it is sunset in the City of the Blessed (Sīdhā-pura, i.e. The Fortunate Islands, noon at Yava-koti, and midnight in the Land of the Romans."—Arjyabhatā, IV. v. 33 (from Kern).

A.D. 560.—"Eastward by a fourth part of the earth's circumference, in the world-quarter of the Bhadrāsvas lies the City famous under the name of Yava koti whose walls and gates are of gold."—Surya-Siḥdā-śīnta, XII. v. 38 (from Kern).

Saka, 654, i.e. A.D. 762.—"Divpayavana Yavākhyam atulan dhān-yādiyājāhikam sampannam kanakākare" . . i.e. the incomparable splendid island called Java, excessively rich in grain and other seeds, and well provided with gold-mines."—Inscription in Batavia Museum (see above).

943.—"Eager . . to study with my own eyes the peculiarities of each country, I have with this object visited Sind and Zanj, and Sanf (see CHAMPA) and Sin (China), and Zabaj. . . "—Masūdī, i. 5.

"This Kingdom (India) borders upon that of Zabaj, which is the empire of the Mahāraj, King of the Isles."—Ibid. 163.

992.—"Djavā is situated in the Southern Ocean . . In the 12th month of the year (992) their King Marādjā sent an embassy . . to go to court and bring tribute."—Groenewold's Notes from Chinese Sources, pp. 15-17.

1208.—"When you sail from Ziamba (Chamba) 1500 miles in a course between south and south-east, you come to a very great island called Java, which, according to the statement of some good mariners, is the greatest Island that there is in the world, seeing that it has a compass of more than 3000 miles, and is under the dominion of a great king. . . Pepper, nutmegs, spice, galangas, cubeb, cloves, and all the other spices are produced in this island, and it is visited by many ships with quantities of merchandise from which they make great profits and gain, for such an amount of gold is found there that no one would believe it or venture to tell it."—Marco Polo, in Ramusio, ii. 51.

c. 1350.—"In the neighbourhood of that realm is a great island, Java by name, which hath a compass of a good 3000 miles. Now this island is populous exceedingly, and is the second best of all islands that exist. . . The King of this island hath a palace which is truly marvellous. . . Now the great Khan of Cathay many a time engaged in war with this King; but this King always vanquished and got the better of him."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 87-89.

c. 1349.—"She clandestinely gave birth to a daughter, whom she made when grown up Queen of the finest island in the world, Sabā by name. . ."—John de Marignolli, ibid. 391.

c. 1444.—"Sunt insulæ duas in interiori India, eæ æreમ et ære Sinæ æbus finibus, ambæ Java nomine, quærum alter æbus Ætææ duæbus milliæus pretiætor æbus orientem versus; sed Majoris, Minoris æbus cognomine discernuntur."—N. Conti, in Poggius, De Var. Fortunae.

1503.—The Syrian Bishops Thomas, Jaballaha, Jacob, and Denha, sent on a mission to India in 1503 by the (Nestorian) Patriarch Elias, were ordained to go "to the land of the Indians and the islands of the seas which are between Dabag and Sin and Masin (see MACHEEN)."—Assemorii, III. Pt. i. 392. This Dabag is probably a relic of the Zabaj, of the Relation, of Masūdī, and of Al-birûnī.

1516.—"Further on . . there are many islands, small and great, amongst which is one very large which they call Java the Great. . . They say that this island is the most abundant country in the world . . . There grow pepper, cinnamon, ginger, bamboo, cubeb, and gold."—Barbosa, 197.

Referring to Sumatra, or the Archipelago in general.

Saka, 578, i.e. A.D. 686.—"The Prince Adityadharma is the Deva of the First Java Land (prathama Yava-bha). May he be great! Written in the year of Saka, 578. May it be great!"—From a Sanskrit Inscription from Pager-Ruyong, in Menang Karubu (Sumatra), pubd. by Friedrich, in the Batavische Transactions, vol. xxiii.

1224.—"Ma'bar (q.v.) is the last part of India; then comes the country of China (Sīn), the first part of which is Jāva, reached by a difficult and fatal sea."—Yākut, i. 516.

,"This is some account of remotest Sīn, which I record without vouching for its truth . . for in sooth it is a far off land. I have seen no one who had gone to it and penetrated far into it; only the merchants seek its outlying parts, to win the country known as Jāva on the sea-coast, like to India; from it are brought Aloeswood (śaḍ), camphor, and nard (śvmbul), and clove, and mace (bāsaba), and China drugs, and vessels of china-ware."—Ibid. iii. 445.
Kazwini speaks in almost the same words of Jawa. He often copies Yâkût, but perhaps he really means his own time (for he uses different words) when he says: "Up to this time the merchants came no further into China than to this country (Jawa) on account of the distance and difference of religion"—ii. 18.

1298.—"When you leave this Island of Pentam and sail about 100 miles, you reach the Island of Java the Less. For all its name 'tis none so small but that it has a compass of 2000 miles or more...." &c.—Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 9.

c. 1300.—"... In the mountains of Java scented woods grow.... The mountains of Java are very high. It is the custom of the people to puncture their hands and entire body with needles, and then rub in some black substance."—Rashid-ad-din, in Elliot, i. 71.

1328.—"There is also another exceeding great island, which is called Jawa, which is in sev'n or more than seven [thousand?] miles as I have heard, and where are many world's wonders. Among which, besides the finest aromatic spices, this is one, to wit, that there be found pygmy men.... There are also trees producing cloven, which when they are in flower emit an odour so pungent that they kill every man who cometh among them, unless he shut his mouth and nostrils.... In a certain part of that island they delight in white and fat men when they can get them...."—Friar Jordanus, 30-31.

c. 1330.—"Parmi les isles de la Mer de l'Inde il faut citer celle de Djâwâl, grande ile comme par l'abondance de ses drogues.... au sud de l'isle de Djâwâl on remarque la ville de Fansour, d'où le camphre Fansotri tire son nom."—Geog. d'Aboulfeda, ii. pt. ii. 127. [See CAMPHOR].

c. 1346.—"After a passage of 25 days we arrived at the Island of Jawa, which gives its name to the fulûn jâwûy (see BENJAMIN).... We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say the city of Sumatra; a fine large town with a wall of wood and towers also of wood."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 228-230.

1553.—"And so these, as well as those of the interior of the Island (Sumatra), are all dark, with lank hair, of good nature and countenance, and not resembling the Javanese, although such near neighbours, indeed it is very notable that at so small a distance from each other their nature should vary so much, all the more because all the people of this Island call themselves by the common name of Javis (Jauis), because they hold it for certain that the Javanese (or Jâwâni) were formerly lords of this great Island...."—Barros, III. v. 1.

1555.—"Beyond the Island of Jawa they sailed along by another called Balî; and then came also vnto other called Autiane, Cambaba, Solar.... The course by these Islands is about 500 leagues. The ancient cosmographers call all these Islands by the name fanos; but late experience hath found the names to be very dierus as you see."—Antonio Galvano, old E.T. in Hakl. iv. 423.

1856.—"It is a saying in Goozerat,—"Who goes to Java Never returns.

If by chance he return, Then for two generations to live upon, Money enough he brings back.'"

Râs Mâlâ, ii. 82; [ed. 1878, p. 418].

JAVA-RADISH, s. A singular variety (Raphanus caudatus, L.) of the common radish (R. sativus, L.), of which the pods, which attain a foot in length, are eaten and not the root. It is much cultivated in Western India, under the name of mugra [see Baden-Powell, Punjab Products, i. 260].

It is curious that the Hind. name of the common radish is mûlî, from mûlî, 'root,' exactly analogous to radiss from radix.

[JAVA-WIND, s. In the Straits Settlements an unhealthy south wind blowing from the direction of Java is so called. (Compare SUMATRA, b.)]

JAWAUB, s. Hind. from Ar. jawâb, 'an answer.' In India it has besides this ordinary meaning, that of 'dismissal.' And in Anglo-Indian colloquial it is especially used for a lady's refusal of an offer; whence the verb passive 'to be jawauvid.' [The Jawaub Club consisted of men who had been at least half a dozen times jawauvid.'

1830.—"'The Juwawb'd Club,' asked Elsmere, with surprise, 'what is that?'

'Tis a fanciful association of those melancholy candidates for wedlock who have fallen in their pursuit, and are smarting under the sting of rejection.'—Orient. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 424.]

Jawab among the natives is often applied to anything erected or planted for a symmetrical double, where

"Grove nodes at grove, each alley has a brother, And half the platform just reflects the other."

"In the houses of many chief every picture on the walls has its jawab (or duplicate). The portrait of Scindiah now in my dining-room was the jawab (copy in fact) of Mr. C. Landseer's picture, and hung opposite to the original in the Darbar room (M.-Gen. Keatinge). ["The masjid with three domes of white marble occupies the left wing and has a counterpart (jawāb) in a precisely similar building on the right hand side of the Taj. This is sometimes called the false masjid; but it is in no sense dedicated to religious purposes."—Führer, Monumental Antiquities, N.W.P., p. 64.]

JAY, s. The name usually given by Europeans to the Coracias Indica, Linn., the Nilkanth, or 'blue-throat' of the Hindus, found all over India.

[1878.—"They are the commonality of birdcorm, who furnish forth the mobs which bewilder the drunken-flighted jay when he jerks, shrieking in a series of blue hyphen-flashes through the air. ..."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 3.]

JEEL, s. Hind. jhil. A stagnant sheet of inundation; a mere or lagoon. Especially applied to the great sheets of remnant inundation in Bengal. In Eastern Bengal they are also called bheel (q.v.)

[1757.—"Towards five the guard waked me with notice that the Nawab would presently pass by to his palace of Mootee jeel."—Holwell's Letter of Feb. 28, in Wheeler, Early Records, 250.]

The Jhils of Silhet are vividly and most accurately described (though the word is not used) in the following passage:

c. 1778.—"I shall not therefore be disbelieved when I say that in pointing my boat towards Syllhet I had recourse to my compass, the same as at sea, and steered a straight course through a lake not less than 100 miles in extent, occasionally passing through villages built on artificial mounds: but so scanty was the ground that each house had a canoe attached to it."—Hon. Robert Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 166.

1824.—"At length we ... entered what might be called a sea of reeds. It was, in fact, a vast jeel or marsh, whose tall rushes rise above the surface of the water, having depth enough for a very large vessel. We sailed briskly on, rustling like a greyhound in a field of corn."—Heber, i. 101.

1850.—"To the geologist the Jheels and Sunderbunds are a most instructive region, as whatever may be the mean elevation of their waters, a permanent depression of 10 to 15 feet would submerge an immense tract."—Hooker's Himalayan Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 265.

1885.—"You attribute to me an act, the credit of which was due to Lieut. George Hutchinson, of the late Bengal Engineers.* That able officer, in company with the late Colonel Berkeley, H.M. 32nd Regt., laid out the defences of the Alam Bagh camp, remarkable for its bold plan, which was so well devised that, with an apparently dangerous extent, it was defensible at every point by the small but ever ready force under Sir James Outram. A long interval ... was defended by a post of support called 'Moir's Picket' ... covered by a wide expanse of jheel, or lake, resulting from the rainy season. Foreseeing the probable drying up of the water, Lieut. Hutchinson, by a clever inspiration, marched all the transport elephants through and through the lake, and when the water disappeared, the dried clay-bed, pierced into a honey-combed surface of circular holes a foot in diameter and two or more feet deep, became a better protection against either cavalry or infantry than the water had been. ..."—Letter to Lt.-Col. P. R. Innes from F. M. Lord Napier of Magdala, dd. April 15.

Jeeh and bheel are both applied to the artificial lakes in Central India and Bundelkhand.

JEETUL, s. Hind. jital. A very old Indian denomination of copper coin, now entirely obsolete. It long survived on the western coast, and the name was used by the Portuguese for one of their small copper coins in the forms certil and zoitole. It is doubtful, however, if certil is the same word. At least there is a medieval Portuguese coin called certil and cestil (see Fernandes, in Memorias da Academia Real das Sciences de Lisboa, 2da Classe, 1856); this may have got confounded with the Indian Jital. The jital of the Delhi coinage of Alā-ud-din (c. 1300) was, according to Mr. E. Thomass calculations, 1/20 of the silver tanga, the coin called in later days the rupee. It was therefore just the equivalent of our modern pie. But of course, like most modern denominations of coin, it has varied greatly.

c. 1193-4.—"According to Kutb-ud-Din's command, Nizam-ud-Din Mohammad, on his return, brought them [the two slaves] along with him to the capital, Dhilli; and Malik Kutb-ud-Din purchased both the Turks for the sum of 100,000 jital."—Raverty, Tabakat-i-Nâṣiri, p. 603.

c. 1290.—"In the same year ... there was dearth in Dehli, and grain rose to a jital per sîr (see SEEB)."—Zi­dāh-ud-din Barnî, in Elliot, iii. 146.

JEHAUD, s. Ar. jihâd, ['an effort, a striving'] ; then a sacred war of Musulmans against the infidel; which Sir Herbert Edwardes called, not very neatly, 'a crescentade.'

[c. 630 A.D.— "Make war upon such of those to whom the Scriptures have been given who believe not in God, or in the last day, and who forbid not that which God and his Prophet have forbidden, and who profess not the profession of the truth, until they pay tribute (jizyah) out of hand, and they be humbled."—Korân, Surah ix. 29.]

1880.— "When the Athenians invaded Ephesus, towards the end of the Peloponnesian War, Tissaphernes offered a mighty sacrifice at Artemis, and raised the people in a sort of Jehad, or holy war, for her defence."—Sat. Review, July 17, 84b.

[1901.—"The matter has now assumed the aspect of a 'Schad,' or holy war against Christianity."—Times, April 4.]

JELAUBEE, s. Hind. jalebi, [which is apparently a corruption of the Ar. zalābiya, P. zalibija]. A rich sweetmeat made of sugar and ghee, with a little flour, melted and trickled into a pan so as to form a kind of interlaced work, when baked.

[1870.—"The poison is said to have been given once in sweetmeats, Jelabees."—Chevers, Med. Jurisp. 178.]

JELLY, s. In South India this is applied to vitrified brick refuse used as metal for roads. [The Madras Gloss. gives it as a synonym for kunkur.] It would appear from a remark of C. P. Brown (MS. notes) to be Telugu zalli, Tam. shallî, which means properly 'shavers, bits, pieces.'

JELUM, n.p. The most westerly of the "Five Rivers" that give their name to the Punjab (q.v.), (among which the Indus itself is not usually included). Properly Jatlam or Jilm, now apparently written Jhilam, and taking this name from a town on the right bank. The Jhilam is the Ḥūdārūs of Alexander's historians, a name corrupted from the Skt. Vīstād, which is more nearly represented by Ptolemy's Bōdūsūrs. A still further (Prakritic) corruption of the same is Behāt (see BEHUT).

1037.— "Here he (Mahmûd) fell ill, and remained sick for fourteen days, and got no better. So in a fit of repentance he forswore wine, and ordered his servants to throw all his supply ... into the Jailam ..."—Bathâqat, in Elliot, ii. 139.

c. 1204.— "... in the height of the conflict, Shama-ud-din, in all his panoply, rode right into the water of the river Jilam ... and his warlike feats while in that water reached such a pitch that he was despatching those infidels from the height of the waters to the lowest depths of Hell ..."—Tabâkât, by Raverty, 604-5.

1856.— "Hydaspes! often have thy waves run tuned To battle music, since the soldier King, The Macedonian, dipped his golden casque And swam thy swollen flood, until the time When Night the peace-maker, with pious hand, Unclasping her dark mantle, smoothed it soft O'er the pale faces of the brave who slept Cold in their clay, on Chillian's bloody field."—The Banyan Tree.

JEMADAR, JEMAUTDAR, &c. Hind. from Ar.—P. jama'dar, jama' meaning 'an aggregate,' the word indicates generally, a leader of a body of individuals. [Some of the forms are as if from Ar.—P. jamâ'at, 'an assemblage.'] Technically, in the Indian army, it is the title of the second rank of native officer in a company of sepoys, the Sûbâdîr (see SOUDBADOR) being the first. In this sense the word dates from the re-organisation of the army in 1768. It is also applied to certain officers of police (under the dârogâha), of the customs, and of other civil departments. And in larger domestic establishments there is often a jemaadár, who is over the servants generally, or over the stables, camp service and orderlies. It is also an honorific title often used by the other household servants in addressing the bikhishâi (see BHEESTY).

1752.—"The English battalion no sooner quitted Trichinopoly than the regent set about accomplishing his scheme of surprising the City, and . . . endeavoured to gain 500 of the Nabob's best peons with firelocks. The jemautdars, or captains of these troops, received his bribes and promised to join." —Orme, ed. 1803, i. 257.

1817.—". . . Calliand had commenced an intrigue with some of the jemautdars, or captains of the enemy's troops, when he received intelligence that the French had arrived at Trichinopoly." —Mill, iii. 175.

1824. —"Abdullah" was a Mussulman convert of Mr. Corrie's, who had travelled in Persia with Sir Gore Ouseley, and accompanied him to England, from whence he was returning . . . when the Bishop took him into his service as a jemautdar, or head officer of the peons." —Editor's note to Heber, ed. 1844, i. 65.

JENNYE, n.p. Hind. Janai. The name of a great river in Bengal, which is in fact a portion of the course of the Brahmaputra (see BURRAM-POOTER), and the conditions of which are explained in the following passage written by one of the authors of this Glossary many years ago: "In Rennell's time, the Burrampooter, after issuing westward from the Assam valley, swept south-eastward, and forming with the Ganges a fluvial peninsula, entered the sea abreast of that river below Dacca. And so almost all English maps persist in representing it, though this eastern channel is now, unless in the rainy season, shallow and insignificant; the vast body of the Burrampooter cutting across the neck of the peninsula under the name of Jenai, and uniting with the Ganges near Pubna (about 150 miles N.E. of Calcutta), from which point the two rivers under the name of Jenai, and with the name of Pudda (Paddo) flow on in mighty union to the sea." (Blackwood's Mag., March 1852, p. 338.)

The river is indicated as an offshoot of the Burrampooter in Rennell's Bengal Atlas (Map No. 6) under the name of Jenni, but it is not mentioned in his Memoir of the Map of Hindostan. The great change of the river's course was palpably imminent at the beginning of the last century; for Buchanan (c. 1809) says: "The river threatens to carry away all the vicinity of Dewangunj, and perhaps to force its way into the heart of Nator." (Eastern India, iii. 394; see also 377.) Nator or Nattore was the territory now called Rajshâhi District. The real direction of the change has been further south. The Janai is also called the Jamunâ (see under JUMNA). Hooker calls it Jummal (1) noticing that the maps still led him to suppose the Burrampooter flowed 70 miles further east (see Him. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 259).

JENNYRICKSHAW. s. Read Capt. Gill's description below. Giles states the word to be taken from the Japanese pronunciation of three characters, reading jin-ri-ki-sha, signifying 'Man—Strength—Cart.' The term is therefore, observes our friend E. C. Baber, an exact equivalent of "Pullman-Car!" The article has been introduced into India, and is now in use in Simla and other hill-stations. [The invention of the vehicle is attributed to various people—to an Englishman known as "Public-spirited Smith" (8 ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 325); to native Japanese about 1868-70, or to an American named Goble, "half-cobbler and half-missionary." See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 236 seq.]

1876.—"A machine called a jennyrickshaw is the usual public conveyance of Shanghai. This is an importation from Japan, and is admirably adapted for the flat country, where the roads are good, and coolie hire cheap . . . In shape they are like a buggy, but very much smaller, with room inside for one person only. One coolie goes into the shafts and runs along at the rate of 6 miles an hour; if the distance is long, he is usually accompanied by a companion who runs behind, and they take it in turn to draw the vehicle." —W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 10. See also p. 163.

1880. —"The Kuruma or jin-ri-ki-sha consists of a light perambulator body, an adjustable hood of oiled paper, a velvet or cloth lining and cushion, a well for parcels under the seat, two high slim wheels, and a pair of shafts connected by a bar at the ends." —Miss Bird, Japan, i. 13.

1885. —"We . . . got into rickshaws to make an otherwise impossible descent to JEZYA. s. Ar. jizya. The poll-tax which the Muslim law imposes on subjects who are not Moslem.

[c. 630 A.D. See under JEHAUD.]

c. 1300. — “The Kázi replied ... No doctor but the great doctor (Hanifa) to whose school we belong, has assented to the imposition of Jizya on Hindus. Doctors of other schools allow of no alternative but “Death or Islam.” ..—Ziá-ud-dín Barná, in Elliot, iii. 184.

1838. — “Understand what custom ye English paid formerly, and compare ye difference between that and our last order for taking custom and Judgea. If they pay no more than they did formerly, they complain without occasion. If more, write what it is, and there shall be an abatement.”

—Vizier’s Letter to Nubob, in Hedges, Diary, July 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 100].

1866. — “Books of accounts received from Dacca, with advice that it was reported at the Court there that the Poll-money or Judgeea lately ordered by the Mogul would be exacted of the English and Dutch. ... Among the orders issued to Pattana Cossum-bazar, and Dacca, instructions are given to the latter place not to pay the Judgeea or Poll-tax, if demanded.”—Lt. St. Geo. Consns. (on Tour) Sept. 29 and Oct. 10; Notes and Extracts, No. i. p. 40.

1765.—“When the Hindoo Rajahs ... submitted to Tamarlaine; it was on these capital stipulations: That ... the emperors should never impose the jesseraah (or poll-tax) upon the Hindus.”—Hotwell, Hist. Events, i. 87.

JEHAUMP. s. A hurdle of matting and bamboo, used as a shutter or door. Hind. jhábá, Mahr. jhámpa; in connection with which there are verbs, Hind. jhámp-ná, jhámpá, dhabámp, ‘to cover.’ See jhoprá, s.v. ak; [but there seems to be no etymological connection].

JHOOM, s. jhüm. This is a word used on the eastern frontiers of Bengal for that kind of cultivation which is practised in the hill forests of India and Indo-China, under which a tract is cleared by fire, cultivated for a year or two, and then abandoned—for another tract, where a like process is pursued. This is the Kumari (see COOMRY) of S.W. India, the Chena of Ceylon (see Emerson Tennent, ii. 463), the toun-gyan of Burma [Gazetteer, ii. 72, 757, the dakya of North India (Skt. dāh, ‘to burn’), ponam (Tam. pun, ‘inferior’), or ponacaud (Mal. punak-katu, pun, ‘inferior,’ katu, ‘forest’) of Malabar]. In the Philippine Islands it is known as garding; it is practised in the Ardennes, under the name of sartage, and in Sweden under the name of svedjande (see Marsh, Earth as Modified by Human Action, 346).

[1890.—“In this hilly tract are a number of people ... who use a kind of cultivation called the Cotwacu, which a good deal resembles that which in the Eastern parts of Bengal is called Jumea.” —Buchanan, Mysores, ii. 177.]

1883. — “It is now many years since Government, seeing the waste of forest caused by juming, endeavoured to put a stop to the practice. ... The people jumed as before, regardless of orders.”—Indian Agriculturist, Sept. (Calcutta).

1885. — “Juming disputes often arose, one village against another, both desiring to jum the same tract of jungle, and these cases were very troublesome to deal with. The juming season commences about the middle of May, and the air is then darkened by the smoke from the numerous clearings. ...” (Here follows an account of the process).—Lt.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 348 seqq.

JILLMILL, s. Venetian shutters, or as they are called in Italy, persiane. The origin of the word is not clear. The Hind. word ‘jīlmīlā’ seems to mean ‘sparkling,’ and to have been applied to some kind of gauze. Possibly this may have been used for blinds, and thence transferred to shutters. [So Platt in his H. Dict.] Or it may have been an onomatopoea, from the rattle of such shutters; or it may have been corrupted from a Port. word such as janella, ‘a window.’ All this is conjecture.

[1892.—“Besides the purdahs, the openings between the pillars have blinds neatly made of bamboo strips, woven together with coloured cords: these are called jillmuns or cheeks” (see CHICK, a).—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 306.]

1784.—“The front (of a Bengal house) is generally long, exhibiting a pillared verandah, or a row of French casements, and jillmilled windows.”—Calc. Review, No. cvii. 307.

JOCOLE, s. We know not what this word is; perhaps ‘toys?’ [Mr.
JOGEE, s. Hind. jogi. A Hindu ascetic; and sometimes a 'conjuror.' From Skt. yogin, one who practises the yoga, a system of meditation combined with austerities, which is supposed to induce miraculous power over elementary matter. In fact, the stuff which has of late been propagated in India by certain persons, under the names of theosophy and esoteric Buddhism, is essentially the doctrine of the Jogis.

1343.—"We anchor by a little island near the main, Anchediva (q.v.), where there was a temple, a grove, and a tank of water... We found a jogi leaning against the wall of a baddhâna or temple of idols" (respecting whom he tells remarkable stories).—Ibn Batuta, iv. 62-63, and see p. 275.

c. 1442.—"The Infidels are divided into a great number of classes, such as the Bramins, the Joghis and others."—Abdurrazak, in India in the XVTh Cent., 17.

1510.—"The King of the Joghe is a man of great dignity, and has about 30,000 people, and he is a pagan, he and all his subjects; and by the pagan Kings he and his people are considered to be saints, on account of their lives, which you shall hear..."—Varthema, p. 111. Perhaps the chief of the Gorakhnâtha Gosains, who were once very numerous on the West Coast, and have still a settlement at Kadri, near Mangalore. See P. della Valle’s notice below.

1516.—"And many of them noble and respectable people, not to be subject to the Moors, go out of the Kingdom, and take the habit of poverty, wandering the world... they carry very heavy chains round their necks and waists, and legs; and they smear all their bodies and faces with ashes... These people are commonly called jogues, and in their own speech they are called Zorwe (see SWAMY) which means Servant of God... These jogues eat all meats, and do not observe any idolatry."—Barbosa, 99-100.

1553.—"Much of the general fear that affected the inhabitants of that city (Goa before its capture) proceeded from a Gentoo, of Bengal by nation, who went about in the habit of a Jogue, which is the strictest sect of their Religion... saying that the City would speedily have a new Lord, and would be inhabited by a strange people, contrary to the will of the natives."—De Barros, Dec. II. liv. v. cap. 8.

"For this reason the place (Adam’s Peak) is so famous among all the Gentile-don of the East yonder, that they resort thither as pilgrims from more than 1000 leagues off, and chiefly those whom they call Jogues, who are as men who have abandoned the world and dedicated themselves to God, and make great pilgrimages to visit the Temples consecrated to him."—Ibid. Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 1.

1563.—"... to make them fight, like the cobras de capello which the jogues carry about asking alms of the people, and these jogues are certain heathen (Gentios) who go begging all about the country, powdered all over with ashes, and venerated by all the poor heathen, and by some of the Moors also..."—Garcia, f. 1564, 157.

[1567.—"Jogues." See under CASIS. [c. 1610.—"The Gentiles have also their Abedales (Abd-Allah), which are like to our hermits, and are called Jogues."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 349.]

1624.—"Finally I went to see the King of the Jogis (Gloghi) where he dwelt at that time, under the shade of a cottage; and I found him roughly occupied in his affairs as a man of the field and husbandman... they told me his name was Batinato, and that the hermitage and the place generally was called Cadira (Kadri)."—P. della Valle, ii. 724; [Hak. Soc. ii. 350, and see i. 37, 75].

[1667.—"I allude particularly to the people called Jauguis, a name which signifies 'united to God.'"—Bernier, ed. Constable, 316.]

1673.—"Near the Gate in a Choutry sate more than Forty naked Jogies, or men united to God, covered with Ashes and pleated Turbats of their own Hair."—Fryer, 160.

1727.—"There is another sort called Joguies, who... go naked except a bit of Cloth about their Loyns, and some deny themselves even that, delighting in Nasti-ness, and an holy Obscenity, with a great Show of Sanctity."—A. Hamilton, i. 152; [ed. 1744, i. 153].

"Fate work'd its own the while. A band Of Yoguees, as they roaming the land Seeking a spouse for Jaga-Naut their God, Stray'd to this solitary glade."

Curse of Kehawa, xiii. 16.

c. 1812.—"Scarcely...were we seated when behold, there poured into the space before us, not only all the Yoguees, Fakiers, and rogues of that description...but the King of the Beggars himself, wearing his peculiar badge."—Mrs. Shortwood, (describing a visit to Henry Martyn at Cawnpore), Autobiog., 415.

"Apnâ gâ'âw kâ jogi än gâ'âw kâ sidh." Hind. proverb: "The man who is a jogi in his own village is a deity in another."—Quoted by Elliot, ii. 207.

JOHN COMPANY, n.p. An old personification of the East India Company, by the natives often taken seriously, and so used, in former days. The term Company is still applied in Sumatra by natives to the existing (Dutch) Government (see H. O. Forbes, Naturalist's Wanderings, 1885, p. 204). [Dahâ Company Bahâdur kâ is still a common form of native appeal for justice, and Company Bahâg is the usual phrase for the public garden of a station. It has been suggested, but apparently without real reason, that the phrase is a corruption of Company Jahân, "which has a fine sounding smack about it, recalling Shah Jehân and Jehângir, and the golden age of the Moguls." (G. A. Sala, quoted in Notes and Queries, 8 ser. ii. 37). And Sir G. Birdwood writes: "The earliest coins minted by the English in India were of copper, stamped with a figure of an irradiated lingam, the phallic 'Roi Soleil.' The mintage of this coin is unknown (? Madras), but, without doubt it must have served to ingratiate us with the natives of the country, and may have given origin to their personification of the Company under the potent title of Kumpani Jehân, which, in English mouths, became 'John Company.'" (Report on Old Records, 222, note.)

[1784.—"Further, I knew that as simple Hottentots and Indians could form no idea of the Dutch Company and its government and constitution, the Dutch in India had given out that this was one mighty ruling prince who was called Jan or John, with the surname Company, which also procured for them more reverence than if they could have actually made the people understand that they were, in fact, ruled by a company of merchants."—Andreas Sparrmann, Travels to the Cape of Good Hope, the South-Polar Lands, and round the World, p. 347; see 9 ser. Notes and Queries, vii. 34.]

1803.—(The Nawab) "much amused me by the account he gave of the manner in which my arrival was announced to him. ... 'Lord Schab Ka bhârjua, Company kâ naava ka tehsîr laid'; literally translated, 'The Lord's sister's son, and the grandson of the Company, has arrived.'—Lord Valentia, i. 137.

1808.—"However the business is pleasant now, consisting principally of orders to countermand military operations, and preparations to save Johnny Company's cash."

1818-19.—"In England the ruling power is possessed by two parties, one the King, who is Lord of the State, and the other the Honourable Company. The former governs his own country; and the latter, though only subjects, exceed the King in power, and are the directors of mercantile affairs."

—Sadâsûkh, in Elliot, viii. 411.

1826.—"He said that according to some accounts, he had heard the Company was an old Englishwoman...then again he told me that some of the Topee wallas say 'John Company,' and he knew that John was a man's name, for his master was called John Brice, but he could not say to a certainty whether 'Company' was a man's or a woman's name."—Pandurang Hari, 60; [ed. 1873, i. 88, in a note to which the phrase is said to be a corruption of Joint Company].

1836.—"The jargon that the English speak to the natives is most absurd. I call it 'John Company's English,' which rather affronts Mrs. Staunton."—Letters from Madras, 42.

1852.—"John Company, whatever may be his faults, is infinitely better than Downing Street. If India were made over to the Colonial Office, I should not think it worth three years' purchase."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 283.

1888.—"It fares with them as with the sceptics once mentioned by a South-Indian villager to a Government official. Some men had been now and then known, he said, to express doubt if there were any such person as John Company; but of such it was observed that something had soon happened to them."—Sat. Review, Feb. 14, p. 220.

JOMPON, s. Hind. jânpâñ, japân, [which are not to be found in Platt's Dict.]. A kind of sedan, or portable chair used chiefly by the ladies at the Hill Sanitaria of Upper India. It is carried by two pairs of men (who are called Jompoonies, i.e. jânpâñ or japânâ), each pair bearing on their shoulders a short bar from which the shafts of the chair are slung. There is some perplexity as to the origin of the word. For we find in Crawford's Malay Dict. "Jampa(0) (Jav. Jampa(0), a kind of litter." Also the Javanese Dict. of P. Jansz (1876) gives: "Djempana—dragstoel (i.e. portable chair), or sedan of a person of rank." Klinkert has jempa(na), djempa(na), sempa(na as a State sedan-chair, and he connects sempa(na with Skt. sam-pa(na), 'that which has turned out well, fortunate.' Wilkinson has: "*jempana, Skt.? a kind of State carriage or sedan for ladies of the court.""] The word cannot, however, have been introduced into India by the officers who served in Java (1811-15), for its use is much older in the Himālaya, as may be seen from the quotation from F. Desideri.

It seems just possible that the name may indicate the thing to have been borrowed from Japan. But the fact that dpot means 'hang' in Tibetan may indicate another origin.

Wilson, however, has the following: "Jhampán, Bengali. A stage on which snake-catchers and other juggling vagabonds exhibit; a kind of sedan used by travellers in the Himālaya, written *Jampaun (?)." [Both Platts and Fallon give the word jhappan as Hind.; the former does not attempt a derivation; the latter gives Hind. jamp 'a cover,' and this on the whole seems to be the most probable etymology. It may have been originally in India, as it is now in the Straits, a closed litter for ladies of rank, and the word may have become appropriated to the open conveyance in which European ladies are carried.]

1716.—"The roads are nowhere practicable for a horseman, or for a Jampana, a sort of palanquin."—Letter of P. Ipólito Desideri, dated April 10, in Lettres Édip. xv. 184.

1783.—(After a description) "... by these central poles the litter, or as it is here called, the Sampan, is supported on the shoulders of four men."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 3.

[1822.—"The Chumpaan, or as it is more frequently called, the Chumpala, is the usual vehicle in which persons of distinction, especially females, are carried...."—Lloyd, Gerard, Narr. i. 103.

[1849.—"A Jhappan is a kind of arm chair with a canopy and curtains; the canopy, &c., can be taken off."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 103.]

1879.—"The gondola of Simla is the jampan or jampot, as it is sometimes called, on the same linguistic principle... as that which converts asparagus into sparrow-grass. Every lady on the hills keeps her jampa and jempanaes... just as in the plains she keeps her carriage and footmen."—Letter in Times, Aug. 17.

JOOL, JHOOL, s. Hind. jhdn supposed by Shakespeare (no doubt correctly) to be a corrupt form of the Ar. jbd (Jow), having much the same meaning: [but Platts takes it from jhânlâ (to dangle)]. Housings, body clothing of a horse, elephant, or other domesticated animal; often a quilt, used as such. In colloquial use all over India. The modern Arabs use the plnr. jilâl as a singular. This Dozy defines as "couverture en laine plus ou moins ornée de dessins, très large, très chaude et enveloppant le poitrail et la croupe du cheval* (exactlty the Indian *jhdn)—also ornement de soie qu'on étend sur la croupe des chevaux aux jours de fête."

[1819.—"Dr. Duncan... took the jhol, or broadcloth housing from the elephant. ... "—Tod, Personal Narr. in Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 715.]

JOLÁ, s. Hind. jhdâl. The ordinary meaning of the word is 'a swing'; but in the Himālaya it is specifically applied to the rude suspension bridges used there.

[1812.—"There are several kinds of bridges constructed for the passage of strong currents and rivers, but the most common are the Sângha and Jhula" (a description of both follows).—Asiat. Res. xi. 475.]

1830.—"Our chief object in descending to the Sutlej was to swing on a Joolâ bridge. The bridge consists of 7 grass ropes, about twice the thickness of your thumb, tied to a single post on either bank. A piece of the hollowed trunk of a tree, half a yard long, slips upon these ropes, and from this 4 loops from the same grass rope depend. The passenger hangs in the loops, placing a couple of ropes under each thigh, and holds on by pegs in the block over his head; the signal is given, and he is drawn over by an eighth rope."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 114.

JOSS, s. An idol. This is a corruption of the Portuguese Deos, 'God,' first taken up in the 'Pidgin' language. of the Chinese ports from the Portuguese, and then adopted from that jargon by Europeans as if they had got hold of a Chinese word. [See CHIN-CHIN.]

1659.—“But the Devil (whom the Chinese commonly called Joosje) is a mighty and powerful Prince of the World.” — Walter Schulz, 17.

"In a four-cornered cabinet in their dwelling-rooms, they have, as it were, an altar, and thereon an image. . . . this they call Josin." —Soar, ed. 1672, p. 27.

1677.—“All the Sinese keep a limning of the Devil in their houses. . . . They paint him with two horns on his head, and commonly call him Josie (Joosje)." — Gerret Vermeulen, Oost Indische Voyages, 33.

1711.—"I know but little of their Religion, more than that every Man has a small Joos or God in his own House." — Lockyer, 181.

1727.—“Their Jooses or Demi-gods some of human shape, some of monstrous Figure.” — A. Hamilton, ii. 286; [ed. 1744, ii. 265].

c. 1790.—“Down with dukes, earls, and lords, those pagan Jooses, False gods! I away with stars and strings and crosses.” — Peter Pindar, Ode to Kien Long.

1798.—“The images which the Chinese worship are called joosje by the Dutch, and joos by the English seamen. The latter is evidently a corruption of the former, which being a Dutch nickname for the devil, was probably given to these idols by the Dutch who first saw them.” — Stavorinuss, E.T. i. 173.

This is of course quite wrong.

JOSS-HOUSE, s. An idol temple in China or Japan. From joss, as explained in the last article.

1750-52.—"The sailors, and even some books of voyages . . . call the pagodas yoss-houses, for or enquiring of a Chinese for the name of the idol, he answers Grande Yoss, instead of Gran Dios." — Olof. Toreen, 292.

1760-1810.—"On the 8th, 18th, and 28th day of the Moon those foreign barbarians may visit the Flower Gardens, and the Honam Joss-house, but not in droves of over ten at a time." — 8 Regulations at Canton, from The Fanckwee at Canton (1882), p. 29.

1840.—"Every town, every village, it is true, abounds with Joss-houses, upon which large sums of money have been spent." — Mem. Col. Mountain, 186.

1876.—"The fantastic gables and tawdry ornaments of a large Joss-house, or temple." — Fortnightly Review, No. ciii. 222.

1876:—"One Tim Wang he makee-travel, Makee stop one night in Joss-house." — Leland, Pilgín-English Sing-Song, p. 42.

Thus also in "pidgin," Joss-house-man or Joss-pidgin-man is a priest, or a missionary.

JOSTICK, JOSS-STICK, s. "A stick of fragrant tinder (powdered costus, sandalwood, &c.) used by the Chinese as incense in their temples, and formerly exported for use as cigar-lights. The name appears to be from the temple use. (See PUTCHOCK.)

1876.—"Burnee joss-stick, talkee plitty." — Leland, Pilgín-English Sing-Song, p. 43.

1879.—"There is a recess outside each shop, and at dusk the joss-sticks burning in these fill the city with the fragrance of incense." — Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 49.

JOW, s. Hind. jhāū. The name is applied to various species of the shrubby tamarisk which abound on the low alluvials of Indian rivers, and are useful in many ways, for rough basket-making and the like. It is the usual material for gabions and fascines in Indian siege-operations.

[c. 1809.—". . . by the natives it is called jhau; but this name is generic, and is applied not only to another species of Tamarisk, but to the Casuarina of Bengal, and to the cone-bearing plants that have been introduced by Europeans." — Buchanan-Hamilton, Eastern India, ii. 597.]

1840.—". . . on the opposite Jhow, or bastard tamarisk jungle . . . a native . . . had been attacked by a tiger. . . ." — Davidson, Travels, ii. 326.]

JOWAULLA MOOKHEE, n.p. Skt.—Hind. Jwālā-mukhi, 'flame-mouthed'; a generic name for quasi-volcanic phenomena, but particularly applied to a place in the Kangra district of the Punjab mountain country, near the Biās River, where jets of gas issue from the ground and are kept constantly burning. There is a shrine of Devī, and it is a place of pilgrimage famous all over the Himalaya as well as in the plains of India. The famous fire-jets at Baku are sometimes visited by more adventurous Indian pilgrims, and known as the Great Jwālā-mukhi. The author of the following passage was evidently ignorant of the phenomenon worshipped, though the name indicates its nature.

[c. 1360.—"Sultān Firoz marchèd with his army towards Nagarkot (see NUGURCOTE) . . . the idol Jwālā-mukhi, much worshipped by the infidels, was situated on the road to Nagarkot. . . . Some of the infidels have reported that Sultán Fíroz went specially to see this idol, and held a golden umbrella over its head. But... the infidels slandered the Sultán. Other infidels said that Sultán Muhammad Sháh bin Tughlík Sháh held an umbrella over this same idol, but this also is a lie..."—Sháma-i-š-rídf, in Elliot, ii. 318.

1616.—"...a place called Jalla mokee, where out of cold Springs and hard Rocks, there are daily to be seen incessant Eruptions of Fire, before which the Idolatrous people fall down and worship."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1467.

1783.—"At Taullah Mhokee (sic) a small volcanic fire issues from the side of a mountain, on which the Hindoos have raised a temple that has long been of celebrity, and favourite resort among the people of the Punjab."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1798, i. 303.

1799.—"Prasoon Poory afterwards travelled...to the Maha or Burée (i.e. larger) Jowallah Maokhi or Juála Múchi, terms that mean a 'Flaming Mouth,' as being a spot in the neighbourhood of Bákú on the west side of the (Caspian) Sea... whence fire issues; a circumstance that has rendered it of great veneration with the Hindus."—Jonathan Duncan, in As. Res. v. 41.

JOWAUR, JOWARREE, s. Hind. jowdr, juár, [Sk. jasa-prakára or akára, 'of the nature of barley';] Sorgo-um vulgare, Pers. (Holcus sorgo-um, L.) one of the best and most frequently grown of the tall millets of southern countries. It is grown nearly all over India in the unloosed tracts; it is sown about July and reaped in November. The reedy stems are 8 to 12 feet high. It is the cholam of the Tamil regions. The stalks are Kirbee. The Ar. dura or dhura is perhaps the same word ultimately as jowdr; for the old Semitic name is dolm, from the smoky aspect of the grain. It is an old instance of the looseness which used to pervade dictionaries and glossaries that R. Drummond (Illus. of the Gram. Parts of Gujarattëe, &c., Bombay, 1808) calls "Joar, a kind of pulse, the food of the common people."

[c. 1590.—In Khandesh "Jowári is chiefly cultivated of which, in some places, there are three crops in a year, and its stalk is so delicate and pleasant to the taste that it is regarded in the light of a fruit."—Aim, ed. Jarrett, ii. 223.]

1810.—"The vanity of parents sometimes leads them to dress their children, even while infants, in this manner, which affords a temptation...to murder these helpless creatures for the sake of their ornaments or joys."—Maria Graham, 3.

JUBTEE, JUPTEE, &c., s. Guz. japtt, &c. Corrupt forms of zabti. ["Watan-zabti, or -japtt, Mahr., Produce of lands sequestered by the State, an item of revenue; in Guzerat the lands once exempt, now subject to assessment" (Wilson).] (See ZUBT.)

1808.—"The Sindías as Sovereigns of Broach used to take the revenues of Mooj-moodards and Denoy (see DESSAYE) of that district every third year, amounting to Rs. 58,390, and called the periodical confiscation Juptee."—R. Drummond. [Majmuádár "in Guzerat the title given to the keepers of the pargana revenue records, who have held the office as a hereditary right since the settlement of Todar Mal, and are paid by fees charged on the villages." (Wilson).]

JUDEA, ODIA, &c., n.p. These names are often given in old writers to the city of Ayuthia, or Ayodhyia, or Yuthia (so called apparently after the Hindu city of Râma, Ayodhyia, which we now call Oudh), which was the capital of Siam from the 14th century down to about 1767, when it was destroyed by the Burmese, and the Siamese royal residence was transferred to Bangkok [see BANCOCK].

1522.—"All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the King of Siam, who is named Siri Zacabedera, and who inhabits Ídúia."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 156.
c. 1546.—"The capital City of all this Empire is Odiaa, whereof I have spoken heretofore: it is fortified with walls of brick and mortar, and contains, according to some, four hundred thousand inhabitants, whereas an hundred thousand are strangers of divers countries."—Pinto, in Cogan's E.T. p. 285; orig. cap. clxxxix.

1553.—"For the Realm is great, and its Cities and Towns very populous; insomuch that the city Hudia alone, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Siam (Siitó), and the residence of the King, furnishes 50,000 men of its own."—Barros, III. ii. 5.

1614.—"As regards the size of the City of Odiaa . . . it may be guessed by an experiment made by a curious engineer with whom we communicated on the subject. He says that . . . he embarked in one of the native boats, small, and very light, with the determination to go all round the City (which is entirely compassed by water), and that he started one day from the Portuguese settlement, at dawn, and when he got back it was already far on in the night, and he affirmed that by his calculation he had gone more than 8 leagues."—Gouto, VI. vii. 9.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangama (see JANGOMAY) arrived at 'the city of Judea' before Eaton's coming away from hence, and brought great store of merchandize."—Sainsbury, ii. 90.

JUGBOOLAK, s. Marine Hind. for jack-block (Roebuck).

JUGGURNAUT, n.p. A corruption of the Skt. Jagannatha, 'Lord of the Universe,' a name of Krishna worshipped as Vishnu at the famous shrine of Puri in Orissa. The image so called is an amorphous idol, much like those worshipped in some of the South Sea Islands, and it has been plausibly suggested (we believe first by Gen. Cunningham) that it was in reality a Buddhist symbol, which has been adopted as an object of Brahmanical worship, and made to serve as the image of a god. The idol was, and is, annually dragged forth in procession on a monstrous car, and as masses of excited pilgrims crowded round to drag or accompany it, accidents occurred. Occasionally also persons, sometimes sufferers from painful disease, cast themselves before the advancing wheels. The testimony of Mr. Stirling, who was for some years Collector of Orissa in the second decade of the last century, and that of Sir W. W. Hunter, who states that he had gone through the MS. archives of the province since it became British, show that the popular impression in regard to the continued frequency of immolations on these occasions—a belief that has made Juggurnaut a standing metaphor—was greatly exaggerated. The belief indeed in the custom of such immolation had existed for centuries, and the rehearsal of these or other cognate religious suicides at one or other of the great temples of the Peninsula, founded partly on fact, and partly on popular report, finds a place in almost every old narrative relating to India. The really great mortality from hardship, exhaustion, and epidemic disease which frequently ravaged the crowds of pilgrims on such occasions, doubtless aided in keeping up the popular impressions in connection with the Juggurnaut festival.

[1811.—"Jagnar." See under MADURA.] c. 1321.—"Annually on the recurrence of the day when that idol was made, the folk of the country come and take it down, and put it on a fine chariot; and then the King and Queen, and the whole body of the people, join together and draw it forth from the church with loud singing of songs, and all kinds of music . . . and many pilgrims who have come to this feast cast themselves under the chariot, so that its wheels may go over them, saying that they desire to die for their god. And the car passes over them, and crushes them, and cuts them in sunder, and so they perish on the spot."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c. i. 83.
c. 1430. — "In Bizengalia (see BIS-NAGAR) also, at a certain time of the year, this idol is carried through the city, placed between two chariots... accompanied by a great concourse of people. Many, carried away by the fervour of their faith, cast themselves on the ground before the wheels, in order that they may be crushed to death,—a mode of death which they say is very acceptable to their god."—N. Conti, in India in Xvth Cent., 28.

c. 1581.—"All for devotion attach themselves to the trace of the car, which is drawn in this manner by a vast number of people... and on the annual feast day of the Pagod this car is dragged by crowds of people through certain parts of the city (Nagapatam), some of whom from devotion, or the desire to be thought to have made a devoted end, cast themselves down under the wheels of the cars, and so perish, remaining all ground and crushed by the caille."

The preceding passages refer to scenes in the south of the Peninsula.

c. 1590.—"The chief city of Purston on the banks of the sea stands the temple of Jagnaunt, near to which are the images of Kishen, his brother, and their sister, made of Sandal-wood, which are said to be 4,000 years old. The Brahmins... at certain times carry the image in procession upon a carriage of sixteen wheels, which in the Hindooe language is called Rakhth (see RUT); and they believe that whoever assists in drawing it along obtains remission of all his sins."—Quinnin's Ayesen, ii. 10-19; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 127.]

—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.]

1632.—"Vnto this Pagod or house of Sathen... doe belong 9,000 Brammines or Priests, which doe daily offer sacrifice unto their great God Jaggunart, from which Idol the City is so called. And when it (the chariot of Jaggunart) is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves a sacrifice to this Idol, and desperately lye downe on the ground, that the Chariott wheels may runne over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken armes, some broken legs, so that many of them are destroyed, and by this meanes they thinke to merit Heauen."—W. Bruton, in Hakl. v. 57.

1667.—"In the town of Jagannatt, which is seated upon the Gulf of Bengala, and where is that famous Temple of the Idol of the same name, there is yearly celebrated a certain Feast... The first day that they shew this Idol with Ceremony in the Temple, the Crowd is usually so great to see it, that there is not a year, but some of those poor Pilgrims, that come afar off, tired and harassed, are suffocated there; all the people blessing them for having been so happy... And when this Hellish Triumphant Chariot marcheth, there are found (which is no Pable) persons so foolishly credulous and superstitious as to throw themselves with their bellies under those large and heavy wheels, which bruise them to death... 3)—Bernier, a Letter to Mr. Chaplain, in Eng. ed. 1684, 97; [ed. Constable, 304 seq.].

[1669-79.—"In that great and Sumptuous Diabolicall Pagod, there Standeth there greatest God Jno. Gernaet, whence ye Pagod receuved that name also."—MS. Asia, &c., by T. B. f. 12. Col. Temple adds: "Throughout the whole MS. Jagannath is repeatedly called Jno. Gernaet, which obviously stands for the common transposition Jagnaunt."

1682.—"We lay by last night till 10 o'clock this morning, ye Captain being desirous to see ye Jagnerto Pagodas for his better satisfaction... "—Hedges, Diary, July 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 30].

1727.—"His (Jagarynt's) Effigy is often carried abroad in Procession, mounted on a Coach four stories high... they fasten small Ropes to the Cable, two or three Fathoms long, so that upwards of 2,000 People have room enough to draw the Coach, and some old Zealots, as it passes through the Street, fall flat on the Ground, to have the Honour to be crushed to Pieces by the Coach Wheels."—A. Hamilton, i. 387; [ed. 1744].

1809.—"A thousand pilgrims strain Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with might and main, To drag that sacred wain, And scarce can draw along the enormous load. Prone fall the frantic votaries on the road, And calling on the God Their self-devoted bodies there they lay To pave his chariot way. On Jagnaunt they call, The ponderous car rolls on, and crushes all, Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path. Groans rise unheard; the dying cry. A and death, and agony, Are trodden under foot by you mad throng, Who follow close and thrust the deadly wheels along."

1814.—"The sight here beggars all description. Though Juggernaut made some progress on the 19th, and has travelled daily ever since, he has not yet reached the place of his destination. His brother is ahead of him, and the lady in the rear. One woman has devoted herself under the wheels, and a shocking sight it was. Another also intended to devote herself, missed the wheels with her body, and had her arm broken. Three people lost their lives in the crowd."—In Asiatic Journal—quoted in Beveridge, Hist. of India, ii. 54, without exacter reference.

c. 1818.—"That excess of fanaticism which formerly prompted the pilgrims to court death by throwing themselves in crowds under the wheels of the car of Jagannath has happily long ceased to actuate the worshippers of the present day. During 4 years that I have witnessed the ceremony, three cases only of this revolting species of immolation have occurred, one of which I may observe is doubtful, and should probably be ascribed to accident; in the others the victims had long been suffering from some excruciating complaints, and chose this method of ridding themselves of the burthen of life in preference to other modes of suicide so prevalent with the lower orders under similar circumstances."—A. Stirling, in As. Res. xv. 324.

1827.—March 28th in this year, Mr. Poynder, in the E. I. Court of Proprietors, stated that "about the year 1790 no fewer than 28 Hindoos were crushed to death at Ishera on the Ganges, under the wheels of a Juggernaut."—As. Journal, 1821, vol. xxiii. 702.

[1864. — "On the 7th July 1864, the editor of the Friend of India mentions that, a few days previously, he had seen, near Serampore, two persons crushed to death, and another frightfully lacerated, having thrown themselves under the wheels of a car during the Rath Jatra festival. It was afterwards stated that this occurrence was accidental."—Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 465.]

1871. — "... poor Johnny Tetterby stag-gering under his Mochol of an infant, the Juggernaut that crushed all his enjoy-ments."—Forster's Life of Dickens, ii. 415.

JULIBDAR, s. Pers. jiladár, from jilau, the string attached to the bridle by which a horse is led, the servant who leads a horse, also called jangi-bahdár, jaghibakhash. In the time of Hedges the word must have been commonly used in Bengal, but it is now quite obsolete.

[c. 1590. — "For some time it was a rule that, whenever he (Akbar) rode out on a khâgah horse, a rupee should be given, viz., one dam to the Âtbeg, two to the Jiladár ..."—Âin, ed. Blochmann, i. 142. (And see under PYKE.)

1673.—"In the heart of this Square is raised a place as large as a Mountebank's Stage, where the Gelabdâr, or Master Multeer, with his prime Passengers or Servants, have an opportunity to view the whole Caphala."—Fryer, 341.

1683.—"Your Jylibdar, after he had received his letter would not stay for the Genâ, but stood upon departure."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 15 ; [Hâk. Soc. i. 112].

"We admire what made you send poons to force our Gyllibdar back to your Factory, after he had gone 12 cosses on his way, and dismiss him again without any reason for it."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 26 ; [Hâk. Soc. i. 120].

1754.—"100 Gilodar; those who are charged with the direction of the couriers and their horses."—Hawkes's Travels, i. 171 ; 262.

[1812.—"I have often admired the courage and dexterity with which the Persian Jelowdars or grooms throw themselves into the thickest engagement of angry horses."—Moorer, Journey through Persia, 63 seq.]

1880.—"It would make a good picture, the surroundings of camels, horses, donkeys, and men ... Pascal and Remise cooking for me; the Jellodars, enveloped in felt coats, smoking their kallifins, amid the half-light of fast fading day..."—MS. Journal in Persia of Capt. W. Gill, R.E.

JUMBEEA, s. Ar. janbiya, probably from jamb, 'the side'; a kind of dagger worn in the girdle, so as to be drawn across the body. It is usually in form slightly curved. Sir R. Burton (Camões, Commentary, 413) identifies it with the agomia and gomio of the quotations below, and refers to a sketch in his Pilgrimage, but this we cannot find, [it is in the Memorial ed. i. 236], though the janbiyâh is several times mentioned, e.g. i. 347, iii. 72. The term occurs repeatedly in Mr. Egerton's catalogue of arms in the India Museum. Janbwa occurs as the name of a dagger in the Âin (orig. i. 119); why Blochmann in his translation [i. 110] spells it jhanbhak we do not know. See also Dozy and Eng. s.v. jambette. It seems very doubtful if the latter French word has anything to do with the Arabic word.

C. 1328.—"Takt-ud-din refused roughly and pushed him away. Then the maidened man drew a dagger (khanjar) such as is called in that country jambwa, and gave him a mortal wound."— Ibn Batuta, i. 534.

1516.—"They go to fight one another bare from the waist upwards, and from the waist downwards wrapped in cotton cloths drawn tightly round, and with many folds, and with their arms, which are swords, bucklers, and daggers (gomios)."—Barbosa, p. 80.

1774.—"Autour du corps ils ont un ceinturon de cuir brodé, ou garni d'argent, JUMDUD, s. H. Jamdad, Jamdhar. A kind of dagger, broad at the base and slightly curved, the hilt formed with a cross-grip like that of the Katar (see KUTTAUR). [A drawing of what he calls a jamdhar katari is given in Egerton's Catalogue (Pl. IX. No. 344-5.)] F. Johnson's Dictionary gives jamdar as a Persian word with the suggested etymology of janb-dar, 'flank-render.' But in the Ain the word is spelt jamdhar, which seems to indicate Hind. origin; and its occurrence in the poem of Chand Bardai (see Ind. Antiq. i. 281) corroborates this. Mr. Beames there suggests the etymology of Yama-dant 'Death's Tooth.' The drawings of the jamhad or jamdhar in the Ain illustrations show several specimens with double and triple toothed points, which perhaps favours this view; but Yama-dhara, 'death-wielder,' appears in the Sanskrit dictionaries as the name of a weapon. [Rather, perhaps, yama-dhara, 'death-bearer.]

c. 1526.—"Jamdher." See quotation under KUTTAUR.

[1813.—"... visited the jamdar khana, or treasury containing his jewels... curious arms...".—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 469.]

JUMMA, s. Hind. from Ar. jama'. The total assessment (for land revenue) from any particular estate, or division of country. The Arab. word signifies 'total' or 'aggregate.'

1781.—"An increase of more than 26 lacks of rupees (was) effected on the former jumma."—Fifth Report, p. 8.

JUMMABUNDEE, s. Hind. from P.—Ar. jama'bandi. A settlement (q.v.), i.e. the determination of the amount of land revenue due for a year, or a period of years, from a village, estate, or parcel of land. [In the N.W.P. it is specially applied to the annual village rent-roll, giving details of the holding of each cultivator.]

[1814.—"Jummandee." See under PATEL.]

JUMNA, n.p. The name of a famous river in India which runs by Delhi and Agra. Skt. Yamuna, Hind. Jamnâ and Jumna, the Διομοῦρα of Ptolemy, the Ἰωβάφις of Arrian, the Jomanes of Pliny. The spelling of Ptolemy almost exactly expresses the modern Hind. form Jamnâ. The name Jamnâ is also applied to what was in the 18th century, an unimportant branch of the Brahmaputra R. which connected it with the Ganges, but which has now for many years been the main channel of the former great river. (See JENNYE.) Jamnâ is the name of several other rivers of less note.

[1616-17.—"I proposed for a water worke, wh might giue the Chief Cittye of the Mogores content... wh is to be don vpon the River Ieminy wh passeth by Agra...".—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 360.]

[1619.—"The river Gemini was vsnft to set a Myll vpon."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 477.]

[JUMNA MUSJID, n.p. A common corruption of the Ar. jâmâ masjid, 'the cathedral or congregational mosque,' Ar. jama', to collect.' The common form is supposed to represent some great mosque on the Jumna R.

[1785.—"The Jumna-musjid is of great antiquity...".—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 448.]

[1849.—"In passing we got out to see the Jumna Masjed, a very fine building now used as a magazine."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 170.]

[1865.—"... the great mosque or Djamia... this word Djamia' means literally 'collecting' or 'uniting,' because here attends the great concourse of Friday worshippers...".—Palgrave, Central and E. Arabia, ed. 1898, 207.]

JUNGEERA, n.p., i.e. Janjir. The name of a native State on the coast, south of Bombay, from which the Fort and chief place is 44 m, distant. This place is on a small island, rising in the entrance to the Rajpurí inlet, to which the name Janjirí properly pertains, believed to be a local corruption of the Ar. jazíra, 'island.' The State is also called Habsoân, meaning 'Hubshee's land,' from the fact that for 3 or 4 centuries its chief has been of that race. This was not at first continuous, nor have the chiefs, even when of African blood, been always of one family; but they have apparently been so for the last 200 years. 'The Sidi' (see SEEDY) and 'The Habshi,' are titles popularly applied to this chief. This State has a port and some land in Káthiáwar.

Gen. Keatinge writes: "The members of the Sidi's family whom I saw were, for natives of India, particularly fair." The old Portuguese writers call this harbour Danda (or as they write it Damda), e.g. João de Castro in Príncipe Roteiro, p. 48. His rude chart shows the island-fort.

JUNGLE, s. Hind. and Mahr. jangal, from Skt. jangala (a word which occurs chiefly in medical treatises). The native word means in strictness only waste, uncultivated ground; then, such ground covered with shrubs, trees or long grass; and thence again the Anglo-Indian application is to forest, or other wild growth, rather than to the fact that it is not cultivated. A forest; a thicket; a tangled wilderness. The word seems to have passed at a rather early date into Persian, and also into use in Turkistan. From Anglo-Indian it has been adopted into French as well as in English. The word does not seem to occur in Fryer, which rather indicates that its use was not so extremely common among foreigners as it is now.

c. 1200.—"... Now the land is humid, jungle (jangalāh), or of the ordinary kind." —Susruta, i. ch. 35.

c. 1370.—"Elephants were numerous as sheep in the jangal round the Káš's dwelling."—Túrikhi-Fıros-Sháht, in Elliot, iii. 314.

c. 1450.—"The Kings of India hunt the elephant. They will stay a whole month or more in the wilderness, and in the jungle (Jangal)."—Abdurráẓacute, in Not. et Est. xiv. 51.

1474.—"... Bichenegar. The vast city is surrounded by three ravines, and intersected by a river, bordering on one side on a dreadful jungle."—Ath. Nikitin, in India in XVth Cent., 29.

1776.—"Land waste for five years... is called Jungle."—Haikat's Gentoo Code, 190.

1809.—"They built them here a bower of jointed cane, Strong for the needful use, and light and long. Was the slight framework reared, with little pain; Litho creepers then the wicker sides supply, And the tall jungle grass fit roofing gave Beneath the genial sky."—

c. 1830.—"'C'est là que je rencontrai les jungles... J'avoue que je fus très déappointé."—Jacquemont, Correspond. i. 194.

1788.—"To the Memory of Augustus Cleveland, Esq., Late Collector of the Districts of Bhaugulpore and Rajamahall, Who without Bloodshed or the Terror of Authority,Employing only the Means of Conciliation, Confidence, and Benevolence, Attempted and Accomplished The entire Subjection of the Lawless and Savage Inhabitants of the Jungleterry of Rajamahall..." (etc.)

Inscription on the Monument erected by Government to Cleveland, who died in 1784.

1817.—"These hills are principally covered with wood, excepting where it has been cleared away for the natives to build their villages, and cultivate jowaur (jowaur), plantains and yams, which together with some of the small grains mentioned in the account of the Jungleterry, constitute almost the whole of the productions of these hills."—Sutherland's Report on the Hill People (in App. to Long, 560).

1824.—"This part, I find (he is writing at Monghyr), is not reckoned either in Bengal or Bahar, having been, under the name of the Jungleterry district, always regarded, till its pacification and settlement, as a sort of border or debatable land."—Heber, i. 131.

JUNGLO, s. Guz. Junglo. This term, we are told by R. Drummond, was used in his time (the beginning of the 19th century), by the less polite, to distinguish Europeans; "wild men of the woods," that is, who did not understand Guzerati!

1806. — "Joseph Maria, a well-known scribe of the order of Topeowallas... was actually mobbed, on the first circuit of 1806, in the town of Pithead, by parties of curious old women and young, some of whom gazng upon him put the question, Aré Jungla, too munne pirmneek? 'O wild one, wilt thou marry me?' He knew not what they asked, and made no answer, whereupon they declared that he was indeed a very Jungla, and it required all the address of Kripnam (the worthy Brahmin who related this anecdote to the writer, uncontradicted in the presence of the said Senhor) to draw off the dames and damselS from the astonished Joseph."—R. Drummond, Illns. (s.v.).
JUNK, s. A large Eastern ship; especially (and in later use exclusively) a Chinese ship. This indeed is the earliest application also; any more general application belongs to an intermediate period. This is one of the oldest words in the European-Indian vocabulary. It occurs in the travels of Friar Odorico, written down in 1331, and a few years later in the rambling reminiscences of John de' Marignolli. The great Catalan World-map of 1375 gives a sketch of one of those ships with their sails of bamboo matting and calls them Enchi, no doubt a clerical error for Fuchi. Dobner, the original editor of Marignolli, in the 18th century, says of the word (junkos): "This word I cannot find in any medieval glossary. Most probably we are to understand vessels of platted reeds (a juncis texta) which several authors relate to be used in India." It is notable that the same erroneous suggestion is made by Amerigo Vespucci in his curious letter to one of the Medici, giving an account of the voyage of Da Gama, whose squadron he had met at C. Verde on its way home. The French translators of Ibn Batuta derive the word from the Chinese tschouen (chwen), and Littre gives the same etymology (s.v. jonque). It is possible that the word may be eventually traced to a Chinese original, but not very probable. The old Arab traders must have learned the word from Malay pilots, for it is certainly the Javanese and Malay jong and ajong, 'a ship or large vessel.' In Javanese the Great Bear is called Lin tang jong, 'The Constellation Junk,' [which is in Malay Bintang Jong. The various forms in Malay and cognate languages, with the Chinese words which have been suggested as the origin, are very fully given by Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 59 seq.]

of these there are three kinds; the big ones which are called junk, in the plural junw. . . . Each of these big ships carries from three up to twelve sails. The sails are made of bamboo slips, woven like mats; they are never hauled down, but are shifted round as the wind blows from one quarter or another."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 31. The French translators write the words as gonk (and gonak). Ibn Batuta really indicates chunk (and chunak); but both must have been quite wrong.

c. 1318.—"Wishing them to visit the shrine of St. Thomas the Apostle . . . we embarked on certain Junks (ascendentes Junkos) from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 356.

1459.—"About the year of Our Lord 1420, a Ship or Junk of India, in crossing the Indian Sea, was driven . . . in a westery and south-westerly direction for 40 days, without seeing anything but sky and sea. . . . The many voyages touched on the coast to supply its wants, the mariners beheld there the egg of a certain bird called chrocho, which egg was as big as a butt."—Rubric on Fra Mauro's Great Map at Venice.

"The Ships or junks (Zonch) which navigate this sea, carry 4 masts, and others besides that they can set up or strike (at will); and they have 40 to 60 little chambers for the merchants, and they have only one rudder. . . . "—Ibid.

1516.—"Many Moorish merchants reside in it (Malacca), and also Gentiles, particularly Chetis (natives of BETTY), who are natives of Choloendal; and they are all-very rich, and have many large ships which they call jugos."—Barbarossa, 191.

1563.—"Juncos are certain long ships that have stern and prow fashioned in the same way."—Garcia, t. 588.

1591.—"By this Negro we were advertised of a small Bare of some thirtie tonnes (which the Moors call a Junco)."—Barker's A. C. of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hakl. ii. 589.

1631.—"And doubtless they had made havoc of them all, had they not presently been relieved by two Arabian Junks (for so their small ill-built ships are named. . . . )"—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 342.

[1627.—"China also, and the great Atlantis (that you call America), which have now but Junks and Canoas, abounded then in tall Ships."—Bacon, New Atlantis, p. 12.]

1630.—"So repairing to Itaus (see JASK), a place in the Persian Gulph, they obtained a flote of Seaven Junks, to convey them and theirs as Merchants' bound for the Shoares or India."—Lord, Religion of the Persians, 3.
1673.—Fryer also speaks of ‘Portugal Jungks.’ The word had thus come to mean any large vessel in the Indian Seas. Barker’s use for a small vessel (above) is exceptional.

JUNKAMEER, s. This word occurs in Wheeler, i. 300, where it should certainly have been written Juncaneer. It was long a perplexity, and as it was the subject of one of Dr. Burnell’s latest, if not the very last, of his contributions to this work, I transcribe the words of his communication:

‘Working at improving the notes to v. Linschoten, I have accidentally cleared up the meaning of a word you asked me about long ago, but which I was then obliged to give up—‘Jonka-mir.’ It = ‘a collector of customs.’

(1745).—Notre Supérieur qui se savoit qu’à moitié chemin certains Jonquamiers* mettoient les passans à contribution, nous avoit donné un ou deux fanons (see PANAM) pour les payer en allant et en revenant, au cas qu’ils l’exigeassent de nous.’—P. Norbert, Mémoires, pp. 159-160.

“The original word is in Malayâlam chungakâran, and do, in Tamil, though it does not occur in the Dictionaries of that language; but chungam (=‘Customs’) does.

“I was much pleased to settle this curious word; but I should never have thought of the origin of it, had it not been for that rascally old Capuchin P. Norbert’s note.”

My friend’s letter (from West Stratton) has no date, but it must have been written in July or August 1882.

—[H.Y.] (See JUNKON.)

1680.—‘The Didacan (see DEWAUN) returned with Lingapis Ruccus (see ROOKCA) upon the Anvaldar (see HAVILDAR) at St. Thoma, and upon the two chief Juncaneers in this part of the country, ordering them not to stop goods or provisions coming into the town.’—Fort St. Geo. Consn., Nov. 22, Notes and Ects., iii. 39.

1746.—‘Given to the Governor’s Servants, Juncaneers, &c., as usual at Christmas, Salampores (see SALEMPOOY) 18Ps. P. 13.’—Act. of Extra Charges at Fort St. David, to Dec. 31. M.S. Report, in India Office.

JUNK-CEYLON, n.p. The popular name of an island off the west coast of the Malay Peninsula. Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, pp. iii. and 29-30) calls it Jan-Sylan, and says it is properly Ujong (i.e. in Malay, ‘Cape’) Sylang. This appears to be nearly right. The name is, according to Crawford (Malay Dict. s.v. Salang, and Dict. Ind. Archip. s.v. Ujong) Ujong Salang, ‘Salang Headland.’ [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this. “There is at least one quite possible alternative, i.e. jong salang, in which jong means ‘a junk,’ and salang, when applied to vessels, ‘heavily tossing’ (see Klinkert, Dict. s.v. salang). Another meaning of salang is to transfix a person with a dagger,’ and is the technical term for Malay executions, in which the kris was driven down from the collar-bone to the heart. Parles in the first quotation is now known as Perlis.”]

1539.—“There we crost over to the firm Land, and passing by the Port of Juncalane (Juncalado) we sailed two days and a half with a favourable wind, by means whereof we got to the River of Parles in the Kingdom of Queda...”—Pinto (orig. cap. xix.) in Cogan, p. 22.

1592.—“We departed thence to a Baie in the Kingdom of unsalaom, which is betwene Malacca and Pegu, 8 degrees to the Northward.”—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 591.

1727.—“The North End of Jonk Ceyloan lies within a mile of the Continent.”—A. Hamilton, 69; [ed. 1744, ii. 67.]

JUNKEON, s. This word occurs as below. It is no doubt some form of the word chungam, mentioned under JUNKAMEER. Wilson gives Telugu Sunkam, which might be used in Orissa, where Bruton was. [Shungum (Mal. chunnam) appears in the sense of toll or customs duties in many of the old treaties in Logan, Malabar, vol. iii.]

1638.—“Any Junkeon or Custome.”—Bruton’s Narrative, in Hakl. v. 59.

1676.—“These practices (claims of perquisite by the factory chiefs) hath occasioned some to apply to the Governor for relief, and chosen rather to pay Junkean than submit to the unreasonable demands aforesaid.”—Major Packtle’s Proposals, in Fort St. Geo. Consn., Feb. 16. Notes and Ects., i. 39.

[1727.—“... at every ten or twelve Miles end, a Fellow to demand Junkaun or Poll-Money for me and my Servants...” —A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 392.]

JURIBASSO, s. This word, meaning ‘an interpreter,’ occurs constantly in the Diary of Richard Cocks, of the English Factory in Japan, admirably edited for the Hakluyt Society by Mr. Edward Maunde Thompson (1883). The word is really Malayo-Javanese jurubahäsa, lit. 'language-master,' juru being an expert, 'a master of a craft,' and bahäsa the Skt. bhäsä, 'speech.' [Wilkinson, Dict., writes Juru-bähasa; Mr. Skeat prefers juru-bhäsä.]

1603.—At Patani the Hollanders having arrived, and sent presents—"'Ils furent pris par un officier nommé Orankaes (see ORÁN-KAY) Jurebassa, qui en fît trois portions.'—In Rec. du Voyages, ed. 1703, ii, 667. See also pp. 672, 675.

1613.—"(Said the Mandarin of Ançao) Captain-major, Auditor, residents, and jurubachts, for the space of two days you must come before me to attend to these instructions (capitulos), in order that I may write to the Alão.' . . .

"These communications being read in the Chamber of the City of Macau, before the Viceroy, the people, and the Captain-Major then commanding in the said city, João Serrao da Cunha, they sought for a person who might be called to reply, such as had knowledge and experience of the Chinese, and of their manner of speech, and finding Lourenço Carvalho . . . he made the reply in the following form of words ' . . . To this purpose we the Captain-Major, the Auditor, the Viceroy, the Padres, and the Jurebassa, assembling together and beating our foreheads before God. . . .'-Bocarro, pp. 725-729.

"The fourteenth, I sent M. Cockes, and my Jurebassa to both the Kings to entreat them to provide me of a dozen Seamen."—Capt. Savia, in Purchas, 378.

1615.—". . . his desire was that, for his sake, I would give over the pursuit of this matter against the sea bongew, for that if they were followed, of force the said bongew must cut his heels, and then my Jurebassa must do the like, until which his request I was content to agree. . . .'-Cocks's Diary, i. 33.

JUTE, s. The fibre (gunny-fibre) of the bark of Corchorus capsularis, L., and Corchorus olitorius, L., which in the last 45 years has become so important an export from India, and a material for manufacture in Great Britain as well as in India. "At the last meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Professor Skeat commented on various English words. Jute, a fibrous substance, he explained from the Sanskrit jāta, a less usual form of jata, meaning, 1st, the matted hair of an ascetic; 2ndly, the fibrous roots of a tree such as the banyan; 3rdly, any fibrous substance" (Academy, Dec. 27, 1879). The secondary meanings attributed here to jata are very doubtful.* The term jute appears to have been first used by Dr. Roxburgh in a letter dated 1795, in which he drew the attention of the Court of Directors to the value of the fibre "called jute by the natives." [It appears, however, as early as 1746 in the Log of a voyage quoted by Col. Temple in J.R.A.S., Jan. 1900, p. 158.] The name in fact appears to be taken from the vernacular name in Orissa. This is stated to be properly jhātā, but jhātō is used by the uneducated. See Report of the Jute Commission, by Babu Hemchundra Kerr, Calcutta, 1874; also a letter from Mr. J. S. Cotton in the Academy, Jan. 17, 1880.

JUTKA, s. From Dak.—Hind. jhatkā, 'quick.' The native cab of Madras, and of Mofussil towns in that Presidency; a conveyance only to be characterised by the epithet ramshackle, though in that respect equalled by the Calcutta cranchee (q.v.). It consists of a sort of box with venetian windows, on two wheels, and drawn by a miserable pony. It is entered by a door at the back. (See SHIGRAM, with like meanings).

JUZAIL, s. This word jazā'il is generally applied to the heavy Afghan rifle, fired with a forked rest. If it is Ar. it must be jazā'il, the plural of jazāl, 'big,' used as a substantive. Jazil is often used for a big, thick thing, so it looks probable. (See GINGALL). Hence jazā'ilchā, one armed with such a weapon.

[1898.—"All night the cressets glimmered pale

[1900.—"Two companies of Khyber Jezailches."—Warburton, Eighteen Years in the Khyber, 78.]

JYEDAD, s. P.—H. jāidad. Territory assigned for the support of troops.

[1824.—"Rampooon on the Chumbul . . . had been granted to Dudernate, as Jaidad,

* This remark is from a letter of Dr. Burnell's dd. Tanjore, March 16, 1880. or temporary assignment for the payment of his troops."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 223.]

JYSHE. s. This term, Ar. jaîsh, 'an army, a legion,' was applied by Tippoo to his regular infantry, the body of which was called the Jaîsh Kachari (see under CUTCERRY).

C. 1782.—"About this time the Bar or regular infantry, Kutcheri, were called the Jîsh Kutcheri."—Hist. of Tipth Sultân, by Husseyn Ali Khán Kermâni, p. 32.

1786.—"At such times as new levies or recruits for the Jîshe and Piadehs are to be entertained, you two and Syed Peer assembling in Kachurry are to entertain none but proper and eligible men."—Tippoo's Letters, 256.

KAJEE. s. This is a title of Ministers of State used in Nepal and Sikkim. It is no doubt the Arabic word (see CAZEE for quotations). Kâjî is the pronunciation of this last word in various parts of India.

KALA JUGGH, s. Anglo-H. kâlâ jagah for a 'dark place,' arranged near a ball-room for the purpose of flirtation.

1885.—"At night it was rather cold, and the frequenters of the Kala Juggh (or dark places) were unable to enjoy it as much as I hoped they would."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 91.

KALLA-NIMMACK, s. Hind. kâlâ-namak, 'black salt,' a common mineral drug, used especially in horse-treatment. It is muraiate of soda, having a mixture of oxide of iron, and some impurities. (Royle.)

KAPAL, s. Kâpâl, the Malay word for a ship, [which seems to have come from the Tam. kappal,] "applied to any square-rigged vessel, with top and top-gallant masts" (Marsden, Memoirs of a Malay Family, 57).

KARBAREE. s. Hind. kârbârî, 'an agent, a manager.' Used chiefly in Bengal Proper.

[c. 1857.—"The Foujdar's report stated that a police Carbaree was sleeping in his own house."—Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurisp. 467.]

1867.—"The Lushai Karbaris (literally men of business) duly arrived and met me at Kassalong."—Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 233.

KARCANNA, s. Hind. from Pers. kâr-khâna, 'business-place.' We cannot improve upon Wilson's definition: "An office, or place where business is carried on; but it is in use more especially applied to places where mechanical work is performed; a workshop, a manufactory, an arsenal; also, fig., to any great fuss or bustle." The last use seems to be obsolete.

[1663.—"Large balls are seen in many places, called Kar-Kanays or workshops for the artizans."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 258 seq. Also see CARCANA.]

1842.—"I further insist upon the offending Kardar being sent a prisoner to my head-quarters at Sukkur within the space of five days, to be dealt with as I shall determine."—Sir C. Napier, in Napier's Conquest of Scinde, 149.

KAREETA, s. Hind. from Ar. kharîta, and in India also khalîta. The silk bag (described by Mrs. Parkes, below) in which is enclosed a letter to or from a native noble; also, by transfer, the letter itself. In 2 Kings v. 23, the bag in which Naaman bound the silver is kharît; also in Isaiah iii. 22, the word translated 'crispin-pins' is kharîtim, rather 'purses.'

C. 1350.—"The Sherif Ibrâhîm, surnamed the Kharîtdâr, i.e. the Master of the Royal Paper and Pens, was governor of the territory of Hânî and Sarsât."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 337.

1388.—"Her Highness the Bâîza Bâi did me the honour to send me a Kharîtâ, that is a letter enclosed in a long bag of Kînh-khwâb (see KINCOB), crimson silk brocaded with flowers in gold, contained in another of fine muslin: the mouth of the bag was tied with a gold and tasseled cord, to which was appended the great seal of her Highness."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim (Mrs. Parkes), ii. 250.

In the following passage the thing is described (at Constantinople).

1673.—"... le Vîsir prenant un sachet de beau brocard d'or à fleurs, long tout au moins d'une demi aulne et large de cinq ou six doigts, lié et scellè par le haut avec une KAUL, s. Hind. Kal, properly 'Time,' then a period, death, and popularly the visitation of famine. Under this word we read:

1808.—"Scarcity, and the scourge of civil war, embittered the Mahatta nation in A.D. 1804, of whom many emigrants were supported by the justice and generosity of neighbouring powers, and (a large number) were relieved in their own capital by the charitable contributions of the English at Bombay alone. This and opening of Hospitals for the sick and starving, within the British settlements, were gratefully told to the writer afterwards by many Mahrattas in the heart, and from distant parts, of their own country."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

KAUNTA, CAUNTA, s. This word, Mahr. and Guz. kantha, 'coast or margin,' [Skt. kantha, 'immediate proximity,' kantha, 'the neck,'] is used in the northern part of the Bombay Presidency in composition to form several popular geographical terms, as Mahi Kanta, for a group of small States on the banks of the Mahi River; Bivna Kanta, south of the above; Sindhu Kanta, the Indus Delta, &c. The word is no doubt the same which we find in Ptolemy for the Gulf of Kachh, Kadha Kõnos. Kanthi-Kot was formerly an important place in Eastern Kachh, and Kanta was the name of the southern coast district (see Kitter, vi. 1038).

KEBULEE. (See MYROBOLANS.)

KEDDAH, s. Hind. Kedhā (kedhā, 'to chase,' from Skt. akheta, 'hunting'). The term used in Bengal for the enclosure constructed to entrap elephants. [The system of hunting elephants by making a trench round a space and enticing the wild animals by means of tame decoys is described by Arrian, Indika, 13.] (See CORRAL)

[c. 1590. — "There are several modes of hunting elephants. 1. kedah (kededna) then follows a description. — An, i. 284."

1789-90.—"The party on the plain below have, during this interval, been completely occupied in forming the Kedah or enclosure."—Lives of the Lindsay, iii. 101.

1810.—"A trap called a Kedah."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 426.

1860.—"The custom in Bengal is to construct a strong enclosure (called a Kedah) in the heart of the forest."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 342.

KEDGEREE, KITCHERY, s. Hind. khichri, a mess of rice, cooked with butter and dal (see DHALL), and flavoured with a little spice, shred onion, and the like; a common dish all over India, and often served at Anglo-Indian breakfast tables, in which very old precedent is followed, as the first quotation shows. The word appears to have been applied metaphorically to mixtures of sundry kinds (see Fryer, below), and also to mixt jargon or lingua franca. In England we find the word is often applied to a mess of re-cooked fish, served for breakfast; but this is inaccurate. Fish is frequently eaten with kedgerees, but is no part of it. ["Fish Kitcherie" is an old Anglo-Indian dish, see the recipe in Riddell, Indian Domestic Economy, p. 437.]

c. 1340.—"The munj (Moong) is boiled with rice, and then buttered and eaten. This is what they call Kishri, and on this dish they breakfast every day."— Ibn Batuta, iii. 131.

c. 1448.—"The elephants of the palace are fed upon Kitchri."—Abdurrazzak, in India in XVth Cent. 27.

c. 1475.—"Horses are fed on peas; also on Kichiris, boiled with sugar and oil; and early in the morning they get shihenin" (3).

The following recipe for Kedgerees is by Abu'l Faqil:

c. 1590.—"Khichri, Rice, split dal, and ghī, 5 ser of each: ½ ser salt; this gives 7 dishes."—An, i. 59.

1648.—"Their daily gains are very small, and with these they fill their hungry bellies with a certain food called Kitcherje."— Van Twist, 57.

1653.—"Kichieri est vne sorte de legume dont les Indiens se nourrissent ordinairement. — De la Boullaye-le-Geus, ed. 1657, p. 545.

1672.—Baldaeus has Kitzsery, Tavernier Quicheri [ed. Batch, i. 282, 391].

1673.—"The Diet of this Sort of People admits not of great Variety or Cost, their delightfulst Food being only Cutcherie a sort of Pulse and Rice mixed together, and boiled in Butter, with which they grow fat."—Fryer, 81.

Again, speaking of pearls in the Persian Gulf, he says: "Whatever is of any Value is very dear. Here is a great Plenty of what they call Ketchery, a mixture of all together, or Refuse of Rough, Yellow, and Unequal, which they sell by Bushels to the Russians."—Ibid. 929.
KEDGEREE. 477  KERSEYMERE.

1727.—"Some Doll and Rice, being mingled together and boiled make Kitcheree, the common Food of the Country. They eat it with Butter and Atchar (see ACHAR)."—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 162].

1750-60.—"Kitcheree is only rice stewed, with a certain pulse they call Dhall, and is generally eaten with salt-fish, butter, and pickles of various sorts, to which they give the general name of Atchar."—Grose, i. 150.

[1813.—"He was always a welcome guest ... and ate as much of their rice and Cutcheree as he chose."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 502.]

1880.—"A correspondent of the Indian Mirror, writing of the annual religious fair at Ajmere, thus describes a feature in the proceedings: "There are two tremendous copper pots, one of which is said to contain about eighty maunds of rice and the other forty maunds. To fill these pots with rice, sugar, and dried fruits requires a round sum of money, and it is only the rich who can afford to do so. This year His Highness the Nawab of Tonk paid Rs. 3,000 to fill up the pots. ... After the pots filled with khichri had been inspected by the Nawab, who was accompanied by the Commissioner of Ajmere and several Civil Officers, the distribution, or more properly the plunder, of khichri commenced, and men well wrapped up with clothes, stuffed with cotton, were seen leaping down into the boiling pot to secure their share of the booty."—Pioneer Mail, July 8. [See the reference to this custom in Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 314, and a full account in Raijputana Gazetteer, ii. 63.]

KEDGEREE, n.p. Khiijiri or Kijari, a village and police station on the low lands near the mouth of the Hoogly, on the west bank, and 68 miles below Calcutta. It was formerly well known as a usual anchorage of the larger Indiamen.

1683.—"This morning early we weighed anchor with the tide of Ebb, but having little wind, got no further than the Point of Kegaria Island."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 64].

1684.—"Signor Nicolò Pareres, a Portuguese Merchant, assured me their whole community had wrought ye Vice King of Goa ... to send them 2 or 3 Frigates with Soldiers to possess themselves of ye Islands of Kegeria and Ingetel."—Ibid. Dec. 17; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1727.—"It is now inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingetli and Kidgerie, two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, ii. 2; [ed. 1744]. (See HIDGELEE.)

1753.—"De l'autre côté de l'entrée, les rivières de Cajori et de l'Ingetli (see HIDGELEE), puis plus au large la rivière de Pipil et celle de Balasor (see BALASOR), sont avec Tomluk (see TUMLOOK), rivière mentionnée plus haut, et qu'on peut ajouter ici, des dérivations d'un grand fleuve, dont le nom de Ganga lui est commun avec le Gange. ... Une carte du Golfe de Bengale insérée dans Blaen, fera même distinguer les rivières d'Ingetli et de Cajori (si on prend la peine de l'examiner) comme des bras du Ganga."—D'Anville, p. 86.

As to the origin of this singular error, about a river Ganga flowing across India from W. to E., see some extracts under GODAVERY. The Rupnarain River, which joins the Hoogly from the W. just above Diamond Harbour, is the grand fleuve here spoken of. The name Gungo or Old Gunga is applied to this in charts late in the 18th century. It is thus mentioned by A. Hamilton, 1727: "About five leagues farther up on the West Side of the River of Hugli, is another Branch of the Ganges, called Gian, it is broader than that of the Hugli, but much shallower."—ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

KEDGEREE-POT, s. A vulgar expression for a round pipkin such as is in common Indian use, both for holding water and for cooking purposes. (See CHATTY, GHRURA.)

1811.—"As a memorial of such misfortunes, they plant in the earth an ear bearing a nudgeri, or earthen pot."—Soleyns, Les Hindous, iii.

1830.—"Some natives were in readiness with a small raft of Kedgeri-pots, on which the palkees were to be ferried over."—Mem. of Cot. Mountain, 110.

KENNERY, n.p. The site of a famous and very extensive group of cave-temples on the Island of Salsette, near Bombay, properly Kanneeri.

1602.—"Holding some conversation with certain very aged Christians, who had been among the first converts there of Padre Fr. Antonio do Porto, ... one of them, who alleged himself to be more than 120 years old, and who spoke Portuguese very well, and read and wrote it, and was continually reading the Flos Statorum, and the Lives of the Saints, assured me that without doubt the work of the Pagoda of Canari was made under the orders of the father of Saint Josafat the Prince, whom Barlaam converted to the Faith of Christ."—Canto, VII. iii. cap. 10.

1673.—"Next Morn before Break of Day we directed our steps to the anciently fam'd, but now ruin'd City of Canorein ... all cut out of a Rock,"—Fryer, 71-72.

1825.—"The principal curiosities of Salsette ... are the cave temples of Kennery. These are certainly in every way remarkable, from their number, their beautiful situation, their elaborate carving, and their marked connection with Buddh and his religion."—Heber, ii. 130.

Kerseymere. 478  KHAKEE, KHARKI.

Indian. But it is through forms like cassimere (also in English use), a corruption of cashmere, though the corruption has been shaped by the previously existing English word kersey for a kind of woollen cloth, as if kersey were one kind and kerseymere another, of similar goods. Kersey is given by Minshew (2nd ed. 1627), without definition, thus: "Hersic cloth, G. (i.e. French) cariez." The only word like the last given by Littre is "Carisil, sorte de canevas." . . . . This does not apply to kersey, which appears to be represented by "Creseau—Terme de Commerce; etoffe de laine croisée à deux envers; etym. croiser." Both words are probably connected with croiser or with carre. Planché indeed (whose etymologies are generally worthless) says: "made originally at Kersey, in Suffolk, whence its name." And he adds, equal to the occasion, "Kerseymere, so named from the position of the original factory on the mere, or water which runs through the village of Kersey" (!) Mr. Skeat, however, we see, thinks that Kersey, in Suffolk, is perhaps the origin of the word Kersey: [and this he repeats in the new ed. (1901) of his Concise Etym. Dict., adding, "Not from Jersey, which is also used as the name of a material." Kerseymere, he says, is "a corruption of Cashmere or Cassimere, by confusion with kersey"].

1583.—"I think cloth, Kerseys and tinnie have never been here at so lowe prices as they are now."—Mr. John Newton, from Babylony (i.e. Bagdad) July 20, in Hakt. 378.

1603.—"I had as lief be a list of an English kersey, as be pil'd as thou art pil'd, for a French velvet."—Measure for Measure, i. 2.

1625.—"Ordanet the thesaurer to tak aff to ilk ane of the officeris and to the drummer and pyper, ilk ane of thame, fyve elne of reid Kairrie claiithe."—Exts. from Reeds. of Glasgow, 1876, p. 347.

1626.—In a contract between the Factor of the King of Persia and a Dutch "Upper Koopman" for goods we find: "2000 Persian olls of Carsay at 1 eoori (i) the ell."—Valentijn, v. 285.

1754.—"For sale—superb cambrics and edgings . . . scarlet and blue Kassimeres."—In Seton-Karr, i. 47.

c. 1880.—(no date given) "Kerseymere. Cassimere. A finer description of kersey . . . (then follows the absurd etymology as given by Planehö). . . . It is principally a manufacturer of the west of England, and except in being tweeded (sic) and of narrow width in no respect differs from superfine cloth."—Draper's Dict. s.v.

[1828.—"The river . . . meanders fantastically . . . through a Khader, or valley between two ranges of hills."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 130.

KHAKEE, vulgarly KHARKI, KHARKEE, s. or adj. Hind. khākī, 'dusty or dust-coloured,' from Pers. khāk, 'earth,' or 'dust'; applied to a light drab or chocolate-coloured cloth. This was the colour of the uniform worn by some of the Punjab regiments at the siege of Delhi, and became very popular in the army generally during the campaigns of 1857-58, being adopted as a convenient material by many other corps. [Gubbins (Mutinies in Oudh, 296) describes how the soldiers at Lucknow dyed their uniforms a light brown or dust colour with a mixture of black and red office inks, and Cave Brown (Punjab and Delhi, ii. 211) speaks of its introduction in place of the red uniform which gave the British soldiers the name of "Lal Coorte Wallahs."]

[1858.—A book appeared called "Service and Adventures with the Khakee Ressalah, or Meerut Volunteer Horse during the Mutinies in 1857-8," by R. H. W. Dunlop.

[1859.—"It has been decided that the full dress will be of dark blue cloth, made up, not like the tunic, but as the native ingresekah (angarka), and set off with red piping. The undress clothing will be entirely of Khakee."—Madras Govt. Order, Feb. 18, quoted in Calcutta Rev. citi. 407.

1787.—"The Amir, we may mention, wore a khaki suit, edged with gold, and the well-known Herati cap."—Sat. Review, Nov. 30, 1883.

[1899.—"The batteries to be painted with the Kirkee colour, which being similar to the roads of the country, will render the vehicles invisible."—Times, July 12.

[1990-91.—The newspapers have constant references to an khaki election, that is an elective started on a war policy, and the War Loan for the Transvaal Campaign has been known as "Khanakis.]"

Recent military operations have led to the general introduction of Khaki as the service uniform. Something like this has been used in the East for clothing from a very early time:

[1611.—"See if you can get me a piece of very fine brown calico to make me clothes."
—Dawers, Letters, i. 109.]

KHALSA, s. and adj. Hind. from Ar. khallṣa (properly ḥ̄allqa) ‘pure, genuine.’ It has various technical meanings, but, as we introduce the word, it is applied by the Sikhs to their community and church (so to call it) collectively.

1783.—"The Sicques salute each other by the expression Wāh Goooro, without any inclination of the body, or motion of the hand. The Government at large, and their armies, are denominated Khalsa, and Khalasajee.”—Forster’s Journey, ed. 1808, i.

"And all the Punjab knows me, for my father’s name was known In the days of the conquering Khalsa, when I was a boy half-grown.”
Attar Singh loqāṭur, by Sowar, in an Indian paper; name and date lost.

KHAN, s. a. Turki through Pers. Khān. Originally this was a title, equivalent to Lord or Prince, used among the Mongol and Turk nomad hordes. Besides this sense, and an application to various other chiefs and nobles, it has still become in Persia, and still more in Afghanistan, a sort of vague title like “Esq.”, in India it has become a common affix to, or in fact part of, the name of Hindustānis out of every rank, properly, however of those claiming a Pathān descent. The Tendency of swelling titles is always thus to degenerate, and when the value of Khān had sunk, a new form, Khān-Khānān (Khān of Khāns) was devised at the Court of Delhi, and applied to one of the high officers of State.

[c. 1610.—The “Assam Cauonas” of Pyard de Laval, which Mr. Gray fails to identify, is probably Hanum-Khan, Hak. Soc.
i. 69.

[1616.—"All the Captayens, as Channa Chana (Khān-Khānān), Mahobet Chān, Chān John (Khān Jahan).”—Sir T. Roe,
Hak. Soc. i. 192.

[1675.—“Cawn.” See under GINGI.]
KHASS, KAUS. &c., adj. Hind. from Ar. khāṣṣ, ‘special, particular, Royal.’ It has many particular applications, one of the most common being to estates retained in the hands of Government, which are said to be held khāṣṣ. The khāṣṣ-mahāl again, in a native house, is the women’s apartment. Many years ago a white-bearded khānsamān (see CONSUMAH), in the service of one of the present writers, indulging in reminiscences of the days when he had been attached to Lord Lake’s camp, in the beginning of the last century, extolled the sāhibs of those times above their successors, observing (in his native Hindustani): “In those days I think the Sāhibs all came from London khāṣṣ; now a great lot of Liverpoolwālās come to the country!”

There were in the Palaces of the Great Mogul and other Mahommedan Princes of India always two Halls of Audience, or Durbar, the Devān-i-Ām, or Hall of the Public, and the Devān-i-Khāṣṣ, the Special or Royal Hall, for those who had the entrée, as we say.

In the Indian Vocabulary, 1788, the word is written Coss.

KHĀSYA, n.p. A name applied to the oldest existing race in the cise-Tibetan Himālaya, between Nepal and the Ganges, i.e. in the British Districts of Kumāun and Garhwal. The Khāsyas are Hindu in religion and customs, and probably are substantially Hindu also in blood; though in their aspect there is some slight suggestion of that of their Tibetan neighbours. There can be no ground for supposing them to be connected with the Mongoloid nation of Kasias (see COSSYA) in the mountains south of Assam.

[1526.—“About these hills are other tribes of men. With all the investigation and enquiry I could make... All that I could learn was that the men of these hills were called Kas. It struck me that as the Hindustani frequently confound sīn and sīn and as Kashmir is the chief... city in those hills, it may have taken its name from that circumstance.”—Legden’s Baber, 313.]

1799.—“The Vakeel of the rajah of Comanah (i.e. Kumāun) of Almora, who is a learned Pandit, informs me that the greater part of the zemindars of that country are C’hasas... They are certainly a very ancient tribe, for they are mentioned as such in the Institutes of Menu; and their great ancestor C’hasa or C’hasya is mentioned by Sanchoniathon, under the name of Cassius. He is supposed to have lived before the Flood, and to have given his name to the mountains he seized upon.”—Wilford (Wilfordizing!), in As. Res. vi. 456.

1824.—“The Khasya nation pretend to be all Rajput of the highest caste... they will not even sell one of their little mountain cows to a stranger... They are a modest, gentle, respectful people, honest in their dealings.”—Heber, i. 264.

KHELAT, n.p. The capital of the Bilūch State upon the western frontier of Sind, which gives its name to the State itself. The name is in fact the Ar. kal‘a, ‘a fort.’ (See under KILLA-DAR.) The terminal t of the Ar. word (written kal‘at) has for many centuries been pronounced only when the word is the first half of a compound name meaning ‘Castle of...’ No doubt this was the case with the Bilūch capital, though in its case the second part has been completely dropt out of use. Khelat (Kal’at)-i-Gholjī is an example where the second part remains, though sometimes dropt.

KHIRAJ, s. Ar. kharaj (usually pron. in India khiraj), is properly a tribute levied by a Muslim lord upon conquered unbelievers, also land-tax; in India it is almost always used for the land-revenue paid to Government; whence a common expression (also Ar.) la khiraj, treated as one word, lākhiraj, ‘rent-free.’

[c. 1590.—“In ancient times a capitation tax was imposed, called khiraj.”—Am, ed. Jarrett, ii. 55. “Some call the whole produce of the revenue khiraj.”—Ibid. ii. 57.]

1784.—“... 136 beegahs, 18 of which are Lackherage land, or land paying no rent.”—In Seton-Karr, i. 49.

KHOA, s. Hind. and Beng. kho, a kind of concrete, of broken brick, lime, &c., used for floors and terrace-roofs.

KHOT, s. This is a Mahāraṭ word, khot, in use in some parts of the Bombay Presidency as the designation of persons holding or farming villages on a peculiar tenure called khot, and
The position and claims of the khots have been the subject of much debate and difficulty, especially with regard to the rights and duties of the tenants under them, whose take various forms; but to go into these questions would carry us much more deeply into local technicalities than would be consistent with the scope of this work, or the knowledge of the editor. Practically it would seem that the khot is, in the midst of provinces where ryotwarry is the ruling system, an exceptional person, holding much the position of a petty zamindar in Bengal (apart from any question of permanent settlement); and that most of the difficult questions touching khoti have arisen from this its exceptional character in Western India.

The khot occurs especially in the Konkan, and was found in existence when, in the early part of the last century, we occupied territory that had been subject to the Mahratta power. It is apparently traceable back at least to the time of the Adil Shahi (see IDALCAN) dynasty of the Deccan. There are, however, various denominations of khot. In the Southern Konkan the khoti has long been a hereditary zamindar, with proprietary rights, and also has in many cases replaced the ancient patel as headman of the village; a circumstance that has caused the khoti to be sometimes regarded and defined as the holder of an office, rather than of a property. In the Northern Konkan, again, the Khotis were originally mere revenue-farmers, without proprietary or hereditary rights, but had been able to usurp both.

As has been said above, administrative difficulties as to the Khotis have been chiefly connected with their rights over, or claims from, the ryots, which have been often exorbitant and oppressive. At the same time it is in evidence that in the former distracted state of the country, a Khoti was sometimes established in compliance with a petition of the cultivators. The Khoti "acted as a buffer between them and the extortionate demands of the revenue officers under the native Government. And this is easily comprehended, when it is remembered that formerly districts used to be farmed to the native officials, whose sole object was to squeeze as much revenue as possible out of each village. The Khot bore the brunt of this struggle. In many cases he prevented a new survey of his village, by consenting to the imposition of some new patti.* This no doubt he recovered from the ryots, but he gave them their own time to pay, advanced them money for their cultivation, and was a milder master than a rapacious revenue officer would have been."

(Kandy, pp. 20-21). See Selections from Records of Bombay Government, No. cxxiv., N.S., viz., Selections with Notes, regarding the Khoti Tenure, compiled by E. T. Candy, Bo. C. S. 1873; also Abstract of Proceedings of the Govt. of Bombay in the Revenue Dept., April 24, 1876, No. 2474.

KHOI, s. The holder of the peculiar khot tenure in the Bombay Presidency.

KHUD, KUDD, s. This is a term chiefly employed in the Himalaya, kudd, meaning a precipitous hill-side, also a deep valley. It is not in the dictionaries, but is probably allied to the Hind. khät, 'a pit,' Dakh.

—Hind. khdãda. [Platts gives Hind. khdad. This is from Skt. khaędà, 'a gap, a chasm,' while khät comes from Skt. khâta, 'an excavation.'] The word is in constant Anglo-Indian colloquial use at Simla and other Himalayan stations.

1837. —"The steeps about Mussoor are so very perpendicular in many places, that a person of the strongest nerve would scarcely be able to look over the edge of the narrow footpath in the Khud, without a shudder."

—Bacon, First Impressions, ii. 146.

1838. —"On my arrival I found one of the ponies at the estate had been killed by a fall over the precipice, when bringing up water from the khud."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

1866. —"When the men of the 43rd Regt. refused to carry the guns any longer, the Eurasian gunners, about 20 in number, accompanying them, made an attempt to bring them on, but were unequal to doing so, and under the direction of this officer (Capt. Cockburn, R.A.) threw them down a khud, as the ravines in the Himalaya are called. . . ."—Bhotan and the H. of the Door War, by Surgeon Rennie, M.D. p. 199.

1879. —"The commander-in-chief . . . is perhaps alive now because his horse so judiciously chose the spot on which suddenly to swerve round that its hind hoofs were only half over the chud” (sic).—Times Letter, from Simla, Aug. 15.

KHURREEF, s. Ar. kharif, ‘autumn’; and in India the crop, or harvest of the crop, which is sown at the beginning of the rainy season (April and May) and gathered in after it, including rice, the tall millets, maize, cotton, rape, sesamum, &c. The obverse crop is rubbee (q.v.).

[1809.—“Three weeks have not elapsed since the Kureef crop, which consists of Bajru (see BJRA), Jowar (see JOWAUR), several smaller kinds of grain, and cotton, was cleared from off the fields, and the same ground is already ploughed . . . and sown for the great Rubbe crop of wheat, barley and chunu (see GRAM).”—Broughton, Letters from a Makratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 216.]

KHUTPUT, s. This is a native slang term in Western India for a prevalent system of intrigue and corruption. The general meaning of khatpat in Hind. and Mahr. is rather ‘wrangling’ and ‘worry,’ but it is in the former sense that the word became famous (1850-54) in consequence of Sir James Outram’s struggles with the rascality, during his tenure of the Residency of Baroda.

[1881.—“Khutput, or court intrigue, rules more or less in every native State, to an extent incredible among the more civilised nations of Europe.”—Frazer, Records of Sport, 204.]

KHUTTRY, KHETTRY, CUTTRY, s. Hind. Khattri, Khatri, Skt. Kshatriya. The second, or military caste, in the theoretical or fourfold division of the Hindus. [But the word is more commonly applied to a mercantile caste, which has its origin in the Punjab, but is found in considerable numbers in other parts of India. Whether they are really of Kshatriya descent is a matter on which there is much difference of opinion. See Crookes, Tribes and Castes of N.W.P., iii. 264 seqq.] The Xαρραίων whom Ptolemy locates apparently towards Rājetpūtāna are probably Kshatriyas.

[1623.—“They told me Ciautru was a title of honour.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 312. 1630.—“And because Cuttery was of a martiall temper God gave him power to sway Kingdomes with the scepter.”—Lord, Banians, 5.

1638.—“Les habitans . . . sont la plus-part Benyans et Ketteris, tisserans, teinturiers, et autres ouvriers en coton.”—Mandelslo, ed. 1659, 130.]

[1671.—“There are also Cuttarees, another Sect Principally about Agra and those parts up the Country, who are as the Banian Gentoes here.”—In Yule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. last year.]

1673.—“Opium is frequently eaten in great quantities by the Rashpooths, Queteries, and Patans.”—Fryer, 193.

1726.—“The second generation in rank among these heathen is that of the Settress.”—Valentiyn, Chorum, 87.

1782.—“The Chittery occasionally betakes himself to traffic, and the Sooder has become the inheritor of principalities.”—G. Forster’s Journey, ed. 1808, i. 64.

1836.—“The Banians are the mercantile-caste of the original Hindus. . . . They call themselves Shudderies, which signifies innocent or harmless(!)”—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, 322.

KHYBER PASS, n.p. The famous gorge which forms the chief gate of Afghanistan from Peshawar, properly Khaibar. [The place of the same name near Al-Madinah is mentioned in the Ain (iii. 57), and Sir R. Burton writes: “Khaybar in Hebrew is supposed to mean a castle. D’Herbelot makes it to mean a pact or association of the Jews against the Moslems.” (Pilgrimage, ed. 1893, i. 346, note.)] 1519.—“Early next morning we set out on our march, and crossing the Kheiber Pass, halted at the foot of it. The Khizzer-Khail had been extremely licentious in their conduct. Both on the coming and going of our army they had shot upon the stragglers, and such of our people as lagged behind, or separated from the rest, and carried off their horses. It was clearly expedient that they should meet with a suitable chastisement.”—Baber, p. 277.

1678.—“On Thursday Jamrud was our encamping ground. “On Friday we went through the Khaibar Pass, and encamped at ‘Ali Musjid.”—Jahànîyâr, in Elliot, vi. 314.

1783.—“The stage from Timrood (read Jimrood) to Dickah, usually called the Hyber-pass, being the only one in which much danger is to be apprehended from banditti, the officer of the escort gave orders to his party to . . . march early on the next morning . . . Timur Shah, who used to pass the winter at Peshour . . . never passed through the territory of the Hybers, without their attacking his advanced or rear guard.”—Forster’s Travels, ed. 1808, ii. 65-66.

1856.—“. . . See the booted Moguls, like a pack Of hungry wolves, burst from their desert lair, And crowding through the Khyber’s rocky strait, Sweep like a bloody harrow o’er the land.”—The Bawyan Tree, p. 6.
KILLUT, KILLAUT.

KIDDEPORE, n.p. This is the name of a suburb of Calcutta, on the left bank of the Hoogly, a little way south of Fort William, and is the seat of the Government Dockyard. This establishment was formed in the 18th century by Gen. Kyd, "after whom," says the Imperial Gazetteer, "the village is named." This is the general belief, and was mine [H.Y.] till recently, when I found from the chart and directions in the English Pilot of 1711 that the village of Kidderpore (called in the same chart Kitherepore) then occupied the same position, i.e. immediately below "Gobarnapore" and that immediately below "Chittanuttu" (i.e. Govindpür. and Chatanatí (see CHUTTANUTTY).

1711.—"... then keep Rounding Chitti Poe (Chitpore) Bite down to Chitti Nutty Point (see CHUTTANUTTY)... The Bite below Gover Napore (Govindpür) is Shoal, and below the Shool is an Eddy; therefore from Gover Napore, you must stand over to the Starboard-Shore, and keep it aboard till you come up almost with the Point opposite to Kiddery-pore, but no longer."—The English Pilot, p. 65.

c. 1380.—"In Persia are some springs, from which flows a kind of pitch which is called kır (read kır) (piz dico seu pegna), with which they smear the skins in which wine is carried and stored."—Friar Jordanaus, p. 10.
c. 1569.—"These are pitched with a bitumen which they call quı, which is like pitch."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 240.

KILLADAR, s. P.—H. kiḍadăr, from Ar. kaḷa, 'a fort.' The commandant of a fort, castle, or garrison. The Ar. kaḷa'ā is always in India pronounced kila. And it is possible that in the first quotation Ibn Batuta has misunderstood an Indian title; taking it as from Pers. kilda, 'a key.' It may be noted with reference to kaḷa that this Ar. word is generally represented in Spanish names by Alcalá, a name borne by nine Spanish towns entered in K. Johnstone's Index Geographico; and in Sicilian ones by Calatafimi, Calatanissetta, Catagirone.
c. 1340.—... Kadih Khân, Sadr-al Jihan, who became the chief of the Amirs, and had the title of Kaltb-dar, i.e. Keeper of the accustomed to pass every night at the Sultan's door, with the bodyguard."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 196.

1757.—"The fugitive garrison... returned with 500 more, sent by the Kellidar of Vandiwash."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 217.

1817.—"The following were the terms... that Amri should be restored to his former governor or Killehadar."—Mill, iii. 340.

1829.—"Among the prisoners captured in the Fort of Hattar, search was made by us for the Keeledar."—Mem. of John Sripp, ii. 210.

KILLA-KOTE, s. pl. A combination of Ar.—P. and Hind. words for a fort (kiḷa for kaḷa, and kōt), used in Western India to imply the whole fortifications of a territory (R. Drummond).

KILLUT, KILLAUT, &c., s. Ar.—H. khillat. A dress of honour presented by a superior on ceremonial occasions; but the meaning is often extended to the whole of a ceremonial present of that nature, of whatever it may consist. [The Ar. khill-a'h properly means 'what a man strips from his person.' "There were (among the later Moguls) five degrees of khillat, those of three, five, six, or seven pieces; or they might as a special mark of favour consist of clothes that the emperor had actually worn." (See for further details Mr. Irvine in J.R.A.S., N.S., July 1896, p. 533.)] The word has in Russian been degraded to mean the long loose gown which forms the most common dress in Turkistan, called generally by Schuyler 'a dressing-gown' (Germ. Schlafock). See Franch, Wolja Bulgar. 43, p. 14.

1411.—"Several days passed in sumptuous feasts. Khil'ats and girdles of royal magnificence were distributed."—Abdurazzak, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 209.

1673.—"Sir George Oxenden held it... He defended himself and the Merchants so bravely, that he had a Collat or Seerpaw, (q.v.) A Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 87.

1766.—"This is the Wardrobe, where the Royal Garments are kept; and from whence the King sends for the Calaat, or a whole Habit for a Man, when he would honour any Stranger..."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 46; [ed. Bull, ii. 98].

1774.—"A flowered satin gown was brought me, and I was dressed in it as a khilat."—Boyle, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

1786.—"And he the said Warren Hastings did send kellauts, or robes of honour (the most public and distinguished mode of acknowledging merit known in India) to the said ministers in testimony of his approbation of their services."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, vii. 25.

1809.—"On paying a visit to any Asiatic Prince, an inferior receives from him a complete dress of honour, consisting of a kheilaut, a robe, a turban, a shield and sword, with a string of pearls to go round the neck."—Id. Valentia, i. 99.

1813.—"On examining the kheilauts ... from the great Maharajah Madajee Sindia, the serpeyeh (see SKEPCH) presented to Sir Charles Malet, was found to be composed of false stones."—Forbes, Or.
Mem. iii. 50; [2nd ed. ii. 418].

KINCOB, s. Gold brocade. P.—H. kamkhab, kamkhwad, vulgarly kimkhwad.
The English is perhaps from the Gujarati, as in that language the last syllable is short.

This word has been twice imported from the East. For it is only another form of the medieval name of an Eastern damask or brocade, cammoca. This was taken from the medieval Persian and Arabic forms kamkha or kimkhada, 'damasked silk,' and seems to have come to Europe in the 13th century.
F. Johnson's Dict, distinguishes between kamkha, 'damask silk of one colour,' and kimkhada, 'damask silk of different colours.' And this again, according to Dozy, quoting Hoffmann, is originally a Chinese word kin-kha; in which doubtless kin, 'gold,' is the first element. Kim is the Fuhkien form of the word; qu. kim-hoa, 'gold-flower?' We have seen kimkhada derived from Pers. kam-khred, 'less sleep,' because such cloth is rough and prevents sleep! This is a type of many etymologies. "[The ordinary derivation of the word supposes that a man could not even dream of it who had not seen it (kom, 'little,' khwad, 'dream') "(Yusuf Ali, Mono. on Silk, 86).
Platts and the Madrid Gloss, take it from kam, 'little,' khwad, 'nap.'] Ducange appears to think the word survived in the French mocado (or moquette); but if so the application of the term must have degenerated in England. (See in Draper's Dict. mockado, the form of which has suggested a sham stuff.)

C. 1300.—"Παύδος γάρ εὐδαμονίωντος, καὶ

1786—"... but not until the nabob's mother aforesaid had engaged to pay for the said change of prison, a sum of £10,000 ... and that she would ransom the zenana ... for Kincobs, muslins, cloths, &c. &c. &c. ..."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, 1852, viii. 28.

1809.—"Twenty trays of shawls, kheen-kaubs ... were tendered to me."—Ed. Valentia, i. 117.

1829.—"Tired of this service we took possession of the town of Muttra, driving them out. Here we had glorious plunder—shawls, silks, satins, khemkaubs, money, &c."—Memo. of John Skipper, i. 124.

KING-CROW, s. A glossy black bird, otherwise called Drongo shrike, about as large as a small pigeon, with a long forked tail, Dircura macroceurus, Vieillot, found all over India. "It perches generally on some bare branch, whence it can have a good look-out, or the top of a house, or post, or telegraph-wire, frequently also on low bushes, hedges, walks, or ant-hills" (Jerdon).

1883.—"... the King-crow ... leaves the whole bird and beast tribe far behind in originality and force of character.... He does not come into the house, the telegraph wire suits him better. Perched on it he can see what is going on ... drops, beat foremost, on the back of the kite ... spits a bee-eater capturing a goody moth, and after a hot chase, forces it to deliver up its booty."—The Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

KIOSQUE, s. From the Turk and Pers. kāsh or kushk, 'a pavilion, a villa,' &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian, nor is it a word, we think, at all common in modern native usage.

c. 1530.—"When he was returned from his expedition, and drawing near to the capital, he ordered his son to build him a palace, or as those people call it a kushk, by the side of a river which runs at that place, which is called Afghanpūr."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 212.

1623.—"There is (in the garden) running water which issues from the entrance of a great kiosck, or covered place, where one may stay to take the air, which is built at the end of the garden over a great pond which adjoins the outside of the garden, so that, like the one at Surat, it serves also for the public use of the city."—P. della Valle, i. 585; [Hak. Soc. i. 68].

KIRBEE, KURBEE, s. Hind. karbi, kiri, Skt. kuḍamba, 'the stalk of a pot-herb.' The stalks of juvar (see JOWAR), used as food for cattle.

[1809.—"We also fell in with large licks of kurbee, the dried stalks of Bajiru and Joor, two inferior kinds of grain; an excellent fodder for the camels."—Broughton, Letters from a Makratta Camp, ed. 1819, p. 11.]

[1823.—"Ordinary price of the straw (kirba) at harvest-time Rs. 15 per hundred sheaves. ..."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bombay, iii. 243.]

KISHM, n.p. The largest of the islands in the Persian Gulf, called by the Portuguese Queixome and the like, and sometimes by our old travellers, Kishmish. It is now more popularly called Jazirat-al-tawila, in Pers. Jaz. darās, the 'Long Island' (like the Lewes), and the name of Kishm is confined to the chief town, at the eastern extremity, where still remains the old Portuguese fort taken in 1622, before which William Baffin the Navigator fell. But the oldest name is the still not quite extinct Brokht, which closely preserves the Greek Oaracta.

B.C. 325.—"And setting sail (from Harnozeia), in a run of 300 stadia they passed a desert and bushy island, and moored beside another island which was large and inhabited. The small desert island was named Organa (no doubt Gerwān, afterwards the site of N. Hormuz—see ORMUS); and the one at which they anchored, Oḍaṇa, planted with vines and date-palms, and with plenty of corn."—Arrian, Voyage of Neaeron, ch. xxxvii.

1553.—"Finally, like a timorous and despairing man ... he determined to leave the city (Ormuz) deserted, and to pass over to the Isle of Queixome. That island is close to the mainland of Persia, and is within sight of Ormuz at 3 leagues distance."—Barros, III. vii. 4.

1554.—"Then we departed to the Isle of Kais or Old Hormuz, and then to the island of Brakhata, and some others of the Green Sea, i.e. in the Sea of Hormuz, without being able to get any intelligence."—Silk 'Ali, 67.

[1623.—"They say likewise that Ormuz and Keshiome are extremely well fortified by the Moors."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 188; in i. 2, Kesom.]

1673.—"The next morning we had brought loft on the left hand of the island of Kismash, leaving a woody Island uninhabited between Kismash and the Main."—Fryer, 320.

1682.—"The Island Queixome, or Queixone, or Quixome, otherwise called by travellers and geographers Khemichie, and by the natives Brokt. . . ."—Nieuhof, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 103.

1817.—". . . Vases filled with Kishmee's golden wine And the red weeping of the Shiraz vine."—Moore, Mokanna.

1821.—"We are to keep a small force at Kishmi, to make descents and destroy boats and other means of maritime war, whenever any symptoms of piracy reappear."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 121.

See also BASSADOE.

KISHMISH, s. Pers. Small stoneless raisins originally imported from Persia. Perhaps so called from the island Kishm. Its vines are mentioned by Arrian, and by T. Moore! (See under KISHM.) [For the manufacture of Kishmish in Afghanistan, see Watt, Econ. Dict. VI, pt. iv. 284.]

[c. 1685.—"Usbes being the country which principally supplies Delhi with these fruits. . . . Kichmiches, or raisins, apparently without stones. . . ."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 118.]

1673.—"We refreshed ourselves an entire Day at Gerom, where a small White Grape, without any Stone, was an excellent Cordial . . . they are called Kismas Grapes, and the Wine is known by the same Name farther than where they grow."—Fryer, 242.

1711.—"I could never meet with any of the Kishmishes before they were turned. These are Raisins, a size less than our Malagas, of the same Colour, and without Stones."—Lockyer, 223.

1883.—"Kishmish, a delicious grape, of white elongated shape, also small and very sweet, both eaten and used for wine-making. When dried this is the Sultana raisin. . . ."—Wills, Modern Persia, 171.

KISSMISS, s. Native servant's word for Christmas. But that festival is usually called Bara din, 'the great day.' (See BURRA DIN.)

KIST, s. Ar. kist. The yearly land revenue in India is paid by instalments which fall due at different periods in different parts of the country; each such instalment is called a kist, or quota. [The settlement of these instalments is kist-bandi.]

[1767.—"This method of comprising the whole estimate into so narrow a compass . . . will convey to you a more distinct idea . . . than if we transmitted a monthly account of the deficiency of each person's Kistbundee."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 56.]

1809.—"Force was always requisite to make him pay his Kists or tribute."—Ed. Valentia, i. 347.

1810.—"The heavy Kists or collections of Bengal are from August to September."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 498.

1817.—"So desperate a malady," said the President, 'requires a remedy that shall reach to its source. And I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that there is no mode of eradicating the disease, but by removing the original cause; and placing these districts, which are pledged for the security of the Kists, beyond the reach of his Highness's management."—Mill, vi. 55.

KITMUTGAR, s. Hind. khidmat-gar, from Ar.—P. khidmat, 'service,' therefore 'one rendering service.' The Anglo-Indian use is peculiar to the Bengal Presidency, where the word is habitually applied to a Musulman servant, whose duties are connected with serving meals and waiting at table under the Consumah, if there be one. Kismutgar is a vulgarism, now perhaps obsolete. The word is spelt by Hadley in his Grammar (see under MOORS) khushman-gar. In the word khidmat, as in khilat (see KILLUT), the terminal t in uninflected Arabic has long been dropped, though retained in the form in which these words have got into foreign tongues.

1759.—The wages of a Khedmutgar appear as 3 Rupees a month.—In Long, p. 192.

1755.—". . . they were taken into the service of Sowjah Dowlah as immediate attendant on his person: Hodgee (see HADJEE) in capacity of his first Kistmutgar (or valet)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 60.

1782.—"I therefore beg to caution strangers against those race of vagabonds who ply about them under the denomination of Consumals and Kismutdars."—Letter in India Gazette, Sept. 28.

1784.—"The Bearer . . . perceiving a quantity of blood . . . called to the Hoojaburdar and a Kismutgar."—In Seton-Karr, i. 13.

1810.—"The Khedmutgar, or as he is often termed, the Kistmutgar, is with very few exceptions, a Musulman; his business is to . . . wait at table."—Williamson, V. M. i. 212.

c. 1810.—"The Kitmugrah, who had attended us from Calcutta, had done his work, and made his harvests, though in no very large way, of the 'Taze Willant' or white people."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 288. The phrase in italics stands for lää Wiläyati (see BILAYUT), "fresh or green Europeans."—Griffins (q.v.).

1813.—"We ... saw nothing remarkable on the way but a Khidmutgar of Chinnagate Apna, who was rolling from Poona to Punderpoor, in performance of a vow which he made for a child. He had been a month at it, and had become so expert that he went on smoothly and without pausing, and kept rolling evenly along the middle of the road, over stones and everything. He travelled at the rate of two coss a day."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 257-8.

1875.—"We had each our own ... Kitmutgar or table servant. It is the custom in India for each person to have his own table servant, and when dining out to take him with him to wait behind his chair."

_Life in the Mogulists, i. 32.

KITTSOL, KITSOL, s. This word survived till lately in the Indian Tariff, but it is otherwise long obsolete. It was formerly in common use for 'an umbrella,' and especially for the kind, made of bamboo and paper, imported from China, such as the English fashion of to-day has adopted to screen fire-places in summer. The word is Portuguese, quita-sol, 'bar-sun.' Also tirasole occurs in Scot's Discourse of Java, quoted below from Purchas. See also Hulsius, Coll. of Voyages, in German, 1602, i. 27. [Mr. Skeat points out that in Howison's Malay Dict. (1801) we have, s.v. Payong: 'A Kittasol, sombrero,' which is nearer to the Port. original than any of the examples given since 1611. This may be due to the strong Portuguese influence at Malacca.]

1688.—"The present was forstie pieces of silke ... a littere chaire and guilt, and two quitasoles of silke."—Parke's Mendoza, ii. 105.

1605.—"Before the shewes came, the King was brought out vpon a man's Shoulders, bestriding his necke, and the man holding his legs before him, and had many rich lyrasoles carried over and round about him."—E. Scot, in Purchas, i. 131.

[1614.—"Quitta sola (or sombreros)."—Pottor, Letters, ii. 207.]

1648.—"... above his head was borne two Kippe-soles, or Sun-screens, made of Paper."—Van Twist, 51.

1673.—"Little but rich Kitsolls (which are the names of several Countries for Umbrellos)."—Fryer, 160.

1687.—"They (the Aldermen of Madras) may be allowed to have Kittsolls over them."—Letter of Court of Directors, in Wheeler, i. 200.

1690.—"nomen ... vulgo effurtur Peritsol ... ali quando paulo alter scribitur ... et utrinque rectius promunndum est Parsos vel potius Parsos cuius significatio Appellativa est, i. q. Quittesol seu umbrellae, quâ in calidioribus regionibus utuntur homines ad caput a sole tuendum."—Hyde's Preface to Travels of Abraham Peritsol, p. vii., in Syntag. Dissertat. i.

"No Man in India, no not the Mogul's Son, is permitted the Priviledge of wearing a Kittisal or Umbrella. ... The use of the Umbrella is sacred to the Prince, appropriated only to his use."—Ovington, 315.

1755.—"He carries a Roundell, or Quit de Soleil over your head."—Iees, 50.

1739.—In Expenses of Nawab's entertainment at Calcutta, we find: "A China Kitysoll ... Rs. 93."—Long, 194.

1761.—A chart of Chittagong, by Barth. Plaisted, marks on S. side of Chittagong R., an umbrella-like tree, called "Kittisoll Tree."

[1785.—"To finish the whole, a Kettessaw (a kind of umbrella) is suspended not infrequently over the lady's head."—Diary, in Buteed, Echoes, 3rd ed. 112.]

1792.—"In those days the Ketisal, which is now sported by our very Cooks and Boatswains, was prohibited, as I have heard, d'you see, to any one below the rank of field officer."—Letter, in Madras Courier, May 3.

1813.—In the table of exports from Macao, we find:

"Kittisolls, large, 2,000 to 3,000, do. small, 8,000 to 10,000."—Milburn, ii. 464.

1875.—"Umbrellas, Chinese, of paper, or Kettissols."—Indian Tariff.

In another table of the same year "Chinese paper Kettissols, valuation Rs. 30 for a box of 110, duty 5 per cent." (See CHATTA, ROUNDEL, UMBRELLA.)

KITTSOL-BOY, s. A servant who carried an umbrella over his master. See Milburn, ii. 62. (See examples under ROUNDEL.)

KLING, n.p. This is the name (Kaling) applied in the Malay countries, including our Straits Settlements, to the people of Continental India who trade thither, or are settled in those regions, and to the descendants of those settlers. [Mr. Skeat remarks: "The standard Malay form is not Kalining, which is the Sumatran form, but Keling (K'ling or Kling). The Malay use of the word is, as a rule, restricted to Tamils, but it is very rarely used in a wider sense."]

The name is a form of Kalinga, a very ancient name for the region known as the "Northern Circars," (q.v.), i.e. the Telugu coast of the Bay of Bengal, or, to express it otherwise in general terms, for that coast which extends from the Kistna to the Mahanadi. "The Kalingas" also appear frequently, after the Pauranic fashion, as an ethnic name in the old Sanskrit lists of races. Kalinga appears in the earliest of Indian inscriptions, viz. in the edicts of Asoka, and specifically in that famous edict (XIII.) remaining in fragments at Gyrnar and Kapurdi-giri, and more completely at Khalsi, which preserves the link, almost unique from the Indian side, connecting the histories of India and of the Greeks, by recording the names of Antiochus, Ptolemy, Antigonus, Magas, and Alexander.

Kalinga is a kingdom constantly mentioned in the Buddhist and historical legends of Ceylon; and we find commemoration of the kingdom of Kalinga and of the capital city of Kalinganagara (e.g. in Ind. Antiq. iii. 132, x. 243). It was from a daughter of a King of Kalinga that sprang, according to the Mahawanso, the famous Wijayo, the civilizer of Ceylon and the founder of its ancient royal race.

Kalingapatam, a part of the Ganjam district, still preserves the ancient name of Kalinga, though its identity with the Kalinganagara of the inscriptions is not to be assumed. The name in later, but still ancient, inscriptions appears occasionally as Tri-Kalinga, "the Three Kalingas"; and this probably, in a Telugu version Madu-Kalinga, having that meaning, is the original of the Modoaluna of Pliny in one of the passages quoted from him. (The possible connection which obviously suggests itself of this name Tri-Kalinga with the names Telina and Telinga, applied, at least since the Middle Ages, to the same region, will be noticed under TELINGA).

The coast of Kalinga appears to be that part of the continent whence commerce with the Archipelago at an early date, and emigration thither, was most rife; and the name appears to have been in great measure adopted in the Archipelago as the designation of India in general, or of the whole of the Peninsular part of it. Throughout the book of Malay historical legends called the Siyara Malayu the word Kalining or Kling is used for India in general, but more particularly for the southern parts (see Journ. Ind. Archip. v. 133). And the statement of Forrest (Voyage to Mergui Archip. 1792, p. 82) that Macassar "Indostan" was called "Neegree Telinga" (i.e. Nagara Telinga) illustrates the same thing and also the substantial identity of the names Telinga, Kalining.

The name Kling, applied to settlers of Indian origin, makes its appearance in the Portuguese narratives immediately after the conquest of Malacca (1511). At the present day most, if not all of the Klings of Singapore come, not from the "Northern Circars," but from Tanjore, a purely Tamil district. And thus it is that so good an authority as Roorda van Eijisinga translates Kaling by 'Coromandel people.' They are either Hindus or Labbeais (see LUBBYE). The latter class in British India never take domestic service with Europeans, whilst they seem to succeed well in that capacity in Singapore. "In 1876," writes Dr. Burnell, "the head-servant at Bekker's great hotel there was a very good specimen of the Nagur Labbeais; and to my surprise he recollected me as the head assistant-collector of Tanjore, which I had been some ten years before." The Hindu Klings appear to be chiefly drivers of hackney carriages and keepers of eating-houses. There is a Siva temple in Singapore, which is served by Pandarams (q.v.). The only Brahmins there in 1876 were certain convicts. It may be noticed that Calingas is the name of a heathen tribe of (alleged) Malay origin in the east of N. Luzon (Philippine Islands).

1868.—"The Klings of Western India are a numerous body of Mahometans, and are petty merchants and shopkeepers."—Wallace, Malay Archip., ed. 1850, p. 20.

"The foreign residents in Singapore mainly consist of two rival races viz. Klings from the Coromandel Coast of India, and Chinese. . . . The Klings are universally the hack-carriage (gharry) drivers, and private grooms (syces), and they also monopolize the washing of clothes. . . . But besides this class there are Klings who amass money as traders and merchants, and become rich."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, 268-9.

KOELANG, s. The name (lit. 'greater division') of a Japanese gold coin, of the same form and class as the obang (q.v.). The coin was issued occasionally from 1580 to 1860, and its most usual weight was 222 grs. troy. The shape was oblong, of an average length of 2$\frac{1}{2}$ inches and width of 1$\frac{1}{2}$.

[1599.—"Cowpan." See under TAEI.] 1616.—"Aug. 22.—About 10 a clock we departed from Shrongo, and paid our host for the house a bar of Coban gould, valued at 5 tais 4 mas. . . ."—Cook's Diary, i. 165.

[1813.—"Copang." See under MACE.] 1850.—"Never give a Kobang to a cat."—Jap. Proverb, in Miss Bird, i. 367.

KOEL, s. This is the common name in northern India of Eudynamys orientalis, L. (Fam. of Cuckoos), also called kokild and kokil. The name koil is taken from its cry during the breeding season, "ku-il, ku-il, increasing in vigour and intensity as it goes on. The male bird has also another note, which Blyth syllables as Ho-ueeho, or Ho-o-o, or Ho-y-o. When it takes flight it has yet another somewhat melodious and rich liquid call; all thoroughly euclidean." (Jerdon.)

c. 1526.—"Another is the Koel, which in length may be equal to the crow, but is much thinner. It has a kind of song, and is the nightingale of Hindustan. It is respected by the natives of Hindustan as much as the nightingale is by us. It inhabits gardens where the trees are close planted."—Baber, p. 323.

1590.—"The Koyil resembles the myneh (see MYNA), but is blacker, and has red eyes and a long tail. It is fabled to be enamoured of the rose, in the same manner as the nightingale."—Aycen, ed. Glosuin, ii. 381; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 121].

c. 1790.—"Le plaisir que cause la fraîcheur dont on jouit sous cette belle verdure est augmenté encore par le gazouillement des oiseaux et les cris clairs et perçants du Koewil. . . ."—Haafner, ii. 9.

1888.—"This same crow-pheasant has a second or third cousin called the Koel, which deposits its eggs in the nest of the crow, and has its young brought up by that discreditable foster-parent. Now this bird supposes that it has a musical voice, and devotes the best part of the night to vocal exercise, after the manner of the nightingale. You may call it the Indian nightingale if you like. There is a difference however in its song . . . when it gets to the very top of its pitch, its voice cracks and there is an end of it, or rather there is not, for the persevering musician begins again. . . . Does not the Maratha novelist, dwelling on the delights of a spring morning in an Indian village, tell how the air was filled with the dulcet melody of the Koel, the green parrot, and the peacock?"—Tribes on My Frontier, 156.
KOHINOR. n.p. Pers. Koh-i-nūr, 'Mountain of Light'; the name of one of the most famous diamonds in the world. It was an item in the Deccan booty of Allāddīn Khiljī (d. 1316), and was surrendered to Baber (or more precisely to his son Humāyūn) on the capture of Agra (1526). It remained in the possession of the Moghul dynasty till Nadīr extorted it at Delhi from the conquered Mahommed Shāh (1739). After Nadīr's death it came into the hands of Ahmed Shāh, the founder of the Afghan monarchy. Shāh Shujā', Ahmed's grandson, had in turn to give it up to Ranjīt Singh when a fugitive in his dominions. On the annexation of the Punjab in 1849 it passed to the English, and is now among the Crown jewels of England. Before it reached that position it ran through strange risks, as may be read in a most diverting story told by Bosworth Smith in his Life of Lord Lawrence (i. 327-8). In 1850-51, before being shown at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, it went through a process of cutting which, for reasons unintelligible to ordinary mortals, reduced its weight from 186½ carats to 106½. [See an interesting note in Ball's Tavernier, ii. 431 seqq.]

1526.—'In the battle in which Ibrahim was defeated, Bikermājī (Raja of Gwalior) was sent to hell. Bikermajī's family...were at this moment in Agra. When Hamānlī arrived...he did not permit them to be plundered. Of their own free will they presented to Hamānlī a peshkesh (see PESHCOUSH), consisting of a quantity of jewels and precious stones. Among these was one famous diamond which had been acquired by Sultan Alāddīn. It is so valuable that a judge of diamonds valued it at half the daily expense of the whole world. It is about eight mishkals...':—Baber, p. 306.

1876.—(With an engraving of the stone.) "This diamond belongs to the Great Mogul...and it weighs 919 Rattis (see RUTTEE) and a half, which make 279 and nine 16ths of our Carats; when it was rough it weighed 907 Rattis, which make 793 carats...—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 143; [ed. Ball, ii. 123].

KOOT.

Mountain of Light! bound with a silken thread
Upon his nervous wrist; more used, I ween,
To feel the rough strap of his buckler there.'

The Brunswick Tree.

KOOKRY, s. Hind. kukri, [which originally means 'a twisted skein of thread,' from kākna, 'to wind'; and then anything curved]. The peculiar weapon of the Goorkhas, a bill, admirably designed and poised for hewing a branch or a foe. [See engravings in Egerton, Handbook of Indian Arms, pl. ix.]

1793.—'It is in felling small trees or shrubs, and lopping the branches of others for this purpose that the dagger or knife worn by every Nepaulian, and called khookheri, is chiefly employed.'—Kirbypatrick's Nepaul, 118.

1866.—'A dense jungle of bamboo, through which we had to cut a way, taking it by turns to lead, and hew a path through the tough stems with my 'kukri,' which here proved of great service.'—Ld. Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 298.

KOOMKY. (See COOMKY.)

KOONBEE, KUNBEE, KOOL-UMBEE, n.p. The name of the prevalent cultivating class in Guzerat and the Konkan, the Kurmi of N. India. Skt. kutumba. The Kaudi is the pure Sudra, [but the N. India branch are beginning to assert a more respectable origin]. In the Deccan the title distinguished the cultivator from him who wore arms and preferred to be called a Mahratta (Drummond).

KOOT, s. Hind. kuṭ, from Skt. kushta, the costum and costus of the Roman writers. (See under FUT-CHOCK.)
KOOZA, s. A goglet, or pitcher of porous clay; corr. of Pers. kūza. Commonly used at Bombay.

KOSHOON, s. This is a term which was affected by Tippoo Sahib in his military organisation, for a brigade, or a regiment in the larger Continental use of that word. His Piddah 'askar, or Regular Infantry, was formed into 5 Kachahrīs (see CUTCHERY), composed in all of 27 Kushāns. A MS. note on the copy of Kirkpatrick's Letters in the India Office Library says that Kushoon was properly Skt. kushūni or kshauṇī, 'a grand division of the force of an Empire, as used in the Mahābhārata. But the word adopted by Tippoo appears to be Turkī. Thus we read in Quatremère's transl. from Abdurrazzāk: 'He (Shah Rukh) distributed to the emirs who commanded the tomāns (corps of 10,000), the koshūn (corps of 1000), the sadeh (of 100), the dekeh (of 10), and even to the private soldiers, presents and rewards' (Nots. et Exts. xiv. 91; see also p. 89).

Again: 'The soldiers of Isfahan having heard of the amnesty accorded them, arrived, koshūn by koshūn.' (Ibid. 130.) Vambery gives koshūn as Or. Turki for an army, a troop (literally whatever is composed of several parts).

KOTOW, KOWTOW, s. From the Chinese k'ō-t'ou, lit. 'knock-head'; the salutation used in China, before the Emperor, his representatives, or his symbols, made by prostrations repeated a fixed number of times, the forehead touching the ground at each prostration. It is also used as the most respectful form of salutation from children to parents, and from servants to masters on formal occasions, &c.

This mode of homage belongs to old Pan-Asiatic practice. It was not, however, according to M. Pauthier, of indigenous antiquity at the Court of China, for it is not found in the ancient Book of Rites of the Cheu Dynasty, and he supposes it to have been introduced by the great destroyer and reorganiser, Tsin shi Hwangti, the Builder of the Wall. It had certainly become established by the 8th century of our era, for it is mentioned that the Ambassadors who came to Court from the famous Harūn-al-Rashīd (a.d. 798) had to perform it. Its nature is mentioned by Marco Polo, and by the ambassadors of Shāh Rukh (see below). It was also the established ceremonial in the presence of the Mongol Khāns, and is described by Baber under the name of kurnak. It was probably introduced into Persia in the time of the Mongol Princes of the house of Hulākū, and it continued to be in use in the time of Shāh 'Abbās. It was probably introduced into Persia in the time of the Mongol Princes of the house of Hulākū, and it continued to be in use in the time of Shāh 'Abbās. The custom indeed in Persia may possibly have come down from time immemorial, for, as the classical quotations show, it was of very ancient prevalence in that country. But the interruptions to Persian monarchy are perhaps against this. In English the term, which was made familiar by Lord Amherst’s refusal to perform it at Pekin in 1816, is frequently used for servile acquiescence or adulation.

Kotow, kotow! is often colloquially used for ‘Thank you’ (E. C. Baber).

c. B.C. 484.—‘And afterwards when they were come to Susa in the king’s presence, and the guards ordered them to fall down and do obeisance, and went so far as to use force to compel them, they refused, and said they would never do any such thing, even were their heads thrust down to the ground, for it was not their custom to worship men, and they had not come to Persia for that purpose.’—Herodotus, by Rawlinson, vii. 136.

c. B.C. 464.—‘Themistocles . . . first meets with Artabanus the Chilarch, and tells him that he was a Greek, and wished to have an interview with the king . . . But quoth he; ‘Stranger, the laws of men are various. You Greeks, ‘tis said, most admire liberty and equality, but to us of our many and good laws the best is to honour the king, and adore him by prostration, as the Image of God, the Preserver of all things.’ . . . Themistocles, on hearing these things, says to him: ‘But I, O Artabanus, . . . will myself obey your laws.’ . . .’—Plutarch, Themistoc., xxvii.

c. B.C. 390.—‘Conon, being sent by Pharnabazus to the king, on his arrival, in accordance with Persian custom, first presented himself to the Chilarch Thithraustes who held the second rank in the empire, and stated that he desired an interview with the king; for no one is admitted without this. The officer replied: ‘It can be at once; but consider whether you think it best to have an interview, or to write the business on which you come. For if you come into the presence you must needs worship the king (what they call προσκύνειν). If this is disagreeable to you you may commit your wishes to me, without doubt of their being as well accomplished.’ Then Conon says: ‘Indeed it is not disagreeable to me to pay the king any honour whatever. But I fear lest I bring discredit upon my city, if belonging to a state which is wont to rule over other nations I adopt manners which are not her own, but those of foreigners.’ Hence he delivered his wishes in writing to the officer.’—Corn. Nepos, Conon, c. iv.

B.C. 324.—‘But he (Alexander) was now downhearted, and beginning to be despairing towards the divinity, and suspicious towards his friends. Especially he dreaded Antipater and his sons. Of these Iolas was the Chief Cupbearer, whilst Kasander had come but lately. So the latter, seeing certain Barbarians prostrating themselves (προσκύνονται), a sort of thing which he, having been brought up in Greek fashion, had never witnessed before, broke into fits of laughter. But Alexander, in a rage gripped him fast by the hair with both hands, and knocked his head against the wall.’—Plutarch, Alexander, lxiv.

A.D. 798.—‘In the 14th year of Tchin-yuan, the Khalif Galun (Hārān) sent three ambassadors to the Emperor; they performed the ceremony of kneeling and beating the forehead on the ground, to salute the Emperor. The earlier ambassadors from the Khalifs who came to China had at first made difficulties about performing this ceremony. The Chinese history relates that the Mahomedans declared that they knelt only to worship Heaven. But eventually, being better informed, they made scruple no longer.’—Gaudil, Abrégé de l’Histoire des Thangs, in Amoy, Mémoires conc. les Chinois, xvi. 144.

c. 1245.—‘Tartari de mandato ipsius principes suos Baiochony et Bato violenter ab omnibus nunculis ad ipsos venientibus faciunt adorari cum triplici genuum flexione, triplici quoque capitum suorum in terram allisione.’—Vincent Bellovacensis, Spec. Historiae, l. xxix. cap. 74.

1298.—‘And when they are all seated, each in his proper place, then a great prelate rises and says with a loud voice: ‘Bow and adore!’ And as soon as he has said this, the company bow down until their foreheads touch the earth in adoration towards the Emperor as if he were a god. And this adoration they repeat four times.’—Marco Polo, Bk. ii. ch. 15.

1604.—‘E ficiéronle vestir dos ropas de camaxin (see KINCOB), é la usanza era, quando estas roupat ponian por el Señor, de fazer un gran yantar, é después de comer de las venes de las ropas, é entonces de fincar los finjios tres, vezes in reverencia del gran Señor.’—Clavijo, § xxi.

‘And the custom was, when these robes were presented as from the Emperor, to make a great feast, and after eating to clothe them with the robes, and then that they should touch the ground three times with the knees to show great reverence for the Lord.’—See Markham, p. 104.

1421.—‘His worship Hajji Yusuf the Kazi, who was . . . chief of one of the twelve imperial Councils, came forward accompanied by several Mussulmans acquainted with the languages. They said to the ambassadors: ‘First prostrate yourselves, and then touch the ground three times with your heads.’’—Embassy from Shah Rukh, in Cathey, p. ccvi.

1502.—‘My uncle the elder Khan came three or four farsangs out from Tashkend, and having erected an awning, seated himself under it. The younger Khan advanced . . . and when he came to the distance at which the kornish is to be performed, he knelt nine times. . . .’—Baber, 106.
KOTOW, KOWTOW.

494 KUBBER, KHubBER.

c. 1590.—The kornish under Akbar had been greatly modified:

"His Majesty has commanded the palm of the right hand to be placed upon the forehead, and the head to be bent downward. This mode of salutation, in the language of the present age, is called Kornish."—Atti, ed. Blochmann, i. 188.

But for his position as the head of religion, in his new faith he permitted, or claimed prostration (ajd'da) before him:

"As some perverse and dark-minded men look upon prostration as blasphemous man- worship, His Majesty, from practical wisdom, has ordered it to be discontinued by the ignorant, and remitted it to all ranks. . . . However, in the private assembly, when any of those are in waiting, upon whom the star of good fortune shines, and they receive the order of seating themselves, they certainly perform the prostration of gratitude by bowing down their foreheads to the earth."

—Ibid. p. 159.

[1615.——". . . Whereat some officers called me to size-da (zd-dak), but the King answered no, no, in Persian."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 244; and see ii. 206.]

1618.—"The King (Shah 'Abbâs) halted and looked at the Sultan, the latter on both knees, as is their fashion, near him, and advanced his right foot towards him to be kissed. The Sultan having kissed it, and touched it with his forehead . . . made a circuit round the king, passing behind him, and making way for his companions to do the like. This done the Sultan came and kissed a second time, as did the other, and this they did three times."—P. della Valle, i. 646.

c. 1836.—"Job (Charnock) made a salam Kornis, or low obeisance, every second step he advanced."—Orme, Fragments, quoted in Yule, Hodges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xxvii.

1816.—"Lord Amherst put into my hands . . . a translation . . . by Mr. Morrison of a document received at Tongchow with some others from Chang, containing an official description of the ceremonies to be observed at the public audience of the Ambassador. . . . The Ambassador was then to have been conducted by the Mandarins to the level area, where kneeling . . . he was next to have been conducted to the lower end of the hall, where facing the upper part . . . he was to have performed the ko-tou with 9 prostrations; afterwards he was to have been led out of the hall, and having prostrated himself once behind the row of Mandarins, he was to have been allowed to sit down; he was further to have prostrated himself with the attendant Princes and Mandarins when the Emperor drank. Two other prostrations were to have been made, the first when the milk-tea was presented to him, and the other when he had finished drinking."—Ellis's Journal of (Lord Amherst's) Embassy to China, 213-214.

1824.—"The first ambassador, with all his following, shall then perform the ceremonial of the three kneelings and the nine prostrations; they shall then rise and be led away in proper order."—Ceremonial observed at the Court of Peking for the Reception of Ambassadors, ed. 1824, in Pauthier, 192.

1855.—". . . The spectacle of one after another of the aristocracy of nature making the kotow to the aristocracy of the accident."

1860.—"Some Seiks, and a private in the Buffs having remained behind with the grog-carts, fell into the hands of the Chineses. On the next morning they were brought before the authorities, and commanded to perform the kotou. The Seiks obeyed; but Moyse, the English soldier, declaring that he would not prostrate himself before any Chinaman alive, was immediately knocked upon the head, and his body thrown upon a dunghill" (see China Correspondent of the Times). This passage prefaces some noble lines by Sir F. Doyle, ending:

"Vain mightiest fleets, of iron framed; Vain those all-shattering guns; Under proud England keep, untamed, The strong heart of her sons. So let his name through Europe ring— A man of mean estate, Who died, as firm as Sparta's king, Because his soul was great." Macmillan's Mag. iii. 130.

1876.—"Neeba more kotow big people."—Leland, 46.

1879.—"We know that John Bull adores a lord, but a man of Major L'Estrange's social standing would scarcely kotow to every shabby little title to be found in stuffy little rooms in Mayfair."—Sat. Revieu, April 19, p. 505.

KOTUL, s. This appears to be a Turki word, though adopted by the Afghans. Kotul, 'a mountain pass, a col.' Pavet de Courteille quotes several passages, in which it occurs, from Baber's original Turki.

[1554.—"Koutel." See under RHINO-CEROS.

[1809.—"We afterwards went on through the hills, and crossed two Cotuls or passes."—Elphinstone, Caudut, ed. 1842, i. 51.]

KUBBER, KHubBER, s. Ar.—P.—H. khabar, 'news,' and especially as a sporting term, new of game, e.g. "There is pucka khubber of a tiger this morning."

[1828.—". . . the servant informed us that there were some gongwalas, or villagers, in waiting, who had some khubber (news about tigres) to give us."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 53.]

1878.—"Khabar of innumerable black partridges had been received."—Life in the Moghul, i. 159.

1879.—"He will not tell me what khabhar has been received."—Vanity Fair, Nov. 29, p. 299.
KUBBERDAUR. An interjectional exclamation, 'Take care!' Pers. khadar-dar! 'take heed!' (see KUBBER). It is the usual cry of chokidārs to show that they are awake. [As a substantive it has the sense of a 'scout' or 'spy'.]

c. 1664.—"Each owrah causeth a guard to be kept all the night long, in his particular camp, of such men that perpetually go the round, and cry Kaber-dar, have a care."

c. 1665.—"Les archers crient ensuite une pleine tête, Caberdar, c'est à dire prenens garde."—Theeconot, v. 58.

[1813.—"There is a strange custom which prevails at all Indian courts, of having a servant called a khubur-dar, or newaman, who is an admitted spy upon the chief, about whose person he is employed."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahatta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 25.]

KUHAR, s. Hind. Kahār, [Skt. skandha-kāra, 'one who carries loads on his shoulders']. The name of a Sūdra caste of cultivators, numerous in Bahār and the N.W. Provinces, whose speciality is to carry palankins. The name is, therefore, in many parts of India synonymous with 'palankan-bearer,' and the Hindu body-servants called bearers (q.v.) in the Bengal Presidency are generally of this caste.

c. 1850.—"It is the custom for every traveller in India . . . also to hire kahlārs, who carry the kitchen furniture, whilst others carry himself in the palankin, of which we have spoken, and carry the latter when it is not in use."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 415.

c. 1550.—"So saying he began to make ready a present, and sent for bulbs, roots, and fruit, birds and beasts, with the finest of fish . . . which were brought by kahlārs in baskets."—Rāmāyana of Tulsī Dāsa, by Grose, 1878, ii. 101.

1673.—"He (the President of Bombay) goes sometimes in his Coach, drawn by large Milk-white Oxen, sometimes on Horseback, other times in Palankeens, carried by Cohors, Musclemen Porters."—Evrée, 68.

1810.—"The Cahr, or palanquin-bearer, is a servant of peculiar utility in a country where, for four months, the intense heat precludes Europeans from taking much exercise."—Williamson, V.M. i. 209.

1873.—"Bhuš Kahlār. A widely spread caste of rather inferior rank, whose occupation is to carry pulks, doltis, water-skins, &c.; to act as Porters . . . they eat flesh and drink spirits: they are an ignorant but industrious class. Buchanan describes them as of Telinga descent . . ."—Dr. H. V. Carter's Notices of Castes in Bombay Pr., quoted in Ind. Antq., ii. 154.

KULÀ, KŁA, n.p. Burmese name of a native of Continental India; and hence misapplied also to the English and other Westerners who have come from India to Burma; in fact used generally for a Western foreigner.

The origin of this term has been much debated. Some have supposed it to be connected with the name of the Indian race, the Kols; another suggestion has connected it with Kalingu (see KLING); and a third with the Skt. kula, 'caste or tribe'; whilst the Burmese popular etymology renders it from kā, 'to cross over,' and la, 'to come,' therefore 'the people that come across (the sea). But the true history of the word has for the first time been traced by Professor Forchhammer, to Gola, the name applied in old Pegu inscriptions to the Indian Buddhist immigrants, a name which he identifies with the Skt. Gavada, the ancient name of Northern Bengal, whence the famous city of Gaur (see GOUR, c).

14th cent.—"The Heroes Sona and Uttara were sent to Rāmahā, which forms a part of Suvannabhūmi, to propagate the holy faith. . . . This town is called to this day Golamātikanganagara, because of the many houses it contained made of earth in the fashion of houses of the Gola people."—Inscr. at Kalyāni near Pegu, in Forchhammer, ii. 5.

1795.—"They were still anxious to know why a person consulting his own amusement, and master of his own time, should walk so fast; but on being informed that I was a 'Colar,' or stranger, and that it was the custom of my country, they were reconciled to this. . . ."—Symes, Embassy, p. 290.

1855.—"His private dwelling was a small place on one side of the court, from which the women peeped out at the Kalās . . . ."—Yule, Mission to the Court of Ava ('Phayre's), p. 5.

"By a curious self-delusion, the Burmans would seem to claim that in theory at least they are white people. And what is still more curious, the Bengalees appear indirectly to admit the claim; for our servants in speaking of themselves and their countrymen, as distinguished from the Burmans, constantly made use of the term kālādūma—'black man,' as the representative of the Burmese kāla, a foreigner."—Ibid. p. 37.

KUMPĀSS, s. Hind. kumpās, corruption of English compass, and hence applied not only to a marine or a surveying compass, but also to theodolites, levelling instruments, and other elaborate instruments of observation, and even to the shaft of a carriage. Thus the sextant used to be called tikunta kampâs, "the 3-cornered compass."

[1866.—"Many an amusing story did I hear of this wonderful kumâpass. It possessed the power of reversing everything observed. Hence if you looked through the doorbeen at a fort, everything inside was revealed. Thus the Feringhees so readily took forts, not by skill or by valour, but by means of the wonderful power of the doorbeen."—Confess. of an Orderly, 175.]

KUNKUR, CONKER, &c., s. Hind. kankur, 'gravels.' As regards the definition of the word in Anglo-Indian usage it is impossible to improve on Wilson: "A coarse kind of limestone found in the soil, in large tabular strata, or interspersed throughout the superficial mould, in nodules of various sizes, though usually small." Nodular kunkur, wherever it exists, is the usual material for road metalling, and as it binds when wetted and rammed into a compact, hard, and even surface, it is an admirable material for the purpose.

c. 1781.—"Etaya is situated on a very high bank of the river Jumna, the sides of which consist of what in India is called conchas, which is originally sand, but the constant action of the sun in the dry season forms it almost into a vitrification" (1)—Hodgson, 110.

1794.—"Konker" appears in a Notification for tenders in Calcutta Gazette.—In Seton-Karr, ii. 135.

c. 1809.—"We came within view of Cawnpore. Our long, long voyage terminated under a high konkur bank."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 381.

1810.—"... a weaker kind of lime is obtained by burning a substance called kunkur, which, at first, might be mistaken for small rugged flints, slightly coated with soil."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 13.

KURREEF, Khurreef, s. Hind. adopted from Ar. xharîf ('autumn'). The crop sown just before, or at the beginning of, the rainy season, in May or June, and reaped after the rains in November—December. This includes rice, maize, the tall millets, &c. (See Rubbee).

[1824.—"The basis on which the settlements were generally founded, was a measurement of the Khurreef, or first crop, when it is cut down, and of the Rubbee, or second, when it is about half a foot high. ..."—Malcolm, Central India, ii. 29.]

KURNOOL, n.p. The name of a city and territory in the Deccan, Karnâl of the Imp. Gazetteer; till 1838 a tributary Nawabhâship; then resumed on account of treason; and now since 1858 a collectorate of Madras Presidency. Properly Kandamâr; Canoul of Orme. Kirkpatrick says that the name Kurnool, Kunnool, or Kundnool (all of which forms seem to be applied corruptly to the place) signifies in the language of that country 'fine spun, clear thread,' and according to Meer Husein it has its name from its beautiful cotton fabrics. But we presume the town must have existed before it made cotton fabrics? This is a specimen of the stuff that men, even so able as Kirkpatrick, sometimes repeat after those native authorities who "ought to know better," as we are often told. [The Madras Gloss. gives the name as Tam. karnâlu, from kandena, 'a mixture of lamp-oil and burnt straw used in greasing cart-wheels' and proũ, 'village,' because when the temple at Alampur was being built, the wheels of the carts were greased here, and thus a settlement was formed.]

KUTTAUR, s. Hind. katûr, Skt. kaṭâra, 'a dagger,' especially a kind of dagger peculiar to India, having a solid blade of diamond-section, the handle of which consists of two parallel bars with a cross-piece joining them. The hand grips the cross-piece, and the bars pass along each side of the wrist. [See a drawing in Egerton, Handbook, Indian Arms, pl. ix.] Ibn Battuta's account is vivid, and perhaps in the matter of size there may be no exaggeration. Through the kindness of Col. Waterhouse I have a phototype of some Travancore weapons shown at the Calcutta Exhibition of 1883-4; among them two great katûrs, with sheaths made from the snouts of two sawfishes (with the teeth remaining in). They are done to scale, and one of the blades is 20 inches long, the other 26. There is also a plate in the Ind. Antiq. (vii. 193) representing some curious weapons from the Tanjore Palace Armoury, among which are katûr-hilted daggers evidently of great length, though the entire length is not shown. The plate accompanies interesting notes by Mr. M. J. Walhouse, who states the curious fact that many of the blades mounted katûr-fashion were of European manufacture, and that one of these bore the famous name of Andrea Ferrara. I add an extract. Mr. Walhouse accounts for the adoption of these blades in a country possessing the far-famed Indian steel, in that the latter was excessively brittle. The passage from Stavorinus describes the weapon, without giving a native name. We do not know what name is indicated by ‘belly piercer.’

c. 1343.—‘The villagers gathered round him, and one of them stabbed him with a kattāra. This is the name given to an iron weapon resembling a plough-share; the hand is inserted into it so that the fore-arm is shielded, but the blade beyond is two cubits in length, and a blow with it is mortal.’—Ibn Battutah, iv. 31-32.

1412.—‘The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked. . . In one hand they hold an Indian poignard (kattārah-Hind), and in the other a buckler of ox-hide . . . this costume is common to the king and the beggar.’—Abdurrozzaḳ, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 17.

c. 1526.—‘On the whole there were given one tipchāk horse with the saddle, two pairs of swords with the belts, 25 sets of enamelled daggers (khāna[r)—see HANGER], 16 enamelled kitāreh[s, two daggers (jamādher—see JUMDUD) set with precious stones.’—Butler, 398.

[c. 1590.—In the list of the Mogun arms we have: “10. Katārah, price ½ R. to 1 Muhur.”—Aria, ed. Blockmann, i. 110, with an engraving, No. 9, pl. xii.] 1638.—‘Les personnes de qualité portent dans la ceinture vne sorte d’armes, ou de poignards, courte et large, qu’ils appellent ginda (?) ou Cattara, dont la garde et la gaine sont d’or.’—Mandetelo, Paris, 1659, 228.

1673.—‘They go rich in Attire, with a Poniard, or Cattara, at their girdle.’—Fryer, 38.

1690.—‘. . . which chafes and ferments him to such a pitch; that with a Cattary or Bagonet in his hands he first falls upon those that are near him . . . killing and stabbing as he goes. . . .’—Owington, 287.

1754.—‘To these were added an enamelled dagger (which the Indians call cuttari) and two swords.’—H. of Nadir, in Hanway’s Travels, ii. 386.

1768-71.—‘They (the Moguls) on the left side . . . wear a weapon which they call by a name that may be translated belly-piercer; it is about 14 inches long; broad near the hilt, and tapering away to a sharp point; it is made of fine steel; the handle has, on each side of it, a catch, which, when the weapon is gripped by the hand, shuts round the wrist, and secures it from being dropped.’—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 457.

1813.—‘After a short silent prayer, Lullabhy, in the presence of all the company, waved his catarra, or short dagger, over the bed of the expiring man. . . . The patient continued for some time motionless; in half an hour his heart appeared to beat, circulation quickened . . . at the expiration of the third hour Lullabhy had effected his cure.’—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 249; [2nd ed. ii. 272, and see i. 69].

1856.—‘The manners of the bardi tribe are very similar to those of their Rajpoot clients; their dress is nearly the same, but the bard seldom appears without the ‘Kutār,’ or dagger, a representation of which is screwed beside his signature, and often rudely engraved upon his monumental stone, in evidence of his death in the sacred duty of Trāgā’ (p. 95).—Forbes, Rās Mālā, ed. 1878, pp. 559-560.

1878.—‘The ancient Indian smiths seem to have had a difficulty in hitting on a medium between this highly refined brittle steel and a too soft metal. In ancient sculptures, as in Srinangam near Trichinapalli, life-sized figures of armed men are represented, bearing Kutārs or long daggers of a peculiar shape; the handles, not so broad as in the later Kutars, are covered with a long narrow guard, and the blades 2½ inches broad at bottom, taper very gradually to a point through a length of 18 inches, more than ⅓ of which is deeply channelled on both sides with 6 converging grooves. There were many of these in the Tanjor armoury, perfectly corresponding . . . and all were so soft as to be easily bent.’—Ind. Antiq. vii.

KUZZANNA, s. Ar.—H. khizdnə, or khazānā, ‘a treasury.’ [In Ar. khazīnah, or khaznah, means ‘a treasure,’ representing 1000 kis or purses, each worth about £5 (see Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 405.)] It is the usual word for the district and general treasuries in British India; and khazānchi for the treasurer.

1683.—‘Ye King’s Duan (see DEWAUN) had demanded of them 8000 Rupees on account of remains of last year’s Tallecas (see TALLICA) . . . ordering his Peasdastr (Peshdastr, an assistant) to see it suddenly paid in ye King’s Cuzzanna.’—Hedjes, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 193.

[1757.—‘A mint has been established in Calcutta; continue coining gold and silver into Siccas and Mohurs . . . they shall pass current in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, and be received into the Cadganna. . . .’—Perwannah from Jaffar Ally Khan, in Verelst, App. 145.]

KUZZILBASH, n.p. Turki kizilbash, ‘red-head.’ This title has been since the days of the Safavi (see SOPHY) dynasty in Persia, applied to the Persianized Turks, who form the ruling class in that country, from the red caps which they wore. The class is also settled extensively over Afghanistan. "At Kâbul," writes Bellew ("Races of Afghanistan," 107), "he (Nâdir) left as chandaal, or 'rear guard,' a detachment of 12,000 of his Kizilbash (so named from the red caps they wore), or Mughal Persian troops. After the death of Nâdir they remained at Kâbul as a military colony, and their descendants occupy a distinct quarter of the city, which is called Chandaal. These Kizilbash hold their own ground here, as a distinct Persian community of the Shia persuasion, against the native population of the Sunni profession. They constitute an important element in the general population of the city, and exercise a considerable influence in its local politics. Owing to their isolated position and antagonism to the native population, they are favourably inclined to the British authority.] Many of them used to take service with the Delhi emperors; and not a few do so now in our frontier cavalry regiments.

c. 1510.—"L'evanza loro è di portare vna berretta rossa, ch'auanza sopra la testa mezzo braccio, a guisa d'vn zon ('like a top'), che dalla parte, che si mette in testa, vine a esser larga, ristringendosi tuttavia sino in cima, et è fatta con dodici coste grosse vn dito... ne mai tagliano barba ne mostacchi."—G. M. Angioletto, in Ramusio, ii. f. 74.

1550.—"Oltra il deserto che è sopra il Corassam fino a Samarcand... signorreggiano Iesvil bas, cioè le berrette verdi, le quali benette verdi sono alcuni Tartari Musulmani che portano le loro berreti di feltro verde acute, e così si fanno chiamare à differencia de Soffiani suoi capitali nemici che signorreggiano la Persia, pur anche essi Musulmani, i quali portano le berretse rosse, quali berrette verdi et rosse, hanno comunemente hauuta fra se guerra crudelissima per causa di diversità di opinione nella loro religione."—Dghzzi Memet, in Ramusio, ii. f. 18r. "Beyond the desert above Corassam, as far as Samarkand and the idolatrous cities, the Yeskilbâs (Iesvilbas) or 'Green-caps,' are predominant. These Green-caps are certain Musulman Tartars who wear point'd caps of green felt, and they are so called to distinguish them from their chief enemies the Soffians, who are predominant in Persia, who are indeed also Musulmans, but who wear red caps."

1574.—"These Persians are also called Red Turks, which I believe is because they have behind on their Turbants, Red Marks, as Cotton Ribbands &c. with Red Brims, whereby they are soon discerned from other Nations."—Rawwolff, 173.

1606.—"Cocelbaxas, who are the soldiers whom they esteem most highly."—Gowea, f. 143.

1653.—"Ie visité le keselbach in Vaucomando, guetto. duquel il recen beau coup de civeitez."—De La Bouljaye-Gouz, ed. 1657, pp. 284-5.

"Keselbache est vn mot compose de Kesset, qui signifie rouge, et bach, teste, comme qui diroit teste rouge, et par ce terme s'entendent les gens de guerre de Perse, à cause du bonnet de Sophi qui est rouge."—Ibid. 546.

1673.—"Those who compose the Main Body of the Cavalry, are the Cussie-Bashees, or with us the Chevaliers."—Fryer, 356. Fryer also writes Cusselbash (Index).

1815.—"The seven Turkish tribes, who had been the chief promoters of his (Ismail's) glory and success, were distinguished by a particular dress; they wore a red cap, from which they received the Turkish name of Kuzzilbash, or 'golden heads,' which has descended to their posterity."—Malcolm, II. of Persia, ii. 502-3.

1828.—"The Kuzzilbash, a Tale of Khorasan. By James Baillie Fraser."

1883.—"For there are rats and rats, and a man of average capacity may as well hope to distinguish scientifically between Ghilzais, Kuki Kheyls, Logar Maliks, Shigwals, Ghazis, Jezailchis, Hazaras, Logaris, Wardaks, Mandozais, Lepel-Griffin, and Kuzzilbashees, as to master the division of the great race of rats."—"Tribes on My Frontier, 15.

KYFE, n. One often meets with this word (Ar. kaif) in books about the Levant, to indicate the absolute enjoyment of the dolce far niente. Though it is in the Hindustâni dictionaries, we never remember to have heard it used in India; but the first quotation below shows that it is, or has been, in use in Western India, in something like the Turkish sense. The proper meaning of the Ar. word is 'how? ' in what manner? the secondary is 'partial intoxication.' This looks almost like a parallel to the English vulgar slang of 'how come you so?' But in fact a man's kaif is his 'howness,' i.e. what pleases him, his humour; and this passes into the sense of gaiety caused by hashish, &c.

1808.—"... a kind of confectio Japonica loaded with opium, Gâwir or Bang, and causing keif, or the first degree of intoxication, lulling the senses and disposing to sleep."—R. Drummond.

KYOUNG. s. Burm. kywang. A Buddhist monastery. The term is not employed by Padre Sangermano, who uses bao, a word, he says, used by the Portuguese in India (p. 88). I cannot explain it. [See BAO.]

1792.—"The kioums or convents of the Rahmaans are different in their structure from common houses, and much resemble the architecture of the Chinese; they are made entirely of wood; the roof is composed of different stages, supported by strong pillars," &c.—Syene, p. 210.

KYTHEE, s. Hind. Kaiti. A form of cursive Nagari character, used by Bunyas, &c., in Gangetic India. It is from Kāyath (Skt. Kāyastha), a member of the writer-caste.

LAC, s. Hind. lahī, from Skt. laūkṣa, for rākṣa. The resinous in-crustation produced on certain trees (of which the dhāk (see DHAWEK) is one, but chiefly Peepul, and Khossum [kusum, kusumb], i.e. Schlécheru bijūga, trijuga) by the puncture of the Lac insect (Coccus Lacaæ, L.). See Roxburgh, in Vol. III. As. Res., 384 seqq.; [and a full list of the trees on which the insect feeds, in Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 410 seqq.]. The incrustation contains 60 to 70 per cent. of resinous lac, and 10 per cent. of dark red colouring matter from which is manufactured lac-dye. The material in its original crude form is called stick-lac; when boiled in water it loses its red colour, and is then termed seed-lac; the melted clarified substance, after the extraction of the dye, is turned out in thin irregular laminae called shell-lac. This is used to make sealing-wax, in the fabrication of varnishes, and very largely as a stiffening for men's hats.

Though laq bears the same sense in Persian, and laq or luk are used in modern Arabic for sealing-wax, it would appear from Dozy (Glos., pp. 295-6, and Oosterlingen, 57), that identical or approximate forms are used in various Arabic-speaking regions for a variety of substances giving a red dye, including the coccus ilicis or Kermes. Still, we have seen no evidence that in India the word was applied otherwise than to the lac of our heading. (Garcia says that the Arabs called it loc-sumutri, 'lac of Sumatra'; probably because the Pegu lac was brought to the ports of Sumatra, and purchased there.) And this the term in the Periplus seems unquestionably to indicate; whilst it is probable that the passage quoted from Aelian is a much misconceived account of the product. It is not nearly so absurd as De Montfart's account below. The English word lake for a certain red colour is from this. So also are lacquer and lacquered ware, because lac is used in some of the varnishes with which such ware is prepared.

c. A.D. 80-90.—These articles are imported (to the ports of Barbaricæ, on the W. of the Red Sea) from the interior parts of Ariâk:—

"Σύνθες Ίνδικὸς καὶ στάμωμα (Indian iron and steel)"

Δάκκος χρωματίνος (Lac-dye)."

c. 250.—"There are produced in India animals of the size of a beetle, of a red colour, and if you saw them for the first time you would compare them to cinnabar. They have very long legs, and are soft to the touch; they are produced on the trees that bear electrum, and they feed on the fruit of these. The Indians catch them and crush them, and with these dye their red cloaks, and the tunics under these, and everything else that they wish to turn to this colour, and to dye. And this kind of clothing is carried also to the King of Persia."—Adian, de Nat. Animal. iv. 46.

c. 1343.—The notice of laca in Pegolotti is in parts very difficult to translate, and we do not feel absolutely certain that it refers to the Indian product, though we believe it to be so. Thus, after explaining that there are two classes of laca, the mutura and acera, or ripe and unripe, he goes on: "It is produced attached to stalks, i.e. to the branches of shrubs, but it ought to be clear from stalks, and earthy dust, and sand, and from cere (λ). The stalks are the twigs of the wood on which it is produced, the costiere or figs, as the Catalans call them, are composed of the dust of the thing, which when it is fresh heaps together and hardens like pitch; only that pitch is black, and those costiere or figs are red and of the colour of unripe laca. And more of these costiere is found in the unripe than the ripe laca," and so on.—Della Decima, iii. 365.

1510.—"There also grows a very large quantity of laca (or락라) for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts."—Varthema, 238.

1516.—"Here (in Pegu) they load much fine laquar, which grows in the country."—Barbosa, Lisbon Acad., 396.
1519.—"And because he had it much in charge to get all the lac (alacre) that he could, the governor knowing through information of the merchants that much came to the Coast of Choromandel by the ships of Pegu and Martaban that frequented that coast . . ."—Correa, ii. 567.

1563.—"Now it is time to speak of the lacre, of which so much is consumed in this country in closing letters, and for other seals, in the place of wax."—Garcia, f. 112v.

1582.—"Laker is a kind of gum that proceeded of the ant."—Castañeda, tr. by N.L., f. 33.

c. 1590.—(Recipe for Lac varnish). "Lac is used for chigills (see CHICK, a). If red, 4 scr of lac, and 1 s. of vermilion; if yellow, 4 s. of lac, and 1 s. varnish."—Alm., ed. Blochmann, i. 226.

1615.—"In this Island (Goa) is the hard Waxe made (which we call Spanish Waxe), and is made in the manner following. They inclose a large plotte of ground, with a little trench filled with water; then they sticke up a great number of small stanes upon the sayd plot, that being done they bring thither a sort of pismires, farre bigger than ours, which beeing debard by the water to issue out, are constrained to retire themselves vpon the said stanes, where they are kil'd with the Heate of the Sunne, and thereof it is that Lacka is made."—De Montford, 85-86.

c. 1610.—"Vne maniere de boete ronde, vernie, et lacrée, qui est vne ouvrage de cesseisles."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 127; [Hak. Soc. i. 170].

1627.—"Lac is a strange drugg, made by certain winged Pismires of the gumme of Trees."—Purcas, Pilgrimage, 569.

1644.—"There are in the territories of the Mogor, besides those things mentioned, other articles of trade, such as Lacre, both the insect lacre and the cake "(de forntiqua e de posta).—Bocearro, MS.

1663.—"In one of these Halls you shall find Embroiderers . . . in another you shall see Goldsmiths . . . in a fourth Workmen in Lacca."—Bernier F.T. 89; [ed. Constable, 269].

1727.—"Their lackt or japon'd Ware is without any Doubt the best in the World."—A. Hamilton, ii. 305; [ed. 1744].

LACADIVE ISLANDS, n.p. Probably Skt. Laksadvlpa, '100,000 Islands'; a name however which would apply much better to the Maldives, for the former are not really very numerous. There is not, we suspect, any ancient or certain native source for the name as specifically applied to the northern group of islands. Barbosa, the oldest authority we know as mentioning the group (1516), calls them Maladiva, and the Maldives Palandiva. Several of the individual islands are mentioned in the Tuhfat-al-Majahidin (E.T. by Rowlandson, pp. 150-52), the group itself being called "the islands of Malabar."

LACK. s. One hundred thousand, and especially in the Anglo-Indian colloquial 100,000 Rupees, in the days of better exchange the equivalent of £10,000. Hind. lākh, lak, &c., from Skt. laksha, used (see below) in the same sense, but which appears to have originally meant "a mark." It is necessary to explain that the term does not occur in the earlier Skt. works. Thus in the Talavakara Brahmaṇa, a complete series of the higher numerical terms is given. After saha (10), salaksa (1000), comes aguta (10,000), prayuta (now a million), nyutya (now also a million), arbauda (100 millions), nyarbuda (not now used), nikharuna (do.), and padma (now 10,000 millions). Laksha is therefore a modern substitute for prayuta, and the series has been expanded. This was probably done by the Indian astronomers between the 5th and 10th centuries A.D.

The word has been adopted in the Malay and Javanese, and other languages of the Archipelago. But it is remarkable that in all of this vocabulary of languages which have adopted the word it is used in the sense of 10,000 instead of 100,000, with the sole exception of the Lumpangs of Sumatra, who use it correctly. (Crawford). (See CRORE.)

We should observe that though a lack, used absolutely for a sum of money, in modern times always implies rupees, this has not always been the case. Thus in the time of Akbar and his immediate successors the revenue was settled and reckoned in laks of dams (q.v.). Thus:

c. 1594.—"In the 40th year of his majesty's reign (Akbar's), his dominions consisted of 105 Sircars, subdivided into 2737 Kusabah (see CUSBHAI), the revenue of which he settled for ten years, at the annual rent of 3 Arriks, 62 Crore, 97 Lacks, 55,246 Dams . . ."—Aqeen, ed. Gladwin, ii. 1; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115].

At Ormuza again we find another lack in vogue, of which the unit was apparently the dinār, not the old gold coin, but a degenerate dinār of small value. Thus:
1554.—"(Money of Ormuz).—A leque is equivalent to 50 pardsos of cadis, which is called 'bad money,' and this leque is not a coin but a number by which they reckon at Ormuz: and each of these pardsos is equal to 2 azares, and each azar to 10 cadis, each cadis to 10 dinars, and after this fashion they calculate in the books of the Custom-house. . . ."—Nunez, Lyvro dos Pesos e Subsidios, p. 25.

Here the azar is the Persian hazar or 1000 (dinars); the cadis Pers. sad or 100 (dinars); the leque or lak, 100,000 (dinars); and the tomân (see Tomaun), which does not appear here, is 10,000 (dinars).

c. 1300.—"They went to the Kāfīr's tent, killed him, and came back into the town, whence they carried off money belonging to the Sultan amounting to 12 lakhs. The lak is a sum of 100,000 (silver) dinars, equivalent to 10,000 Indian gold dinars."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 106.

c. 1340.—"The Sultan distributes daily two lakhs in alms, never less; a sum of which the equivalent in money of Egypt and Syria would be 160,000 pieces of silver."—Skilabuddin Dimiski, in Notes and Excurs., xiii. 192.

In these examples from Pinto the word is used apart from money, in the Malay form, but not in the Malay sense of 10,000:

c. 1540.—"The old man desiring to satis-fie Antonio de Faria's demand, Sir, said he . . . the chronicles of those times affirm, how in only four years and an half sixteen Lacazans (lacaas) of men were slain, every Lacazan containing an hundred thousand."— Pinto (orig. cap. xlv.) in Cogan, p. 53.

c. 1546.—". . . he ruined in 4 months space all the enemies countries, with such a destruction of population as, if credit may be given to our histories . . . there died fifty Laquesass of persons."—Ibid. p. 224.

1615.—"And the whole present was worth ten of their Leakes, as they call them; a Leake being 10,000 pounds sterling; the whole 100,000 pounds sterling."—Coryat's Letters from India (Crueldates, iii. 256).

1616.—"He received twenty lecks of roupies towards his charge (two hundred thousand pounds sterling)."—Sir T. Roe, reprint, p. 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 201, and see i. 95, 183, 238].

1651.—"Yeder Lac is honderd dusyend."—Rogierius, 77.

c. 1665.—"Il faut cent mille roupies pour faire un lek, cent mille leks pour faire un courou, cent mille courous pour faire un padan, et cent mille padan pour faire un nit."—Thevenot, v. 54.

1673.—"In these great Solemnities, it is usual for them to set it around with Lamps to the number of two or three Leagues, which is so many hundred thousand in our account."—Frazer, p. 104, reading Leagues.

1684.—"They have by information of the servants dug in several places of the house, where they have found great sumums of money. Under his bed were found Lacks 43. In the House of Office two Lacks.
They in all found Ten Lacks already, and make no doubt but to find more."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 145].

1692.—". . . a lack of Pagodas, . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 262.

1747.—"The Nabob and other Principal Persons of this Country are of such an extreme lucrative (sic) Disposition, and . . .
are so exceedingly avaritious, occasioned by the large Proffers they have received from the French, that nothing less than Lacks will go near to satisfy them."—Letter from Mr. St. David to the Cour, May 2 (MS.
Records in India Office).

1778.—"Sir Matthew Mite will make up the money already advanced in another name, by way of future mortgage upon his estate, for the entire purchase, 5 lacks of roupesses."—Foote, The Nabob, Act I. sc. i.

1785.—"Your servants have no Trade in this country; neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many lacs of pagodas."— Nabob of Arcot, in Burke's Speech on his Debts, Works, iv. 18.

1833.—"Tout le reste (et dans le reste il y a des intendants riches de plus de vingt laks) s'assied par terre."—Jacquemont, Correspond., ii. 120.

1879.—"In modern times the only numbers in practical use above 'thousands' are lakas ('lac' or 'lakh') and kori ('crore'); and an Indian sum is wont to be pointed thus: 123, 45, 67, 890, to signify 123 crores, 45 lakhs, + 67 thousand, eight hundred and

The older writers, it will be observed (c. 1600-1620), put the lakh at £10,000;
Hamilton (c. 1700) puts it at £12,500;
Williamson (c. 1810) at the same; then for many years it stood again as the equivalent of £10,000; now (1850) it is little more than £8000; [now (1901) about £6660].

LACKERAGE. (See KHIRAJ.)

LALL-SHRAUB, s. Englishman's Hind. lāl-shārub, 'red wine.' The universal name of claret in India.

[c. 1780.—"To every plate are set down two glasses; one pyramidal (like hobnob glasses in England) for Loll Shrub (sciulēt, claret); the other a common sized wineglass for whatever beverage is most agreeable."— Diary of Mrs. Ray, in Busted, Echos., 123.]

LALLA, s. P.—H. lālā. In Persia this word seems to be used for a kind of domestic tutor; now for a male nurse, or as he would be called in India, 'child's bearer.' In N. India it is usually applied to a native clerk writing the vernacular, or to a respectable merchant. [For the Pers. usage see Blockmann, Ain, i. 426 note.]

[1841.—"Where there are no tigers, the Lalla (scribe) becomes a shikarike."—Society in India, ii. 176.]

LAMA. s. A Tibetan Buddhist monk. Tibet. Lama (b being silent). The word is sometimes found written Llama; but this is nonsense. In fact it seems to be a popular confusion, arising from the name of the S. American quadruped which is so spelt. See quotation from Times below.

c. 1590.—"Fawning Court doctors . . . said it was mentioned in some holy books that men used to live up to the age of 1000 years . . . and in Thibet there were even now a class of Lamas or Mongolian devotees, and recluses, and hermits that live 200 years and more . . ."—Budâni, quoted by Blockmann, Ain, i. 201.

1664.—"This Ambassador had in his suite a Physician, which was said to be of the Kingdom of Lassa, and of the Tribe Lamy or Lama, which is that of the men of the Law in that country, as the Brahmins are in the Indies . . . he related of his great Lama that when he was old, and ready to die, he assembled his council, and declared to them that now he was passing into the Body of a little child lately born.

1774.—". . . ma questo primo figlio . . . rinunziò la corona al secondo e lui difatti si fece religioso o lama del paese."—Della Tomba, 61.

c. 1818.—"The Parliament of Thibet met—The little Lama, called before it, Did there and then his whispering get, And, as the Nursery Gazette Assures us, like a hero bore it."—T. Moore, The Little Grand Lama.

1876.—". . . Hastings . . . touches on the analogy between Tibet and the high valley of Quito, as described by De la Condamine, an analogy which Mr. Markham brings out in interesting detail. . . . But when he enlarges on the wool which is a staple of both countries, and on the animals producing it, he risks confusing in careless readers that popular impression which might be expressed in the phraseology of Flüelen—"Tis all one; 'tis alike as my fingers is to my fingers, and there is Llamas in both."—Rev. of Markham's Tibet, in Times, May 15.

The passage last quoted is in jesting vein, but the following is serious and delightful:

1879.—"The landlord prostrated himself as reverently, if not as lowly, as a Peruvian before his Grand Llama."—Patty's Dream, a novel reviewed in the Academy, May 17.

LAMASERY, LAMASERIE. s. This is a word, introduced apparently by the French R. C. Missionaries, for a lama convent. Without being positive, I would say that it does not represent any Oriental word (e.g. compound of lami and sera), but is a factitious French word analogous to nonnery, vacherie, laiterie, &c.

[c. 1844.—"According to the Tartars, the Lamasy of the Five Towers is the best place you can be buried in."—Huc, Travels in Tartary, i. 78.]

LAMBALLIE, LOMBALLIE, LOMBARDIE, LUMBANAH, &c., s. Dakh. Hind. Lâmbârâ, Mahr. Lambân, with other forms in the languages of the Peninsula. [Platts connects the name with Skt. lamba, 'long, tall'; the Madras Gloss. with Skt. lampata, 'greedy.'] A wandering tribe of dealers in grain, salt, &c., better known as Banjârâs (see BRINJARRY). As an Anglo-Indian word this is now obsolete. It was perhaps a corruption of Lübâhàna, the name of one of the great clans or divisions of the Banjârar. [Another suggestion made is that the name is derived from their business of carrying salt (Skt. lavañâ); see Crooke, Tribes of N.W.P. i. 158.]

1756.—"The army was constantly supplied . . . by bands of people called Lambalis, peculiar to the Deccan, who are constantly moving up and down the country, with their flocks, and contract to furnish the armies in the field."—Orme, ii. 102.

1785.—"What you say of the scarcity of grain in your army, notwithstanding your having a cutwâl (see CUTWAL), and so many Lumbâneh is with you, has astonished us."—Letters of Tippoo, 49.

LANCHARA. s. A kind of small vessel often mentioned in the Portuguese histories of the 16th and 17th centuries. The derivation is probably Malay lanchâr, 'quick, nimble.' [Mr. Skeat writes : "The real Malay form is Lanchar-an, which is regularly formed from Malay lanchâr, 'swift,' and lanchara I believe to be a Port. form of lanchar-an, as lanchara could not possibly, in Malay, be formed from lanchâr, as has hitherto been implied or suggested." ] quali vi sono li nauili detti Lanchares, có li quali vanno navigando la costa di Siam... —Sommario de' Regni, &c., in Ramauno, i. 396.

c. 1539.—"This King (of the Batais) understanding that I had brought him a letter and a Present from the Captain of Malaca, caused me to be entertained by the Xabundeo (see SHABUNDER)... This General, accompanied with five Lanchares and twelve Ballons, came to me to the Port where I rode at anchor."—Pinta, E.T. p. 81.

LANDWIND, s. Used in the south of India. A wind which blows seaward during the night and early morning. [The dangerous effects of it are described in Madras Gloss. s.v.]

1561.—"Correndo a costa com terrenhos."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 115.

[1598.—"The East winds beginne to blow from off the land into the seas, whereby they are called Terrenhos."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 284.

[1612.—"Send John Dench... that in the morning he may go out with the landborne and return with the sea borne."—Donners, Letters, i. 206.]

1644.—"And as it is between monsoon and monsoon (monsaen) the wind is quite uncertain only at the beginning of summer. The N.W prevails more than any other wind... and at the end of it begins the land winds (terrenhos) from midnight to about noon, and these are E. winds."—Bocarro, M.S.

1673.—"... we made for the Land, to gain the Land Breezes. They begin about Midnight, and hold till Noon, and are by the Portugals named Terrenhoes."—Fryer, 23.

1838.—"We have had some very bad weather for the last week; furious landwind, very fatiguing and weakening... Everything was so dried up, that when I attempted to walk a few yards towards the beach, the grass crunched under my feet like snow."—Letters from Madras, 193-200.

LANGASAVE, n.p. The most usual old form for the Japanese city which we now call Nagasaki (see Sainsbury, passim).

1611.—"After two or three days space a Jesuite came vnto vs from a place called Langesacke, to which place the Carakte of Makoo is yeereley wont to come."—W. Adams, in Purchas, i. 126.

1618.—The Journal of Capt. John Saris has both Nagasuke and Langasake.—Ibid. 366.

1618.—"It has now com to passe, which before I feared, that a company of rich usurers have gotten this sentence against us, and com doune together every yeare to Langasque and this place, and have allwaies byn accustomed to buy by the pancudo (as they call it), or whole sale, all the goods which came in the carick from Amacen, the Portingales having no prevelages as we have."—The same to the E.T. Co., ii. 207-8.

Two years later Cocks changes his spelling and adopts Nangasaque (Ibid. 300 and to the end).

LAN JOHN, LANGIANNE, &c., n.p. Such names are applied in the early part of the 17th century to the Shan or Laos State of Luang Prabun on the Mekong. Lan-chan is one of its names signifying in Siamese, it is said, 'a million of elephants.' It is known to the Burmese by the same name (Len-Shen). It was near this place that the estimable French traveller Henri Mouhot died, in 1861.

1587.—"I went from Pegu to Jambhe (see JANGOMAY), which is in the country of the Langesians; it is fine and twelte dayes journeay North-east from Pegu."—Fitzch, in Hakl. ii.

[1598.—"Thus we arrived at Lanchan, the capital of the Kingdom (Lao) where the King resides. It is a Kingdom of great extent, but thinly inhabited, because it has been frequently devastated by Pegu."—De Morga, 98.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangomá (JANGOMAY) arrived at the city of Judea... and brought great store of merchandize."—Sainsbury, ii. 90.

1663.—"Entre tant et de si puissans Royaumes du dernier Orient, desquels on n'a presque jamais entendu parler en Europe, il y en a un qui se nomme Lao, et plus proprement le Royaume des Langiens... le Royaume n'a pris son nom que du grand nombre d'Elephants qui s'y rencontrent: de vray ce mot de Langiens signifie proprement, miliers d'Elephants."—Marini, H. Nouvelle et Courtoise des Royaumes de Tunguin et de Lao (Fr. Tr., Paris, 1666), 329, 337.
It would appear from Lieut. Macleod's narrative, and from Garnier, that the name of Laos is that by which the branch of these people on the Lower Mekong, i.e. of those two States, used to designate themselves. Muang Praban is still quasi independent; Vien-Shan was annexed with great cruelties by Siam, c. 1828.

1553.—"Of silver of 11 dinheiroes alloy he (Alfonso V.) made only a kind of money called Malaguezes, which silver came thither from Pegu, whilst from Siam came a very pure silver of 12 dineriores assay, procured from certain people called Laos, lying to the north of these two kingdoms."—Barros, II. vi. 6.

1553.—"... certain very rugged mountain ranges, like the Alps, inhabited by the people called Gueos who fight on horseback, and with whom the King of Siam is continually at war. They are near him only on the north, leaving between the two the people called Laos, who encompass this Kingdom of Siam, both on the North, and on the East along the river Mecon ... and on the south adjoin these Laos the two Kingdoms of Camboja and Choaunpa (see CHAMPA), which are on the sea-board. These Laos ... though they are lords of so great territories, are all subject to this King of Siam, though often in rebellion against him."—Ibid. III. ii. 5.

"... Three Kingdoms at the upper part of these, are those of the Laos, who (as we have said) obey Siam through fear: the first of these is called Jangoma (see JANGO-MAY), the chief city of which is called Chiamay ... the second Chancray Chencran: the third Lanchan (see LAN JOHN) which is below the others, and adjoin the Kingdom of Caicho, or Cauchichina. ..."—Ibid.

c. 1560.—"... These Laos came to Camboa, downe a River many daies Iournie, which they say to have his beginning in China as many others which runne into the Sea of India; it hath eight, fiftene, and twentie fathome water, as myselfe sawe by experience in a great part of it; it passeth through many unknoune and desert Countries of great Woods and Forests where there are innumerable Elephants, and many Buffes ... and certayne beasts which in that Countrie they call Badas (see ABADA)."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

c. 1598.—"... I offered to go to the Laos by land, at my expense, in search of the King of Cambodia, as I knew that that was the road to go by. ..."—Blas de Herman Gonzalez, in De Monga (E.T. by Hon. H. Stanley, Hak. Soc.), p. 97.

1641.—"Concerning the Land of the Louwen, and a Journey made thereunto by our Folk in Anno 1641" (Kc.).—Valentinji, III. Pt. ii. pp. 50 seqq.

LAR, n.p. This name has had several applications.

(a) To the region which we now call Guzerat, in its most general application. In this sense the name is now quite obsolete; but it is that used by most of the early Arab geographers. It is the Arabic of Ptolemy; and appears to represent an old Skt. name Lata, adj. Lataka, or Latika. ["The name Lata appears to be derived from some local tribe, perhaps the Lattas, who, as r and l are commonly used for each other, may possibly be the well-known Rashtrakutas since their great King Amoghavarsha (A.D. 851-879) calls the name of the dynasty Ratta."—Bomboy Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 7.]

c. A.D. 150. — "Tēs de ᾼνδοκενίας τὰ ἀπὸ ἀναστώσεως τὰ μεν ἀπὸ ταλασσίας κατάχει τῇ Ἀραβίκᾳ χώρᾳ, ἐν ᾣ̄ μεσογείῳ ἀπὸ μεν ἄνωθεν τοῦ Ναμάθου παταμων πόλις ἤτε. ... Βαργουχαὶ ἐμφύλου." — Ptolemy, VII, ii. 62.

c. 940. — "On the coast, e.g. at Saimūr, at Sūbrā, and at Tāna, they speak Lārī; these provinces give their name to the Sea of Lār (Lārawi) on the coast of which they are situated." — Muṣʿābī, i. 381.

c. 1020. — "... to Kach the country producing gum (mokht, i.e. Beldillum, q.v.), and bardrād (!) to Sonmāt, fourteen (pamangs); to Kamūr, thirty ... to Tāna five. There you enter the country of Lārān, where is Jaimūr" (i.e. Saimūr, see CHOU). — Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 66.

c. 1190. — "Udaya the Parmār mounted and came. The Dors followed him from Lār ..." — The Poem of Chand Bardati, B.T. by Beames, in Ind. Antiq. i. 275.

c. 1230. — A certain Traveller says that Tāna is a city of Guzerat (Gurad) in its eastern part, lying west of Malabar (Muntarā); whilst Ibn Saʿyid says that it is the furthest city of Lār (Al-Lār), and very famous among traders." — Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, p. 188.

(b) To the Delta region of the Indus, and especially to its western part. Sir H. Elliot supposes the name in this use, which survived until recently, to be identical with the preceding, and that the name had originally extended continuously over the coast, from the western part of the Delta to beyond Bombay (see his Historians, i. 378). We have no means of deciding this question (see LARRY BUNDER).

c. 1290. — "Dīwāl ... was reduced to ruins by a Muhammadan invasion, and another site chosen to the eastward. The new town still went by the same name ... and was succeeded by Lāri Bandar or the port of Lār, which is the name of the country forming the modern delta, particularly the western part." — M. Murdo, in J. R. As. Soc. i. 29.

(c) To a Province on the north of the Persian Gulf, with its capital. c. 1220. — Lār is erroneously described by Yakūt as a great island between Sirāf and Kish. But there is no such island.* It is an extensive province of the continent. See Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, p. 501.

c. 1330. — "We marched for three days through a desert and ... then arrived at Lār, a big town having springs, considerable streams, and gardens, and fine bazaars. We lodged in the hermitage of the pious Shaikh Abū Dulaf Muhammad." — Ibn Batūta, ii. 240.

c. 1487. — Retorneing alongest the coast, forneagainst Ormūz there is a towne called Lār, a great and good towne of merchandis, about 1ijn* houses. ..." — Josias Barrow, old E.T. (Hak. Soc.) 50.

[c. 1590. — Lār] borders on the mountains of Great Tibet. To its north is a lofty mountain which dominates all the surrounding country, and the ascent of which is arduous. ..." — Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 363.] 1553. — These benefactions the Kings of Ormūz ... pay to this day to a mosque which that Caciz (see CASIS) had made in a district called Hongez of Sheikh Doniar, adjoining the city of Lara, distant from Ormūz over 40 leagues." — Barros, ii. ii. 2.

1602. — "This man was a Moor, a native of the Kingdom of Lār, adjoining of Ormuz: his proper name was Cufo, but as he was a native of the Kingdom of Lara he took a surname from him, and called himself Cufo Larym." — Couto, IV. vii. 6.

1622. — "Lār, as I said before, is capital of a great province or kingdom, which till our day had a prince of its own, who rightfully or wrongfully reigned there absolutely; but from Sirāf, may be meant. Barbosa also mentions Lār among the islands in the Gulf subject to the k. of Ormuz (p. 37)."

* It is possible that the island called Shaikh Shur(ab), which is off the coast of Lār, and not far from Sirāf, may be meant. Barbosa also mentions Lār among the islands in the Gulf subject to the k. of Ormuz (p. 37).
LARAI, s. This Hind. word, meaning 'fighting,' is by a curious idiom applied to the biting and annoyance of fleas and the like. [It is not mentioned in the dictionaries of either Fallon or Platts.] There is a similar idiom (jang kardan) in Persian.

LAREK, n.p. Larak; an island in the Persian Gulf, not far from the island of Jerun or Ormus.

[1623. — "At noon, being near Lareck, and no wind stirring, we cast Anchor." — P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 3.]

1685. — "We came up with the Islands of Ormus and Arack . . ." (called Lareck afterwards). — Hedges, Diary, May 23; [Hak. Soc. i. 292.]

LARIN, s. Pers. läri. A peculiar kind of money formerly in use on the Persian Gulf, W. Coast of India, and in the Maldive Islands, in which last it survived to the last century. The name is there retained still, though coins of the ordinary form are used. It is sufficiently described in the quotations, and representations are given by De Bry and Tavernier. The name appears to have been derived from the territory of Lar on the Persian Gulf. (See under that word, [and Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 232 seq.])

c. 1563. — "I have seen the men of the Country who were Gentiles take their children, their sonsne and their daughters, and have desired the Portugalls to buy them, and I have seen them sold for eight or ten larines apiece, which may be of our money x s. or xiii s. iii d. — Master Caesar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 343.

1583. — Gasparo Balbi has an account of the Larino, the greater part of which seems to be borrowed litteratim by Fitch in the succeeding quotation. But Balbi adds: "The first who began to strike them was the King of Lar, who formerly was a powerful King in Persia, but is now a small one." — f. 87.

1587. — "The said Larine is a strange piece of money, not being round, as all other current money in Christianitie, but is a small rod of silver, of the greatnesse of the pen of a goose feather . . . which is wrested so that two endes meet at the just half part, and in the head thereof is a stamp Turkesco, and these be the best current money in all the Indias, and 6 of these Larines make a duckat." — R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 407.

1598. — "An Oxe or a Cowe is there to be bought for one Larin, which is as much as half a Gilderne." — Linschoten, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 94; in i. 48 Larynzen; see also i. 229].

c. 1610. — "La monnoye du Royaume n'est que d'argent et d'une sorte. Ces sont des pieces d'argent qu'ils appellent larins, de valeur de huit sols ou enuiron de notre monnoye . . . longues comme le doigt mais redoublées." — Pyrard de Laval, i. 163; [Hak. Soc. i. 222].

1622. — "The lari is a piece of money that I will exhibit in Italy, most eccentric in form, for it is nothing but a little rod of silver of a fixed weight, and bent double unequally. On the bend it is marked with some small stamp or other. It is called Lar because it was the peculiar money of the Princes of Lar, invented by them when they were separated from the Kingdom of Persia . . . In value every 5 lari are equal to a piastre or patacca of reals of Spain, or 'piece of eight' as we choose to call it." — P. della Valle, ii. 494.

LARKIN, s. (obsolete). A kind of drink—apparently a sort of punch—which was popular in the Company's old factories. We know the word only on the authority of Pietro della Valle; but he is the most accurate of travellers. We are in the dark as to the origin of the name. On the one hand its form suggests an eponymus among the old servants of the Company, such as Robert Larkin, whom we find to have been engaged for the service in 1610, and to have died chief of the Factory of Patani, on the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, in 1616. But again we find in a Vocabulary of Certaine Words of the Naturall Language of Iaua," in Drake's Voyage (Hak. iv. 246): "Larvinka=Drink."

Of this word we can trace nothing nearer than (Jawan) larih, 'to pledge, or invite to drink at an entertainment,' and (Malay) larih-larahan, 'mutual pledging to drink.' It will be observed that della Valle assigns the drink especially to Java.

1623. — "Meanwhile the year 1622 was drawing near its close, and its last days were often celebrated of an evening in the House of the English, with good fellowship. And on one of these occasions I learned from them how to make a beverage called LASCAR.

LARKIN, which they told me was in great vogue in Java, and in all those other islands of the Far East. This said beverage seemed to me in truth an admirable thing,—not for use at every meal (it is too strong for that),—but as a tonic in case of debility, and to make tasty possets, much better than those we make with Muscatel wines or Cretan malmseys. So I asked for the recipe; and am taking it to Italy with me. . . . It seemed odd to me that those hot southern regions, as well as in the environs of Hormuz here, where also the heat is great, they should use both spice in their food and spirits in their drinks, as well as many other hot beverages like this larkin."—P. della Valle, ii. 475.

LARRY-BUNDER, n.p. The name of an old seaport in the Delta of the Indus, which succeeded Daibul (see DIUL-SIND) as the chief haven of Sind. We are doubtful of the proper orthography. It was in later Mohomedan times called Lâhôri-bandar, probably from presumed connection with Lahore as the port of the Punjab (Elliott, i. 378). At first sight, M'Murdo's suggestion that the original name may have been Lârî-bandar, from Lâr, the local name of the southern part of Sind, seems probable. M'Murdo, indeed, writing about 1820, says that the name Lârî-Bandar was not at all familiar to natives; but if accustomed to the form Lâhôri-bandar they might not recognize it in the other. The shape taken however by what is apparently the same name in our first quotation is adverse to M'Murdo's suggestion.

1630. — "This stream (the Indus) after passing (Alor) . . . divides into two streams, and itself into the sea in the neighbourhood of the city of Lâhârânî, and the other branches off to the East, to the borders of Kach, and is known by the name of Sind Sâgâr, i.e., Sea of Sind."—Al-Birânî, in Elliot, i. 49.

[1607. — "Then you are to sail for Lawrie in the Bay of the River Syndus."—Birdwood, First Letter-book, 251.

[1611. — "I took . . . Larree, the port town of the River Sindha."—Duncairn, Letters, i. 102.]

[1665. — "It se fait aussi beaucoup de trafic au Loure-bender, qui est a trois jours de Tatta sur la mer, où la rade est plus excellente pour Vaisseaux, qu'en quelque autre lieu que ce soit des Indes."—Thevenot, v. 159.

1679. — . . . If Suratt, Barach, and Bunddlaree in Scinde may be included in the same Phyrmaud to be customes free . . . then that they get these places and words inserted."—Pt. St. Geo. Cons., Feb. 20. In Notes and Extracts, No. 1. Madras, 1871.

1727. — "It was my Fortune . . . to come to Larrhibunder, with a Cargo from Mallehkar, worth above 210,000."—I. Hamilton, i. 116; [ed. 1744, i. 117, Larribdar].

1739. — "But the Castle and town of Lohre Bender, with all the country to the eastward of the river ATTOK, and of the waters of the SCIND, and NALA SUNKHA, shall, as before, belong to the Empire of Hindostan."—II. of Nâdir, in Hunzâry, ii. 387.

1753. — "Le bras gauche du Sind se rend à Laheri, où il s'étançonne en un lac; et ce port, qui est celui de Tattanagar, communément nommé Lahre-bender."—D'Arcvile, p. 40.

1780. — "The first place of any note, after passing the bar, is Laribunda, about 5 or 6 leagues from the sea."—Dunn's Oriental Navigator, 5th ed. p. 96.

1813. — "Laribunder. This is commonly called Scindy River, being the principal branch of the Indus, having 15 feet water on the bar, and 6 or 7 fathoms inside; it is situated in latitude about 24° 30' north. . . . The town of Laribunder is about 5 leagues from the sea, and vessels of 200 tons used to proceed up to it."—Milburn, i. 136.

1831. — "We took the route by Durajee and Meerpoor. . . . The town of Lahory was in sight from the former of these places, and is situated on the same, or left bank of the Pitarre."—J. Barnes, 2nd. ed. i. 22.

LASCAR, s. The word is originally from Pers. lashkar, 'an army,' 'a camp.' This is usually derived from Ar., al-ashkar, but it would rather seem that LASGAR.

Ar. 'askar, 'an army' is taken from this Pers. word: whence lashkari, 'one belonging to an army, a soldier.' The word 'lascar' or 'lascar' (both these pronunciations are in vogue) appears to have been corrupted, through the Portuguese use of laskari in the forms lasquarin, lascari, &c., either by the Portuguese themselves, or by the Dutch and English who took up the word from them, and from these laskar has passed back again into native use in this corrupt shape. The early Portuguese writers have the forms we have just named in the sense of 'soldier'; but lascar is never so used now. It is in general the equivalent of khalasi, in the various senses of that word (see CLASSY), viz. (1) an inferior class of artilleryman ('gun-lascar'); (2) a tent-pitcher, doing other work which the class are accustomed to do; (3) a sailor. The last is the most common Anglo-Indian use, and has passed into the English language. The use of lascar in the modern sense by Pyrard de Laval shows that this use was already general on the west coast at the beginning of the 17th century, [also see quotation from Pringle below]; whilst the curious distinction which Pyrard makes between Lascar and Lascari, and Dr. Fryer makes between Luscar and Lascar (accenting probably Luscar and Lascar) shows that lashkari for a soldier was still in use. In Ceylon, the use of the word lascar seen for a local or civil soldier long survived; perhaps is not yet extinct. The word lashkari does not seem to occur in the Ain.

1541.—"It is a proverbial saying all over India (i.e. Portuguese India, see s.v.), that the good Lasquarin, or 'soldier' as we should call him, must be an Abyssinian."—Castro, Roteiro, 73.

1546.—"Besides these there were others (who fell at Din) whose names are unknown, being men of the lower rank, among whom I knew a lascaryn (a man getting only 500 reis of pay!) who was the first man to lay his hand on the Moorish wall, and shouted aloud that they might see him, as many have told me. And he was immediately thrown down wounded in five places with stones and bullets, but still lived; and a noble gentleman sent and had him rescued and carried away by his slaves. And he survived, but being a common man he did not even get his pay!"—Correa, iv. 567.

1552.—"... eles os reparte polos lascarins de suas capitaniaes, q' assi chamão soldados."—Costenhalda, ii. 67. [Mr. Whitehead notes that in the orig. repartem for reparte, and the reference should be ii. 16.]

1554.—"Moreover the Senhor Governor conceded to the said ambassador that if in the territories of Idolshaa (see IDALCAN), or in those of our Lord the King there should be any differences or quarrels between any Portuguese lascarins or peons (pietas) of ours, and lascarins of the territories of Idolshaa and peons of his, that the said Idolshaa shall order the delivery up of the Portuguese and peons that they may be punished if culpable. And in like manner ..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 44.

LĀT, LĀT SĀHIB. s. This, a popular corruption of Lord Sahib, or Lārd Sāhīb, as it is written in Hind, is the usual form from native lips, at least in the Bengal Presidency, of the title by which the Governor-General has long been known in the vernacular. The term also extends nowadays to Lieutenant-Governors, who in contact with the higher authority become Chhotā ('Little') Lāt, whilst the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief are sometimes discriminated as the Mulāki Lāt Sāhīb [or Barā Lāt], and the Jangā Lāt Sāhīb ('territorial' and 'military'), the Bishop as the Lāt Pādēr Sāhīb, and the Chief Justice as the Lāt Justīy Sāhīb. The title is also sometimes, but very incorrectly, applied to minor dignitaries of the supreme Government, [whilst the common form of blessing addressed to a civil officer is "Hazār Lāt Guv-nār, Lāt Sīkhirāt ho-jāen."—1824. He seemed, however, much puzzled to make out my rank, never having heard (he said) of any 'Lord Sahib', except the Governor-General, while he was still more perplexed by the exposition of 'Lord Bishop Sahib', which for some reason or other my servants always prefer to that of Lord Padre."—Heber, i. 69.]

1837.—"The Arab, thinking I had purposely stolen his kitten, ran after the buggy at full speed, shouting as he passed Lord Auckland's tents, 'Dohāt, dohāt, Sāhīb! dohāt, Lord Sāhīb!' (see DOAI). 'Mercy, mercy, sir! mercy, Governor-General!' The faster the horse rushed on, the faster followed the shouting Arab."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 142.

1868.—"The old barber at Rookree, after telling me that he had known Strachey when he first began, added, 'Ah Lāt-Sekretur hai! Ah! hum bhi boodda hogya!' ('Now he is Lord Secretary! Ah! I too have become old!')"—Letter from Sir J. F. Stephen, in Times, May 31.

LĀT, LĀTH. s. Hind. lāt, used as a corruption of the English lot, in reference to an auction (Carnegie).
LATERITE, s. A term, first used by Dr. Francis Buchanan, to indicate a reddish brick-like argillaceous formation much impregnated with iron peroxide, and hardening on exposure to the atmosphere, which is found in places all over South India from one coast to the other, and the origin of which geologists find very obscure. It is found in two distinct types: viz. (1) High-level Laterite, capping especially the trap-rocks of the Deccan, with a bed from 30 or 40 to 200 feet in thickness, which perhaps at one time extended over the greater part of Peninsular India. This is found as far north as the Rajmahal and Monghyr hills. (2) Low-level Laterite, forming comparatively thin and sloping beds on the plains of the coast. The origin of both is regarded as being, in the most probable view, modified volcanic matter; the low-level laterite having undergone a further rearrangement and deposition; but the matter is too complex for brief statement (see Neubold, in J. R. A. S., vol. viii.; and the Manual of the Geol. of India, pp. xlv. seqq., 348 seqq.). Mr. King and others have found flint weapons in the low-level formation. Laterite is the usual material for road-metal in S. India, as kunkur (q.v.) is in the north. In Ceylon it is called cabook (q.v.).

1800.—"It is diffused in immense masses, without any appearance of stratification, and is placed over the granite that forms the basis of Malayala. . . . It very soon becomes as hard as brick, and resists the air and water much better than any brick I have seen in India. . . . As it is usually cut into the form of bricks for building, in several of the native dialects it is called the brick-stone (Iticaucelles) [Malayal. vettkal]. . . . The most proper English name would be Laterite, from Lateris, the appellation that may be given it in science."—Buchanan, Mysore, &c., ii. 440-441.

1860.—"Natives resident in these localities (Galle and Colombo) are easily recognisable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence along the western coast of laterite, or, as the Singhalese call it, cabook, a product of disintegrated gneiss, which being subjected to detritus communicates its hue to the soil."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 17.

LATEEAL, s. Hind. lāthīyāl, or, more cumbrously, lāthīvālī, 'a clubman,' a hired ruffian. Such gentry were not many years ago entertained in scores by planters in some parts of Bengal, to maintain by force their claims to lands for sowing indigo on.

1878.—"Doubtless there were hired latials . . . on both sides."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 114.

LAW-OFFICER. This was the official designation of a Mahomedan officer learned in the (Mahomedan) law, who was for many years of our Indian administration an essential functionary of the judges' Courts in the districts, as well as of the Sukdar or Courts of Review at the Presidency. It is to be remembered that the law administered in Courts under the Company's government, from the assumption of the Dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, was the Mahomedan law; at first by the hands of native Cazees and Mufties, with some superintendence from the higher European servants of the Company; a superintendence which, while undergoing sundry vicissitudes of system during the next 30 years, developed gradually into a European judiciary, which again was set on an extended and quasi-permanent footing by Lord Cornwallis's Government, in Regulation IX. of 1793.
LAW-OFFICER. 511 LAW-OFFICER.

(see ADAWULT). The Mahommedan law continued, however, to be the professed basis of criminal jurisprudence, though modified more and more, as years went on, by new Regulations, and by the recorded constructions and circular orders of the superior Courts, until the accomplishment of the great changes which followed the Mutiny, and the assumption of the direct government of India by the Crown (1858). The landmarks of change were (a) the enactment of the Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), and (b) that of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act. XXV. of 1861), followed by (c) the establishment of the High Court (July 1, 1862), in which became merged both the Supreme Court with its peculiar jurisdiction, and the (quondam-Company's) Sudder Courts of Review and Appeal, civil and criminal (Dewanny Adawlvt, and Nizamat Adawlvt).

The authoritative exposition of the Mahommedan Law, in aid and guidance of the English judges, was the function of the Mahommedan Law-officer. He sat with the judge on the bench at Sessions, i.e. in the hearing of criminal cases committed by the magistrate for trial; and at the end of the trial he gave in his written record of the proceedings with his Futwa (q.v.) (see Regn. IX. 1793, sect. 47), which was his judgment as to the guilt of the accused, as to the definition of the crime, and as to its appropriate punishment according to Mahommedan Law. The judge was bound attentively to consider the futwa, and if it seemed to him to be consonant with natural justice, and also in conformity with the Mahommedan Law, he passed sentence (save in certain excepted cases) in its terms, and issued his warrant to the magistrate for execution of the sentence, unless it were one of death, in which case the proceedings had to be referred to the Sudder Nizamut for confirmation. In cases also where there was disagreement between the civilian judge and the Law-officer, either as to finding or sentence, the matter was referred to the Sudder Court for ultimate decision.

In 1832, certain modifications were introduced by law (Regn. VI. of that year), which declared that the futwa might be dispensed with either by referring the case for report to a punchayet (q.v.), which sat apart from the Court; or by constituting assessors in the trial (generally three in number). The frequent adoption of the latter alternative rendered the appearance of the Law-officer and his futwa much less universal as time went on. The post of Law-officer was indeed not actually abolished till 1864. But it would appear from enquiry that I have made, among friends of old standing in the Civil Service, that for some years before the issue of the Penal Code and the other reforms already mentioned, the Moolvvee (maulavi) or Mahommedan Law-officer had, in some at least of the Bengal districts, practically ceased to sit with the judge, even in cases where no assessors were summoned.* I cannot trace any legislative authority for this, nor any Circular of the Sudder Nizamut; and it is not easy, at this time of day, to obtain much personal testimony. But Sir George Yule (who was Judge of Rungpore and Bogra about 1855-56) writes thus:

"The Moolvvee-ship . . . must have been abolished before I became a judge (I think), which was 2 or 3 years before the Mutiny; for I have no recollection of ever sitting with a Moolvvee, and I had a great number of heavy criminal cases to try in Rungpore and Bogra. Assessors were substituted for the Moolvvee in some cases, but I have no recollection of employing these either."

Mr. Seton-Karr, again, who was Civil and Sessions Judge of Jessore (1857-1860), writes:

"I am quite certain of my own practice . . . and I made deliberate choice of native assessors, whenever the law required me to have such functionaries. I determined never to sit with a Maulavi, as, even before the Penal Code was passed, and came into operation, I wished to get rid of futwas and differences of opinion."

The office of Law-officer was formally abolished by Act XI. of 1864.

In respect of civil litigation, it had been especially laid down (Regn. of April 11, 1780, quoted below) that in suits regarding successions, inheritance, marriage, caste, and all religious usages

* Reg. I. of 1810 had empowered the Executive Government, by an official communication from its Secretary in the Judicial Department, to dispense with the attendance and futwa of the Law officers of the courts of circuit, when it seemed advisable. But in such case the judge of the court passed no sentence, but referred the proceedings with an opinion to the Nizamat Adawlvt.
and institutions, the Mahommedan laws with respect to Mahommedans, and the Hindu laws with respect to Hinduts, were to be considered as the general rules by which the judges were to form their decisions. In the respective cases, it was laid down, the Mahommedan and Hindu law-officers of the court were to attend and expound the law.

In this note I have dealt only with the Mahommedan law-officer, whose presence and co-operation was so long (it has been seen) essential in a criminal trial. In civil cases he did not sit with the judge (at least in memory of man now living), but the judge could and did, in case of need, refer to him on any point of Mahommedan Law. The Hindu law-officer (Pundit) is found in the legislation of 1793, and is distinctly traceable in the Regulations down at least to 1821. In fact he is named in the Act XI. of 1864 (see quotation under CAZEE) abolishing Law-officers. But in many of the districts it would seem that he had very long before 1860 practically ceased to exist, under what circumstances exactly I have failed to discover. He had nothing to do with criminal justice, and the occasions for reference to him were presumably not frequent enough to justify his maintenance in every district. A Pundit continued to be attached to the Sudder Dewanny, and to him questions were referred by the District Courts when requisite. Neither Pundit nor Moolvee is attached to the High Court, but native judges sit on its Bench. It need only be added that under Regulation III. of 1821, a magistrate was authorized to refer for trial to the Law-officer of his district a variety of complaints and charges of a trivial character. The designation of the Law-officer was Maulavi. (See ADAWLUT, CAZEE, FUTWA, MOOLVEE, MUFTY.)

1780.—"That in all suits regarding inheritance, marriage, and caste, and other religious usages or institutions, the laws of the Koran with respect to Mahommedans, and those of the Shaster with respect to Gentoons, shall be invariably adhered to. On all such occasions the Molavies or Brahmins shall respectively attend to expound the law; and they shall sign the report and assist in passing the decree."—Regulation passed by the G.-G. and Council, April 11, 1780.

1783.—"II. The Law Officers of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, the Nizamut Adawlut, the provincial Courts of Appeal, the courts of circuit, and the zillah and city courts ... shall not be removed but for incapacity or misconduct. ..."—Reg. XII. of 1793.

In §§ iv., v., vi. CAZEE and MUFTY are substituted for Law-Officer, but referring to the same persons.

1799.—"IV. If the futwa of the law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut declare any person convicted of wilful murder not liable to suffer death under the Mahomedan law on the ground of ... the Court of Nizamut Adawlut shall notwithstanding sentence the prisoner to suffer death. ..."—Reg. VIII. of 1799.

LAXIMANA, LAQUESIMENA, &c., s. Malay Laksamana, from Skt. lakshmana, 'having fortunate tokens' (which was the name of a mythical hero, brother of Ráma). This was the title of one of the highest dignitaries in the Malay State, commander of the forces.

1511.—"There used to be in Malaca five principal dignities ... the third is Lassa-mane; this is Admiral of the Sea. ..."—Aboquerque, by Birch, iii. 87.

1539.—"The King accordingly set forth a Fleet of two hundred Sails. ... And of this Navy he made General the great Laque Xemenia, his Admiral, of whose Valor the History of the Indies hath spoken in divers places."—Pinto, in Çogan, p. 38.

1563.—"Lacsamana was harassed by the King to engage Dom Garcia; but his reply was: Sire, against the Portuguese and their high-sided vessels it is impossible to engage with low-cut lancarans like ours. Leave me (to act) for I know this people well, seeing how much blood they have cost me; good fortune is now with them, and I am about to revenge you on them. And so he did."—Barros, III. viii. 7.

[1615.—"On the morrow I went to take my leave of Laxaman, to whom all strangers' business are resigned."—Foster, Letters, iv. 6.]

LEAGUER, s. The following use of this word is now quite obsolete, we believe, in English; but it illustrates the now familiar German use of Lager-Bier, i.e. 'beer for laying down, for keeping' (primarily in cask). The word in this sense is neither in Minshew (1627), nor in Bayley (1790).

1747.—"That the Storekeeper do provide Leagurers of good Columbo or Batavia arrack."—Pt. St. David Conon., May 5 (MS. Record in India Office).

1782.—"Will be sold by Public Auction by Mr. Bondfield, at his Auction Room, formerly the Court of Cutcherry ... Square and Globe Lanterns, a quantity of Country Rum in Leagurers, a Slave Girl, and a variety of other articles."—India Gazette, Nov. 23.
LECOMBE, s. We do not know what the word used by the Abbé Raynal in the following extract is meant for. It is perhaps a mistake for last, a Dutch weight.

1770.—"They (Dutch at the Cape) receive a still smaller profit from 60 lecques of red wine, and 80 or 90 of white, which they carry to Europe every year. The lecque weighs about 1,200 pounds."—Raynal, E.T. 1777, i. 293.

LEE, s. Chin. 亮. The ordinary Chinese itinerary measure. Books of the Jesuit Missionaries generally interpret the modern 亮 as \( \frac{2}{3} \) of a league, which gives about 3 亮 to the mile; more exactly, according to Mr. Giles, 27\( \frac{1}{4} \) 亮 = 10 miles; but it evidently varies a good deal in different parts of China, and has also varied in the course of ages. Thus in the 8th century, data quoted by M. Vivien de St. Martin, from Père Gaubil, show that the 亮 was little more than \( \frac{1}{3} \) of an English mile. And from several concurrent statements we may also conclude that the 亮 is generalised so that a certain number of 亮, generally 100, stand for a day's march. [Arch-deacon Gray (China, ii. 101) gives 10 亮 as the equivalent of \( \frac{2}{3} \) English miles; Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 305) asserts that Hwen Thang converts the Indian yojanas into Chinese 亮 at the rate of 40 亮 per yojana, or of 10 亮 per klo.]

1858.—"By the said booke it is found that the Chinos haue amongst them but only three kind of measures; the which in their language are called 亮, 丈, and 町, which is as much as to say, or in effect, as a forlong, league, or ironey: the measure, which is called 町, hath so much space as a man's voice on a plaine grounde may bee hearde in a quiet day, halowing or whooping with all the force and strength he may; and ten of these 町 maketh a 丈, which is a great Spanish league; and ten 丈 maketh a day's journe, which is called 町町, which maketh 12 (sic) long leagues."—Mendoza, i. 21.

1861.—"In this part of the country a day's march, whatever its actual distance, is called 100 亮; and the 亮 may therefore be taken as a measure of time rather than of distance."—Col. Sarel, in J.R. Geog. Soc. xxiii. 11.

1878.—"D'après les clauses du contrat le voyage d'une longueur totale de 1,800 亮s, ou 150 lieues, devait s'effectuer en 15 jours."—L. Rouset, A Travers la Chine, 387.

LECHEE, LYCHEE, s. Chin. 梨-枝, and in S. China (its native region) 梨-枝; the beautiful and delicate fruit of the Nephelium litchi, Cambessédées (N. O. Sapindaceae), a tree which has been for nearly a century introduced into Bengal with success. The dried fruit, usually ticketed as lychee, is now common in London shops.

c. 1540.—"... outra verdeura muito mais fresca, e de melhor chieiro, que esta, a que os naturaes da terra chamáo lechias. ..."

—Pinto, ch. lviii.

1563.—"R. Of the things of China you have not said a word; though there they have many fruits highly praised, such as are lalichias (lalixius) and other excellent fruits. "O. I did not speak of the things of China, because China is a region of which there is so much to tell that it never comes to an end. ..."—Garcia, t. 157.

1585.—"Also they have a kinde of plummes that they doo call lechias, that are of an exceeding gallant tast, and never hurteth anybody, although they should eate a great number of them."—Parke's Mendoza, i. 14.

1598.—"There is a kind of fruit called Lechyas, which are like Plums, but of another taste, and are very good, and very much esteemed, whereof I have eaten."—Linschoten, 88; [Hak. Soc. i. 181].

1631.—"Adfertur ad nos præterea fructus quidam Lances (read Laices) vocatus, qui racematin, ut uve, crescit."—Jac. Bontii, Dial. vi. p. 11.

1684.—"Laicea, or Chinese Chestnuts."—Valentijn, iv. (China) 12.

1750-52.—"Leicki is a species of trees which they seem to reckon equal to the sweet orange trees. ... It seems hardly credible that the country about Canton (in which place only the fruit grows) annually makes 100,000 Tel of dried leickis."—Olof Toreen, 302-3.

1824.—"Of the fruits which this season offers, the finest are leeches (sic) and manges; the first is really very fine, being a sort of plum, with the flavour of a Frontignac grape."—Heber, i. 60.

c. 1585.—

"Et tandis que ton pied, sorti de la ba-boche, Pendait rose, au bord du manchy (see MUNCHEEL) À l'ombre des bois noirs touffus, et du Letchi,
Aux fruits moins pourpres que ta bouche."

Lecomte de Lisle.

1878.—"... and the lichi hiding under a shell of ruddy brown its globes of translucent and delicately fragrant flesh."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49.

1879.—"... Here are a hundred and sixty lichi fruits for you. ..."—M. Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales (Calc. ed.) 51.

LEMON. s. Citrus medica, var. Lémonum, Hooker. This is of course not an Anglo-Indian word. But it has come into European languages through the Ar. limān, and is, according to Henn, of Indian origin. In Hind. we have both limā and nimbā, which last, at least, seems to be an indigenous form. The Skt. dictionaries give nimbāka. In England we get the word through the Romance languages, Fr. limon, It. limone, Sp. limon, &c., perhaps both from the Crusades and from the Moors of Spain. [Mr. Skeat writes: “The Malay form is limau, ‘a lime, lemon, or orange.’ The Port. limão may possibly come from this Malay form. I feel sure that limau, which in some dialects is limar, is an indigenous word which was transferred to Europe.”] (See LIME.)

c. 1200.—“Sunt praeterea aline arbores fructus acidos, pontici videlicet saporis, ex se procreantes, quos appellant limones.”—Jacobi de Vitriaco, Hist. Hierosolym, cap. lxxxv. in Bougr.

c. 1328.—“I will only say this much, that the India, as regards fruit and other things, is entirely different from Christendom: except, indeed, that there be lemons in some places, as sweet as sugar, whilst there be other lemons sour like ours.”—Friar Jordanus, 15.

1331.—“Profunditas hujus aquae plena est lapidibus preciosis. Quae aqua multum est yрудinibus et sanguisugis plena. Hos lapides non accipit rex, sed pro animа sub semel vel in anno sub aquas ipsos pauperes ire permittit. . . . Et it ipsi pauperes ire sub aquam possint accipiant limonem et quemdam fructum quem bene pistant, et illo bene se ungunt. . . . Et cum sic sus uncti yrudines et sanguisugae illos offrande non valent.”—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App., p. xxi.

c. 1333.—“The fruit of the mango-tree (aλ'-ανδρα) is the size of a great pear. When yet green they take the fallen fruit and powder it with salt and preserve it, as is done with the sweet citron and the lemon (aλ-λιμαν) in our country.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 126.

LEMON-GRASS, s. Andropogon citratus, D.C., a grass cultivated in Ceylon and Singapore, yielding an oil much used in perfumery, under the name of Lemon-Grass Oil, Oil of Verbena, or Indian Melissa Oil. Royle (Hind. Medicine, 82) has applied the name to another very fragrant grass, Andropogon schoenanthus, L., according to him the αχων of Dioscorides. This last, which grows wild in various parts of India, yields Ruа Oıl, alias O. of Ginger-grass or of Geranium, which is exported from Bombay to Arabia and Turkey, where it is extensively used in the adulteration of “Otto of Roses.”

LEOPARD, s. We insert this in order to remark that there has been a great deal of controversy among Indian sportsmen, and also among naturalists, as to whether there are or are not two species of this Cat, distinguished by those who maintain the affirmative, as panther (F. pardus) and leopard (Felis pardus), the latter being the smaller, though by some these names are reversed. Even those who support this distinction of species appear to admit that the markings, habits, and general appearance (except size) of the two animals are almost identical. Jerdon describes the two varieties, but (with Blyth) classes both as one species (Felis pardus). [Mr. Blanford takes the same view: “I cannot help suspecting that the difference is very often due to age. . . . I have for years endeavoured to distinguish the two forms, but without success.” (Mammalia of India, 68 seq.)]

LEWCHEW, LIU KIU, LOO-CHOO, &c., n.p. The name of a group of islands to the south of Japan, a name much more familiar than in later years during the 16th century, when their people habitually navigated the China seas, and visited the ports of the Archipelago. In the earliest notices they are perhaps mixt up with the Japanese. [Mr. Chamberlain writes the name Luchu, and says that it is pronounced דאך by the natives and בַּק by the Japanese (Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 267). Mr. Pringle traces the name in the “Gold flowered loes” which appear in a Madras list of 1684, and which he supposes to be “a name invented for the occasion to describe some silk stuff brought from the Liu Kiu islands.” (Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 174.)]

1540.—"And they, demanding of him whence he came, and what he would have, he answered them that he was of the Kingdom of Sião [of the settlement of the Tanacornim foreigners, and that he came from Veniaga] and as a merchant was going to traffique in the Isle of Lequios." —Pinto (orig. cap. x. xii), in Cogan, 49.

1553.—"Fernao Peres ... whilst he remained at that island of Beniaga, saw there certain junkes of the people called Lequios, of whom he had already got a good deal of information at Malaca, as that they inhabited certain islands adjoining that coast of China; and he observed that the most part of the merchandise that they brought was a great quantity of gold ... and they appeared to him a better disposed people than the Chinese." —Barros, III, ii. 8. See also II. vi. 6.

1556.—(In this year) "a Portuguese arrived at Malaca, named Perea Gomes d'Almeida, servant to the Grand Master of Santiago, with a rich Present, and letters from the Vntaquin, Prince of the Island of Tanix-unna, directed to King John the third ... to have five hundred Portuguese granted to him, to the end that with them, and his own Forces, he might conquer the Island of Lequio, for which he would remain tributary to him at 5000 Kintals of Copper and 1000 of Lattin, yearly. ..." —Pinto, in Cogan, p. 188.

1615.—"The King of Mashona (qu. Shashona?) ... who is King of the westernmost islands of Japan ... has conquered the Leques Islands, which not long since were under the Government of China." —Sainsbury, i. 417.

"... The King of Shashma ... a man of great power, and hath conquered the islands called the Leques, which not long since were under the government of China. ... Leque Grande yeeldeth great store of amber grece of the best sort, and will vent 1,000 or 15,000 (sic) ps. of coarse cloth, as duties and such like, per annum." —Letter of Rapho Coppindall, in Cocks, ii. 272.

LIAMPO, n.p. This is the name which the older writers, especially Portuguese, give to the Chinese port which we now call Ning-Po. It is a form of corruption which appears in other cases of names used by the Portuguese, or of those who learned from them. Thus Nanking is similarly called Lanchin in the publications of the same age, and Y unnan appears in Mondona as Olam.

1540.—"Sailing in this manner we arrived six days after at the Ports of Liampo, which are two Islands one just against another, distant three Leagues from the place, where at that time the Portugals used their commerce; there they had built above a thousand houses, that were governed by Sheriffs, Auditors, Consuls, Judges, and 6 or 7 other kinds of Officers [com governauza de Vereadores, & Ouvidor, & Alcaides, & notas seis ou sete Varas de Justiça & Ofícios de Republica], where the Notaries underneath the publicke Acts which they made, wrote thus, I, such a one, publique Notarie of this Town of Liampo for the King our Sovereign Lord. And this they did with as much confidence and assurance as if this Place had been situated between Soudares and Lisbon; so that there were houses there which cost three or four thousand Dutchasts the building, but both they and all the rest were afterwards demolished for our sins by the Chinese. ..." —Pinto (orig. cap. lxvi), in Cogan, p. 82.

What Cogan renders 'Ports of Liampo' is ports, i.e. Gates. And the expression is remarkable as preserving a very old tradition of Eastern navigation; the oldest document regarding Arab trade to China (the Relation, tr. by Reinaud) says that the ships after crossing the Sea of Sanji pass the Gates of China. These Gates are in fact mountains washed by the sea; between these mountains is an opening, through which the ships pass" (p. 19). This phrase was perhaps a translation of a term used by the Chinese themselves—see under BOCCA TIGRIS.

1553.—"The eighth (division of the coasts of the Indies) terminate in a notable cape, the most easterly point of the whole continent so far as we know at present, and which stands about midway in the whole coast of that great country China. This our people call Cabo de Liampo, after an illustrious city which lies in the bend of the cape. It is called by the natives Nimpo, which our countrymen have corrupted into Liampo." —Barros, i. ix. 1.

1696.—"Those Junks commonly touch at Lympo, from whence they bring Petes, Geelougs, and other Silks." —Borger, in Dalrymple, i. 87.

1701.—"The Mandarin of Justice arrived late last night from Limpo." —Fragmentary M.S. Records of China Factory (at Chusan ?), in India Office, Oct, 24.

1727.—"The Province of Cheqian, whose chief city is Limpoa, by some called Nimpoa, and by others Ningpo." —A. Hamilton, ii. 283; [ed. 1744, ii. 282].

1770.—"To these articles of importation may be added those brought every year, by a dozen Chinese Junks, from Emoy, Limpo, and Canton." —Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 249.

LIKIN, LEKIN, s. We borrow from Mr. Giles: "An arbitrary tax, originally of one cash per tael on all kinds of produce, imposed with a view of making up the deficiency in the land-tax of China caused by the Tai ping and Nienfei troubles. It was to be set aside for military purposes only—hence its common name of 'war tax'... The Chefoo Agreement makes the area of foreign concessions at the various Treaty Ports exempt from the tax of Lekin" (Gloss. of Reference, s.v.). The same authority explains the term as "li (le, i.e. a cash or तौंद of a tael-money," because of the original rate of levy. The likin is professedly not an imperial customs-duty, but a provincial tax levied by the governors of the provinces, and at their discretion as to amount; hence varying in local rate, and from time to time changeable. This has been a chief difficulty in carrying out the Chefoo Agreement, which as yet has never been authoritatively interpreted or finally ratified by England. [It was ratified in 1886. For the conditions of the Agreement see Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 629 seqq.] We quote the article of the Agreement which deals with opium, which has involved the chief difficulties, as leaving not only the amount to be paid, but the line at which this is to be paid, undefined.

1876.—"Sect. III... (iii). On Opium Sir Thomas Wade will move his Government to sanction an arrangement different from that affecting other imports. British merchants, when opium is brought into port, will be obliged to have it taken cognizance of by the Customs, and deposited in Bond... until such time as there is a sale for it. The importer will then pay the tariff duty upon it, and the purchasers the likin; in order to the prevention of the evasion of the duty. The amount of likin to be collected will be decided by the different Provincial Governments, according to the circumstances of each."—Agreement of Chefoo.

1878.—"La Chine est parsemée d'une infinité de petits bureaux d'octroi échelonnés le long des voies commerciales; les Chinois les nomment Li-kin. C'est la source la plus sure, et la plus productive des revenus."—Ronsse, A Travers la Chine, 221.

LILAC. s. This plant-name is eventually to be identified with anil (q.v.), and with the Skt. nila, 'of a dark colour (especially dark blue or black)'; a fact which might be urged in favour of the view that the ancients in Asia, as has been alleged of them in Europe, belonged to the body of the colour-blind (like the writer of this article). The Indian word takes, in the sense of indigo, in Persian the form लिलांग; in Ar. this, modified into लिलाक and लिलक, is applied to the lilac (Syringa spp.). Marcel Devic says the Ar. adj. lilak has the modified sense 'bleuâtre.' See a remark under BUCKYNE. We may note that in Scotland the 'striving after meaning' gives this familiar and beautiful tree the name among the uneducated of 'lily-oak.'

LIME, s. The fruit of the small Citrus medica, var. acida, Hooker, is that generally called lime in India, approaching as it does very nearly to the fruit of the West India Lime. It is often not much bigger than a pigeon's egg, and one well-known miniature lime of this kind is called by the natives from its thin skin की单位 निम्बा, or 'paper lime.' This seems to bear much the same relation to the lemon that the miniature thin-skinned orange, which in London shops is called Tangerine, bears to the "China orange." But lime is also used with the characterising adjective for the Citrus medica, var. Limetta, Hooker, or Sweet Lime, an insipid fruit.

The word no doubt comes from the Sp. and Port. lima, which is from the Ar. lima; Fr. lime, Pers. lima, limān (see LEMON). But probably it came into English from the Portuguese in India. It is not in Minshew (2nd ed. 1727).

1404.—"And in this land of Guilan snow never falls, so hot is it; and it produces abundance of citrons and limes and oranges (citrus ḍlimaś & varanjas)."—Clavijo, § 1337.

1526.—"Another is the lime (lima), which is very plentiful. Its size is about that of a hen's egg, which it resembles in shape. If one who is poisoned boils and eats its fibres, the injury done by the poison is averted."—Babar, 328.

1563.—"It is a fact that there are some Portuguese so pig-headed that they would rather die than acknowledge that we have here any fruit equal to that of Portugal; but there are many fruits here that bear the bell, as for instance all the fructas de espíno. For the lemons of these parts are so big that they look like citrons, besides being very tender and full of flavour, especially those of Bagaím; whilst the citrons themselves are much better and more tender (than those of Portugal); and the limes (limas) vastly better... ."—García, f. 133.

c. 1630.—"The Ile inricht us with many good things; Buffolles, Goats, Turtle, Hens, huge Batts ... also with Oranges, Lemons, Lymes. . . .—Sir T. Herbert, 28.

1673.—"Here Asparagus flourish, as do Limes, Pomegranates, Genetins. . . ."—Fryer, 110. ("Jannting" from Fr. genêtin, [or, according to Prof. Skeat, for janneeton, a dim. from Fr. pommé de S. Jean.]"

1690.—"The Island (Johanna) abounds with Fowls and Rice, with Poppy, Yams, Plantens, Bonanoes, Potatoes, Oranges, Lemons, Limes, Pine-apples, &c. . . ."—Ovington, 109.

LINGAIT, LINGAYET, LINGUIT, LINGAVANT, LINGADHARI, s. Mahr. Lángé-it, Can. Lingáyata, a member of a Sivait sect in W. and S. India, whose members wear the lingá (see LINGAM) in a small gold or silver box suspended round the neck. The sect was founded in the 12th century by Básava. They are also called Jangama, or Víra Sáiva, and have various subdivisions. [See Nelson, Madura, pt. iii. 48 seq.; Monier Williams, Brahmanism, 88.]

1673.—"At Hubly in this Kingdom are a caste called Linguits, who are buried up-right."—Fryer, 153. This is still their practice.

Lingua is given as the name or title of the King of Columb (see QUILON) in the 14th century, by Friar Jordanus (p. 41), which might have been taken to denote that he belonged to this sect; but this seems never to have had followers in Malabar.

LINGAM, s. This is taken from the S. Indian form of the word, which in N. India is Skt. and Hind. linga, 'a token, badge,' &c., thence the symbol of Siva which is so extensively an object of worship among the Hindus, in the form of a cylinder of stone. The great idol of Somnáth, destroyed by Mahmúd of Ghazni, and the object of so much romantic narrative, was a colossal symbol of this kind. In the quotation of 1838 below, the word is used simply for a badge of caste, which is certainly the original Skt. meaning, but is probably a mistake as attributed in that sense to modern vernacular use. The man may have been a lingait (q.v.), so that his badge was actually a figure of the lingam. But this clever author, hence often gets out of her depth.

1811.—"The stone idols called Ling Mahádeo, which had been a long time established at that place . . . these, up to this time, the kick of the horse of Islam had not attempted to break. . . . Deo Narain fell down, and the other gods who had seats there raised their feet, and jumped so high, that at one leap they reached the foot of Lanka, and in that affright the lingas themselves would have fled, had they had any legs to stand on."—Amir Khwádr, in Elliot, iv. 91.

1816.—". . . above this there is elevated the figure of an idol, which in decency I abstain from naming, but which is called by the heathen Linga, and which they worship with many superstitions; and indeed they regard it to such a degree that the heathen of Canara carry well-wrought images of the kind round their necks. This abominable custom was abolished by a certain Canara King, a man of reason and righteousness."—Couto, Dec. VII. iii. 11.

1726.—"There are also some of them who wear a certain stone idol called Lingam . . . round the neck, or else in the hair of the head. . . ."—Valentijn, Choro. 74.

1781.—"These Pagodas have each a small chamber in the center of twelve feet square, with a lamp hanging over the Lingham."—Hodges, 94.

1799.—"I had often remarked near the banks of the rivulet a number of little altars, with a linga of Mahádeva upon them. It seems they are placed over the ashes of Hindus who have been burnt near the spot."—Gulbrooks, in Life, p. 162.

1809.—"Without was an immense lingam of black stone."—Ed. Valenta, i. 371.

1814.—". . . two respectable Brahmins, a man and his wife, of the secular order; who, having no children, had made several religious pilgrimages, performed the accustomed ceremonies to the linga, and consulted the divines."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 364; [2nd ed. ii. 4; in ii. 164, lingam].

1838.—"In addition to the preaching, Mr. G. got hold of a man's Lingum, or badge of caste, and took it away."—Letters from Madras, 156.

1843.—"The homage was paid to Lingamism. The insult was offered to Mahometanism. Lingamism is not merely idolatry, but idolatry in its most pernicious form."—Macaulay, Speech on Gates of Somnath.

LINGUIST, s. An old word for an interpreter, formerly much used in the East. It long survived in China, and is there perhaps not yet obsolete. Probably adopted from the Port. linguia, used for an interpreter.

1554.—"To a lingua of the factory (at Goa) 2 pardos monthly. . . ."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 63.

1612.—"Did Captain Saris' Linguist attend?"—Dunster, Letters, i. 68.
1700.—"I carried the Linguist into a Merchant's House that was my Acquaintance to consult with that Merchant about removing that Remover, that stop'd the Man of War from entering into the Harbour."—A. Hamilton, iii. 254; [ed. 1744].

1711.—"Linguists require not too much haste, having always five or six to make choice of, never a Barrel the better Herring."—Lockyer, 102.

1760.—"I am sorry to think your Honour should have reason to think, that I have been anyway concerned in that unlucky affair that happened at the Negrain, in the month of October 1759; but give me leave to assure your Honour that I was no further concerned, than as a Linguist for the King's Officer who commanded the Party."—Letter to the Gov. of Fort St. George, from Antonio the Linguist, in Dalrymple, i. 396.

1760-1810.—"If the ten should presume to enter villages, public places, or bazaars, punishment will be inflicted on the linguist who accompanies them."—Regulations at Canton, from The Fancivae at Canton, p. 29.

1852.—"As up to treaty days, neither Consul nor Vice-Consul of a foreign nation was acknowledged, whenever either of these officers made a communication to the Hoppo, it had to be done through the Hong merchants, to whom the dispatch was taken by a Linguist."—The Fancivae at Canton, p. 50.

LIP-LAP, s. A vulgar and disparaging nickname given in the Dutch Indies to Eurasians, and corresponding to Anglo-Indian chee-chee (q.v.). The proper meaning of lip-lap seems to be the uncoagulated pulp of the coco-nut (see Rumphius, bk. 1, ch. 1). [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is not in the dict., but Klinkert gives Jav. lap-lap, 'a dish-clout.'] 1788-71.—"Children born in the Indies are nicknamed liplaps by the Europeans, although both parents may have come from Europe."—Stavrinus, E.T. i. 315.

LISHTEE, LISTEE, s. Hind. visht, English word, 'a list.'

LONG-CLOTH, s. The usual name in India for (white) cotton shirtings, or Lancashire calico; but first applied to the Indian cloth of like kind exported to England, probably because it was made of length unusual in India; cloth for native use being ordinarily made in pieces sufficient only to clothe one person. Or it is just possible that it may have been a corruption or mis-apprehension of lungi (see LOONGHEE). [This latter view is accepted without question by Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Rec., 224), who dates its introduction to Europe about 1675.]

1670.—"We have continued to supply you ... in regard the Dutch do so fully fall in with the Calico trade that they had the last year 50,000 pieces of Long-cloth."—Letter from Court of E.I.C. to Madras, Nov. 9th. In Notes and Eexts., No. i. p. 2.

[1862.—"... for Long cloth brown English 72; Coveds long & 2/3 broad No. 1. ..."—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. Ist ser. i. 40.]

1727.—"Suderass, or Suderass Patam, a small Factory belonging to the Dutch, to buy up long cloth."—A. Hamilton, i. 358; [ed. 1744].

1785.—"The trade of Fort St. David's consists in long cloths of different colours."—Carracchi's Life of Clive, i. 5.

1866.—"Long-cloth, as it is termed, is the material principally worn in the Tropics."—Waring, Tropical Resident, p. 111.

1880.—"A Chinaman is probably the last man in the world to be taken in twice with a fraudulent piece of long-cloth."—Pall Mall Budget, Jan. 9, p. 9.

LONG-DRAWERS, s. This is an old-fashioned equivalent for pyjamas (q.v.). Of late it is confined to the Madras Presidency, and to outfitters' lists. [Mosquito drawers were probably like these.]

[1623.—"They wear a pair of long Drawers of the same Cloth, which cover not only their Thighs, but legs also to the Feet."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 43.]

1711.—"The better sort wear long Drawers, and a piece of Silk, or wrought Callico, thrown loose over the Shoulders."—Lockyer, 57.

1774.—"... gave each private man a frock and long drawers of chintz."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 100.

1780.—"Leroy, one of the French hussars, who had saved me from being cut down by Hyde's horse, gave me some soup, and a shirt, and long drawers, which I had great want of."—Hon. John Lindsay in Lives of the Lindays, iv. 266.

1789.—"It is true that they (the Sycs) wear only a short blue jacket, and blue long draws."—Note by Translator of Seir-Mutaghérin, i. 87.

1810.—"For wear on board ship, pantaloons ... together with as many pair of wove cotton long-drawers, to wear under them."—Williamson, V. M. i. 9.

(See PYJAMAS, MOGUL BREECHES, SHULWAURS, SIRDARS.)
LONG-SHORE WIND, s. A term used in Madras to designate the damp, unpleasant wind that blows in some seasons, especially July to September, from the south.

1837.—"This longshore wind is very disagreeable—a sort of sham sea-breeze blowing from the south; whereas the real sea-breeze blows from the east; it is a regular cheat upon the new-comers, feeling damp and fresh as if it were going to cool one."—Letters from Madras, 73.

LOONTAR, s. The palm leaves used in the Archipelago (as in S. India) for writing on are called lontar-leaves. Filet (No. 5179, p. 209) gives lontar as the Malay name of two palms, viz. Borassus flabelliformis (see PALMYRA, BRAB), and Livistona tundifolia. [See CADJAN.] [Mr. Skeat notes that Klinkert gives—"Lontar, metathesis of Ron-tal, leaf of the tal tree, a fan-palm whose leaves were once used for writing on, borassus flabelliformis." Ron is thus probably equivalent to the Malay dawn, or in some dialects don, 'leaf.' The tree itself is called p'huun (pohun) tar in the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, tar and tal being only variants of the same word. Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 121, gives: "Lontar, a palm, dial. form of dawn tal (tal, Hind.)." (See TODDY.)

LOOCHER, s. This is often used in Anglo-Ind. colloquial for a blackguard libertine, a lewd loafer. It is properly Hind. luchcha, having that sense. Orme seems to have confounded the word, more or less, with latiya (see under Looty). [A rogue in Pandurang Hari (ed. 1873, ii. 168) is Loochajee. The place at Matheran originally called "Louisa Point" has become "Loocha Point!"]

[1829.—"... nothing-to-do loothchas of every sect in Camp..."—Or. Sport. Mag. ed. 1873, i. 121.]

LOONGHEE, s. Hind. lungi, perhaps originally Pers. lung and lunggi; [but Platts connects it with linga]. A scarf or web of cloth to wrap round the body, whether applied as what the French call pagne, i.e. a cloth simply wrapped once or twice round the hips and tucked in at the upper edge, which is the proper Mussulman mode of wearing it; or as a cloth tucked between the legs like a dhoty (q.v.), which is the Hindu mode, and often followed also by Mahommedans in India. The Qanoon-e-Islam further distinguishes between the lunggi and dhoti that the former is a coloured cloth worn as described, and the latter a cloth with only a coloured border, worn by Hindus alone. This explanation must belong to S. India. ["The lungi is really meant to be worn round the waist, and is very generally of a checked pattern, but it is often used as a poggri (see PUGGREGY), more especially that known as the Kohat lungi" (Cookson, Mon. on Punjub Silk, 4). For illustrations of various modes of wearing the garment, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures and Costumes, pl. iii. iv.]

1673.—"The Elder sat in a Row, where the Men and Women came down together to wash, having Lungies about their Wastes only."—Fryer, 101. In the Index, Fryer explains as a "Waste-Clout." 1726.—"Silk Longis with red borders, 160 pieces in a pack, 14 coidos long and 2 broad."—Valentine, v. 178.

1727.—"... For some course chequered Cloth, called Cambaya (see COMBOY), Lungies, made of Cotton-Yarn, the Natives would bring Elephant's Teeth."—A. Hamilton, i. 9; [ed. 1744].

"(In Pegu) "Under the Frock they have a Scarf or Lungee doubled fourfold, made fast about the Middle..."—Ibid. ii. 49.

c. 1760.—"Instead of petticoats they wear what they call a longee, which is simply a long piece of silk or cotton stuff."—Grose, i. 143.

c. 1809-10.—"Many use the Lunggi, a piece of blue cotton cloth, from 5 to 7 cubits long and 2 wide. It is wrapped simply two or three times round the waist, and hangs down to the knee."—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, iii. 102.

LOOT, s. & v. Plunder; Hind. lat, and that from Skt. lotra, for loptrā, root lvp, 'rob, plunder'; [rather lvp, 'to rob']. The word appears in Stockdale's Vocabulary, of 1788, as "Loot—plunder, pillage." It has thus long been a familiar item in the Anglo-Indian colloquial. But between the Chinese War of 1841, the Crimean War (1854-5), and the Indian Mutiny (1857-8), it gradually found acceptance in England also, and is now a recognised constituent of the English Slang Dictionary. Admiral Smyth has it in his Nautical Glossary (1867) thus: "Loot, plunder, or pillage, a term adopted from China."

1845. — St. Francis Xavier in a letter to a friend in Portugal admonishing him from encouraging any friend of his to go to India seems to have the thing Loot in his mind, though of course he does not use the word: "Neminem patiaris amicorum tuorum in Indian cum Praefectura mitti, ad regias pecunias, et negotia tractanda. Nam de illis vere illud scriptum capere licet: 'Delectur de libro viventium et cum justis non scribantur. . . . Invidiam tantum non culpam usus publicus detrahit, dum vix dubitat fieri non maev quod impune fit. 'Unique, semper, rapitur, congeritur, aquirit. Semel captum nunquam redditur. Qvis enumeret artes et nomina, praedarium? Equidem mirari satis nequeo, quot, praeiter usitatos modos, insoliti flexionibus inauspicatam illud rapiendi verbum quaedam avaritiae barbaria conjugat!' — Epistolae, Prague, 1867, Lib. V. Ep. vii.

1842. — I believe I have already told you that I did not take any loot — the Indian word for plunder — so that I have nothing of that kind, to which so many in this expedition helped themselves so bountifully. — Colin Campbell to his Sister, in L. of Ed. Clyde, i. 120.

"In the Sangor district the plunderers are beaten whenever they are caught, but there is a good deal of burning and 'looting,' as they call it." — Indian Administration of Ld. Ellenborough. To the D. of Wellington, May 17, p. 194.

1847. — "Went to see Marshal Soult's pictures which he looted in Spain. There are many Murillos, all beautiful." — Ed. Matneshury, Mem. of an Ex-Minister, i. 192.

1858. — "There is a word called 'loot,' which gives, unfortunately, a venial character to what would in common English be styled robbery." — Ed. Blygin, Letters and Journals, 215.

1860. — "Loot, swag or plunder." — Slang Dict. s.v.

1864. — "When I mentioned the 'looting' of villages in 1845, the word was printed in italics as little known. Unhappily it requires no distinction now, custom having rendered it rather common of late." — Admiral W. H. Smyth, Synopses, p. 52.

1875. — "It was the Colonel Sahib who carried off the loot." — The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

1876. — "Public servants (in Turkey) have vied with one another in a system of universal loot." — Blackwood's Mag. No. cxix. p. 115.

1878. — "The city (Hongkong) is now pillaged night and day by strong parties of marines and Sikhs, for both the disposition to loot and the facilities for looting are very great." — Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 34.

1883. — "Loot" is a word of Eastern origin, and for a couple of centuries past . . . the looting of Delhi has been the day-dream of the most patriotic among the Sikh race." — Bos. Smith's Life of Ld. Lawrence, ii. 245.

"At Ta li fu . . . a year or two ago, a fire, supposed to be an act of incendiarism, broke out among the Tibetan encampments which were then looted by the Chinese." — Official Memo. on Chinese Trade with Tibet, 1858.

LOOTY, LOOTIEWALLA, s.

1757. — A body of their Louchees (see LOUCHER) or plunderers, who are armed with clubs, passed into the Company's territory."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 120.

1782. — "Even the rascally Looty wallahs, or Mysorean hussars, who had just before been meditating a general desertion to us, now pressed upon our flanks and rear." — Munro's Narrative, 295.

1792. — "The Colonel found him as much dismayed as if he had been surrounded by the whole Austrian army, and busy in placing an ambuscade to catch about six looties." — Letter of T. Munro, in Life.

"This body (horse plunderers round Madras) had been branded generally by the name of Looties, but they had some little title to a better appellation, for they were not guilt of those sanguinary and inhuman deeds. . . ." — Madras Courier, Jan. 26.

1793. — "A party was immediately sent, who released 27 half-starved wretches in heavy irons; among them was Mr. Randal Cadman, a midshipman taken 10 years before by Suffrein. The remainder were private soldiers; some of whom had been taken by the Looties; others were deserters. . . ." — Dirom's Narrative, p. 157.

b. A different word is the Ar.—Pers. lutfi, bearing a worse meaning, 'one of the people of Lot,' and more generally 'a blackguard.'

[1824. — "They were singing, dancing, and making the lutfi all the livelong day." — Hajji Baba, ed. 1851, p. 444.

[1888. — The Lootis, who wandered from town to town with monkeys and other animals, taught them to cast earth upon their heads (a sign of the deepest grief among Asiatics) when they were asked whether they would be governors of Balkh or Akkhech." — Ferrier, H. of the Afghans, 101.

[1888. — Monkeys and baboons are kept and trained by the Lutis, or professional
The people of Shiraz are noted for a fondness for jingling phrases, common enough among many Asians, including the people of India, where one constantly hears one's servants speak of chawki-auki (for chairs and tables), naukar-chakar (where both are however real words), 'servants,' lakrį-dkį, 'sticks and staves,' and so forth. Regarding this Mr. Wills tells a story (Modern Persia, p. 239). The late Minister, Kawām-ud-Daulat, a Shirāzi, was asked by the Shāh:

"Why is it, Kawām, that you Shirāzis always talk of Kabob-mabob and so on? You always add a nonsense-word; is it for euphony?"

"Oh, Asylum of the Universe, may I be your sacrifice! No respectable person in Shirāz does so, only the lītī-pūtī says it!"

LOQUOT, LOQUAT. s. A sub-acid fruit, a native of China and Japan, which has been naturalised in India and in Southern Europe. In Italy it is called nespula giapponese (Japan medlar). It is Eriobotrya japonica, Lindl. The name is that used in S. China, lu-kīh, pron. at Canton lu-kwat, and meaning 'rush-orange.' Elsewhere in China it is called pi-pa.

1821.-"The Lacott, a Chinese fruit, not unlike a plum, was produced also in great plenty (at Bangalore); it is sweet when ripe, and both used for tarts, and eaten as dessert."—Boole, Missions in Madras and Myssore, 2nd ed. 159.

1878.-"... the yellow loquat, pech-skinned and pleasant, but prodigal of stones."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49.

1880.-"A loquat tree in full fruit is probably a sight never seen in England before, but the phenomenon is now on view at Richmond. (This was in the garden of Lady Parker at Stawell House.) We are told that it has a fine crop of fruit, comprising about a dozen bunches, each bunch being of eight or ten beautiful berries. ..."—Newspaper cutting (source lost).

LORCHA, s. A small kind of vessel used in the China coasting trade. Giles explains it as having a hull of European build, but the masts and sails Chinese fashion, generally with a European skipper and a Chinese crew. The word is said to have been introduced by the Portuguese from S. America (Giles, 81). But Pinto’s passage shows how early the word was used in the China seas, a fact which throws doubt on that view. [Other suggestions are that it is Chinese low-chuen, a sort of fighting ship, or Port. lanceha, our launch (2 N. & Q. iii. 217, 236).]

1540.—"Now because the Lorch (lorco), wherein Antonio de Faria came from Patana leaked very much, he commanded all his soldiers to pass into another better vessel ... and arriving at a River that about evening we found towards the East, he cast anchor a league out at Sea, by reason his Junk ... drew much water, so that fearing the Sands ... he sent Christovam Borracho with 14 Soldiers in the Lorch up the River. ..."—Pinto (orig. cap. xii.), Cogan, p. 50.

" Có isto nos partemos deste lugar de Laito muyto embandeirados, com as gávias toldadas de paños de seda, et os juncos e lorchas có duas ordens de pavées por banda."—Pinto, ch. lviii. i.e. "And so we started from Laito all dressed out, the tops draped with silk, and the junk and lorchas with two tiers of banners on each side.”

1613.—"And they use smaller vessels called lorchas and ljolyo (!), and these never use more than 2 oars on each side, which serve both for rudders and oars in the river traffic."—Godinho de Erespond, t. 28v.

1856.—"... Mr. Parkes reported to his superior, Sir John Bowring, at Hong Kong, the facts in connexion with an outrage which had been committed on a British-owned lorch at Canton. The lorch 'Arrow,' employed in the river trade between Canton and the mouth of the river, commanded by an English captain and flying an English flag, had been boarded by a party of Mandarins and their escort while at anchor near Dutch Folly."—Boutley, H. of China, 1854, iii. 396.

LORY, s. A name given to various brilliantly-coloured varieties of parrot, which are found in the Moluccas and other islands of the Archipelago. The word is a corruption of the Malay nārī, ‘a parrot’; but the corruption seems not to be very old, as Fryer retains the correct form. Perhaps it came through the French (see Lullier below). [Mr. Skeat writes: "Lūrī is hardly a corruption of nārī; it is rather a parallel form. The two forms appear in different dialects. Nārī may have been first introduced, and lūrī may be some dialectic form of it." The first quotation shows that lories were imported into S. India as early as the 14th century. They are still imported thither, where they are called in the vernacular by a name signifying 'Five-coloured parrots.' [Can. panchavarnagini.]"
Indian application; but natives also extend it to the spherical pipkins of earthenware (see CHATTY or GHURRA.)

1810.—"... a lootah, or brass water vessel." —Williamson, V. M. ii. 284.

LOTE, s. Mod. Hind. lot, being a corruption of Eng. 'note.' A bank-note; sometimes called banklot.

LOTOO, s. Burm. Hlweat-d'ha, 'Royal Court or Hall'; the Chief Council of State in Burma, composed nominally of four Wungyi's (see WOON) or Chief Ministers. Its name designates more properly the place of meeting; compare Star-Chamber.

1792.—"... in capital cases he transmits the evidence in writing, with his opinion, to the Lotoo, or grand chamber of consultation, where the council of state assembles...." —Symes, 307.

1819.—"The first and most respectable of the tribunals is the Lutto, comprised of four presidents called Wungyi, who are chosen by the sovereign from the oldest and most experienced Mandarins, of four assistants, and a great chancery." —Sangermano, 164.

1827.—"Every royal edict requires by law, or rather by usage, the sanction of this council: indeed, the King's name never appears in any edict or proclamation, the acts of the Lut-d'hau being in fact considered his acts." —Crawford's Journal, 401.

LOTEA, LOYTIA, &c. s. A Chinese title of respect, used by the older writers on China for a Chinese official, much as we still use mandarin. It is now so obsolete that Giles, we see, omits it. "It would almost seem certain that this is the word given as follows in C. C. Baldwin's Manual of the Foochow Dialect: 'Lo-tia.' (in Mandarin Lao-tye) a general apppellative used for an officer. It means 'Venerable Father' (p. 215). In the Court dialect Ta-lao-yé, 'Great Venerable Father' is the apppellative used for any officer, up to the 4th rank. The yo of this expression is quite different from the tyé or tia of the former" (Note by M. Terrien de la Couverprie). Mr. Baber, after giving the same explanation from Carstairs Douglas's Amoy Dict., adds: 'It would seem ludicrous to a Pekingese. Certain local functionaries (Prefects, Magistrates, &c.) are, however, universally known in China as Fu-mu-kwan, 'Parental Officers' (lit. 'Father-und-Mother Officers’) and it is very likely that the expression ‘Old Papa’ is intended to convey the same idea of paternal government."

c. 1560.—“Everyone that in China hath any office, command, or dignity by the King, is called Louthia, which is to say with us Señor.”—Gaspar da Cruz, in Parachus, iii. 169.

"...I shall have occasion to speak of a certain Order of gentlemen that are called Loutsea; I will first therefor expound what this word signifies. Loutsea is as much as to say in our language as Sir..."—Galeotto Peregra, by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii.; [ed. 1810, ii. 548].

1585.—“And although all the King’s officers and justices of what sort of administration they are, be generally called by the name of Loytia; yet euerie one hath a speciall and a particular name besides, according vnto his office.”—Mendoza, tr. by R. Parke, ii. 101.

1598.—“Not any Man in China is esteemed or accounted of, for his birth, family, or riches, but only for his learning and knowledge, such as they that serve at every town, and have the government of the same. They are called Loitias and Manderijns.”—Linschoten, 39; [Hak. Soc. i. 133].

1618.—“The China Capt. had letters this day per way of Xaxma (see SATSUMA) that the letters I sent are received by the noblemen in China in good parte, and a mandarin, or loytea, appointed to com for Japon.”—Cocks, Diary, ii. 44.

1681.—“They call...the lords and gentlemen Loityas...”—Martines de la Puente, Compendio, 26.

LOVE-BIRD, s. The bird to which this name is applied in Bengal is the pretty little lori-keet, Loriculus vernalis, Sparrman, called in Hind. latkan or ‘pendant,’ because of its quaint habit of sleeping suspended by the claws, head downwards.

LUBBEY, LUBBEE, s. [Tel. Labbi, Tam. Ilappas]; according to C. P. Brown and the Madras Gloss. a Dravidian corruption of 'Arabi.' A name given in S. India to a race, Musulmans in creed, but speaking Tamil, supposed to be, like the Moplahs of the west coast, the descendants of Arab emigrants by inter-marriage with native women. "There are few classes of natives in S. India, who in energy, industry, and perseverance, can compete with the Lubbay;" they often, as pedlars, go about selling beads, precious stones, &c.

1810.—“Some of these (early emigrants from Kufa) landed on that part of the Western coast of India called the Conan; the others to the eastward of C. Comorin; the descendants of the former are the Nevayets; of the latter the Lubbe, a name probably given to them by the natives, from that Arabic particle (a modification of Lubbeh) corresponding with the English here I am, indicating attention on being spoken to. The Lubbe pretend to one common origin with the Nevayets, and attribute their black complexion to inter-marriage with the natives, but the Nevayets affirm that the Lubbe are the descendants of their domestic slaves, and there is certainly in the physiognomy of this very numerous class, and in their stature and form, a strong resemblance to the natives of Abyssinia.”—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, i. 243.

1836.—“Mr. Boyd...describes the Moors under the name of Choolia (see CHOLILA); and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation of Lubbes. These epithets are however not admissible; for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter, to the priests who officiate in their temples; and also as an honorary affidavit to the proper names of some of their chief men.”—Simon Castie Chitty on the Moors of Ceylon, in J.R. As. Soc. iii. 338.

1888.—“The Lubbes are a curious caste, said by some to be the descendants of Hindus forcibly converted to the Mahometan faith some centuries ago. It seems most probable, however, that they are of mixed blood. They are, comparatively, a fine strong active race, and generally contrive to keep themselves in easy circumstances. Many of them live by traffic. Many are smiths, and do excellent work as such. Others are fishermen, boatmen and the like. . . .”—Nelson, Madura Manual, Pt. ii. 86.

1889.—In a paper by Dr. Shortt it is stated that the Lubbays are found in large numbers on the East Coast of the Peninsula, between Pulicat and Negapatam. Their headquarters are at Nagore, the burial place of their patron saint Nagori Mir Sahib. They excel as merchants, owing to their energy and industry.—In Trans. Edin. Soc. of London, N.S. vii. 198-190.

LUCKERBAUG, s. Hind. lakrā, lagrā, larkabarbaghā, lagkarbaghā, ‘a hyena.’ The form larkabarbaghā is not in the older dictis, but is given by Platts. It is familiar in Upper India, and it occurs in Hickey’s Bengal Gazette, June 24, 1781. In some parts the name is applied to the leopard, as the extract from Buchanan shows. This is the case among the Hindi-speaking people of the Himalaya also (see Jerdon). It is not clear what the etymology of the name is, lakrā, lakrā meaning in their everyday sense, a stick or piece of timber. But both in Hind. and Mahr., in an adjective form, the word is used for 'stiff, gaunt, emaciated,' and this may be the sense in which it is applied to the hyena. [More probably the name refers to the bar-like stripes on the animal.] Another name is harvāgh, or (approximately) 'bone-tiger,' from its habit of gnawing bones.

c. 1809.—"It was said not to be uncommon in the southern parts of the district (Bhagalpur) ... but though I have offered ample rewards, I have not been able to procure a specimen, dead or alive; and the leopard is called at Munger Lakravagh."

"The hyena or Lakravagh in this district has acquired an uncommon degree of ferocity."—F. Buchanan, Eastern India, iii. 142-3.

[1849.—"The man seized his gun and shot the hyena, but the lakkabakka 'got off.'"—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, i. 162.]

LUCKNOW, n.p. Properly Lakhnau; the well-known capital of the Nawabs and Kings of Oudh, and the residence of the Chief Commissioner of that British Province, till the office was united to that of the Lient.-Governor of the N.W. Provinces in 1877. [The name appears to be a corruption of the ancient Lakshmanavatī, founded by Lakshmana, brother of Rāmāchandra of Ayodhya.]

1528.—"On Saturday the 28th of the latter Jemādī, I reached Luknow; and having surveyed it, passed the river Gûmti and encamped."—Baber, p. 381.

[c. 1590.—"Luknow is a large city on the banks of the Gûmti, delightful in its surroundings."—Āin, ed. Jarrett, i. 173.]

1663.—"In Agra the Hollanders have also an House. ... Formerly they had a good trade there in selling Scarlet ... as also in buying those cloths of Jelapour and Lakhnau, at 7 or 8 days journey from Agra, where they also keep an house. ... "—Bernier, E.T. 94; [ed. Constable, 292, who identifies Jelapower with Jalālpur-Nāhir in the Fyzâbâd district.]

LUDDOO, s. H. lâddû. A common native sweetmeat, consisting of balls of sugar and ghee, mixt with wheat and grain flour, and with coconut kernel rasped.

[1826.—"My friends ... called me boor ke luddoo, or the great man's sport."—Pundarang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 197.]

[1828.—"When at large we cannot even get rabri (porridge), but in prison we eat ladoo (a sweetmeat)."—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 185.]

LUUGOW, TO, v. This is one of those imperatives transformed, in Anglo-Indian jargon, into infinitives, which are referred to under BUNOW, PUCKEROW. H. inf. logā-na, imperative logā-o. The meanings of logāna, as given by Shakespear, are:

"to apply, close, attach, join, fix, affix, ascribe, impose, lay, add, place, put, plant, set, shut, spread, fasten, connect, plaster, put to work, employ, engage, use, impute, report anything in the way of scandal or malice"— in which long list he has omitted one of the most common uses of the verb, in its Anglo-Indian form lagow, which is "to lay a boat alongside the shore or wharf, to moor." The fact is that lagāna is the active form of the neuter verb lag-nd, 'to touch, lie, to be in contact with,' and used in all the neuter senses of which lagāna expresses the transitive senses. Besides neuter lagā, active lagānā, we have a secondary casual verb, lagwarīnā, 'to cause to apply,' &c. Lagānā, lagānā are presumably the same words as our lie, and lay, A.-S. liegen, and liegen, mod. Germ. liegen and legen. And the meaning 'lay' underlies all the senses which Shakespear gives of lagā-na. [See Skeat, Concise Etym. Dict. s.v. lie.]

LUMBERDAR, s. Hind. lumbardar, a word formed from the English word 'number' with the Pers. termination -dār, and meaning properly 'the man who is registered by a number.' "The registered representative of a coparcenary community, who is responsible for Government revenue." (Carneigy). "The cultivator who, either on his own account or as the representative of other members of the village, pays the Government dues and is registered in the Collector's Roll according to his number; as the representative of the rest he may hold the office by descent or by election." (Wilson).

by Hindus, and identified with the monkey-god Hanumān. The genus is PresbyteS, Illiger, of which several species are now discriminated, but the differences are small. [See Blanford, Mammalia, 27, who classes the Langūr as Semnopithecus entellus.] The animal is well described by Aelian in the following quotation, which will recall to many what they have witnessed in the suburbs of Benares and other great Hindu cities. The Langūr of the Prassi is P. Entellus.

c. 250.—"Among the Prassi of India they say that there exists a kind of ape with human intelligence. These animals seem to be about the size of Hycranian dogs. Their front hair looks all grown together, and any one ignorant of the truth would say that it was dressed artificially. The beard is like that of a satyr, and the tail strong like that of a lion. All the rest of the body is white, but the head and the tail are red. These creatures are tame and gentle in character, but by race and manner of life they are wild. They go about in crowds in the suburbs of Latāgē (now Latagē is a city of the Indians) and eat the boiled rice that is put out for them by the King's order. Every day their dinner is elegantly set out. Having eaten their fill it is said that they return to their parents in the woods in an orderly manner, and never hurt anybody that they meet by the way."—Aelian, De Nat. Animal. xvi. 10.

1825.—"An alarm was given by one of the sentries in consequence of a baboon howling near his post. The character of the intruder was, however, soon detected by one of the Suwarrs, who on the Sepoy's repeating his exclamation of the broken English 'Who goes there?' said with a laugh, 'Why do you challenge the lungoor? he cannot answer you.'—Heber, ii. 85.

1859.—"I found myself in immediate proximity to a sort of parliament or general assembly of the largest and most human-like monkeys I had ever seen. There were at least 200 of them, great lungoors, some quite four feet high, the jetty black of their faces enhanced by a fringe of snowy whisker."—Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 49.

1884.—"Less interesting personally than the gibbon, but an animal of very developed social instincts, is Semnopithecus entellus, otherwise the Bengal langur. (He) fights for his wives according to a custom not unheard of in other cases; but what is peculiar to him is that the vanquished males receive charge of all the young ones of their own sex, with whom they retire to some neighbouring jungle. Schoolmasters and private tutors will read this with interest, as showing the origin and early disabilities of their profession."—Saturday Rev., May 31, on Sterndale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

LUNGOOTY, s. Hind. langoty. The original application of this word seems to be the scantiest modicum of covering worn for decency by some of the lower classes when at work, and tied before and behind by a string round the waist; but it is sometimes applied to the more ample dhoti (see DHOY). According to R. Drummond, in Guzerat the "Langoth or Lungota" (as he writes) is "a pretty broad piece of cotton cloth, tied round the breech by men and boys bathing. . . . The diminutive is Langotee, a long slip of cloth, stitched to a loin band of the same stuff, and forming exactly the T bandage of English Surgeons. . . ." This distinction is probably originally correct, and the use of-languta by Abdurrazzik would agree with it. The use of the word has spread to some of the Indo-Chinese countries. In the quotation from Mocquet it is applied in speaking of an American Indian near the R. Amnat. But the writer had been in India.

c. 1422.—"The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked; they wear only bandages round the middle called lankoutah, which descend from the navel to above the knee."—Abdurrazzik, in India in XV. Cent. 17.

1526.—"Their peasants and the lower classes all go about naked. They tie on a thing which they call a langoti, which is a piece of clout that hangs down two spans from the navel, as a cover to their nakedness. Below this pendant modesty-clout is another slip of cloth, one end of which they fasten before to a string that ties on the langoti, and then passing the slip of cloth between the two legs, bring it up and fix it to the string of the langoti behind."—Baber, 333.

c. 1608.—"Leur capitaine anoit fort bonne façon, encore qu'il fuss tout nud et luy seul anoit vn langoutin, qui est vne petite pièce de coton peinte."—Moquet, 77.

"They wear nothing but the langoty, which is a string round the loins, and a piece of cloth about a hand's breadth fastened to it in front."—(Ref. lost), p. 26.
LUNKA, n.p. Skt. Laṅka. The oldest name of Ceylon in the literature both of Buddhism and Brahmanism. Also ‘an island’ in general.

—, s. A kind of strong cheroot much prized in the Madras Presidency, and so called from being made of tobacco grown in the ‘islands’ (the local term for which is laṅka) of the Godavery Delta.

M

dwand ’! ‘You, my Lord, are my mother and father!’ This is an address from a native, seeking assistance, or begging release from a penalty, or reluctant to obey an order, which the young sāhīb hears at first with astonishment, but soon as a matter of course.

MABAR, n.p. The name given in the Middle Ages by the Arabs to that coast of India which we call Coromandel. The word is Ar. ma’bar, ‘the ferry or crossing-place.’ It is not clear how the name came to be applied, whether because the Arab vessels habitually touched at its ports, or because it was the place of crossing to Ceylon, or lastly whether it was not an attempt to give meaning to some native name. [The Madras Gloss, says it was so called because it was the place of crossing from Madura to Ceylon; also see Logan, Malabar, i. 280.] We know no occurrence of the term earlier than that which we give from Abdallatif.

c. 1203. — ‘I saw in the hands of an Indian trader very beautiful mats, finely woven and painted on both sides with most pleasing colours. . . . The merchant told me . . . that these mats were woven of the Indian plantain . . . and that they sold in Mabar for two dinars a piece.’—Abd-Allatif, Relation de l’Egypte, p. 31.

1279-1322. — In M. Panther’s notes on Marco Polo very curious notices are extracted from Chinese official annals regarding the communications, in the time of Kublai Kaan, between that Emperor and Indian States, including Ma-pa-rh.—(See pp. 600-605).

c. 1292. — ‘When you leave the Island of Seilan and sail westward about 60 miles, you come to the great province of Maabar, which is styled India the Greater: it is the best of all the Indies, and is on the mainland.’—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 18.

c. 1300. — ‘The merchants export from Maabar silk, taffeta, silken stuffs, aromatic roots; large pearls are brought from the sea. The productions of this country are carried to Irāk, Khurasan, Syria, Russia and Europe.’—Rashdul-ddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1303. — ‘In the beginning of this year (703 H.), the Malik-‘Azam, Takiī-d-dīn . . . departed from the country of Hind to the passage (ma’bar) of corruption. The King of Maabar was anxious to obtain his property and wealth, but Malik Mu’azzam Sirāj-d-dīn, son of the deceased, having secured his goodwill, by the payment of 200,000 dinārs, not only obtained the wealth, but rank also of his father.’—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 45.

1310. — ‘The country of Maabar, which is so distant from Dehli that a man travelling with all expedition could only reach it after a journey of 12 months, there the arrow of any holy warrior had not yet reached.’—Amīr Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 85.

c. 1390. — ‘The third part (of India) is Maabar, which begins some three or four days journey to the eastward of Kaulam; this territory lies to the east of Malabar. . . . It is stated that the territory Maabar begins at the Cape Kumhāri, a name which applies both to a mountain and a city. . . . By the word Kaulam is the residence of the Prince of Maabar, for whom horses are imported from foreign countries.’—Abulfeda, in Gilde-meister, p. 185. We regret to see that M. Guyard, in his welcome completion of Reinanda’s translation of Abulfeda, absolutely, in some places, substitutes “Coromandel” for “Maabar.” It is French fashion, but a bad one.

a. The name applied by the Portuguese to the small peninsula and the city built on it, near the mouth of Canton River, which they have occupied since 1557. The place is called by the Chinese Nyao-mān (Nyao, ‘bay or inlet,’ Mān, ‘gates’). The Portuguese name is alleged to be taken from A-mā-ngao, ‘the Bay of Ama,’ i.e. of the Mother, the so-called MACAO.

Queen of Heaven,' a patroness of seamen. And indeed Amacao is an old form often met with.

c. 1567.—"Hanno i Portoghesi fatta vna picciola cittad in vna Isola vicina a' i liti della China chiamato Machao... ma i dati sono del Rè della China, e vanno a pagarsi a Canton, bellissima cittad, e di grande importanza, distante da Machao due giorni e mezzo." — Cesare de' Federici, in Ramosio, iii. 391.

c. 1570.—"On the fifth day of our voyage it pleased God that we arrived at... Lampacau, where, at that time the Portugals exercised their commerce with the Chineses, which continued till the year 1557, when the Mandarin of Canton, at the request of the Merchants of that Country, gave us the port of Macao, where the trade now is; of which place (that was but a desert Island before) our countrymen made a very goodly plantation, wherein there were houses worth three or four thousand Duckats, together with a Cathedral Church..." — Pinto, in Capita, p. 315.

1584.—"There was in Machao a religious man of the order of the barefoote friars of St. Francis, who understanding the great and good desire of this king, did send him by certaine Portuguese merchants... a cloth whereon was painted the day of judgement and hell, and that by an excellent workman." — Mendoza, p. 394.

1585.—"They came to Amacao, in July, 1585. At the same time it seasonably hapned that Linsilvan was commanded from the court to procure of the Strangers at Amacao, certaine goodly feathers for the King." — From the Jesuit Accounts, in Purchas, iii. 330.

1599... "Amacao." See under MONSOON.

1602.—"Being come, as heretofore I wrote your Worship, to Macao a city of the Portugals, adjoyning to the firme land of China, where there is a Collège of our Company." — Letter from Diego de Pontao, in Purchas, iii. 350.

[1611.—"There came a Jesuit from a place called Langasack (see LANGASAOE) which place the Carrack of Amakau yearly was wont to come." — Dunyver, Letters, i. 146.]

1615.—"He adviseth me that 4 juncks are arrived at Langasaque from Chanchew, which, with this ship from Amacau, will cause all matters to be sound chepe." — Cocke's Diary, p. 35.

1625.—"That course continued divers yerees till the Chinois growing lesse fearefull, granted them in the greater land a little Peninsula to dwell in. In that place was an Idoll, which still remained to be scene, called Ama, whence the Peninsula was called Amacao, that is Amas Bay." — Purchas, iii. 315.

b. MACAO, MACCAO, was also the name of a place on the Pegu River which was the port of the city so called in the day of its greatnes. A village of the name still exists at the spot.

1554.—"The baar (see BAHAR) of Macao contains 120 bichas, each biça 100 ticals (q.v.)..." — A. Nunes, p. 39.

1568.—"Si fa commodamente il viaggio sino a Maccao distante da Pegu dodeci miglia, e qui si sbarca." — Ces. Federici, in Ramosio, iii. 395.

MACAREO, s. A term applied by old voyagers to the phenomenon of the bore, or great tidal wave as seen especially in the Gulf of Cambay, and in the Sitang Estuary in Pegu. The word is used by them as if it were an Oriental word. At one time we were disposed to think it might be the Skt. word makara, which is applied to a mythological sea-monster, and to the Zodiacal sign Capricorn. This might easily have had a mythological association with the furious phenomenon in question, and several of the names given to it in various parts of the world seem due to associations of a similar kind. Thus the old English word Oegir or Eagre for the bore on the Severn, which occurs in Drayton, "seems to be a reminiscence of the old Scandinavian deity Oegir, the god of the stormy sea."* [This theory is rejected by N.E.D. s.v. Eagre.] One of the Hindi names for the phenomenon is Mendha, 'The Ram'; whilst in modern Guzerat, according to R. Drummond, the natives call it ghord, "likening it to the war horse, or a squadron of them."† But nothing could illustrate the naturalness of such a figure as makara, applied to the bore, better than the following paragraph in the review-article just quoted (p. 401), which was evidently penned without any allusion to or suggestion of such an origin of the name, and which indeed makes no reference to the Indian name, but only to the French names of which we shall presently speak:

"Compared with what it used to be, if old descriptions may be trusted, the Mascaret is now stripped of its terrors. It resembles the great nature-force which used to ravage the valley of the Seine, like one of the mythical dragons which, as legends tell, laid whole districts waste, about as much as a lion confined in a cage resembles the free monarch of the African wilderness."

Take also the following:

1885.—"Here at his mouth Father Meghna is 20 miles broad, with islands on his breast as large as English counties, and a great tidal bore which made a daily and ever-varying excitement. . . In deep water, it passed merely as a large rolling bellow; but in the shallows it rushed along, roaring like a crested and devouring monster, before which no small craft could live."—It. Col. T. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, 161-162.

But unfortunately we can find no evidence of the designation of the phenomenon in India by the name of makara or the like; whilst both mascaret (as indicated in the quotation just made) and macrée are found in French as terms for the bore. Both terms appear to belong properly to the Garonne, though mascaret has of late began on the Seine to supplant the old term barre, which is evidently the same as our bore. [The N.E.D. suggests O. N. bāra, 'wave.'] Littré can suggest no etymology for mascaret; he mentions a whimsical one which connects the word with a place on the Garrone called St. Maccaire, but only to reject it. There would be no impossibility in the transfer of an Indian word of this kind to France, any more than in the other alternative of a transfer of a French term to India in such a way that in the 16th century visitors to that country should have regarded it as an indigenous word, if we had but evidence of its Indian existence. The date of Littré's earliest quotation, which we borrow below, is also unfavourable to the probability of transplantation from India. There remains the possibility that the word is Basque. The Saturday Reviewer already quoted says that he could find nothing approaching to Mascaret in a Basque French Dict., but this hardly seems final.

The vast rapidity of the flood-tide in the Gulf of Cambay is mentioned by Mas'ūdi, who witnessed it in the year H. 303 (A.D. 915) i. 255; also less precisely by Ibn Batutta (iv. 60). There is a paper on it in the Bo. Govt. Selections, N.S. No. xxvi., from which it appears that the bore wave reaches a velocity of 10½ knots. [See also Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd. ed. i. 313.]

1558.—"In which time there came hither (to Diu) a concourse of many vessels from the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and all the coast of Arabia and India, so that the places within the Gulf of Cambaya, which had become rich and noble by trade, were by this port undone. And this because it stood outside of the Macareos of the Gulf of Cambaya, which were the cause of the loss of many ships."—Barros, II. ii. cap 9.

1568.—"These Sholds (G. of Cambay) are an hundred and four-score miles about in a straight or guifo, which they call Macareo (Maccareo in orig.) which is as much as to say a race of a Tide."—Master C. Frederick, Hist. ii. 342; [and comp. ii. 362].

1583.—"And having sailed until the 23d of the said month, we found ourselves in the neighbourhood of the Macareo (of Martaban) which is the most marvellous thing that ever was heard of in the way of tides, and high waters. . . The water in the channel rises to the height of a high tree, and then the boat is set to face it, waiting for the fury of the tide, which comes on with such violence that the noise is that of a great earthquake, insomuch that the boat is soused from stem to stern, and carried by that impulse swiftly up the channel."—Gasparo Balbi, ff. 91v, 92.

1644.—"Thence to the Gulf of Cambaya with the impetuosity of the currents which are called Macareo, of whose furious strange things are told, insomuch that a stone thrown with force from the hand even in the first speed of its projection does not move more swiftly than those waters run."—Bocarro, MS.

1727.—"A Body of Waters comes rolling in on the Sand, whose Front is above two Fathoms high, and whatever Body lies in its Way it overturns, and no Ship can evade its Force, but in a Moment is overturned, this violent Boer the Natives called a Macarea."—A. Hamilton, ii. 33; [ed. 1744, ii. 32].

1811.—Solvyns uses the word Macrée as French for 'Bore,' and in English describes..."
his print as "... the representation of a phenomenon of Nature, the Macrée or tide, at the mouth of the river Oungly."—Les Hindous, iii.

MACASSAR, n.p. In Malay Many-kasar, properly the name of a people of Celebes (q.v.), but now the name of a Dutch seaport and seat of Government on the W. coast of the S.W. peninsula of that spider-like island. The last quotation refers to a time when we occupied the place, an episode of Anglo-Indian history almost forgotten.

[1610.—"Celebes or Makassar, wherein are spent and uttered these wares following."

[1604-5.—"... and anon to Gresham College, where, among other good discourse, there was tried the great poison of Maccassa upon a dogg, but it had no effect all the time we sat there."—Popps, Diary, March 15; ed. Wheadley, iv. 372.]

1816.—"Letters from Macassar of the 20th and 27th of June (1815), communicate the melancholy intelligence of the death of Lieut. T. C. Jackson, of the 1st Regt. of Native Bengal Infantry, and Assistant Resident of Macassar, during an attack on a fortified village, dependent on the dethroned Raja of Boni."—As. Journal, i. 297.

a. The crimson net-like mantle, which envelops the hard outer shell of the nutmeg, when separated and dried constitutes the mace of commerce. Hanbury and Flückiger are satisfied that the attempt to identify the Maccir, Macer, &c., of Pliny and other ancients with mace is a mistake, as indeed the sagacious Garcia also pointed out, and Chr. Acosta still more precisely. The name does not seem to be mentioned by Mas'ud; it is not in the list of aromatics, 25 in number, which he details (i. 367). It is mentioned by Edrisi, who wrote c. 1150, and whose information generally was of much older date, though we do not know what word he uses. The fact that nutmeg and mace are the product of one plant seems to have led to the fiction that clove and cinnamon also came from that same plant. It is, however, true that a kind of aromatic bark was known in the Arab pharmacopoeia of the Middle Ages under the name of kirfat-al-karanful or 'bark of clove,' which may have been either a cause of the mistake or a part of it. The mistake in question, in one form or another, prevailed for centuries. One of the authors of this book was asked many years ago by a respectable Mahommedan of Delhi if it were not the case that cinnamon, clove, and nutmeg were the produce of one tree. The prevalence of the mistake in Europe is shown by the fact that it is contradicted in a work of the 16th century (Bodtei, Comment. in Theophrastum, 992); and by the quotation from Funnel.

The name mace may have come from the Ar. basbasa, possibly in some confusion with the ancient maccir. [See Skeat, Concise Dict. who gives F. macis, which was confused with M. F. macer, probably Lat. macer, macir, doubtless of Eastern origin.]

c. 1150.—"On its shores (i.e. of the sea of Sanf or Champa), are the dominions of a King called Mihraj, who possesses a great number of populous and fertile islands, covered with fields and pastures, and produ-ding ivory, camphor, nutmeg, mace, clove, aloeswood, cardamom, cubeb, &c."—Edrisi, i. 89; see also 51.

c. 1347.—"The fruit of the clove is the nutmeg, which we know as the scented nut. The flower which grows upon it is the mace (basbasa). And this is what I have seen with my own eyes."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 243.

c. 1370.—"A great Yle and great Contree, that men clepen Java... There growen alle manere of Specerie more plentifully liche than in any other contree, as of Gyngever, Clowegeytlofes, Canelle, Zedewalle, Notemuges and Maces. And wythe the wel, that the Notemuge bereth the Maces. For righte as the Note of the Haselle hath an Husk withouten, that the Note is closed in, til it be ripe, and after falleth out; righte so it is of the Notemuge and of the Maces."—Sir John Mandeville, ed. 1866, p. 187-188.

This is a remarkable passage for it is interpolated by Mandeville, from superior information, in what he is borrowing from Odorie. The comparison to the hazel-nut husk is just that used by Hanbury & Flückiger (Pharmacographia, 1st ed. 456).

c. 1430.—"Has (insulae Java) ultra xv dieorum cursu duae reperuntur insulae, orientem versus. Altera Sandai appellata, in qua nuces muscatae et maces, altera Bandam nomine, in qua sola garofali producuntur."—Conti, in Poggius, De Var Fortunae.

1514.—"The tree that produces the nut (mag) and maccis is all one. By this ship I send you a sample of them in the green state."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 81.

1563.—"It is a very beautiful fruit, and pleasant to the taste; and you must know that when the nut is ripe it swells, and the first cover bursts as do the husks of our chestnuts, and shows the maza, or a bright vermilion like fine grain (i.e. cocco); it is the most beautiful sight in the world when the trees are loaded with it, and sometimes the mace splits off, and that is why the nutmegs often come without the maza."—Garcia, f. 129b-130.

MACE, s.

b. Jav. and Malay mās. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Mās is really short for amās or emās, one of those curious forms with prefixed a, as in the case of abada, which are probably native, but may have been influenced by Portuguese." ] A weight used in Sumatra, being, according to Crawford, 1-16th of a Malay tael (q.v.), or about 40 grains (but see below). Mace is also the name of a small gold coin of Achin, weighing 9 grs. and worth about 1s. 1d. And mace was adopted in the language of European traders in China to denominate the tenth part of the Chinese liang or tael of silver; the 100th part of the same value being denominated in like manner candareen (q.v.). The word is originally Skt. māsha, 'a bean,' and then 'a particular weight of gold' (comp. CARAT, RUTTEE).

1599.—"... by intervention of this thirsndaw whom the Moor employed as broker they agreed on my price with the merchant at seven mazes of gold, which in our money makes a 1400 reys, at the rate of a half cruzado the maz."—Pinto, cap. xxv. Cogan has, "the fishermen sold me to the merchant for seven mazes of gold, which amounts in our money to seventeen shillings and sixpence."—p. 31.

1564.—"The weight with which they weigh (at Malaca) gold, musk, seed-pearl, coral, calabuco... consisting of cates which contain 20 taels, each tael 16 mazes, each maz 5 curundwryns. Also one pondo 4 mazes, one maz 4 cupoes (see KOBANG), one cupo 5 curundwryns (see CANDAREEN)."—A. Nunes, 39.

1599.—"Bezar sive Bazar (i.e. Bezoar, q.v.) per Masas venditur."—De Bry, ii. 64.

1625.—"I have also sent by Master Tomkins of their coin (Achin)... that is of gold named a Mas, and is ninepence halfpenie neereest."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1813.—"Milburn gives the following table of weights used at Achin, but it is quite inconsistent with the statements of Crawford and Linschoten above.

| 4 copang   |  1 mace       |
|  5 mace    |  1 mayam     |
| 16 mayam   |  1 tale      |
|  5 taels   |  1 bancal    |
| 20 bancals |  1 catty     |
| 200 catties |  1 bahrn.  |

Milburn, ii. 329. [Mr. Skeat notes that here "copang" is Malay kwapang; tale, tali; bancal, bongkal.]

MACHEEN, MAHACHEEN, n.p.

This name, Mahā-chin, "Great China," is one by which China was known in India in the early centuries of our era, and the term is still to be heard in India in the same sense in which Al-Birūnī uses it, saying that all beyond the great mountains (Himalaya) is Mahā-chin. But in "later times the majority, not knowing the meaning of the expression, seem to have used it pleonastically coupled with Chin, to denote the same thing, Chin and Māchin, a phrase having some analogy to the way Sind and Hind was used to express all India, but a stronger one to Goy and Magoy, as applied to the northern nations of Asia." And eventually Chin was discovered to be the eldest son of Japeth, and Māchín his grandson; which is much the same as saying that Britain was the eldest son of Brut the Trojan, and Great Britain his grandson! (Cathay and the Way Thither, p. cxix.).

In the days of the Mongol supremacy in China, when Chinese affairs were for a time more distinctly conceived in Western Asia, and the name of Manz as denoting Southern China, unconquered by the Mongols till 1275, was current in the West, it would appear that this name was confounded with Māchín, and the latter thus acquired a specific but erroneous application. One author of the 16th century also (quoted by Klapproth, J. As. Soc. ser. 2, tom. i. 115) distinguishes Chin and Māchín as N. and S. China, but this distinction seems never to have been entertained by the Hindus. Ibn Batuta sometimes distinguishes Sin (i.e. Chin) as South China from Khāltāi (see CATHAY) as North China. In times when intimacy with China had again ceased, the double name seems to have recovered its old vagueness as a rotund way of saying China, and had no more plurality of sense than in modern parlance Sodor and Man. But then comes an occasional new application of Mächin to Indo-China, as in Conti (followed by Fra Mauro). An exceptional application, arising from the Arab habit of applying the name of a country to the capital or the chief port frequented by them, arose in the Middle Ages, through which Canton became known in the West as the city of Мачин, or in Persian translation Chunkalun, i.e., Great Chin.

MÁCHIS, s. This is recent Hind. for 'lucifer matches.' An older and purer phrase for sulphur-matches is dîva-, dîva-salāt.

MADAPOLLAM, n.p. This term, applying to a particular kind of cotton.
cloth, and which often occurs in prices current, is taken from the name of a place on the Southern Delta-branch of the Godavery, properly Māḍhavapalām, [Tel. Madhavany-palemu, 'fortified village of Māḍhava'.] This was till 1833 [according to the Madras Gloss, 1827] the seat of one of the Company's Commercial Agencies, which was the chief of three in that Delta; the other two being Bunder Malunaka and Injeram. Mādapollām is now a staple export from England to India; it is a finer kind of white piece-goods, intermediate between calico and muslin.

Review, Jan. 11, p. 45.

MADRAFAXAO, s. This appears in old Portuguese works as the name of a gold coin of Guzerat; perhaps representing Muzaffar-shahi. There were several kings of Guzerat of this name. The one in question was probably Muzaffar-Shah II. (1511-1525), of whose coinage Thomas mentions a gold piece of 185 grs. (Pathān Kings, 353).

1554.—"There also come to this city Madafaxaos, which are a money of Cambayya, which vary greatly in price; some are of 24 tangas of 60 reis the tanga, others of 23, 22, 21, and other prices according to time and value."—A. Yunoee, 32.

MADRAS, n.p. This alternative name of the place, officially called by its founders Fort St. George, first appears about the middle of the 17th century. Its origin has been much debated, but with little result. One derivation, backed by a fictitious legend, derives the name from an imaginary Christian fisherman called Madarasen; but this may be pronounced philologically impossible, as well as otherwise unworthy of serious regard.* Lassen makes the name to be a corruption of Manda-redji, "Realm of the Stupid!" No one will suspect the illustrious author of the Indische Alterthumskunde to be guilty of a joke; but it does look as if some malign Bengalee had suggested to him this gibe against the "Benighted"! It is indeed curious and true that, in Bengal, sepoys and the like always speak of the Southern Presidency as Mandrāj. In fact, however, all the earlier mentions of the name are in the form of Madraspatanam, 'the city of the Madras,' whatever the Madras may have been. The earliest maps show Madraspatanam as the Mahommedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah. The word is therefore probably of Mahommedan origin; and having got so far we need not hesitate to identify it with Madrasa, 'a college.' The Portuguese wrote this Madrasa (see Faria y Sousa, Africa Portuguesa, 1681, p. 6); and the European name probably came from them, close neighbours as they were to Fort St. George, at Mylapore or San Thomé. That there was such a Madrassā in existence is established by the quotation from Hamilton, who was there about the end of the 17th century.† Fryer's Map (1698, but illustrating 1672-73) represents the Governor's House as a building of Mahommedan architecture, with a dome. This may have been the Madrasa itself. Lockyer also (1711) speaks of a "College," of which the building was "very ancient"; formerly a hospital, and then used apparently as a residence for young writers. But it is not clear whether the name "College" was not given on this last account. [The Madras Admin. Mon. says: "The origin of this name has been much discussed. Madrissa, a Mahommedan school, has been suggested, which considering the date at which the name is first found seems fanciful. Mando is in Sanscrit 'slow.' Mandarz was a king of the lunar race.

* It is given in No. II. of Selections from the Records of S. Arood District, p. 107.
† In a letter from poor Arthur Burnell, on which this paragraph is founded, he adds: "It is sad that the most Philistine town (in the German sense) in all the East should have such a name."
The place was probably called after this king" (ii. 91). The Madras Gloss. again writes: "Hind. Madras, Can. Madarasu, from Tel. Mandarada, name of a local Telegu Royer," or ruler. The whole question has been discussed by Mr. Pringle (Diary Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 106 seqq.). He points out that while the earliest quotation given below is dated 1653, the name, in the form Madrastapatam, is used by the President and Council of Surat in a letter dated 29th December, 1640 (J. O. Records, O. C. No. 1764); "and the context makes it fairly certain that Francis Day or some other of the factors to the new Settlement must have previously made use of it in reference to the place, or rather, as the Surat letter says, ‘plot of ground’ offered to him. It is no doubt just possible that in the course of the negotiations Day heard or caught up the name from the Portuguese, who were at the time in friendly relations with the English; but the probabilities are certainly in the opposite direction. The nyak from whom the plot was obtained must almost certainly have supplied the name, or what Francis Day conceived to be the name. Again, as regards Hamilton’s mention of a ‘college,’ Sir H. Yule’s remark certainly goes too far. Hamilton writes, ‘There is a very Good Hospital in the Town, and the Company’s Horse-stables are neat, but the old College where a good many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is ill-kept in repair.’ This remark taken together with that made by Lockyer ... affords proof, indeed, that there was a building known to the English as the ‘College.’ But it does not follow that this, or any, building was distinctively known to Musulmans as the ‘madrasa.’ The ‘old College’ of Hamilton may have been the successor of a Musulman ‘madrasa’ of some size and consequence, and if this was so the argument for the derivation would be strengthened. It is however equally possible that some old buildings within the plot of territory acquired by Day, which had never been a ‘madrasa,’ was turned to use as a College or place where the young writers should live and receive instruction; and in this case the argument, so far as it rests on a mention of a ‘College’ by Hamilton and Lockyer, is entirely destroyed. Next as regards the probability that the first part of ‘Madrastapatam’ is of Mahommedan origin, Sir H. Yule does not mention that date of the maps in which Madrastapatam is shown ‘as the Mahommedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah’; but in Fryer’s map, which represents the fort as he saw it in 1672, the name ‘Madirasa’—to which is added ‘the Indian Town with flat houses’—is entered as the designation of the collection of houses on the north side of the English town, and the next makes it evident that in the year in question the name of Madras was applied chiefly to the crowded collection of houses styled in turn the ‘Heathen,’ the ‘Malabar,’ and the ‘Black’ town. This consideration does not necessarily disprove the supposed Musulman origin of ‘Madras,’ but it undoubtedly weakens the chain of Sir H. Yule’s argument." Mr. Pringle ends by saying: "On the whole it is not unfair to say that the chief argument in favour of the derivation adopted by Sir H. Yule is of a negative kind. There are fatal objections to whatever other derivations have been suggested, but if the mongrel character of the compound ‘Madrastapatam’ is disregarded, there is no fatal objection to the derivation from ‘madrasa.’ ... If however that derivation is to stand, it must not rest upon such accidental coincidences as the use of the word ‘College’ by writers whose knowledge of Madras was derived from visits made from 30 to 50 years after the foundation of the colony.”]

1673.—"Let us now pass the Pale to the Heathen Town, only parted by a wide Parrade, which is used for a Buzzar, or Mercate-place. Madares then divides itself into divers long streets, and they are chequered by as many transverse. It enjoys some Choultries for Places of Justice; one Exchange; one Pagod..."—Fryer, 38-39.

1727.—"Fort St. George or Madares, or as the Natives call it, China Patam, is a Colony and City belonging to the English East India Company, situated in one of those most incommodious Places I ever saw. There is a very good Hospital in the Town, and the Company's Horse-Stables are neat, but the Old College, where a great many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is kept in ill Repair."—A. Hamilton, i. 364, [ed. 1744, ii. 192]. (Also see CHINAPATAM.)

MADRAS, s. This name is applied to large bright-coloured handkerchiefs, of silk warp and cotton woof, which were formerly exported from Madras, and much used by the negroes in the W. Indies as head-dresses. The word is preserved in French, but is now obsolete in England.

c. 1830.—"... We found President Petion, the black Washington, sitting on a very old ragged sofa, amidst a confused mass of papers, dressed in a blue military undress frock, white trousers, and the ever-lasting Madras handkerchief bound round his brows."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1868, p. 425.

MADREMALUCO, n.p. The name given by the Portuguese to the Mahomedan dynasty of Berar, called 'Imad-shah. The Portuguese name represents the title of the founder 'Imad-ul-Mulk, ('Pillar of the State'), otherwise Path Ullah 'Imad Shah. The dynasty was the most obscure of those founded upon the dissolution of the Bahmani monarchy in the Deccan. (See COTAMALUCO, IDALCAG, MELIQUE VERIDO, NIZAMALUCO, SABAIO.) It began about 1484, and in 1572 was merged in the kingdom of Ahmednagar. There is another Madremalucu (or 'Imad-ul-Mulk) much spoken of in Portuguese histories, who was an important personage in Guzerat, and put to death with his own hand the king Sikandar Shâh (1526) (Barros, IV. v. 3; Correa, ii. 272, 344, &c.; Couto, Decs. v. and vi. passim).

1553.—"The Madre Maluco was married to a sister of the Hidalchan (see IDALCAN), and the latter treated this brother-in-law of his, and Meleque Verido as if they were his vassals, especially the latter."—Barros, IV. vii. 1.

1563.—"The Imadmaluco or Madremalucu, as we corruptly style him, was a Circassian (Cherques) by nation, and had originally been a Christian, and died in 1546. Imad is as much as to say 'prop,' and thus the other (of these princes) was called Imadmaluco, or 'Prop of the Kingdon.'..."—Garcia, f. 36v.

Neither the chronology of De Orta here, nor the statement of Imad-ul-Mulk's Circassian origin, agree with those of Firishta. The latter says that Path-Ullah 'Imad Shâh was descended from the heathen of Bija-nagar (iii. 485).

MADURA, n.p., properly Madurei, Tam. Mathurasi. This is still the name of a district in S. India, and of a city which appears in the Tables of Ptolemy as "Mδoναρα βασιλειου Πανδιμων." The name is generally supposed to be the same as that of Mathurâ, the holy and much more ancient city of Northern India, from which the name was adopted (see MUTTRA), but modified after Tamil pronunciation.* [On the other hand, a writer in J. R. As. Soc. (xiv. 578, n. 3) derives Madura from the Dravidian Madur in the sense of 'Old Town,' and suggests that the northern-Mathura may be an offshoot from it.] Madura was, from a date, at least as early as the Christian era, the seat of the Pandya sovereigns. These, according to Tamil tradition, as stated by Bp. Caldwell, had previously held their residence at Kolkes on the Tamraparni, the Kâraxa of Ptolemy. (See Caldwell, pp. 16, 95, 101). The name of Madura, probably as adopted from the holier northern Muttra, seems to have been a favourite among the Eastern settlements under Hindu influence. Thus we have

* This perhaps implies an earlier spread of northern influence than we are justified in assuming.

c. 1347.—"The Sultan stopped a month at Fattan, and then departed for his capital. I stayed 15 days after his departure, and then started for his residence, which was at Mutra, a great city with wide streets, . . . I found there a pest raging of which people died in brief space . . . when I went out I saw only the dead and dying."—\textit{Ibn Batuta}, ii. 190-1.

1311.—"... the royal canoe moved from Birdhul . . . and 5 days afterwards they arrived at the city of Mathra . . . the dwelling-place of the brother of the Râ\footnote{Râd} Sundar Pândya. They found the city empty, for the Râd had fled with the Râdus, but had left two or three elephants in the temple of Jagnâr (Jaganâth)."—\textit{Amîr Khusrâr}, in \textit{Elliot}, iii. 91.

MADURA FOOT, s. A fungoidal disease of the foot, apparently incurable except by amputation, which occurs in the Madura district, and especially in places where the 'Black soil' prevails. Medical authorities have not yet decided on the causes or precise nature of the disease. See Nelson, \textit{Madura}, Pt. i. pp. 91-94; [Gribble, \textit{Cuddapah}, 193].

MAGADOXO, n.p. This is the Portuguese representation, which has passed into general European use, of Makadashan, the name of a town and State on the Somâlî coast in E. Africa, now subject to Zanzibar. It has been shown by one of the present writers that Marco Polo, in his chapter on Madagascar, has made some confusion between Magadoxo and that island, mixing up particulars relating to both. It is possible that the name of Madagascar was really given from Makdahsh, as Sir R. Burton supposes; but he does not give any authority for his statement that the name of Madagascar "came from Makdishedu (Magadoxo) . . . . whose Sheikh invaded it." (Comment. on Camões, ii. 520). [Owen \textit{(Narrative, i. 357)} writes the name Muldeesha, and Boteler \textit{(Narrative, ii. 215)} says it is pronounced by the Arabs Makodisha. The name is said to be Magaad-el-Shata, "Harbour of the Sheep," and the first syllable has been identified with that of Makdah and is said to mean "door" in some of the Gall dialects (\textit{Notes & Queries}, 9 ser. ii. 193, 310. Also see Mr. Gray's note on \textit{Pyramid}, Hak. Soc. i. 29, and Dr. Burnell on \textit{Linschoten}, Hak. Soc. i. 19.)

c. 1330.—"On departing from Zaila, we sailed on the sea for 15 days, and then arrived at Makdashaun, a town of great size. The inhabitants possess a great number of camels, and of these they slaughter (for food) several hundreds every day."—\textit{Ibn Batuta}, ii. 181.

1498.—"And we found ourselves before a great city with houses of several stories, and in the midst of the city certain great palaces; and about it a wall with four towers; and this city stood close upon the sea, and the Moors call it Magadoxo. And when we were come well abreast of it, we discharged many bombardis (at it), and kept on our way along the coast with a fine wind on the poop."—\textit{Roteiro}, 102.

1605.—"And the Viceroy (Don Francisco D'Almeida) made sail, ordering the course to be made for Magadoxo, which he had instructions also to make tributary. But the pilots objected saying that they would miss the season for crossing to India, as it was already the 26th of August."—\textit{Correa}, i. 560.

1514.—"... The most of them are Moors such as inhabit the city of Zofalla . . . and these people continue to be found in Mazambic, Melinda, Mogodecio, Marachilue (read Brava Chilve, i.e. Brava and Quilua), and Mombazza; which are all walled cities on the main land, with houses and streets like our own; except Mazambich."—\textit{Letter of Gio. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital.}

1516.—"Further on towards the Red Sea there is another very large and beautiful town called Magadoxo, belonging to the Moors, and it has a King over it, and is a place of great trade and merchandise."—\textit{Barbosa}, 16.

1532.—"... and after they had passed Cape Guardafu, Dom Estevão was going along in such depression that he was like to die of grief, on arriving at Magadoxo, they stopped to water. And the King of the country, hearing that there had come a son of the Count Admiral, of whom all had ample knowledge as being the first to discover and navigate on that coast, came to the shore to see him, and made great offers of all that he could require."—\textit{Conto}, IV. viii. 2.

1727.—"Magadoxa, or as the Portuguese call it, Magadocia, is a pretty large City, about 2 or 3 Miles from the Sea, from whence it has a very fine Aspect, being adorned with many high Steeples and Mosques."—\textit{A. Hamitons}, 1.12-13, [ed. 1744].
MAHÁJUN, s. Hind. from Skt. mahá-jan, 'great person.' A banker and merchant. In Southern and Western India the vernacular word has various other applications which are given in Wilson.

"Down there lives a Mahajun—my father gave him a bill, I have paid the [knife thrice over, and here I'm paying him still. He shows me a long stamp paper, and must have my land—must he! If I were twenty years younger, he should get six feet by three."

Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

The Mahajun hospitably entertains his victim, and spends his homeward departure, giving no word or sign of his business till the time for appeal has gone by, and the decree is made absolute. Then the storm bursts on the head of the luckless hill-man, who finds himself loaded with an overwhelming debt, which he has never incurred, and can never hope to discharge; and so he practically becomes the Mahajan's slave for the rest of his natural life."—Lit. Col. T. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 339.

MAHÁNNAH, s. (See MEEANA.)

MAHÉ, n.p. Properly Māyāli. [According to the Madras Gloss. the Mal. name is Mayyashi, mai, 'black,' aṣhi, 'river mouth'; but the title is from the French Mahé, being one of the names of Labourdonnais. A small settlement on the Malabar coast, 4 m. S.E. of Tellicherry, where the French established a factory for the sake of the pepper trade in 1722, and which they still retain. It is not now of any importance.

MAHI, n.p. The name of a considerable river flowing into the upper part of the Gulf of Cambay. ["The height of its banks, and the fierceness of its floods; the deep gullies through which the traveller has to pass on his way to the river, and perhaps, above all, the bad name of the tribes on its banks, explain the proverb: 'When the Mahi is crossed, there is comfort.'"

(Mag. Gazetteer, s.v.)

"Next comes another gulf extending also to the north, at the mouth of which is an island called Botërët (Perim), and at the innermost extremity a great river called Mais."—Periplus, ch. 42.

MAHOUT, s. The driver and tender of an elephant. Hind. mahā-wat, from Skt. mahā-mātra, 'great in measure,' a high officer, &c., so applied. The Skt. term occurs in this sense in the Mahābhārata (e.g. iv. 1761, &c.). The Mahout is mentioned in the 1st Book of Maccabees as 'the Indian.' It is remarkable that we find what is apparently mahā-mātra, in the sense of a high officer in Hesychius:

"Μανάμπρα, οἱ στρατηγοὶ παρ' Ἰνδοῖς."

—Hesych. s.v. c. 1590.—"Must elephants (see MUST. There are five and a half servants to each, viz., the Mahawat, who sits on the neck of the animal and directs its movements... He gets 200 dōma per month... Secondly a Bhōi, who sits behind, upon the rump of the elephant, and assists in battle, and in quickening the speed of the animal; but he often performs the duties of the Mahawat... Thirdly the Metha (see MATE... A Meth fetches fodder, and assists in caparisoning the elephant..."

—An, ed. Blockmann, i. 128.

1648.—"... and Mahouts for the elephants..."

—Van Twist, 58.

1826.—"... will now pass over the term of my infancy, which was employed in learning to read and write—my preceptor being a mahouhut, or elephant-driver—and will take up my adventures."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [fed. 1873, i. 28].

1848.—"Then he described a tiger hunt, and the manner in which the Mahout of his elephant had been pulled off his seat by one of the infuriate animals."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

MAHRATTA, n.p. Hind. Marhatā, Marhättā, Marhatā (Marhatī, Marhattī), and Marhatā. The name of a famous Hindu race, from the old Skt. name of their country, Mahā-rāṣṭra, 'Magna Regio.' [On the other hand H. A. A. Acworth (Ballads of the Marathas, Intro. vi.) derives the word from a tribal name Maharatta, or Ratha, 'chariot fighters,' from rath, 'a chariot,' thus Mahâ-Ratha means 'Great Warrior.' This was transferred to the country and finally Sanskritised into Mahâ-râshtra. Again some authorities (Wilson, Indian Castes, ii. 48; Baden-Powell, J. R. As. Soc., 1897, p. 249, note) prefer to derive the word from the Mahr or Mahar, a once numerous and dominant race. And see the discussion in the Bombay Gazetteer, I. pt. ii. 143 seq.]

c. 1760.—". . . those dangerous and powerful neighbors the Morattoes; who being now masters of the contiguous island of Salsette . . ."—Grose, ii. 44.

1765.—"The name of Morattoes, or Marattas, is, I have reason to think, a derivation in their country-language, or by corruption, from Mar-Rajah."—Ibids. ii. 75.

1775.—"These united princes and people are those which are known by the general name of Maharattors; a word compounded of Rattor and Mahah; the first being the name of a particular Raaspoot (or Raiypoon) tribe; and the latter, signifying great or mighty (as explained by Mr. Fraser). . . ."—Holwell, Hist. —Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

The following is in the true Hobson-Jobson manner:

[1859.—"This term Marhatta, or Marhutta, is derived from the mode of warfare adopted by these men. Mar means to strike, and hutna, to get out of the way, i.e. those who struck a blow suddenly and at once retreated out of harm's way."—H. Dunstan Robertson, District Duties during the Revolt in 1857, p. 104, note.]

Maharatta Ditch, n.p. An excavation made in 1742, as described in the extract from Orme, on the landward sides of Calcutta, to protect the settlement from the Maharatta bands. Hence the term, or for shortness 'The Ditch' simply, as a disparaging name for Calcutta (see ditcher). The line of the Ditch corresponded nearly with the outside of the existing Circular Road, except at the S.E. and S., where the work was never executed. [There is an excavation known by the same name at Madras excavated in 1780. (Murray, Handbook, 1859, p. 43.]]

1742.—"In the year 1742 the Indian inhabitants of the Colony requested and obtained permission to dig a ditch at their own expense, round the Company's bounds, from the northern parts of Sootanatty to the southern part of Govindpore. In six months three miles were finished: when the inhabitants . . . discontinued the work, which from the occasion was called the Morattoe ditch."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 45.

1757.—"That the Bounds of Calcutta are to extend the whole Circle of Ditch dug upon the Invasion of the Marattes; also 600 yards without it, for an Esplanade."—Articles of Agreement sent by Colonel Clive (previous to the Treaty with the Nabob of May 14). 1782.—"To the Proprietors and Occupiers of Houses and other Tenements within the MAISTRY, MISTRY, sometimes even MYSTERY, s. Hind. mistrī. This word, a corruption of the Portuguese mestre, has spread into the vernaculars all over India, and is in constant Anglo-Indian use. Properly 'a foreman,' 'a master-workman'; but used also, at least in Upper India, for any artisan, as rāj-mistrī (properly Pers. rāz), 'a mason or bricklayer,' lōhār-mistrī, 'a blacksmith,' &c. The proper use of the word, as noted above, corresponds precisely to the definition of the Portuguese word, as applied to artisans in Bluteau: "Artifice que sabe bem o seu ofício. Peritus artifex ... Opifex, alienorum opera rum inspec'tor." In W. and S. India maistry, as used in the household, generally means the cook, or the tailor. (See CALEEF.)

MASTÉR (Macreps) is also the Russian term for a skilled workman, and has given rise to several derived adjectives. There is too a similar word in modern Greek, μαγιστρός.

1404. - "And in these (chambers) there were works of gold and azure and of many other colours, made in the most marvellous way; insomuch that even in Paris whence come the subtle maestros, it would be reckoned beautiful to see." — Clavijo, § ev. (Comp. Markham, p. 125).

1524. - "And the Viceroy (D. Vasco da Gama) sent to seize in the river of the Culymuts four newly-built cators, and fetched them to Cochin. These were built

MAHSEER, MASEER, MASAL, &c. Hind. mahāśīr, mahīśēr, mahāshātal, s. The name is applied to perhaps more than one of the larger species of Barbus (N.O. Cyprinidae), but especially to B. Mosul of Buchanan, B. Tor, Day, B. megalepis, McClelland, found in the larger Himalayan rivers, and also in the greater perennial rivers of Madras and Bombay. It grows at its largest, to about the size of the biggest salmon, and more. It affords also the highest sport to Indian anglers; and from these circumstances has sometimes been called, misleadingly, the 'Indian salmon.' The origin of the name Mahseer, and its proper spelling, are very doubtful. It may be Skt. mahā-śīras, 'big-head,' or mahā-śākṣa, 'large-scaled.' The latter is most probable, for the scales are so large that Buchanan mentions that playing cards were made from them at Dacca. Mr. H. S. Thomas suggests mahā-śāyā, 'great mouth.' [The word does not appear in the ordinary dictionaries; on the whole, perhaps the derivation from mahā-śīras is most probable.]

c. 1809. — "The Masal of the Kosi is a very large fish, which many people think better than the Rohu, and compare it to the salmon." — Buchanan, Eastern India, iii. 194.

1822. — "Mahasaula and Tora, variously altered and corrupted, and with various additions may be considered as genuine appellations, amongst the natives for these fishes, all of which frequent large rivers." — F. Buchanan Hamilton, Fishes of the Ganges, 304.

1873. — "In my own opinion and that of others whom I have met, the Mahseer shows more sport for its size than a salmon." — H. S. Thomas, The Rod in India, p. 9.

MAINATO, s. Tam. Mal. Mainātta, a washerman or dhoby (q.v.).

1516. — "There is another sect of Gentiles which they call Mainatos, whose business it is to wash the clothes of the Kings, Bramins, and Naires; and by this they get their living; and neither they nor their sons can take up any other business." — Barbosa, Lisbon ed., 334.

c. 1542. — "In this inclosure do likewise remain all the Landresses, by them called Maynates, which wash the linens of the City (Pequin), who, as we were told, are above an hundred thousand." — Pinto, in Cogun, p. 193. The original (cap. ev.) has todos os mainatos, whose sex Cogan has changed.

1554. — "And the farm (renda) of mainatos, which farm prohibits any one from washing clothes, which is the work of a mainato, except by arrangement with the farmer (Rendeiro). ..." — Tombo, &c., 53.

MAJOON, s. Hind, from Ar. ma'jûn, lit. 'kneaded,' and thence what old medical books call 'air elecctuary' (i.e. a compound of medicines kneaded with syrup into a soft mass), but especially applied to an intoxicating confection of hemp leaves, &c., sold in the bazar. [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 159.] In the Deccan the form is ma'jûm. Mooden Sheriff, in his Suppt. to the Pharmac. of Indla, writes magh-jûm. "The chief ingredients in making it are ganja (or hemp) leaves, milk, glee, poppy-seeds, flowers of the thorn-apple (see DATURA), the powder of nux vomica, and sugar" (Qamoa-n-e-Islam, Gloss. lixxiii).

1519.—"Next morning I halted... and indulging myself with a maajun, made them throw into the water the liquor used for 'intoxicating fishes, and caught a few fish."—Faber, 272.

1559.—"And this they make up into an 'elecctuary, with sugar, and with the things above-metinioned, and this they call maju."—Garcia, f. 272a.

1781.—"Our ill-favoured guard brought in a dose of majam each, and obliged us to eat it... a little after sunset the surgeon came, and with him 30 or 40 Caffres, who seized us, and held us fast till the operation (circumcision) was performed."—Soldier's letter quoted in Hon. John Lindsay's Journal of Captivity in Myore, Lives of Lindsay, iii. 295.

1874.—"... it (Bhang) is made up with flour and various additions into a sweetmeat or majam of a green colour."—Hanbury and Fröhlicher, 493.

a. The name of the sea-board country which the Arabs called the 'Pepper-Coast,' the ancient Kerala of the Hindus, the Ruophkos, or rather Δωρόπως, of the Greeks (see TAMIL), is not in form indigenous, but was applied, apparently, first by the Arab or Arabo-Persian mariners of the Gulf. The substantive part of the name, Malay, or the like, is doubtless indigenous; it is the Dravadian term for 'mountain' in the Sanskritized form Malayam, which is applied specifically to the southern portion of the Western Ghauts, and from which is taken the indigenous term Malayalam, distinguishing that branch of the Dravidian language in the tract which we call Malabar. This name—Male or Malai, Maliah, &c.—we find in the earlier post-classic notices of India; whilst in the great Temple-Inscription of Tanjore (11th century) we find the region in question called Malay-

nâdu (nâdu, 'country'). The affix bâr appears attached to it first (so far as we are aware) in the Geography of Edrisi (c. 1150). This (Persian) bâr termination, bâr, whatever be its origin, and whether or not it be connected either with the Ar. bâr, 'a continent,' on the one hand, or with the Skt. vâra, 'a region, a slope,' on the other, was most assuredly applied by the navigators of the Gulf to other regions which they visited besides Western India. Thus we have Zangi-bâr (mod. Zanzibar), 'the country of the Blacks'; Kalah-bâr, denoting apparently the coast of the Malay Peninsula; and even according to the dictionaries, Hindia-bâr for India. In the Arabic work which affords the second of these examples (Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 17) it is expressly explained: 'The word bâr serves to indicate that which is both a coast and a kingdom.' It will be seen from the quotations below that in the Middle Ages, even after the establishment of the use of this termination, the exact form of the name as given by foreign travellers and writers, varies considerably. But, from the time of the Portuguese discovery of the Cape route, Malabar, or Malabar, as we have it now, is the persistent form. [Mr. Logan (Manual, i. 1) remarks that the name is not in use in the district itself except among foreigners and English-speaking natives; the ordinary name is Malayalam or Malaya, 'the Hill Country.']

c. 645.—"The imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, sandalwood. These again are passed on from Sledediba to the marts on this side, such as Mañet, where the pepper is grown. And the most notable places of trade are these, Sindu and then the five marts of Mañet, from which the pepper is exported, viz., Parti, Mangaruth, Salopatana, Nalopatana, and Pudopatana."—Cosmas, Bk. xi. In Cathay, &c., p. cxlviii.

c. 645.—"To the south this kingdom is near the sea. There rise the mountains called Mo-la-ye (Malaya), with their precipitous sides, and their lofty summits, their dark valleys and their deep ravines. On these mountains grows the white sandalwood."—Huen T' sung, in Julien, iii. 122.

351.—"From this place (Maskat) ships sail for India, and run for Kaulam-Malai; the distance from Maskat to Kaulam-Malai is a month's sail with a moderate wind."— Relation, &c., tr. by Reinward, i. 15. The same work at p. 15 uses the expression "Country of Pepper" (Balad-ul-fulaf).

580.—"From Sindân to Mali is five days' journey; in the latter pepper is to be found, also the bamboo."— Ibn Khariddda, in Elliot, i. 15.

c. 1090.—"You enter then on the country of Lârin, in which is Jaimûr (see under CHOU), then Maliah, then Kânhîî, then Dravira (see DRAVIDIAN)."— Al-Birâni, in Reinward, Fragmens, 121.

c. 1150.—"Fandarina (see PANDARANI) is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Minibâr, where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor."—I'drisî, in Elliot, i. 90.

c. 1200.—"Hari sports here in the delightful spring ... when the breeze from Malaya is fragrant from passing over the charming lavanga" (cloves).—Gîta Govinda.

1270.—"Malabar is a large country of India, with many cities, in which pepper is produced."—Kazwînî, in Gildemeister, 214.

c. 1293.—"You can sail (upon that sea) between these islands and Ormes, and (from Ormes) to those parts which are called (Minibar), is a distance of 2,000 miles, in a direction between south and south-east; then 300 miles between east and south-east from Minibar to Maabar" (see MABAR).—Letter of Fr. John of Monte-corvina, in Cathay, i. 215.

1298.—"Melibar is a great kingdom lying towards the west. ... There is in this kingdom a great quantity of pepper."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 25.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Kankan (see CONCAN) and Tana; beyond them the country of Malibar, which from the boundary of Karkho to Edlam (probably from Gheriah to Quilon) is 300 parasangs in length."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1320.—"A certain traveller states that India is divided into three parts, of which the first, which is also the most westerly, is that on the confines of Kerman and Sind, and is called Güzérat; the second Manibâr, or the Land of Pepper, east of Güzérat."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 184.

c. 1322.—"And now that ye may know how pepper is got, let me tell you that it groweth in a certain empire, whereunto I came to land, the name whereof is Minibar."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 74.

c. 1343.—"After 3 days we arrived in the country of the Mularbâr, which is the country of Pepper. It stretches in length a distance of two months' march along the sea-shore."— Ibn Batuta, iv. 71.

c. 1348-49.—"We embarked on board certain junks from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—John de Marignoli, in Cathay, 356.

c. 1420-30.—"Departing thence he ... arrived at a noble city called Colaen. ... This province is called Melibaria, and they collect in it the ginger called by the natives colombi, pepper, brazil-wood, and the cinnamon, called canella grossa."—Conti, corrected from Jones's tr. in India, in XVth Cent. 17-18.

c. 1442.—"The coast which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as (Kael), a place situated opposite to the Island of Serendib ... bears the general name of Melibar."—Aburruzas, ibid. 19.

1459.—Fra Mauro's great Map has Mili- bar.

1514.—"In the region of India called Melibar, which province begins at Goa, and extends to Cape Comedis (Comorin). ..."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, 79. It is remarkable to find this Florentine using this old form in 1514.

1516.—"And after that the Moors of Mea discovered India, and began to navigate near it, which was 610 years ago, they used to touch at this country of Mala- bar on account of the pepper which is found there."—Barbosa, 102.

1553. —"We shall hereafter describe particularly the position of this city of Calecut, and of the country of Malabar in which it stands."—Barros, Dec. I. iv. c. 6. In the following chapter he writes Malabar.

1554.—"From Din to the Islands of Dib. Steer first S.E., the pole being made by five inches, side towards the land in the direction of E.S.E. and S.E. by E. till you see the mountains of Monibar."—The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben. v. 401.
MALABAR.

1572.—
"Esta provinicia cuja porto agora Tomado tendes, Malabar se chama :
Do culto antigo os idolos adora, Que cã por estas partes se derrama."
Camões, viii. 32.

By Burton:

"This province, in whose Ports your ships have Idol-religion being broadest sown."

Since De Barros Malabar occurs almost universally.

[1623.—"... Malabar Pirates..."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 121.]

1877.—The form Malabar is used in a letter from Athanasius Peter III., "Patriarch of the Syrians of Antioch" to the Marquis of Salisbury, dated Cairo, July 18.

MALABAR, n.p.

b. This word, through circumstances which have been fully elucidated by Bishop Caldwell in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 10-12), from which we give an extract below,* was applied by the Portuguese not only to the language and people of the country thus called, but also to the Tamil language and the people speaking Tamil. In the quotations following, those under A apply, or may apply, to the proper people or language of Malabar (see MALAYALAM); those under B are instances of the misapplication to Tamil, a misapplication which was general (see e.g. in Orme, passim) down to the beginning of the last century, and which still holds among the more ignorant Europeans and Aurasians in S. India and Ceylon.

1572.—
"Leva alguns Malabares, que tomou Por força, dos que o Samarim mandara."
Camões, ix. 14.

* "The Portuguese... sailing from Malabar on voyages of exploration... made their acquaintance with various places on the eastern or Coromandel Coast... and finding the language spoken by the fishing and sea-faring classes on the eastern coast similar to that spoken on the western, they came to the conclusion that it was identical with it, and called it in consequence by the same name—viz. Malabar. ... A circumstance which naturally confirmed the Portuguese in their notion of the identity of the people and language of the Coromandel Coast with those of Malabar was that when they arrived at Caël, in Timevelly, on the Coromandel Coast... they found the King of Quillán (one of the most important places on the Malabar Coast) residing there."—Sp. In the following passage the word Malabars is misapplied still further, though by a writer usually most accurate and intelligent:

1810.—"The language spoken at Madras is the Tulinga, here called Malabars."—Maria Graham, 123.

1860.—"The term 'Malabar' is used throughout the following pages in the comprehensive sense in which it is applied in the Singhalese Chronicles to the continental invaders of Ceylon; but it must be observed that the adventurers in these expeditions, who are styled in the Malavasaru 'damilos', or Tamils, came not only from . . . 'Malabar', but also from all parts of the Peninsula as far north as Cuttack and Orissa."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 553.

MALABAR RITES. This was a name given to certain heathen and superstitious practices which the Jesuits of the Madura, Carnatic, and Mysore Missions permitted to their converts, in spite of repeated prohibitions by the Popes. And though these practices were finally condemned by the Legate Cardinal de Tournon in 1704, they still subsist, more or less, among native Catholic Christians, and especially those belonging to the (so-called) Goa Churches. These practices are generally alleged to have arisen under Father de' Nobili ("Robertus de Nobilibus"), who came to Madura about 1606. There can be no doubt that the aim of this famous Jesuit was to present Christianity to the people under the form, as it were, of a Hindu translation!

The nature of the practices of which we speak may be gathered from the following particulars of their prohibition. In 1623 Pope Gregory XV., by a constitution dated 31st January, condemned the following:—1. The investiture of Brahmins and certain other castes with the sacred thread, through the agency of Hindu priests, and with Hindu ceremonies. For these Christian ceremonies were to be substituted; and the thread was to be regarded as only a civil badge. 2. The ornamental use of sandalwood paste was permitted, but not its superstitious use, e.g., in mixture with cowdung ashes, &c., for ceremonial purification. 3. Bathing as a ceremonial purification. 4. The observance of caste, and the refusal of high-caste Christians to mix with low-caste Christians in the churches was disapproved.

The quarrels between Capuchins and Jesuits later in the 17th century again brought the Malabar Rites into notice, and Cardinal de Tournon was sent on his unlucky mission to determine these matters finally. His decree (June 23, 1704) prohibited:—1. A mutilated form of baptism, in which were omitted certain ceremonies offensive to Hindus, specifically the use of 'saliva, sal, et insufflation.' 2. The use of Pagan names. 3. The Hinduizing of Christian terms by translation. 4. Deferring the baptism of children. 5. Infant marriages. 6. The use of the Hindu tali (see TALEE). 7. Hindu usages at marriages. 8. Augury at marriages, by means of a coco-nut. 9. The exclusion of women from churches during certain periods. 10. Ceremonies on a girl's attainment of puberty. 11. The making distinctions between Pariahs and others. 12. The assistance of Christian musicians at heathen ceremonies. 13. The use of ceremonial washings and bathtings.

With regard to No. 11 it may be observed that in South India the distinction of castes still subsists, and the only Christian Mission in that quarter which has really succeeded in abolishing caste is that of the Basel Society.

MALABATHRUM. s. There can be very little doubt that this classical export from India was the dried leaf of various species of Cinnamomum, which leaf was known in Skt. as tamála-pattra. Some who wrote soon after the Portuguese discoveries took, perhaps not unnaturally, the pán or betel-leaf for the malabathrum of the ancients; and this was maintained by Dean Vincent in his well-known work on the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients, justifying this in part by the Ar. name of the betel, tambád, which is taken from Skt. tambála, betel; tambála-pattra, betel-leaf. The tamála-pattra, however, the produce of certain wild spp. of Cinnamomum, obtained both in the hills of Eastern Bengal and in the forests of Southern India, is still valued in India as a medicine and aromatic, though in no such degree as in ancient times, and it is usually known in domestic economy as tejpat, or corruptly tezpat, i.e. 'pungent leaf.' The leaf was in the Arabic Materia Medica under the name of sádhaj or sádhaji Hindi, as was till recently in the English Pharmacopoeia as Foli um indicum, which will still be found in Italian drug-shops. The matter is treated, with his usual lucidity and abundance of local knowledge, in the Colloquios de Garcia de Orta, of which we give a short extract. This was evidently unknown to Dean Vincent, as he repeats the very errors which Garcia dissipates. Garcia also notes that confusion of Malabathrum and Foli um indicum with spikenard, which is traceable in Pliny as well as among the Arab pharmacologists. The ancients did no doubt apply the name Malabathrum to some other substance, an unguent or solid extract. Rheed, we may notice, mentions that in his time in Malabar, oils in high medical estimation were made from both leaves and root of the "wild cinnamon" of that coast, and that from the root of the same tree a camphor was extracted, having several of the properties of real camphor and more fragrance. (See a note by one of the present writers in Cathay, &c., pp. cxiv.-xlvi.) The name Cinnamomum is properly confined to the tree of Ceylon (C. Zeylanicum). The other Cinnamomum are properly Cassia借口s. [See Watt. Econ. Dict. ii. 317 seqq.]

c. A.D. 79.—"We are beholden to Syria for Malabathrum. This is a tree that beareth leaves rolled up round together, and seeming to the eie withered. Out of which there is drawn and pressed an Oile for perfumers to use. . . And yet there commeth a better kind thereof from India. . . The relish thereof ought to resemble Nardus at the tongue end. The perfume or smell that . . . the leaf yeeldeth when it is boiled in wine, passeth all others. It is strange and monstrous which is observed in the price; for it hath risen from one denier to three hundred a pound."—Pliny, xii. 26, in Ph. Holland.

c. A.D. 90.—. . . Getting rid of the fibrous parts, they take the leaves and double them up into little balls, which they stitch through with the fibres of the withes. And these they divide into three classes. . . And thus originate the three qualities of Malabathrum, which the people who have prepared them carry to India for sale."—Periplus, near the end. [Also see Yule, Intro. Gill, River of Golden Sand, ed. 1883, p. 89.]

1568.—"R. I remember well that in speaking of betel you told me that it was not folium indu, a piece of information of great value to me; for the physicians who put themselves forward as having learned much from these parts, assert that they are the same; and what is more, the modern writers . . . call betel in their works tembul, and say that the Moors give it this name. . . "O. That the two things are different as I told you is clear, for Avicenna treats them in two different chapters, viz., in 259, which treats of fo lium indu, and in 707, which treats of tambul . . . and the folium indu is called by the Indians Tamala-patra, which the Greeks and Latins corrupted into Malabathrum," &c.—Garcia, f. 225v, 96c.

c. 1760.—"... quand l'on considère que les Indiens appellent notre feuille Indienne malalapatra on croit d'apercevoir que le mot Grec μαλάζαρπος en est anciennement dérivé."—(Diderot) Encyclopédie, xx. 846.

1837.—(Malatroon) is given in Arabic works of Materia Medica as the Greek of Śādhaj, and tej-pat and tej-pat as the Hindi synonyms. "By the latter names may be obtained everywhere in the bazaars of India, the leaves of Cinn. Tamala and of Cinn. albiflorum."—Royle, Essay on Antiq. of Hindoo Medicine, 85.

MALACCA, n.p. The city which gives its name to the Peninsula and the Straits of Malacca, and which was the seat of a considerable Malay monarchy till its capture by the Portuguese under D’Alboquerque in 1511. One naturally supposes some etymological connection between Malay and Malacca. And such a connection is put forward by De Barros and D’Alboquerque (see below, and also under MALAY). The latter also mentions an alternative suggestion for the origin of the name of this city, which evidently refers to the Ar. mulákat, ‘a meeting.’ This last, though it appears also in the Śājarā Malajy, may be totally rejected. Crawfurd is positive that the place was called from the word malaka, the Malay name of the Phyllanthus emblica, or emblc Myrobalan (q.v.), "a tree said to be abundant in that locality"; and this, it will be seen below, is given by Godinho de Eredia as the etymology. Malaka again seems to be a corruption of the Skt. amlaka, from āmka, ‘acid.’ [Mr. Skeat writes: "There can be no doubt that Crawfurd is right, and that the place was named from the tree. The supposed connection between Malajy and Malaka appears impossible to me, and, I think, would do so to any one acquainted with the laws of the language. I have seen the Malaka tree myself and eaten its fruit. Ridley in his Botanical Lists has laka-laka and malaka which he identifies as Phyllanthus emblica, L. and P. pectinatus Hooker (Euphorbiaceae). The two species are hardly distinct, but the latter is the commoner form. The fact is that the place, as is so often the case among the Malays, must have taken its name from the Sungai Malaka, or Malaka River.”]

1416.—"There was no King but only a chief, the country belonging to Siam. . . . In the year 1409, the imperial envoy Cheng Ho brought an order from the emperor and gave to the chief two silver seals, . . . he erected a stone and raised the place to a city, after which the land was called the Kingdom of Malacca (Moa-la-ka)." . . . Tin is found in the mountains . . . it is cast into small blocks weighing 1 catti 8 taels . . . ten pieces are bound together with rattan and form a small bundle, whilst 40 pieces make a large bundle. In all their trading . . . they use these pieces of tin instead of money."—Chinese Annals, in Groeneweld, p. 128.

1498.—"Meliqua . . . is 40 days from Qualecut with a fair wind . . . hence proceeds all the clove, and it is worth there 9 Crusados for a bahar (q.v.), and likewise nutmeg other 9 Crusados the bahar; and there is much porcelain and much silk, and much tin, of which they make money, but the money is of large size and little value so that it takes 3 Farazalas (see Frazala) of it to make a crusado. Here too are many large parrots all red like fire."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 110-111.

1510.—"When we had arrived at the city of Malachia, we were immediately presented to the Sultan, who is a Moor . . . I believe that more ships arrive here than in any other place in the world . . ."—Varthema, 224.

1511.—"This Paremiçura gave the name of Malaca to the new colony, because in the language of Java, when a man of Palmibio flees away they call him Malayo . . . Others say that it was called Malaca because of the number of people who came there from one part and the other in so short a space of time, for the word Malaca also signifies to meet . . . Of these two opinions let each one accept that which he thinks to be the best, for this is the truth of the matter."—Commentaries of Alboquerque, E.T. by Birch, iii. 76-77.

1516.—"The said Kingdom of Ansyane (see Siam) throws out a great point of land into the sea, which makes there a cape, where the sea returns again towards China to the north; in this promontory is a small kingdom in which there is a large city called Malaca."—Barboa, 191.

1553.—"A son of Paramisora called Xa-quant Darxa, (i.e. Sikander Shik) . . . to form the town of Malaca, to which he gave that name by history of the banishment of his father, because in his vernacular tongue (Javanese) this was as much as to say ‘banished,’ and hence the people are called Malaisos."—De Barros, II. vi. 1.

1565.—"That which he (Alboquerque) regretted most of all that was lost on that vessel, was two lions cast in iron, a first-rate work, and most natural, which the King of China had sent to the King of Malaca, and which King Mahamed had kept, as an honourable possession, at the gate of his Palace, whence Affonso Alboquerque carried them off, as the principal item of his triumph on the capture of the city."—Ibid. II. vii. 1.
MALADOO, s. Chicken maladoo is an article in the Anglo-Indian menu. It looks like a corruption from the French cuisine, but of what? [Maladoo or Manadoo, a lady informs me, is cold meat, such as chicken or mutton, cut into pieces, or pounded up and re-cooked in batter. The Port. maladu, 'beaten-up,' has been suggested as a possible origin for the word.]

MALAY, n.p. This is in the Malay language an adjective, Maláyu; thus orang Maláyu, 'a Malay'; kâna [tânah] Maláyu, 'the Malay country'; bahasa [bhasa] Maláyu, 'the Malay language.'

In Javanese the word maláyu signifies 'to run away,' and the proper name has traditionally been derived from this, in reference to the alleged foundation of Malacca by Javanese fugitives; but we can hardly attach importance to this. It may be worthy at least of consideration whether the name was not of foreign, i.e. of S. Indian origin, and connected with the Maláki of the Peninsula (see under MALABAR). [Mr. Skeat writes: "The tradition given me by Javanese in the Malay States was that the name was applied to Javanese refugees, who peopled the S. of Sumatra. Whatever be the original meaning of the word, it is probable that it started its life-history as a river-name in the S. of Sumatra, and thence became applied to the district through which the river ran, and so to the people who lived there; after which it spread with the Malay dialect until it included not only many allied, but also many foreign, tribes; all Malay-speaking tribes being eventually called Malays without regard to racial origin.

A most important passage in this connection is to be found in Leyden's Tr. of the 'Malay Annals' (1821), p. 20, in which direct reference to such a river is made: 'There is a country in the land of Andalas named Parelambang, which is at present designated Palembang, the raja of which was denominated Damang Lebar Dawn (chieftain Broad-leaf), who derived his origin from Raja Sulan (Chulan?), whose great-grandson he was. The name of its river Muartatang, into which falls another river named Sungey Malaloom, near the source of which is a mountain named the mountain Sagantang Maha Miru.' Here Palembang is the name of a well-known Sumatran State, often described as the original home of the Malay race. In standard Malay 'Damaing Lebar Dawn' would be 'Demang Lebar Dawn.' Raja Chulan is probably some mythical Indian king, the story being evidently derived from Indian traditions. 'Muartatang' may be a mistake for Muar Tanjung, which is a place one heard of in the Peninsula, though I do not know for certain where it is. 'Sungey Malaloom' simply means 'River Malaloom.' 'Sagantang Maha Miru' is, I think, a mistake for Sa-guntang Maha Miru, which is the name used in the Peninsula for the sacred central mountain of the world on which the episode related in the Annals occurred" (see Skeat, Malay Magic, p. 2].

It is a remarkable circumstance, which has been noted by Crawfurd, that a name which appears on Ptolemy's Tables as on the coast of the Golden Chersonese, and which must be located somewhere about Maulmain, is Malæo Kãloö, words which in Javanese (Maláyu-Kulon) would signify "Malays of the West." After this the next (possible) occurrence of the name in literature is in the Geography of Edrisi, who describes Malai as a great island in the eastern seas, or rather as occupying the position of the Lemuria of Mr. Sclater, for (in partial accommodation to the Ptolemaic theory of the Indian Sea) it stretched eastward nearly from the coast of Zinj, i.e. of Eastern Africa, to the vicinity of China. Thus it must be uncertain without further accounts whether it is an adumbration of the great Malay islands (as is on the whole probable) or of the Island of the Malaggashes (Madagascar), if it is either.
We then come to Marco Polo, and after him there is, we believe, no mention of the Malay name till the Portuguese entered the seas of the Archipelago.

the district W. or N.W. of Palembang in

c. 1150.—"The Isle of Malai is very great.
... The people devote themselves to very profitable trade; and there are found here elephants, rhinoceroses, and various aromatic and spices, such as clove, cinnamon, nard ... and nutmeg. In the mountains are mines of gold, of excellent quality ... the people also have windmills."—Edrisi, by Jaubert, i. 945.

c. 1275.—A Chinese notice records under this year that tribute was sent from Siam to the Emperor. "The Siamese had long been at war with the Malay, or Malur, but both nations laid aside their feud and submitted to China."—Notice by Sir T.
Wade, in Dowering's Siam, i. 72.

c. 1292.—"You come to an Island which forms a kingdom, and is called Malaiur.
The people have a king of their own, and a peculiar language. The city is a fine and noble one, and there is a great trade carried on there. All kinds of spicery are to be found there."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 5.

1553.—"And so these Gentiles like the Moors who inhabit the sea-coasts of the Island (Sumatra), although they have each their peculiar language, almost all can speak the Malay of Malacca as being the most general language of those parts."— Barros, I. v. 1.

"... everything with them is to be a gentleman; and this has such prevalence in those parts that you will never find a native Malay, however poor he may be, who will set his hand to lift a thing of his own or anybody else's; every service must be done by slaves."—Ibid. II. vi. 1.

1610.—"I cannot imagine what the Hollanders mean, to suffer these Malaysians, Chinesians, and Moors of these countries, and to assist them in their free trade thorow all the Indies, and forbid it their own servants, countrymen, and Brethren, upon paine of death and losse of goods."—Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 321.

[Mr. Skeat writes: "The word Malaya is now often applied by English writers to the Peninsula as a whole, and from this the term Malaya as a term of wider application (i.e. to the Archipelago) has been coined (see quotation of 1610 above).
The former is very frequently mis-written by English writers as 'Malay, place on the title-page of a book—

MALAYÁLAM. This is the name applied to one of the cultivated Dravidian languages, the closest in its relation to the Tamil. It is spoken along the Malabar coast, on the Western side of the Ghauts (or Maléya mountains), from the Chandragiri River on the North, near Mangalore (entering the sea in 12° 29'), beyond which the language is, for a limited distance, Tulu, and then Canarese, to Trevandum on the South (lat. 8° 29'), where Tamil begins to supersede it.
Tamil, however, also intertwinest with Malayálam all along Malabar. The term Malayálam properly applies to territory, not language, and might be rendered "Mountain region" [See under MALABAR, and Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 90.]

MALDIVES, MALDIVE ISLDS., n.p. The proper form of this name appears to be Male-diva; not, as the estimable Garcia de Orta says, Nale-diva; whilst the etymology which he gives is certainly wrong, hard as it may be to say what is the right one.
The people of the islands formerly designated themselves and their country by a form of the word for 'island' which we have in the Skt. dvipa and the Pali dīpa. We find this reflected in the Divi of Ammianus, and in the Diva and Diba-ját (Pers. plural) of old Arab geographers, whilst it survives in letters of the 18th century addressed to the Ceylon Government (Dutch) by the Sultan of the Isles, who calls his kingdom D positional Raje, and his people Dipheh miuhun. Something like the modern form first appears in Ibn Batuta. He, it will be seen, in his admirable account of these islands, calls them, as it were, Mahal-dives, and says they were so called from the chief group Mahal, which was the residence of the Sultan, indicating a connection with Mahal, ‘a palace.’ This form of the name looks like a foreign ‘striving after meaning.’ But Pyrard de Laval, the author of the most complete account in existence, also says that the name of the islands was taken from Male, that on which the King resided. Bishop Caldwell has suggested that these islands were the dives, or islands, of Male, as Malebra (see MALABAR) was the coast-tract or continent, of Male. It is, however, not impossible that the true etymology was from maldah, ‘a garland or necklace,’ of which their configuration is highly suggestive. [The Madras Gloss, gives Malayal, mal, ‘black,’ and dehip, ‘island,’ from the dark soil. For a full account of early notices of the Maldives, see Mr. Gray’s note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 423 seqq.] Milburn (Or. Commerce, i. 335) says: “This island was (these islands were) discovered by the Portuguese in 1507.” Let us see!

c. 545.—“And round about it (Sielidita or Taprobane, i.e. Ceylon) there are a number of small islands, in all of which you find fresh water and coco-nuts. And these are almost all set close to one another.”—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., cit. xvii.

851.—“Between this Sea (of Horkand) and the Sea called Laravi there is a great number of islands; their number, indeed, it is said, amounts to 1,900; . . . the distance from land to island is 2, 3, or 4 parasangs. They are all inhabited, and all produce coco-palms. . . . The last of these islands is Serendib, in the Sea of Horkand; it is the chief of all; they give the islands the name of Dibajât” (i.e. Dibas).—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinward, i. 4-5.

c. 1030.—“The special name of Diva is given to islands which are formed in the sea, and which appear above water in the form of accumulations of sand; these sands continually augment, spread, and unite, till they present a firm aspect . . . these islands are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their staple product. Those of one class are called Diva-Kâzâb (or the Cowry Divahs), because of the cowries which are gathered from coco-branches planted in the sea. The others are called Diva-Kanbar, from the word kanbar (see COIR), which is the name of the twine made from coco-fibres, with which vessels are stitched.”—Al-Birâni, in Reinward, Fragment., 124.

1150.—See also Edivisi, in Jaubert’s Transl. i. 68. But the translator prints a bad reading, Râbhiât, for Dibajât.

c. 1343.—“Ten days after embarking at Calicut we arrived at the Islands called Dhibat-al-Mahal. . . . These islands are reckoned among the wonders of the World; there are some 2000 of them. Groups of a hundred, or not quite so many, of these islands are found clustered into a ring, and each cluster has an entrance like a harbour-mouth, and it is only there that ships can enter. . . . Most of the trees that grow on these islands are coco-palms. . . . They are divided into regions or groups . . . among which are distinguished . . . 3° Mahal, the group which gives a name to the whole, and which is the residence of the Sultan.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 110 seqq.

1442.—Abdurrazaz also calls them “the isles of Diva-Mahal.”—In Not. et Ets. xiv. 429.

1503.—“But Dom Vasco . . . said that things must go on as they were to India, and there he would inquire into the truth. And so arriving in the Gulf (golfo) where the storm befel them, all were separated, and that vessel which steered badly, parted company with the fleet, and found itself at one of the first islands of Maldives, at which they stopped some days enjoying themselves. For the island abounded in provisions and the men indulged to excess in eating cocos, and fish, and in drinking bad stagnant water, and in disorders with women; so that many died.”—Correa, i. 347.

1563.—“R. Though it be somewhat to interrupt the business in hand,—why is that chain of islands called ‘ Islands of Maldives?’ Of. In this matter of the nomenclature of lands and seas and kingdoms, many of our people make great mistakes even in regard to our own lands; how then can you expect that one can give you the rationale of etymologies of names of foreign tongues? But, never mind; I will tell you what I have heard say. And that is that the right name is not Maldives, but Nalediva; for nala in Malabar means ‘four,’ and diva ‘island,’ so that in the Malabar tongue the name is as much as to say ‘Four Isles.’ . . . And in the same way we call a certain island that is 12 leagues from Goa Angelina (see ANCHEDIVA), because there are five in the group, and so the name in Malabar MAMIRAN, MAMIRA.

MALUM, s. In a ship with English officers and native crew, the mate is called malum sáhib. The word is Ar. mu'allim, literally 'the Instructor,' and is properly applied to the pilot or sailing-master. The word may be compared, thus used, with our 'master' in the Navy. In regard to the first quotation we may observe that Nakhuda (see NACODA) is, rather than Mu'allim, 'the captain'; though its proper meaning is the owner of the ship; the two capacities of owner and skipper being doubtless often combined. The distinction of Mu'allim from Nakhuda accounts for the former title being assigned to the mate.

1497.—"And he sent 20 cruzados in gold, and 20 testoons in silver for the Malemos, which were the pilots, for of all countries would give each month whatever he (the Sheikh) should direct."—Correa, i. 38 (E.T. by Ed. Stanley of Alderley, 88). On this passage the Translator says: "The word is perhaps the Arabic for an instructor, a word in general use all over Africa." It is curious that his varied experience should have failed to recognise the habitual marine use of the term.

1541.—"Meanwhile he sent three caturas (q.v.) to the Port of the Malems (Porto dos Malemos) in order to get some pilots. In this Port of the Bandel of the Malems the ships of the Moors take pilots when they enter the Straits, and when they return they leave them here again."—Correa, iv. 168.

* This Port was immediately outside the Straits, as appears from the description of Dom João de Castro (1541). "Now turning to the 'Gates' of the Strait, which are the chief object of our description, we remark that here the land of Arabia juts out into the sea, forming a prominent Point, and very prolonged. ... This is the point or promontory which Ptolemy calls Posidium. ... In front of it, a little more than a gunshot

"Memirem est radix nodosa, non multum grossa, citrini coloris, sicut curcuma; minor tamen est et subtillior, et asportatur ex Indiæ, et apud physicos orientales est valde nota, et usitatur in passionibus oculi."—Avicenna, Opera, Venet. 1564, p. 345 (lib. ii. tractat. ii.).

The glossary of Arabic terms by Andreas de Alpago of Belluno, attached to various early editions of Avicenna, gives the following interpretation: "Memirem est radix nodosa, non multum grossa, citrini coloris, sicut curcuma; minor tamen est et subtillior, et asportatur ex Indiæ, et apud physicos orientales est valde nota, et usitatur in passionibus oculi."

MAMLUKTAR, s.—H. mu’-amalatdar (from Ar. mu’damala, ‘affairs, business’), and in Mahr. mamlatdar. Chiefly used in Western India. For merly it was the designation, under various native governments, of the chief civil officer of a district, and is now in the Bombay Presidency the title of a native civil officer in charge of a Talook, corresponding nearly to the Tahseeladar of a pargonna in the Bengal Presidency, but of a status somewhat more important.

[1826.—"I now proceeded to the Maamul-t-dar, or farmer of the district. . . ."—Pondurwari Harî, ed. 1873, f. 42.]

MAMMOOL, s.; MAMOOLEE, adj. Custom, Customary. Ar.—H. ma’mul. The literal meaning is ‘practised,’ and then ‘established, customary.’ Ma’mul is, in short, ‘precedent,’ by which all Orientals set as much store as English lawyers, e.g. "And Laban said, It must not be done in our country (lit. It is not so done in our place) to give the younger before the firstborn."—Genesis xxix. 26.

MAMOOTY, MAMOTY, MOMATTY, s. A digging tool of the form usual all over India, i.e. not in the shape of a spade, but in that of a hoe, with the helve at an acute angle with the blade. [See FOWRA.] The word is of S. Indian origin, Tamil mauvett, ‘earth-cutter’; and its vernacular use is confined to the Tamil regions, but it has long been an established term in the list of ordnance stores all over India, and thus has a certain prevalence in Anglo-Indian use beyond these limits.

[1782.—"He marched . . . with two battalions of sepoys . . . who were ordered to make a show of entranching themselves with mamuties. . . ."—Letter of Lt. Mawortney, in Forrest, Selections, iii. 855.]

[1852.—". . . by means of a momety or hatchet, which he ran and borrowed from a husbandman . . . this fellow dug . . . a reservoir. . . ."—Neal, Narrative of Residence in Siam, 138.]

MANCHUA, s. A large cargo-boat, with a single mast and a square sail, much used on the Malabar coast. This is the Portuguese form; the original Malayalam word is manji, [manchi, Skt. mancha, ‘a cot,’ so called apparently from its raised platform for cargo,] and nowadays a nearer approach to this, manje, &c., is usual.

C. 1610.—"Il a une petite Galioye, qu’ils appellent manchoues, fort bien couverte ... et faut huit ou neuf hommes seulement pour la merce."—Puyard de Laval, ii. 26; [Hak. Soc. ii. 42].

1736.—"All ships and vessels ... as well as the munchusas appertaining to the Company’s officers."—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, ii. 31.

Mandatore, s. Port. mandador, ‘one who commands.’

1673.—"Each of which Tribes have a Mandator or Superintendent."—Fryer, 67.

Mandalay, Mandalé, n.p. The capital of the King of Burmah, founded in 1860, 7 miles north of the preceding capital Amarapura, and between 2 and 3 miles from the left bank of the Irawadi. The name was taken from that of a conical isolated hill, rising high above the alluvial plain of the Irawadi, and crowned by a gilt pagoda. The name of the hill (and now of the city at its base) probably represents Mandara, the sacred mountain which in Hindu mythology served the gods as a churning-staff at the churning of the sea. The hill appears as Manidye-taung in Major Grant Allan’s Map of the Environs of Amarapura (1855), published in the Narrative of Major Phayre’s Mission, but the name does not occur in the Narrative itself.

1861.—"Next morning the son of my friendly host accompanied me to the Mandalay Hill, on which there stands in a gilt chapel the image of Shwesayatta, pointing down with outstretched finger to the Palace of Mandalay, interpreted as the divine command there to build a city ... on the other side where the hill falls in an abrupt precipice, sits a gigantic Buddha gazing in motionless meditation on the mountains opposite. There are here some caves in the hard rock, built up with bricks and whitewashed, which are inhabited by eremites. ..."—Bastian’s Travels (German), ii. 89-90.

Mandarin, s. Port. Mandarí, Mandarin. Wedgwood explains and derives the word thus: “A Chinese officer, a name first made known to us by the Portuguese, and like the Indian caste, erroneously supposed to be a native term. From Portuguese mandar, to hold authority, command, govern, &c.” So also T. Hyde in the quotation below. Except as regards the word having been first made known to us by the Portuguese, this is an old and persistent mistake. What sort of form would mandarí be as a derivative from mandar? The Portuguese might have applied to Eastern officials some such word as mandador, which a preceding article (see Mandatore) shows that they did apply in certain cases. But the parallel to the assumed origin of mandarin from mandar would be that English voyagers on visiting China, or some other country in the far East, should have invented, as a title for the officials of that country, a new and abnormal derivation from ‘order,’ and called them orderumbos.

The word is really a slight corruption of Hind. (from Skt.) mantri, ‘a counsellor, a Minister of State,’ for which it was indeed the proper old pre-Mahommedan term in India. It has been adopted, and specially affected in various Indo-Chinese countries, and particularly by the Malays, among whom it is habitually applied to the highest class of public officers (see Crawford’s Malay Dict. s.v. [and Klinkert, who writes manteri, colloquially mentri]). Yet Crawford himself, strange to say, adopts the current explanation as from the Portuguese (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 189). [Klinkert adopts the Skt. derivation.] It is, no doubt, probable that the instinctive “striving after meaning” may have shaped the corruption of mantri into a semblance of mandar. Marsden is still more oddly perverse, videns meliora, detextor securitis, when he says: “The officers next in rank to the Sultan are Mantree, which some apprehend to be a corruption of the word Mandarin, a title of distinction among the Chinese” (H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 285). Ritter adopts the etymology from mandar, apparently after A. W. Schlegel.*

The true etymon is pointed out in Notes and Queries in China and Japan, iii. 12, and by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways for Sept. 1872, p. 186. Several of the quotations below will show that the earlier applications of the title have no reference to China at all, but to officers of state, not only in the Malay countries, but in Continental India. We may add that mantri (see MUNTREE) is still much in vogue among the less barbarous Hill Races on the Eastern frontier of Bengal (e.g. among the Kasuits (see COSSYA) as a denomination for their petty dignitaries under the chief. Gibbon was perhaps aware of the true origin of mandarin; see below.

MANDARIN LANGUAGE, s. The language spoken by the official and literary class in China, as opposed to local dialects. In Chinese it is called Kuan-Hua. It is substantially the language of the people of the northern and middle zones of China, extending to Yunnan. It is not to be confounded with the literary style which is used in books. [See Ball, Things Chinese, 169 seq.]

1674.—"The Language... is called Quenhra (hua), or the Language of Mandarines, because as they spread their command they introduced it, and it is used throughout all the Empire, as Latin in Europe. It is very barren, and as it has more Letters far than any other, so it has fewer words."—Parria y Sousa, E.T. ii. 468.

MANGALORE, n.p. The only place now known by this name is (a) Mangalūr, a port on the coast of Southern Canara and chief town of that district, in lat. 12° 51' N. In Mīr Hūsain Ali’s Life of Haidar it is called “Gorial Bender,” perhaps a corr. of Kandādāl, which is said in the Imp. Gaz. to be the modern native name. [There is a place called Gurupura close by; see Madras Gloss. s.v. Goopore.] The name in this form is found in an inscription of the 11th century, whatever may have been its original form and etymology. [The present name is said to be taken from the temple of Mangalā Devi.] But the name in approximate forms (from maṅgala, ‘gladdness’) is common in India. One other port (b) on the coast of Peninsular Guzerat is formerly well known, now commonly called Munugrole. And another place of the name (c) Mangalvar in the valley of Swat, north of Peshâwar, is mentioned by Hwen T’seang as a city of Gandhāra. It is probably the same that appears in Skt. literature (see Williams, s.v. Mangalá) as the capital of Udyāna.

c. 1343.—"Quitting Fākānūr (see BACANORE) we arrived after three days at the city of Manjarur... which is large and situated on an estuary. It is here that most of the merchants of Fars and Yemen land; pepper and ginger are very abundant."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 78-80.

1442.—"After having passed the port of Bendinaneh (see PANDARANI) situated on the coast of Melibar, (he) reached the port of Mangalor, which forms the frontier of the kingdom of Bidjanagar..."—Abdurrazāk, in India in the Xvth Cent., 20.

1516.—"There is another large river towards the south, along the sea-shore, where there is a very large town, peopled by Moors and Gentiles, of the kingdom of Narsinga, called Mangalore. They also ship there much rice in Moorish ships for Aden, also pepper, which thenceforward the earth begins to produce."—Barbosa, 85.

1727.—"The Fields here bear two Crops of Corn yearly in the Plains; and the higher Grounds produce Pepper, Bettlenut, Sandalwood, Iron and Steel, which make Mangalore a Place of pretty good Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 285, [ed. 1744].

b. Mangalore or Munugrole in Guzerat.

c. 150.—"Συμφορέη... Συμφορά κόμη... Μαγγάλως αισθηταί..." Ptolemy, VII. i. 3.

1516.—"... there is another town of commerce, which has a very good port, and is called Swatli Mangalor, where also many ships of Malabar touch."—Barbosa, 89.

1536.—"... for there was come another catur with letters, in which the Captain of Dez urgently called for help; telling how the King (of Cambay) had equipped large squadrons in the Ports of the Gulf... alleging... that he was sending them to Mangalor to join others in an expedition against Sind... and that all this was false, for he was really sending them in the expectation that the Rumis would come to MANGELIN, s. A small weight, corresponding in a general way to a carat (q.v.), used in the S. of India and in Ceylon for weighing precious stones. The word is Télegu manjāḍī; in Tamil manjāḍi, [from Skt. manju, 'beautiful']; the seed of the Aden-anthera pavonina (Compare RUTTEE). On the origin of this weight see Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India. The manjāḍī seed was used as a measure of weight from very early times. A parcel of 50 taken at random gave an average weight of 4-13 grs. Three parcels of 10 each, selected by eye as large, gave average 5-02 and 5-03 (op. cit. p. 47).

1516.—Diamonds "... sell by a weight which is called a Mangiar, which is equal to 2 tare and $\frac{1}{2}$, and 2 tare make a carat of good weight, and 4 tare weigh one fanam." —Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 321a.

1554.—(In Ceylon) "A calamiga contains 20 mangelins, each mangelin 8 grains of rice; a Portugues of gold weighs 8 calamjas and 2 mangelins." —A. Nunez, 35.

1584.—"There is another sort of weight called Mangialino, which is 5 grains of Venice weight, and therewith they weigh diamonds and other jewels." —Barret, in Hakl. ii. 409.

1665.—"Le poids principal des Diamans est le mangelin; il pese cinq grains et trois cinquièmes." —Thesavon, v. 299.

1675.—"At the mine of Raolconda they weigh by Mangelin, a Mangelin being one Carat and three quarters, that is 7 grains. ... At the Mine of Soumpelor in Bengal they weigh by Rati's (see RUTTEE), and the Rati is $\frac{1}{3}$ of a Carat, or 3 grains. In the Kingdoms of Golconda and Visapoor, they make use of Mangelina, but a Mangelin in those parts is not above 1 carat and $\frac{1}{3}$. The Portugals in Goa make use of the same Weights in Goa; but a Mangelin there is not above 5 grains." —Tavernier, E.T. ii. 141; [ed. Ball, ii. 87, and see ii. 438.]

MANGO, s. The royal fruit of the Mangifera indica, when of good quality is one of the richest and best fruits in the world. The original of the word is Tamil mān-lāy or mān-gūdy, i.e. mān fruit (the tree being mānmarum, ‘mān-tree’). The Portuguese formed from this mango, which we have adopted as mango. The tree is wild in the forests of various parts of India; but the fruit of the wild tree is uneatable.

The word has sometimes been supposed to be Malay; but it was in fact introduced into the Archipelago, along with the fruit itself, from S. India. Rumphius (Herb. Amb.yn. i. 95) traces its then recent introduction into the islands, and says that it is called (Malaisé) "mangka, vel vulgo Manga et Mapelaum." This last word is only the Tamil Māpałam, i.e. ‘mān fruit’ again. The close approximation of the Malay mangka to the Portuguese form might suggest that the latter name was derived from Malaccia. But we see mango already used by Varthema, who, according to Garcia, never really went beyond Malabar. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The modern standard Malay word is mangga, from which the Port. form was probably taken. The other Malay form quoted from Rumphius is in standard Malay mapelām, with mēpēlam, hēmēlam, ampelām, and 'pēlam or 'plam as variants. The Javanese is pēlem."

The word has been taken to Madagascar, apparently by the Malayan colonists, whose language has left so large an impression there, in the precise shape mangka. Had the fruit been an Arab importation it is improbable that the name would have been introduced in that form.

The N. Indian names are Ām and Amba, and variations of these we find in several of the older European writers. Thus Fr. Jordanus, who had been in the Konkan, and appreciated the progenitors of the Goa and Bombay Mango (c. 1328), calls the fruit Aniba. Some 30 years later John de' Marignolli calls the tree "amburan, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach" (Cathay, &c., ii. 362). Garcia de Orta shows how early the Bombay fruit was prized. He seems to have been the owner of the parent tree. The Skt. name is Amra, and this we find in Hwen T'sang (c. 645) phoneticised as 'An-mo-lo.

The mango is probably the fruit alluded to by Theophrastus as having caused dysentery in the army of Alexander. (See the passage s.v. JACK.)

c. 1328.—"Est etiam alia arbor quae fructus facit ad modum pruni, grossissimos, qui vocantur Aniba. Hi sunt fructus ita dulces et amabiles, quod ore tenus exprimi hoc minimè possit."—Fr. Jordanus, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 42.

c. 1334.—"The mango tree (Ambura) resembles an orange-tree, but is larger and more leafy; no other tree gives so much shade, but this shade is unwholesome, and whoever sleeps under it gets fever."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 125. At ii. 185 he writes Amba. [The same charge is made against the tamarind; see Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 81.]

c. 1349.—"They have also another tree called Amburas, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach."—John de' Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 362.

1510.—"Another fruit is also found here, which is called Amba, the stem of which is called Manga, &c.—Varthema, 160-161.

c. 1526.—"Of the vegetable productions peculiar to Hindustan one is the mango (ambhe). ... Such mangos as are good are excellent." &c.—Baber, 324.

1563.—"O. Boy! go and see what two vessels those are coming in—you see them from the varanda here—and they seem but small ones.

"Servant. I will bring you word presently.*

"S. Sir! it is Simon Toscano, your tenant in Bombay, and he brings this hamper of mangas for you to make a present to the Governor, and says that when he has mooed the boat he will come here to stop.

"O. He couldn't have come more à propos. I have a manga-tree (mangeira) in that island of mine which is remarkable for both its two crops, one at this time of year, the other at the end of May, and much as the other crop excels this in quality for fragrance and flavour, this is just as remarkable for coming out of season. But come, let us taste them before His Excellency. Boy! take out six mangas."—Garcia, ff. 134r, 135. This author also mentions that the mangas ofOrmuz were the most celebrated; also certain mangas of Guzerat, not large, but of surpassing fragrance and flavour, and having a very small stone. Those of Balaghat were both excellent and big; the Doctor had seen two that weighed 4 arrelat and a half (44 lbs.); and those of Bengal, Pegu, and Malacca were also good.

1569.—"There is much fruit that comes from Arabia and Persia, which they call mangoes (mangas), which is very good fruit." —Cronica dos Reys Dormus, translated from the Arabic in 1569.

c. 1590.—"The Mangoe (Amba). ... This fruit is unrivalled in colour, smell, and taste; and some of the gourmands of Ttrán and Iran place it above musk melons and grapes. ... If a half-ripe mango, together with its stalk to a length of about two fingers, be taken from the tree, and the broken end of its stalk be closed with warm wax, and kept in butter or honey, the fruit will retain its taste for two or three months."—An, ed. Blockmann, i. 67-68.

1614.—"Two jars of Manges at rupees 45."—Foster, Letters, iii. 41.

1615.—"George Durois sent in a present of two pottles of Mangases."—Cocke's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 79.

"There is another very liequiovour fruit called Amazonies growing on trees, and it is as bigge as a great quince, with a very great stone in it."—De Montfort, 20.

1622.—P. della Valle describes the tree and fruit at Miná (Minha) near Hormuz, under the name of Amba, as an exotic introduced from India. Afterwards at Goa he speaks of it as "manga or ambà."—*pp. 313-14, and 481; [Hak. Soc. i. 40.]

1663.—"Ambas, or Mangues, are in season during two months in summer, and are plentiful and cheap; but those grown at Delhi are indifferent. The best come from Bengale, Golconda, and Goa, and these are indeed excellent. I do not know any sweet-meat more agreeable."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 249.

1675.—Of the Goa Mango.* Fryer says justly: "When ripe, the Apples of the Hesperides are but Fables to them; for Taste, the Neetarite, Peach, and Apricot fall short. ..."—*p. 182.

1679.—"Mango and saio (see SOY), two sorts of sauces brought from the East Indies."—Locke's Journal, in Ed. King's Life, 1830, i. 249.

* The excellence of the Goa Mangoes is stated to be due to the care and skill of the Jennils (Annae Martimino, ii. 270). In S. India all good kinds have Portuguese or Mahomedan names. The author of Travels on My Frontier, 1888, p. 148, mentions the luscious peîris and the delicate fôsô as two fine varieties, supposed to bear the names of a certain Peres and a certain Afonso.
MANGO-BIRD. s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the beautiful golden oriole (Oriolus aureus, Jerdon). Its “loud mellow whistle” from the mango-groves and other gardens, which it affects, is associated in Upper India with the invasion of the hot weather.

1878.—“The mango-bird glances through the groves, and in the early morning announces his beautiful but unwelcome presence with his merle melody.” — Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 59.

MANGO-FISH. s. The familiar name of an excellent fish (Polynemus Vissea of Buchanan, P. paradises of Day), in flavour somewhat resembling the smelt, but, according to Dr. Mason, nearly related to the mullets. It appears in the Calcutta market early in the hot season, and is much prized, especially when in roe. The Hindu-stani name is tapisi or tapussi, ‘an ascetic,’ or ‘penitent,’ but we do not know the rationale of the name. Buchanan says that it is owing to the long fibres (or free rays), proceeding from near the head, which lead the natives to associate it with penitents who are forbidden to shave. [Dr. Grierson writes: “What the connection of the fish with a hermit was I never could ascertain, unless it was that like wandering Fakirs, they disappear directly the rains begin. Compare the uposatha of the Buddhists.” But tapasya means ‘produced by heat,’ and is applied to the month Phāgum (Feb.-March) when the fish appears; and this may be the origin of the name.]

1781.—“The Board of Trustees Assemble on Tuesday at the New Tavern, where the Committee meet to eat Mangoe Fish for the benefit of the Subscribers and on other special affairs.”—Hickey’s Bengal Gazette, March 3.

[1820.—“... the mango fish (so named from its appearing during the mango season). ... By the natives they are named the Tapussi (penitent) fish, (abbreviated by Europeans to Tipay) from their resembling a class of religious penitents, who ought never to shave.”—Hamilton, Des. of Hindoostan, i. 58.]

MANGO-SHOWERs, s. Used in Madras for showers which fall in March and April, when the mangoes begin to ripen.

MANGO-TRICK. One of the most famous tricks of Indian jugglers, in which they plant a mango-stone, and show at brief intervals the tree shooting above ground, and successively producing leaves, flowers, and fruit. It has often been described, but the description given by the Emperor Jahangir in his Autobiography certainly surpasses all in its demand on our belief.

c. 1610.—“... Khaun-e-Jehaun, one of the nobles present, observed that if they spoke truly he should wish them to produce for his conviction a mulberry-tree. The men arose without hesitation, and having in ten separate spots set some seed in the ground, they recited among themselves ... when instantly a plant was seen springing from each of the ten places, and each proved the tree required by Khaun-e-Jehaun. In the same manner they produced a mango, an apple-tree, a cypress, a pine-apple, a fig-tree, an almond, a walnut ... open to the observation of all present, the trees were perceived gradually and slowly springing from the earth, to the height of one or perhaps of two cubits ... Then making a sort of procession round the trees as they stood ... in a moment there appeared on the respective trees a sweet mango without the rind, an almond fresh and ripe, a large fig of the most delicious kind ... the fruit being pulled in my presence, and every one present was allowed to taste it. This, however, was not all; before the trees were removed there appeared among the foliage, birds of such surpassing beauty, in colour and shape, and melody and song, as the world never saw before. At the close of the operation, the foliage, as in autumn, was seen to put on its variegated tints, and the trees gradually disappeared into the earth.

'c. 1650.—'Then they thrust a piece of stick into the ground, and asked the Company what Fruit they would have. One told them he would have Mangues; then one of the Mountebanks hiding himself in the middle of a Sheet, stoop to the ground five or six times one after another. I was so curious to go upstairs, and look out of a window, to see if I could spy what the Mountebank did, and perceived that after he had cut himself under the armpits with a Razor, he rub'd the stick with his Blood. After the two first times that he rais'd himself, the stick seemed to the eye to grow. The third time there sprung out branches with young buds. The fourth time the tree was covered with leaves; and the fifth time it bore flowers. . . . The English Minister protested that he could not give his consent that any Christian should be Spectator of such delusions. So that as soon as he saw that these Mountebanks had of a dry stick, in less than half-an-hour, made a Tree four or five foot high, that bare leaves and flowers, as in the Spring-time: he went about to break it, protesting that he would not give the Communion to any person that should stay any longer to see those things."—Tavernier, Travels made English, by J.P., ii. 36; [ed. Ball, i. 67, seq.]

1667.—"When two of these Jaquins (see JOGEE) that are eminent, do meet, and you stir them up on the point and power of their knowledge or Jaquisme, you shall see them do such tricks out of sight to one another, that I know not if Simon Magus could have outdone them. For they divine what one thinketh, make the Branch of a Tree blossom and bear fruit in less than an hour, hatch eggs in their bosome in less than half a quarter of an hour, and bring forth such birds as you demand: I mean, if what is said of them is true. . . . For, as for me, I am with all my curiosity not happy Men, that are present at, and see these great feats."—Bernier, E.T. 103; [ed. Constable, 321].

1679.—"Others presented a Mock-Creation of a Mango-Tree, arising from the Stone in a short space (which they did in Hugger-Mugger, being very careful to avoid being discovered) with Fruit Green and Ripe; so that a Man must stretch his Fancy, to imagine it Witchcraft; though the common Sort think no less."—Fryer, 192.

1690.—"Others are said to raise a Mango-Tree, with ripe Fruit upon its Branches, in the space of one or two Hours. To confirm which Relation, it was affirmed confidently to me, that a Gentleman who had plucked one of these Mangoes, fell sick upon it, and was never well as long as he kept it till he consulted a Bramin for his Health, who prescrib'd his only Remedy would be the restoring of the Mango, by which he was restor'd to his Health again."—Ovington, 258-259.

1726.—"They have some also who will show you the kernel of a mango-fruit, or may be only a twig, and ask if you will see the fruit or this stick planted, and in a short time see a tree grow from it and bear fruit: after they have got their answer the jugglers (Koerde-daneres) wrap themselves in a blanket, stick the twig into the ground, and then put a basket over them (kc. &c.).

"There are some who have prevailed on these jugglers by much money to let them see how they have accomplished this.

"These have revealed that the jugglers made a hole in their bodies under the armpits, and rubbed the twig with the blood from it, and every time that they stuck it in the ground they would kill it, and in this way they clearly saw it to grow and to come to the perfection before described.

"This is asserted by a certain writer who has seen it. But this can't move me to believe it!"—Valentijn, v. (Chorom.) 53.

Our own experience does not go beyond Dr. Fryer's, and the hugger-mugger performance that he disparages. But many others have testified to more remarkable skill. We once heard a traveller of note relate with much spirit such an exhibition as witnessed in the Deccan. The narrator, then a young officer, determined with a comrade, at all hazards of fair play or foul, to solve the mystery. In the middle of the trick one suddenly seized the conjuror, whilst the other uncovered and snatched at the mango-plant. But lo! it came from the earth with a root, and the mystery was darker than ever! We tell the tale as it was told.

It would seem that the trick was not unknown in European conjuring of the 16th or 17th centuries, e.g.

1657.—". . . . trium horarium spatii arbustumulam veram systemae longitudinem e mensa facere enasici, ut et alias arbores frondiferas et fructiferas."—Magia Universalis, of P. Gaspar Schottus e Soc. Jes., Herbipoli, 1657, i. 32.

MANGOSTEEN, s. From Malay manggusta (Crawfurd), or manggidan (Favre), in Javanese Manggis. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The modern standard Malay form used in the W. coast of the Peninsula is manggis, as in Javanese, the forms manggusta and manggistan never being heard there. The Siamese form maangkhut given in McFarland's Siamese Grammar is probably from the Malay manggusta. It was very interesting to me to find that some distinct trace of this word was still preserved in the name of this fruit at Patani-Kelantan on the E. coast, where it was called bawch 'seta (or 'setar), i.e. the 'setar fruit,' as well as occasionally mestar or mesetar, clearly a corruption of some such old form as manggistar."

This delicious fruit is known throughout the Archipelago, and in Siam, by modifications of the same name; the delicious fruit of the Garcinia Mangostana (Nat. Ord. Guttiferae). It is strictly a tropical fruit, and, in fact, near the coast does not bear fruit further north than lat. 14°. It is a native of the Malay Peninsula and the adjoining islands.

1563.—"R. They have bragged much to me of a fruit which they call mangostana; let us hear what you have to say of these.

"O. What I have heard of the mangostan is that 'tis one of the most delicious fruits that they have in these regions. . . ."

—Garcia, f. 151v.

1598.—"There are yet other fruits, as . . . Mangostaine [in Hak. Soc. Mangostains] . . . but because they are of small account I think it not requisite to write severally of them."—Linschoten, 96; [Hak. Soc. ii. 34].

1631.—

"Cedant Hesperii longe hinc, mala aurea, fructus, Ambrosia pascit Mangostan et nectare divers . . . Inter omnes Indiae fructus longe sapidissimum."

[1682.—"The Mangosthan is a Fruit growing by the Highways in Java, upon bushes, like our Sloe."—Mandelslo, tr. Daviaq, Bk. ii. 121 (Stanz. Dict.).]

1727.—"The Mangostane is a delicious Fruit, almost in the Shape of an Apple, The Skin is thick and red, being dried it is a good Astringent. The Kernels (if I may so call them) are like Cloves of Garlic, of a very agreeable Taste, but very cold."—A. Hamilton, ii. 80 [ed. 1744].

MANGROVE, s. The sea-loving genera Rhizophora and Avicennia derive this name, which applies to both, from some happy accident, but from which of two sources may be doubtful. For while the former genus is, according to Crawfurd, called by the Malays manggi-manggi, a term which he supposes to be the origin of the English name, we see from Oviedo that one or other was called mangle in S. America, and in this, which is certainly the origin of the French manglier, we should be disposed also to seek the derivation of the English word. Both genera are universal in the tropical tidal estuaries of both Old World and New. Prof. Sayce, by an amusing slip, or oversight probably of somebody else's slip, quotes from Humboldt that "maize, mangle, hammock, canoe, tobacco, are all derived through the medium of the Spanish from the Haytian mahiz, mangle, hamaca, canoa, and tabaco." It is, of course, the French and not the English mangle that is here in question. [Mr. Skeat observes: "I believe the old English as well as French form was mangle, in which case Prof. Sayce would be perfectly right. Mangrove is probably mangle-grove. The Malay manggi-manggi is given by Klinkert, and is certainly on account of the reduplication, native. But I never heard it in the Peninsula, where mangrove is always called baku."]

The mangrove abounds on nearly all the coasts of further India, and also on the sea margin of the Ganges Delta, in the backwaters of S. Malabar, and less luxuriantly on the Indus mouths.

1535.—"Of the Tree called Mangle. . . . These trees grow in places of mire, and on the shores of the sea, and of the rivers, and streams, and torrents that run into the sea. They are trees very strange to see . . . they grow together in vast numbers, and many of their branches seem to turn down and change into roots . . . and these plant themselves in the ground like stems, so that the tree looks as if it had many legs joining one to the other."—Oviedo, in Ramusio, iii. f. 146v.

"So coming to the coast, embarked in a great Canoa with some 30 Indians, and 5 Christians, whom he took with him, and coasted along amid solitary places and islets, passing sometimes into the sea itself for 4 or 5 leagues,—among certain trees, lofty, dense and green, which grow in the very sea-woter, and which they call mangle."—Ibid. f. 224.

1553.—"... by advice of a Moorish pilot, who promised to take the people by night to a place where water could be got . . . and either because the Moor desired to land many times on the shore by which he was conducting them, seeking to get away from the hands of those whom he was conducting, or because he wasreal perplexed by its being night, and in the middle of a great growth of mangrove (mangues) he never succeeded in finding the wells of which he spoke."—Barroso, I.
v. 4.

c. 1380.—"'Smite my timbers, do the trees bear shellfish?' The tide in the Gulf of Mexico does not ebb and flow above two feet except in the springs, and the ends of the drooping branches of the mangrove trees that here cover the shore, are clustered, in the wash of the water, with a small well-flavoured oyster."—Tom Cringle, ed.
1865, 119.

MANILLA-MAN, s. This term is applied to natives of the Philippines, who are often employed on shipboard, and especially furnish the quartermasters (Seacunny, q.v.) in Lascar crews on the China voyage. But Manilla-man seems also, from Wilson, to be used in S. India as a hybrid from Telug, manellâ rádu, 'an itinerant dealer in coral and gems'; perhaps in this sense, as he says, from Skt. manî,
'a jewel,' but with some blending also of the Port. manilha, 'a bracelet.'
(Compare COBRA-MANILLA.)

MANJEE, s. The master, or steersman, of a boat or any native river-craft; Hind. mânjâ, Beng. mafi and mafhî, 'all from Skt. mâyâ,
'one who stands in the middle'].
The word is also a title borne by the head men among the Paharis or Hill-people of Râjmahal (Wilson), [and as equivalent for Majhwar, the name of an important Dravidian tribe on the borders of the N.W. Provinces and Chota Nagpur].

1683.—"We were forced to track our boat till 4 in the Afternoon, when we saw a great black cloud arise out of ye North with much lightning and thunder, which made our Mangee or Steerman advise us to fasten our boat in some Creeks."—Hedges, Diary,
Hak. Soc. i. 88.

[1706.—"Manjee." See under HARRY.]

1781.—"This is to give notice that the principal Gaut Mangies of Calcutta have entered into engagements at the Police Office to supply all Persons that apply there with Boats and Binderows, and to give security for the Dandies."—India Gazette, Feb. 17.

1874.—"Mr. Austin and his head bearer, who were both in the room of the budgerow, are the only persons known to be drowned.
The manjee and dandees have not ap-ppeared."—In Seton-Karr, i. 25.

1810.—"Their manjies will not fail to take every advantage of whatever distress, MARGOSA. s. A name in the S. of India and Ceylon for the Nim (see NEEM) tree. The word is a corruption of Port. amargosa, 'bitter,' indicating the character of the tree. This gives rise to an old Indian proverb, traceable as far back as the Jatakas, that you cannot sweeten the nim tree though you water it with syrup and ghee (Naturam expellas furcâ, &c.).

1727.—"The wealth of an evil man shall another evil man take from him, just as the crows come and eat the fruit of the margoise tree as soon as it is ripe."—Apotthegms translated in Valentijn, v. (Ceylon) 390.

1782.—"... ils lavent le malade avec de l'eau froide, ensuite ils le frottent rude- ment avec de la feuille de Margosier."—Sonnert, i. 208.

1834.—"Adjacent to the Church stand a number of tamarind and margosa trees."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 183.

MARKHORE, s. Pers. mahr-khor, 'snake-eater.' A fine wild goat of the Western Himalaya; Cepra megaceros, Hutton.

1851.—"Hence the people of the country call it the Markhor (eater of serpents)."—Edwards, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 474.

1895.—"Never more would he chase the ibex and makor."—Mrs. Croker, Village Tales, 112.

MARTABAN, n.p. This is the conventional name, long used by all the trading nations, Asiatic and European, for a port on the east of the Irawadi Delta and of the Sitang estuary, formerly of great trade, but now in comparative decay. The original name is Talaing, Mel-ta-man, the meaning of which we have been unable to ascertain.

1514.—"... passed then before Marta- man, the people also heathens; men expert in everything, and first-rate merchants; great masters of accounts, and in fact the greatest in the world. They keep their accounts in books like us. In the said country is great producne of lac, clothes, and provisions."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, p. 80.

1545.—"At the end of these two days the King... caused the Captains that were at the Guard of the Gates to leave them and retire; whereupon the miserable City of Martabano was delivered to the mercy of the Souldiers... and therein showed themselves so cruel-minded, that the thing they made least reckoning of was to kill 100 men for a crown."—Pindo, in Cogan, 203.

1553.—"And the towns which stand outside this gulf of the Isles of Pegu (of which we have spoken) and are placed along the coast of that country, are Vagara, Martaban, a city notable in the great trade that it enjoys, and further on Rey, Talaga, and Tavay."—Barros, l. ix. 1.

1586.—"The city of Martaban hath its front to the south-east, south, and southwest, and stands on a river which there enters the sea... it is a city of Manparagia, a Prince of the King of Pegu's."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 129v, 130v.

1680.—"That the English may settle factories at Serian, Pegu, and Ava... and alsose that they may settle a factory in like manner at Mortavan..."—Articles to be proposed to the King of Barma and Pegu in Notes and Eats, No. iii. p. 8.

1695.—"Concerning Bartholomew Rodriges... I am informed and do believe he put into Mortavan for want of wood and water, and was there seized by the King's officers, because not bound to that Place."—Governor Higgison, in Dalrymple, Or. Repert. ii. 342-3.

MARTABAN, s. This name was given to vessels of a peculiar pottery, of very large size, and glazed, which were famous all over the East for many centuries, and were exported from Martaban. They were sometimes called Pegu jars, and under that name specimens were shown at the Great Exhibition of 1851. We have not been able to obtain recent information on the subject of this manufacture. The word appears to be now obsolete in India, except as a colloquial term in Telegu. [The word is certainly not obsolete in Upper India: "The mar- taban' (Plate ii. fig. 10) is a small deep jar with an elongated body, which is used by Hindus and Muhammadans to keep pickles and acid articles" (Halli- fax, Mono. of Punjab Pottery, p. 9). In the endeavour to supply a Hindi deriva- tion it has been derived from im- rita-bân, 'the holder of the water of immortality.' In the Arabian Nights the word appears in the form bartaman, and is used for a crock in which gold is buried. (Burton, xi. 26). Mr. Bell saw some large earthenware jars at Malé, some about 2 feet high, called rumba; others larger and barrel-shaped, called māṭābān. (Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 259.) For the modern manufacture, see Scott, Gazetteer of Upper Burma, 1900, Pt. i. vol. ii. 399 seq.]

c. 1350.—"Then the Princess made me a present consisting of dresses, of two elephant-loads of rice, of two she-buffaloes, ten sheep, four rolls of cordial syrup, and four Martabāns, or huge jars, filled with pepper, citron, and mango, all prepared with salt, as for a sea-voyage."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 253.

(" Un grand bassin de Martabani.")—1001 Jours, ed. Paris 1826, ii. 19. We do not know the date of these stories. The French translator has a note explaining "porcelaine verte."

1508.—"Le lac (acre) which your Highness desired me to send, it will be a piece of good luck to get, because these ships depart early, and the vessels from Pegu and Martaban come late. But I hope for a good quantity of it, as I have given orders for it."—Letter from the Viceroy Dom Francisco Almeida to the King. In Correa, i. 900.

1516.—"In this town of Martaban are made very large and beautiful porcelain vases, and some of glazed earthenware of a black colour, which are highly valued among the Moors, and they export them as merchandise."—Barboss, 185.

1593.—"In this town many of the great earthen pots are made, which in India are called Martavananas, and many of them carried throughout all India, of all sorts both small and great; some are so great that they will hold full two pipes of water. The cause why so many are brought into India is for that they use them in every house, and in their ships instead of casks."—Linschoten, p. 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 101; see also i. 28, 285.]

1610.—"... des arres les plus belles, les mieux vernis et les mieux faconnées que j'ay eu ailleurs. Il y en a qui tienent autant qu'une pippe et plus. Elles se font au Royaume de Martaban, d'où on les apporte, et d'où elles prennon leur nom par toute l'Inde."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 179; [Hak. Soc. i. 289.]

1615.—"Vasa figulina quae vulgo Martabania dicitur per Indian notae sunt... Per Orientem ornem, quin et Lusitaniam, horum est usu."—Jarric, Thesaurus Rev. Indie, pt. ii. 389.

1673.—"... to that end offer Rice, Oyl, and Cocoe-Nuts in a thick Grove, where they piled an huge Heap of long Jars like Mortivana."—Fryer, 180.

1688.—"They took it out of the cask, and put it into earthen Jars that held about eight Barrels apiece. These they call Montaban Jars, from a town of that name in Pegu, whence they are brought, and carried all over India."—Dampier, ii. 98.

c. 1690.—"Sunt autem haec vastissimae ac turgidae ollae in regionibus Martavana et Siamana confectiones, quae per totam transferruntur Indian ad varias liquores conservandos."—Rumphius, i. ch. iii.

1711.——"... Pegu, Quedah, Jahore and all their own Coasts, whence they are plentifully supply'd with several Necessaries, they otherwise must want; As Ivory, Beeswax, Mortivan and small Jars, Pepper, &c."—Lockyer, 35.

1726.—"... and the Martavanas containing the water to drink, when empty require two persons to carry them."—Valentijn, v. 254.

"The goods exported hitherward (from Pegu) are ... glazed pots (called Martavans after the district where they properly belong), both large and little."—Ibid. v. 128.

1727.—"Martavan was one of the most flourishing Towns for Trade in the East... They make earthen Ware there still, and glaze them with Lead-car. I have seen some Jars made there that could contain two Hogsheads of Liquor."—A. Hamilton, i. 63, [ed. 1744, ii. 62].

1740.—"The Pay Master is likewise ordered ... to look out for all the Pegu Jars in Town, or other vessels proper for keeping water."—In Wheeler, iii. 194.

Such jars were apparently imitated in other countries, but kept the original name. Thus Baillie Fraser says that "certain jars called Martaban were manufactured in Oman."—Journey into Khorasan, 18.

MARTIL, MARTOL, s. A hammer. Hind mārtol, from Port. martello, but assisted by imaginary connection with Hind mār-nā, ' to strike.'

MARTINGALE, s. This is no specially Anglo-Indian word; our excuse for introducing it is the belief that it is of Arabic origin. Popular assumption, we believe, derives the name from a mythical Colonel Martin- gale. But the word seems to come to us from the French, in which language, besides the English use, Littré gives chausses à la martingale as meaning "culottes dont le pont était placé par derrière," and this he strangely declares to be the true and original meaning of the word. His etymology, after Ménage, is from Martiques in Provence, where, it is alleged, breeches of this kind were worn. Skew seems to accept these explanations. [But see his Concise Diet., where he inclines to the view given in this article, and adds: "I find Arab, rataka given by Richardson as a verbal root, whence ratak, going with a short quick step."] But there is a Span. word al-martaga, for a kind of bridle, which Urrea quoted by Dozy derives from verb Arab, rataka, "qui, à la IVe forme signifie 'effect ut brevibus assibus incederet.'" This is precisely the effect of a martingale. And we venture to say that probably the word bore its English meaning originally also in French and Spanish, and came from Arabic direct into the latter tongue. Dozy himself, we should add, is inclined to derive the Span. word from al-mirta'a, 'a halter.'

MARWÁREE, n.p. and s. This word Márwârî, properly a man of the Mârwâr [Skt. maru, 'desert'], or Jodhpur country in Râjputâna, is used in many parts of India as synonymous with Banya (see BANYAN) or Sowcar, from the fact that many of the traders and money-lenders have come originally from Mârwâr, most frequently Jains in religion. Compare the Lombard of medieval England, and the caorsino of Dante's time.

MARYACAR, n.p. According to R. Drummond and a MS. note on the India Library copy of his book R. Catholics in Malabar were so called. Marya Karar, or 'Mary's People.' [The word appears to be really marakkar, of which two explanations are given. Logan (Malabar, i. 332 note) says that Marakkar means 'doer or follower of the Law' (margam), and is applied to a foreign religion, like that of Christians and Mohammedians. The Madras Gloss. (iii. 474) derives it from Mal. marakkalam, 'boat,' and kar, a termination showing possession, and defines it as a 'titular appellation of the Moplah Mahommedans on the S.W. coast."

MASCABAR, s. This is given by C. P. Brown (MS. notes) as an Indo-Portuguese word for 'the last day of the month,' quoting Calcutta Review, viii. 345. He suggests as its etymon Hind. mâs-ke-bû'ad, 'after a month.' [In N. Indian public offices the màskâbâr is well known as the monthly statement of cases decided during the month. It has been suggested that it represents the Port. mes-acabar, 'end of the month'; but according to Platts, it is more probably a corruption of Hind. mâsik-wâr or mût-kâ-wâr.]

MASH, s. Hind. mûsh, [Skt. másha, 'a bean']; Phaseolus radiatus, Roxb. One of the common Hindu pulses. [See MOONG.]

MASKEE. This is a term in Chinese "pigeon," meaning 'never mind,' 'n'importe,' which is constantly in the mouths of Europeans in China. It is supposed that it may be the corruption or ellipsis of a Portuguese expression, but nothing satisfactory has been suggested. [Mr. Skene writes: "Surely this is simply Port. mas que, probably imported direct through Macao, in the sense of 'although, even, in spite of,' like French malgré. And this seems to be its meaning in 'pigeon':"

"That nightey tim begin chop-chop,
One young man walkee—no can stop.
Maskee snow, maskee ice!
He eally flyg with chop so nice—Topsdide Galow!
'Excelstior,' in 'pigeon.'"]

MASULIPATAM, n.p. This coast town of the Madras Presidency is sometimes vulgarly called Machilipatam or Machhi-bandar, or simply Bandar (see BUNDER, 2); and its name explained (Hind. machhi, 'fish') as Fish-town, [the Madras Gloss. says from an old tradition of a whale being stranded on the shore.] The etymology may originally have had such a connection, but there can be no doubt that the name is a trace of the Μούσωλια and Μαυσολεύν πεσαμον ἐκβολαι which we find in Ptolemy's Tables; and of the MasaMá producing muslins, in the Periplus. [In one of the old Logos the name is transformed into Mesopotamia (J.R. As. Soc., Jan. 1900, p. 158). In a letter of 1605-6 it appears as Mesepotamya (Birdwood, First Letter Book, 73).

1684. —"These sort of Women are so nimble and active that when the present king went to see Masilipatan, nine of them undertook to represent the figure of an Elephant; four making the four feet, four the body, and one the trunk; upon which the King, sitting in a kind of Throne, made his entry into the City."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 65; [ed. Balj, i. 158].

1789.—"Masilipatam, which last word, by the bye, ought to be written Machipatan (Fish-town), because of a Whale that happened to be stranded there 150 years ago."—Note on Seir Mutaghérin, iii. 370.

c. 1790.—"... clothes of great value ... from the countries of Bengal, Bunaras, China, Kashmir, Boorhanpoor, Mutchiliputtun, &c."—Meer Hussein Ali, H. of Hyder Naik, 383.

MATE, MATY, s. An assistant under a head servant; in which sense or something near it, but also sometimes in the sense of a 'head-man,' the word is in use almost all over India. In the Bengal Presidency we have a mate-bearer for the assistant body-servant (see BEARER); the mate attendant on an elephant under the mahout; a mate (head) of coolies or jomponnies (q.v.) (see JOMPON), &c. And in Madras the maty is an under-servant, whose business it is to clean crockery, knives, &c., to attend to lamps, and so forth.

The origin of the word is obscure, if indeed it has not more than one origin. Some have supposed it to be taken from the English word in the sense of comrade, &c.; whilst Wilson gives metti as a distinct Malayalam word for an inferior domestic servant, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tamil met, 'high']. The last word is of very doubtful genuineness. Neither derivation will explain the fact that the word occurs in the Ain, in which the three classes of attendants on an elephant in Akbar's establishment are styled respectively Mahdávat, Bhá, and Meth; two of which terms would, under other circumstances, probably be regarded as corruptions of English words. This use of the word we find in Skt. dictionaries as mettha, mentha, and menyé, 'an elephant-keeper or feeder.' But for the more general use we would query whether it may not be a genuine Prakrit form from Skt. mitra, 'associate, friend'? We have in Pali metta, 'friendship,' from Skt. mattr.

c. 1590.—"A meth fetches fodder and assists in caparisoning the elephant. Meths of all classes get on the march 4 dámá daily, and at other times 31/2."—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 125.

1810. —"In some families mates or assistants are allowed, who do the drudgery."—Williamson, V. M. i. 241.

1837.—"One matee."—See Letters from Madras, 106.

1872. —"At last the morning of our departure came. A crowd of porters stood without the veranda, chattering and squabbling, and the mate distributed the boxes and bundles among them."—A True Reformer, ch. vi.

1873.—"To procure this latter supply (of green food) is the daily duty of one of the attendants, who in Indian phraseology is termed a mate, the title of Mahout being reserved for the head keeper" (of an elephant).—Sat. Rev. Sept. 6, 302.

MATRANEE, s. Properly Hind. from Pers. miktártáni; a female sweeper (see MEHTAB). [In the following extract the writer seems to mean Bhathiýara or Bhathiyárin, the wife of a Bhathiyara or inn-keeper.]

[1785.—"... a handsome seru ... where a number of people, chiefly women, called metrahnees, take up their abode to attend strangers on their arrival in the city."—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 404.]

MATROSS, s. An inferior class of soldier in the Artillery. The word is quite obsolete, and is introduced here because it seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England, and occurs frequently in old Indian narratives. It is Germ.
matrose, Dutch matroos, 'a sailor,' identical no doubt with Fr. matelot. The origin is so obscure that it seems hardly worth while to quote the conjectures regarding it. In the establishment of a company of Royal Artillery in 1771, as given in Duncan's Hist. of that corps, we have besides sergeants and corporals, "4 Bombardiers, 8 Gunners, 34 Matrosses, and 2 Drummers." A definition of the Matross is given in our 3rd quotation. We have not ascertained when the term was disused in the R.A. It appears in the Establishment as given by Grose in 1801 (Military Antiq. i. 315). As far as Major Duncan's book informs us, it appears first in 1639, and has disappeared by 1793, when we find the men of an artillery force divided (excluding sergeants, corporals, and bombardiers) into First Gunners, Second Gunners, and Military Drivers.

1673.—"There being in pay for the Honourable East India Company of English and Portuguese, 700, reckoning besides Matrosses and Gunners."—Fryer, 38.

1745.—"... We were told with regard to the Fortifications, that no Expense should be grudged that was necessary for the Defence of the Settlement, and in 1741, a Person was sent out in the character of an Engineer for our Place; but... he lived not to come among us; and therefore, we could only judge of his Merit and Qualifications by the Value of his Stipend, Six Pagodas a Month, or about Eighteen Pences a Day, scarce the Pay of a common Matross.

..."—Letter from Mr. Burnett to the Secret Committee, in Letter to a Proprietor of the E.I. Co., p. 45.

1757.—"I have with me one Gunner, one Matross, and two Lascars."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Repert. i. 203.

1779.—"Matrosses are properly apprentices to the gunner, being soldiers in the royal regiment of artillerists, and next to them; they assist in loading, firing, and spunging the great guns. They carry fire-locks, and march along with the guns and store-waggons, both as a guard, and to give their assistance in every emergency."—Capt. O. Smith's Universal Military Dictionary.

1792.—"Wednesday evening, the 25th inst., a Matross of Artillery deserted from the Mount, and took away with him his firelock, and nine rounds of powder and ball."—Matras Courier, Feb. 2.

[1800.—"A serjeant and two matrosses employed under a general warrant on the captured military stores in Seringapatam."—Wellington Suppl. Desp. ii. 32 (Swarf. Dict.).]

MAUND.

Maund, s. Touch (of gold). Tamil māru (pron. māṭu), perhaps from Skt. mātra, 'measure.' Very pure gold is said to be 9 mātruv, inferior gold of 5 or 6 mātruv.

1693.—"Gold, purified from all other metals... by us is reckoned as of four-and-Twenty Carats, but by the blacks is here divided and reckoned as of ten mat."—Hewart, 106.

1727.—At Mocha... the Coffee Trade brings in a continual Supply of Silver and Gold... from Turkey, Ebramies and Mograbis, Gold of low Matt."—A. Hamilton, i. 43, [ed. 1744].

1752.—... to find the Value of the Touch in Fanams, multiply the Matt by 10, and then by 8, which gives it in Fanams."—T. Brooks, 25.

The same word was used in Japan for a measure, sometimes called a fathom.

MAUMLET, s. Domestic Hind. māmlat, for 'omelet'; [Māmlēt] is 'marmalade'.

MAUND, s. The authorised Anglo-Indian form of the name of a weight (Hind. man, Mahr. man), which, with varying values, has been current over Western Asia from time immemorial. Professor Sayce traces it (mana) back to the Accadian language.* But in any case it was the Babylonian name for 1/5 of a talent, whence it passed, with the Babylonian weights and measures, almost all over the ancient world. Compare the men or mna of Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions, preserved in the emna or amna of the Copts, the Hebrew māneh, the Greek μένα, and the Roman mina. The introduction of the word into India may have occurred during the extensive commerce of the Arabs with that country during the 8th and 9th centuries; possibly at an earlier date. Through the Arabs also we find an old Spanish word almena, and in old French almène, for a weight of about 20 lbs. (Marcel Devie).

The quotations will show how the Portuguese converted man into māo, of which the English made maune, and so (probably by the influence of the old English word maund) our present form, which occurs as early as 1611. Some of the older travellers, like Linschoten, misled by the Portuguese mão, identified it with the word for 'hand' in that language, and so rendered it.

The values of the man as weight, even in modern times, have varied immensely, i.e. from little more than 2 lbs. to upwards of 160. The 'Indian Maund,' which is the standard of weight in British India, is of 40 sers, each ser being divided into 16 chhitaks; and this is the general scale of subdivision in the local weights of Bengal, and Upper and Central India, though the value of the ser varies. That of the standard ser is 80 tolas (q.v.) or rupee-weights, and thus the maund = 82½ lbs. avoirdupois. The Bombay maund (or man) of 48 sers = 28 lbs.; the Madras one of 40 sers = 25 lbs. The Palloda man of Ahmadnagar contained 64 sers, and was = 163½ lbs. This is the largest man we find in the 'Useful Tables.' The smallest Indian man again is that of Colachy in Travancore, and that = 18 lbs. 12 oz. 13 dr. The Persian Tabriizi man is, however, a little less than 7 lbs.; the man shahi twice that; the smallest of all on the list named is the Jeddah man = 2 lbs. 3 oz. 9½ dr.

b.c. 692. — In the "Eponymy of Zazaq," a house in Nineveh, with its shrubbery and gates, is sold for one maneh of silver according to the royal standard. Quoted by Sayce, u.s.

b.c. 667. — We find Nergal-sarrà-nacir lending "four manehs of silver, according to the maneh of Carchemish." — Ibid.

c. b.c. 524. — "Cambyses received the Libyan presents very graciously, but not so the gifts of the Cyrenaeans. They had sent no more than 500 minae of silver, which Cambyses, I imagine, thought too little. He therefore snatched the money from them, and with his own hand scattered it among the soldiers." — Herodot. iii. ch. 13 (E.T. by Rawlinson).

MECKLEY, n.p. One of the names of the State of Munneapore.

MEEANA, MYANNA, s. H.—P. miyäna, 'middle-sized.' The name of a kind of palankin; that kind out of which the palankin used by Europeans has been developed, and which has been generally adopted in India for the last century. [Buchanan Hamilton writes: "The lowest kind of palanquins, which are small litters suspended under a straight bamboo, by which they are carried, and shaded by a frame covered with cloth, do not admit the passenger to lie at length, and are here called miyana, or Mahapa."
In some places, these terms are considered as synonymous, in others the Miyana is open at the sides, while the Mahapa, intended for women, is surrounded with curtains." (Eastern India, ii. 426).]

In Williamson's Vade Mecum (i. 319) the word is written Mohannah.

1784.—"... an entire new myannah, painted and gilt, lined with orange silk, with curtains and bedding complete."—In Steton-Karr, i. 49.

1793.—"Patna common chairs, couches and teapoys, two Mahana palanquins."—Ibid. 62.

1795.—"For Sale, an Elegant Fashionable New Meanna from Calcutta."—Ibid. May 16.

MEERASS, s. MEERASSY, adj., MEERASSIDAR, s. 'Inheritance,' 'hereditary,' 'a holder of hereditary property.' Hind. from Arab. mirds, mirds, mirdsdr; and these from waris, 'to inherit.'

1806.—"Every meerassdar in Tanjore has been furnished with a separate pottah (q.v.) for the land held by him."—Fifth Report (1812), 774.

1812.—"The term meerasse was introduced by the Mahomedans."—Ibid. 136.

1877.—"All miras rights were reclaimable within a forty years' absence."—Meadow Taylor, Story of My Life, ii. 211.

"... I found a great proportion of the occupants of land to be mirasdars,—that is, persons who hold their portions of land in hereditary occupancy."—Ibid. 210.
MEHAUL, s. Hind. from Arab. mahâl, being properly the pl. of Arab. mahâli. The word is used with a considerable variety of application, the explanation of which would involve a greater amount of technical detail than is consistent with the purpose of this work. On this Wilson may be consulted. But the most usual Anglo-Indian application of mahâl (used as a singular and generally written, incorrectly, mahâl) is to 'an estate,' in the Revenue sense, i.e. 'a parcel or parcels of land separately assessed for revenue.' The sing. mahâl (also written in the vernaculars mahâli, and mahâl) is often used for a palace or important edifice, e.g. (see Shish-Muhull, Taj-Mahal).

MEHTAR, s. A sweeper or scavenger. This name is usual in the Bengal Presidency, especially for the domestic servant of this class. The word is Pers. comp. mishtar (Lat. major), 'a great personage,' 'a prince,' and has been applied to the class in question in irony, or rather in consolation, as the domestic tailor is called caleefa. But the name has so completely adhered in this application, that all sense of either irony or consolation has perished; mehtar is a sweeper and nought else. His wife is the Matranee. It is not unusual to hear two mehtars hailing each other as Mahârâj! In Persia the menial application of the word seems to be different (see below). The same class of servant is usually called in W. India bhangi (see Bungy), a name which in Upper India is applied to the caste generally and specially to those not in the service of Europeans. [Examples of the word used in the honorific sense will be found below.]

C. 1800.—"Maitre." See under Bunow. 1810.—"The mator, or sweeper, is considered the lowest menial in every family."—Williamson, V. M. i. 270-7.

1823.—"... besides many mehtars or stable-boys."—Hajji Baba in England, i. 60.

1824.—"In each of the towns of Central India, there is... a mehtur, or head of every other class of the inhabitants down to the lowest."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 555.

1880.—"On the right bank is the fort in which the Mihter or Bâdshâh, for he is known by both titles, resides."—Biddulph, Tribes of the Hindoos Kutch, 61.]

MELINDE, MELINDA, n.p. The name (Malinda or Malindi) of an Arab town and State on the east coast of Africa, in S. lat. 3° 9'; the only one at which the expedition of Vasco da Gama had amicable relations with the people, and that at which they obtained the pilot who guided the squadron to the coast of India.

c. 1150.—"Melinde, a town of the Zendj, ... is situated on the sea-shore at the mouth of a river of fresh water. ... It is a large town, the people of which ... draw from the sea different kinds of fish, which they dry and trade in. They also possess and work mines of iron."—Edrisi (Jaubert), i. 56.

c. 1520.—See also Abulfeda, by Reinaud, ii. 207.

1438.—"And that same day at sundown we cast anchor right opposite a place which is called Milinde, which is 30 leagues from Mombaça. ... On Easter Day those Moors whom we held prisoners, told us that in the said town of Milinde were stopping four ships of Christians who were Indians, and that if we desired to take them these would give us, instead of themselves, Christian Pilots."—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 423.

1554.—"As the King of Melinde pays no tribute, nor is there any reason why he should, considering the many tokens of friendship we have received from him, both on the first discovery of these countries, and to this day, and which in my opinion we repay very badly, by the ill treatment which he has from the Captains who go on service to this Coast."—Simão Botelho, Tombo, 17.

c. 1570.—"Di Chialu si negotia anco per la costa de' Melind in Ethiopia."—Cesare de Federici in Ramusio, iii. 396v.

"Quando chegava a frota aquella parte Onde o reino Melinde já se via, De toldos adornada, e leda de arte: Que bem mostra estimar a sancta dia Treme a bandeira, voo a estandarte, A cor purpurea ao longe apparecia, Soam os atambores, e pandeiros: E assim entravam ledes e guerreiros."—Camões, ii. 73.

By Burton:

"At such a time the Squadron neared the part where first Melinde's goodly shore unseen, in awnings drest and prankt with gallant art, to show that none the Holy Day misseen: Flutter the flags, the streaming Estandart gleams from afar with gorgeous purple sheen, tom-toms and timbrels mingle martial jar: thus past they forwards with the pomp of war."
MELIQUE VERIDO, n.p. The Portuguese form of the style of the princes of the dynasty established at Bidar in the end of the 15th century, on the decay of the Bahmani kingdom. The name represents 'Malik Barid.' It was apparently only the third of the dynasty, 'Ali, who first took the title of ('Ali) Barid Shâh.

1533.—'And as the futosomià (?) of Badur was very great, as well as his presumption, he sent word to Yzam Maluco (Nizamaluco) and to Verido (who were great Lords, as it were Kings, in the Decanim, that lies between the Baligat and Cambaya) . . . that they must pay him homage, or he would hold them for enemies, and would direct war against them, and take away their dominions.'—Corea, iii. 514.

1563.—'And these regents . . . concerted among themselves . . . that they should seize the King of Daquem in Bedar, which is the chief city and capital of the Decan; so they took him and committed him to one of their number, by name Verido; and then he and the rest, either in person or by their representatives, make him a salâam (salâma) at certain days of the year. . . . The Verido who died in the year 1510 was a Hungarian by birth, and originally a Christian, as I have heard on sure authority.'—Garcia, f. 35 and 35v.

c. 1601.—'About this time a letter arrived from the Prince Sultân Dâñyûl, reporting that (Malik) Ambar had collected his troops in Bidar, and had gained a victory over a party which had been sent to oppose him by Malik Barid.'—Indigat Ullah, in Elliot, vi. 104.

MENDY, s. Hind. mehndi, [meīndi, Skt. mendhikâ]; the plant Lawsonia alba, Lam., of the N. O. Lythraceae, strongly resembling the English privet in appearance, and common in gardens. It is the plant whose leaves afford the heenaw, used so much in Mahommedan countries for dyeing the hands, &c., and also in the process of dyeing the hair. Mehnad is, according to Royle, the Cyprus of the ancients (see Pliny, xii. 24). It is also the campshire of Canticles i. 14, where the margin of A.V. has erroneously cypress for cypris.

[1813.—"After the girls are betrothed, the ends of the fingers and nails are dyed red, with a preparation from the Mendey, or hinna shrub."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 55; also see i. 22.]

c. 1817.—". . . his house and garden might be known from a thousand others by their extraordinary neatness. His garden was full of trees, and was well fenced round with a ditch and mindew hedge."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1873, p. 71.

MERCÀLL, MARCÀL, s. Tam. marrakkal, a grain measure in use in the Madras Presidency, and formerly varying much in different localities, though the most usual was 12 sers of grain. [Also known as toom.] Its standard is fixed since 1846 at 800 cubic inches, and 1 1/2 of a garce (q.v.).

1554.—(Negapatam) "Of ghee (namteina) and oil, one mercar is =2½ cavadas" (a Portuguese measure of about 3 pints).—A. Nucci, 36. 1803.—". . . take care to put on each bulboll full six mercalls or 72 seers."—Wellington Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 85.

MERGUI, n.p. The name by which we know the most southern district of Lower Burma with its town; annexed with the rest of what used to be called the "Tenasserim Provinces" after the war of 1824-26. The name is probably of Siamese origin; the town is called by the Burmese Beit (Sir A. Phayre).

1568.—"Tenasuri la quale è Città delle regioni del regno di Sien, posta infra terra due o tre marce sopra un gran fiume . . . ed onde il fiume entra in mare e una villa chiamata Merghi, nel porto della quale ogni anno si caricano alcune navi di verzino (see BRAZIL-wood and SAPPA-wood), di nipa (q.v.), di betzvin (see BENJAMIN), e qualche poco di garofalo, macis, noot . . ."—Cos. Federici, in Rumiano, iii. 327v.

[1684-5.—"A Country Vessel belonging to Mr. Thomas Lucas arriv'd in this Road from Merge."— Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. iv. 19.

[1727. — "Merjee." See under TENAS-SERIM.]

MILK-BUSH, MILK-HEDGE, s. Euphorbia Tirucalli, L., often used for hedges on the Coromandel coast. It abounds in acrid milky juices.
c. 1590.—"They enclose their fields and gardens with hedges of the zekoom (zal-kum) tree, which is a strong defence against cattle, and makes the country almost impenetrable by an army."—Ayeen, ed. Gladwin, ii. 68; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 229].

[1773.—"Milky Hedge. This is rather a shrub, which they plant for hedges on the coast of Coromandel. . ."—Ives, 462.]

1789.— "Thorn hedges are sometimes placed in gardens, but in the fields the milk bush is most commonly used . . . When squeezed emitting a whitish juice like milk, that is deemed a deadly poison. . . A horse will have his head and eyes prodigiously swelled from standing for some time under the shade of a milk hedge."— Munro's Narr. 80.

1879.— "So saying, Buddha
Silently laid aside sandals and staff, His sacred thread, turban, and cloth, and came Forth from behind the milk-bush on the sand. . . .

Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, Bk. v.

c. 1886.— "The milk-hedge forms a very distinctive feature in the landscape of many parts of Guzerat. Twigs of the plant thrown into running water kill the fish, and are extensively used for that purpose. Also charcoal from the stems is considered the best for making gunpowder."—M. Gen.
R. H. Krattinge.

MINCOPIE, n.p. This term is attributed in books to the Andaman islanders as their distinctive name for their own race. It originated with a vocabulary given by Lient. Colebrooke in vol. iv. of the Asiatic Researches, and was certainly founded on some misconception. Nor has the possible origin of the mistake been ascertained.
[Mr. Man (Proc. Anthrop. Institute, xii.
71) suggests that it may have been a corruption of the words min biauh!
'Come here!']

MINICOY, n.p. Minikai; [Logan (Malabar, i. 2) gives the name as Menakayat, which the Madras Gloss.
derives from Mal. min, 'fish,' kayam,
'deep pool.' The natives call it Maltiku (note by Mr. Gray on the passage from Pyramid quoted below).] An island intermediate between the Maldives and the Laccadive group. Politically it belongs to the latter, being the property of the Ali Raja of Cannanore, but the people and their language are Mal-divian. The population in 1871 was 2800. One-sixth of the adults had perished in a cyclone in 1867. A lighthouse was in 1883 erected on the island. This is probably the island intended for Mulkei in that illedited book the E. T. of Tuhfat al-Mujahidin. [Mr. Logan identifies it with the "female island" of Marco Polo. (Malabar, i. 287).]

[c. 1610.—" . . a little island named Malicut."—Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc.
i. 322.]

MISCALL, s. Ar. meyskal (mithkal, properly). An Arabian weight, originally that of the Roman aureus and the gold dinar; about 73 grs.

c. 1340.— "The prince, violently enraged, causes this officer to be put in prison, and confiscated his goods, which amounted to 437,000,000 mithkals of gold. This anec dote serves to attest at once the severity of the sovereign and the extreme wealth of the country."—Shihabuddin, in Not. et Ext., xiii. 192.

1502.— "Upon which the King (of Sofala) showed himself much pleased . . . and gave them as a present for the Captain-Major a mass of strings of small golden beads which they call pinga, weighing 1000 maticals, every matical being worth 500 reis, and gave for the King another that weighed 8000 maticals . . ."—Correa, i. 274.

MISREE, s. Sugar candy. Misri, 'Egyptian,' from Misr, Egypt, the Misraim of the Hebrews, showing the original source of supply. [We find the Misri or 'sugar of Egypt' in the Arabian Nights (Burton, xi. 396).] (See under SUGAR.)

1810.—"The sugar-candy made in India, where it is known by the name of miscery, bears a price suited to its quality. . . It is usually made in small conical pots, whence it concretes into masses, weighing from 3 to 6 lbs. each."—Williamson, V. M.
i. 194.

MISSAL, s. Hind. from Ar. misal, meaning 'similitude.' The body of documents in a particular case before a court. [The word is also used in its original sense of a 'clan.']

[1861.—"The martial spirit of the Sikhs thus aroused . . . formed itself into clans or confederacies called Misils . . ."—Cave-Browne, Punjab and Delhi, i. 393.]
MOBED. s. P. mūbīd, a title of Parsee Priests. It is a corruption of the Pehlevi maqū-pat, 'Lord Magus.' [1815. — "The rites ordained by the chief Mobuds are still observed."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, ed. 1829, i. 499.]

MOCUDDUM, s. Hind. from Ar. mukaddam, 'praepositus,' a head-man. The technical applications are many; e.g. to the headman of a village, responsible for the realisation of the revenue (see LUMBERDAR); to the local head of a caste (see CHOWDRTY); to the head man of a body of peons or of a gang of labourers (see MATE), &c. &c. (See further detail in Wilson). Cobarruvias (Tesor de la Lengua Castellana, 1611) gives Almocaden, 'Capi- tan de Infanteria.'

C. 1347. — "... The princess invited the taudail (see TINDAL) or mukaddam of the crew, and the apākhātar or mukaddam of the archers." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 250.*

1538. — "O Mocadān da mazmorra q ēra o carerceiro d'aquella prisão, tanto q os vio mortos, deu logo rebate disso ao Guazil da justiça. ..." — Pinto, cap. vi.

"... The Jaylor, which in their language is called Mocadan, repairing in the morning to us, and finding our two companions dead, goes away in all haste therewith to acquaint the Guazil, which is as the Judg with us." — Cegua's Transl., p. 8.

1554. — "E a hum naique, com seys piães (peons) e hum mocadã, com seys tochas, hum boy de sombreirão, dus mainatos," &c. — Botelho, Tabo, 57.

1567. — "... furthermore that no infidel shall serve as scrivener, shroff (zurratro) mocadam (mocadão), naique (see NAIK), peon (pião) paraprin (see PARBUTTY), collector of dues, corregidor, interpreter, procurator or solicitor in court, nor in any other office or charge in which he can in any way hold authority over Christians." — Decree of the Sacred Council of Goa, Dec. 27. In Arch. Port. Oriental, fasc. 4. [1598. — "... a chief Boteson which they call Mocadon." — Löschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 267.]

[c. 1610. — "They call these Lascarys and their captain Mocadon." — Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 117.]

* This passage is also referred to under NACODA. The French translation runs as follows: — "Cette princesse invite ... le tendil ou 'general des piétons,' et le apākhātar ou 'general des archers.' " In answer to a query, our friend, Prof. Robertson Smith, writes: "The word is r Eylül, and this may be used either as the plural of reiül, 'man,' or as the pl. of r Eylül, 'pieton.' But foreman, or 'praepositus' of the 'men' (mukaddam is not well rendered 'general'), is just as possible."

And, if possible, much more reasonable. Delarueer (J. A., ser. iv. tom. ix.) renders r Eylül here "sailors." See the article TINDAL; and see the quotation under the present article from Bocarro MS.

[1615. — "The Generall dwelt with the Makadow of Swally." — Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 45 ; comp. Danvers, Letters, i. 284.]

1644. — "Each vessel carries forty mariners and two moccadons." — Boeuroo, MS.

1680. — "For the better keeping the Boatmen in order, resolved to appoint Black Tom Muckadum or Master of the Boatmen, being Christian as he is, his wages being paid at 70 fanamas per messnum." — Fort St. Geo. Consn., Dec. 23, in Notes and Exts. No. iii. p. 42.

1870. — "This headman was called the Mokaddam in the more Northern and Eastern provinces." — Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 138.

MOCCUDAMA, s. Hind. from Ar. mukaddama, 'a piece of business,' but especially 'a suit at law.'

MODELLARI, MODLIAR, s. Used in the Tamil districts of Ceylon (and formerly on the Continent) for a native head-man. It is also a caste title, assumed by certain Tamil people who styled themselves Sudras (an honourable assumption in the South). Tam. muddaliydr, muthaliydr, an honorific pl. from muddali, muthali, 'a chief.'

C. 1320. — "When I was staying at Columbo (see QUILON) with those Christian chiefs who are called Modillial, and are the owners of the pepper, one morning there came to me ..." — John de Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., ii. 381.

1522. — "And in opening this foundation they found about a cubit below a grave made of brickwork, white-washed within, as if newly made in which they found part of the bones of the King who was converted by the holy Apostle, who the natives said they heard was called Tani (Tami) mudo- lyar, meaning in their tongue 'Thomas Servant of God.' " — Corret, ii. 726.

1607. — "On the part of Dom Fernando Modelliar, a native of Ceylon, I have received a petition stating his services." — Letter of R. Philip III. in L. das Monções, 135.

1616. — "These entered the Kingdom of Candy ... and had an encounter with the enemy at Matale, where they cut off five- and-thirty heads of their people and took certain archers and modilares who are chiefs among them, and who had ... deserted and gone over to the enemy as is the way of the Chingalas." — Bocarro, 495.

1648. — "The 5 August followed from Candy the Modelliar, or Great Captain ..."
in order to inspect the ships."—Van Spilbergen's Voyage, 33.

1685.—"The Modeliarae . . . and other great men among them put on a shirt and doublet, which those of low caste may not wear."—Ribeiro, i. 46.

1708.—"Mon Révérend Père. Vous êtes tellement acoutumé à vous mêler des affaires de la Compagnie, que non obstant la prière que je vous ai réitérée plusieurs fois de nous laisser en repos, je ne suis pas étonné si vous prenez parti dans l'affaire de Lazaro ci-devant courtier et Modeliar de la Compagnie."—Norbert, Mémoires, i. 274.

1726.—"Modelyaaar. This is the same as Captain."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 9.

1810.—"We . . . arrived at Barbareen about two o'clock, where we found that the provident Modeliar had erected a beautiful rest-house for us, and prepared an excellent collation."—Maria Graham, 98.

MOFUSSIL, s., also used adjectively, "The provinces,"—the country stations and districts, as contra-distinguished from 'the Presidency'; or, relatively, the rural localities of a district as contra-distinguished from the sudder or chief station, which is the residence of the district authorities. Thus if, in Calcutta, one talks of the Moofussil, he means anywhere in Bengal out of Calcutta; if one at Benares talks of going into the Mofussil, he means going anywhere in the Benares division or district (as the case might be) out of the city and station of Benares. And so over India. The word (Hind. from Ar.) mofussal means properly 'separate, detailed, particular,' and hence 'provincial,' as mofussal 'addit', a 'provincial court of justice.' This indicates the way in which the word came to have the meaning attached to it.

About 1845 a clever, free-and-easy newspaper, under the name of The Mofussilite, was started at Meerut, by Mr. John Lang, author of Too Clever by Half, &c., and endured for many years.

1781.—"... a gentleman lately arrived from the Moussel " (plainly a misprint).—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, March 31.

"A gentleman in the Mofussil, Mr. P., fell out of his chaise and broke his leg."—Ibid., June 30.

1810.—"Either in the Presidency or in the Mofussil. . . ."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 499.

1836.—"... the Mofussil newspapers which I have seen, though generally disposed to cavil at all the acts of the Government, have often spoken favourably of the measure."—T. B. Macaulay, in Life, &c. i. 399.

MOGUL, n.p. This name should properly mean a person of the great nomad race of Mongols, called in Persia, &c., Mughals; but in India it has come, in connection with the nominally Mongol, though essentially rather Turk, family of Baber, to be applied to all foreign Mahomedans from the countries on the W. and N.W. of India, except the Pathans. In fact these people themselves make a sharp distinction between the Mughal Iran, of Pers. origin (who is a Shi{^}a), and the M. T{^}urd{^}a of Turk origin (who is a Sunni). Beg is the characteristic affix of the Mughal's name, as Khud is of the Pathan's. Among the Mahomedans of S. India the Moguls or Mughals constitute a strongly marked caste. [They are also clearly distinguished in the Punjab and N.W.P.] In the quotation from Baber below, the name still retains its original application. The passage illustrates the tone in which Baber always speaks of his kindred of the Steppe, much as Lord Clyde used sometimes to speak of "confounded Scotchmen."

In Port. writers Mogol or Mogor is often used for "Hindostân," or the territory of the Great Mogul.

1247.—"Terra quaedam est in partibus orientis . . . quae Mongal nominatur. Hae terra quondam populus quatuor habuit: unus Yeka Mongal, id est magni Mongali . . . "—Joannis de Plano Carpini, Hist. Mongalorum, 645.

1298.—"... Mungul, a name sometimes applied to the Tartars."—Marco Polo, i. 276 (2nd ed.).

c. 1300.—"Ipsi verbo dicunt se descendisse de Gog et Magog, unde ipsi dicuntur Mogoli, quasi corrupto vocabulo Magogoli."—Ricoludis de Monte Cruci, in Per. Quatuor, p. 118.

c. 1540.—"In the first place from Tana to Gintarchan may be 25 days with an ox-wagon, and from 10 to 12 days with a horse-wagon. On the road you will find plenty of Moccols, that is to say of armed troopers."—Pepolotti, on the Land Route to Cathay, in Cathay, &c., ii. 287.

1404.—"And the territory of this empire of Samarkand is called the territory of Mo- gala, and the language thereof is called Mugal, and they don't understand this language on this side of the River (the Oxus) . . . for the character which is used by those of Samarkand beyond the river is not understood or read by those on this side the river; and they call that character Mongali, and the Emperor keeps by him certain scribes who can read and write this Mogali character."—Clavijo, § citii. (Comp. Markham, 119-120.)

c. 1500.—"The Moghul troops, which had come to my assistance, did not attempt to fight, but instead of fighting, betook themselves to dismounting and plundering my own people. Nor is this a solitary instance; such is the uniform practice of these wretches the Moghuls; if they defeat the enemy they instantly seize the booty; if they are defeated, they plead and dismount their own allies, and betide what may, carry off the spoil."—Babar, 93.

1534.—"And whilst Badur was there in the hills engaged with his pleasures and luxury, there came to him a messenger from the King of the Mogores of the kingdom of Dely, called Bobor Mirza."—Correa, iii. 571.

1536. — "Dicti Mogores vel à populis Persarum Mogoribus, vel quod nunc Turkae à Persis Mogores appellantur."—Letter from K. John III, to Pope Paul III.

1555.—"Tartaria, otherwisely called Mongal, as Vincentius wrote, is in that part of the earth where the Easte and the northie joine together."—W. Watereyn, Fardele of Faciousnes.

1563.—"This Kingdom of Dely is very far inland, for the northern part of it marches with the territory of Coracone (Khorasan). . . . The Mogores, whom we call Tartars, conquered it more than 30 years ago. . . ."—Garcia, f. 34.

[c. 1610.—"The greatest ships come from the coast of Persia, Arabia, Mogor."—Pyramid de Labat, Hak. Soc. i. 285.]

[1636.—India "containeth many Provinces and Realmes, as Cambiara, Deli, Decan, Bisbarar, Malabar, Narsing, Oroka, Bengala, Sunga, Mogores, Tipura, Gourons, Ayia, Pregua, Aurea Chersonesus, Sina, Camboia, and Campaa."—T. Blundevil, Description of Plancius his Mappe, in Eight Treatises, ed. 1626, p. 547.]

c. 1650.—"Now shall I tell how the royal house arose in the land of the Mongol. . . . And the Ruler (Chingiz Khan) said . . . MOGUL, THE GREAT, n.p. Sometimes 'The Mogul' simply. The name by which the Kings of Delhi of the House of Timur were popularly styled, first by the Portuguese (o grão Mogor) and after them by Europeans generally. It was analogous to the Sophy (q.v.), as applied to the Kings of Persia, or to the ‘Great Turk’ applied to the Sultan of Turkey. Indeed the latter phrase was probably the model of the present one. As noticed under the preceding article, Mogol, Mogor, and also Mogulistan are applied among old writers to the dominions of the Great Mogul. We have found no native idiom precisely suggesting the latter title; but Mogul is thus used in the Aravish-i-Mahfil below, and Mogulistan must have been in some native use, for it is a form that Europeans would not have invented. (See quotations from Thevenot here and under MOHWA.)

Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

In a picture by Vandyke of William 1st Earl of Denbigh, belonging to the Duke of Hamilton, and exhibited at Edinburgh in July 1683, the subject is represented as out shooting, in a red striped shirt and pyjamas, no doubt the "Mogul breeches" of the period.

MOHUR, GOLD, s. The official name of the chief gold coin of British India, Hind. from Pers. mahr, a (metallic) seal, and thence a gold coin.
It seems possible that the word is taken from mahr, 'the sun,' as one of the secondary meanings of that word is 'a golden circlet on the top of an umbrella, or the like' (Wallers).
[Platts, on the contrary, identifies it with Skt. mudrá, 'a seal.]

The term mahr, as applied to a coin, appears to have been popular only and quasi-generic, not precise. But that to which it has been most usually applied, at least in recent centuries, is a coin which has always been in use since the foundation of the Mahommedan Empire in Hindustan by the Ghürí Kings of Ghaznî and their freedmen, circa A.D. 1200, tending to a standard weight of 100 ratis (see BUTTEE) of pure gold, or about 175 grains, thus equaling in weight, and probably intended then to equal ten times in value, the silver coin which has for more than three centuries been called Rupee.

There is good ground for regarding this as the theory of the system.*
But the gold coins, especially, have deviated from the theory considerably;
a deviation which seems to have com-nenced with the violent innovations of Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (1325-1351), who raised the gold coin to 200 grains, and diminished the silver coin to 140 grains, a change which may have been connected with the enormous influx of gold into Upper India, from the plunder of the innumerable accumulations of the Peninsula in the first quarter of the 14th century. After this the coin again settled down in approximation to the old weight, insomuch that, on taking the weight of 46 different mohurs from the lists given in Prinsep's Tables, the average of pure gold is 167-22 grains.†

The first gold mohur struck by the Company's Government was issued in 1766, and declared to be a legal tender for 14 seca rupees. The full weight of this coin was 179-66 grs., containing 149-72 grs. of gold. But it was impossible to render it current at the rate fixed; it was called in, and in 1769 a new mohur was issued to pass as legal tender for 16 seca rupees.
The weight of this was 190-773 grs.
(according to Regn. of 1793, 190-894), and it contained 190-986 grs. of gold.
Regulation xxxv. of 1793 declared these gold mohurs to be a legal tender in all public and private transactions. Regn. xiv. of 1818 declared, among other things, that "it has been thought advisable to make a slight deduction in the intrinsic value of the gold mohur to be coined at this Presidency (Fort William), in order to raise the value of fine gold to fine silver, from the present rates of 1 to 14-861 to that of 1 to 15. The gold mohur will still continue to pass curt at the rate of 16 rupees." The new gold mohur was to weigh 204-710 grs., containing fine gold 187-651 grs.
Once more Act xvii. of 1835 declared that the only gold coin to be coined at Indian mints should be (with proporally debased; and (2) the first twenty-four pieces tionate subdivisions) a gold mohur or "15 rupee piece" of the weight of 180 grs. troy, containing 165 grs. of pure gold; and declared also that no gold coin should thenceforward be a legal tender of payment in any of the territories of the E.I. Company. There has been since then no substantial change.

A friend (W. Simpson, the accomplished artist) was told in India that gold mohur was a corruption of gol, (round) mohr, indicating a distinction from the square mohurs of some of the Delhi Kings. But this we take to be purely fanciful.

1690.—"The Gold Moor, or Gold Roupie, is valued generally at 14 of Silver; and the Silver Roupie at Two Shillings Three Pence."—Ovington, 219.

1726.—"There is here only also a State mint where gold Moors, silver Roupies, Pegues and other money are struck."—Valentijn, v. 166.

1758.—"80,000 rupees, and 4000 gold mohurs, equivalent to 60,000 rupees, were the military chest for immediate expenses."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 364.

1779.—"I then took hold of his hand: then he (Francis) took out gold mohurs: and offered to give them to me: I refused them; he said 'Take that (offering both his hands to me), 'twill make you great men, and I will give you 100 gold mohurs more.'"—Evidence of Rambux Jemadar, on Trial of Grand v. Francis, quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 228.

1785.—"Malver, hairdresser from Europe, proposes himself to the ladies of the settlement to dress Hair daily, at two gold mohurs per month, in the latest fashion with gauze flowers, &c. He will also instruct the slaves at a moderate price."*—In Seton-Karr, i. 119.

1797.—"Notwithstanding he (the Nabob) was repeatedly told that I would accept nothing, he had prepared 5 lacs of rupees and 8000 gold Mohurs for me, of which I was to have 4 lacs, my attendants one, and your Ladyship the gold."—Letter in Mem. of Lord Teignmouth, i. 410.

1811.—"Some of his fellow passengers ... offered to bet with him sixty gold mohurs."—Morton's Life of Leyden, 83.

* Was this ignorance, or slang? Though slave-boys are occasionally mentioned, there is no indication that slaves were at all the usual substitute for domestic servants at this time in European families.

1829.—"I heard that a private of the Company's Foot Artillery passed the very noses of the prize-agents, with 500 gold mohurs (sterling 1000/.) in his hat or cap."—John Shipp, ii. 226.

[c. 1847.—"The widow is vexed out of patience, because her daughter Maria has got a place beside Cambrie, the penniless curate, and not by Colonel Goldmore, the rich widower from India."—Thackeray, Book of Snobs, ed. 1879, p. 71.]

MOHRURR, MOHRER, &c., s. A writer in a native language. Ar. māḥarrīr, 'an elegant, correct writer.' The word occurs in Grose (c. 1760) as 'Mooreis, writers.'

MOHURRUM, s. Ar. Mūḥarram ('sacer'), properly the name of the 1st month of the Mahomedan lunar year. But in India the term is applied to the period of fasting and public mourning observed during that month in commemoration of the death of Hassan and of his brother Husain (a.d. 669 and 680) and which terminates in the ceremonies of the 'Ashūrā-a, commonly however known in India as "the Mohurrum." For a full account of these ceremonies see Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. 98-148. [Perry, Miracle Play of Hassan and Husain.] And see in this book HOBSON-JOBYSON.

1869.—"Fête du Martyre de Hussein. ... On la nomme généralement Muharram du nom du mois ... et plus spécialement Dādah, mot persan dérivé de dāh 'dix,' ... les dénominations viennent de ce que la fête de Husain dure dix jours."—Gurcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. p. 31.

MOHWA, MOHWA, MOWA, s. Hind. &c. māhuḍ, māhuḍ, Skt. mah-ūḍa, the large oak-like tree Bassia latifolia. * Roxb. (N. O. Sapotaceae), also the flower of this tree from which a spirit is distilled and the spirit itself. It is said that the Mahwa flower is now largely exported to France for the manufacture of liqueurs. The tree, in groups, or singly, is common all over Central India in the lower lands, and, more sparsely, in the Gangetic provinces. "It abounds in Guzerat. When the flowers are falling the Hill—men camp under the trees to collect them. And it is a common practice to sit perched on one of the trees in order to shoot the large deer which come to feed on the fallen mhowa. The timber is strong and durable." (M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge).

e. 1665.—"Les bornes du Mogolistan et de Golconde sont plantées à environ un lieue et demie de Calvar. Ce sont des arbres qu'on appelle Mahoua; il marquent la dernière terre du Mogol."—Thevenot, v. 200.

1810.—"... the number of shops where Toddy, Mowah, Pariah Arrack, &c., are served out, absolutely incalculable."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 153.

1814.—"The Mowah... attains the size of an English oak... and from the beauty of its foliage, makes a conspicuous appearance in the landscape."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 452; [2nd ed. ii. 261, reading Mawah].

1871.—"The flower... possesses considerable substance, and a sweet but sickly taste and smell. It is a favourite article of food with all the wild tribes, and the lower classes of Hindus; but its main use is in the distillation of ardent spirits, most of what is consumed being Mhowa. The spirit, when well made, and mellowed by age, is by no means of despicable quality, resembling in some degree Irish whisky. The luscious flowers are no less a favourite food of the brute creation than of man. ..."—Forsyth, Highlands of C. India, 75.

MOLE-ISLAM, n.p. The title applied to a certain class of rustic Mahommedans or quasi-Mahommedans in Guzerat, said to have been forcibly converted in the time of the famous Sultan Mahmud Bigarara, Butler's "Prince of Cambay." We are ignorant of the true orthography or meaning of the term. [In the E. Panjab the descendants of Jats forcibly converted to Islam are known as Mula, or 'unfortunate' (Ibbetson, Panjab Ethnography, p. 142). The word is derived from the nakshatra or lunar asterism of Mula, to be born in which is considered specially unlucky.]

[1808—"Mole - Islams." See under GRASSIA.]

MOLEY, s. A kind of (so-called wet) curry used in the Madras Presidency, a large amount of coco-nut being one of the ingredients. The word is a corruption of 'Malay'; the dish being simply a bad imitation of one used by the Malays.

[1885—"Regarding the Ceylon curry, ... It is known by some as the 'Malay curry,' and it is closely allied to the moli of the Tamils of Southern India." Then follows the recipe.—Wyvern, Culinary Jottings, 5th ed., 299.]

MOLLY, or (better) MALLEE, s. Hind. māli, Skt. mālika, 'a garland-maker,' or a member of the caste which furnishes gardeners. We sometimes have heard a lady from the Bengal Presidency speak of the daily homage of "the Molly with his dolly," viz. of the māli with his dāli.

1759.—In a Calcutta wages tariff of this year we find—"House Molly ... ... 4 Rs." In Long, 182.

MOLUCCAS, n.p. The 'Spice Islands,' strictly speaking the five Clove Islands, lying to the west of Gilolo, and by name Ternate (Tarnāṭi), Tidore (Tidori), Mortir, Makian, and Bachian. [See Mr. Gray's note on Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 166.] But the application of the name has been extended to all the islands under Dutch rule, between Celebes and N. Guinea. There is a Dutch governor residing at Amboyna, and the islands are divided into 4 residencies, viz. Amboyna, Banda, Ternate and Manado. The origin of the name Molucca, or Maluco as the Portuguese called it, is not recorded; but it must have been that by which the islands were known to the native traders at the time of the Portuguese discoveries. The early accounts often dwell on the fact that each island (at least three of them) had a king of its own. Possibly they got the (Ar.) name of Jazīrat-al-Mulāk, 'The Isles of the Kings.' Valentijn probably entertained the same view of the derivation. He begins his account of the islands by saying:

"There are many who have written of the Moluccos and of their Kings, but we have hitherto met with no writer who has given an exact view of the subject." (Deel, 1. Mol. 3).

And on the next page he says:

"For what reason they have been called Moluccos we shall not here say; for we shall do this circumstantially when we shall speak of the Molukse Kings and their customs."

But we have been unable to find the fulfilment of this intention, though probably it exists in that continent of a work somewhere. We have also seen a paper by a writer who draws much from the quarry of Valentijn. This is an article by Dr. Van Muschenbroek in the Proceedings of the International Congress of Geog. at Venice in 1881 (ii. pp. 596, seq.), in which he traces the name to the same origin. He appears to imply that the chiefs were known among themselves as Molokos, and that this term was substituted for the indigenous Kolano, or King. "Ce nom, ce titre restèrent, et furent même peu à peu employés, non seulement pour les chefs, mais aussi pour l'état même. À la longue les îles et les états des Molokos devinrent les îles et les états Molokos." There is a good deal that is questionable, however, in this writer's deductions and etymologies. [Mr. Skeat remarks: "The islands appear to be mentioned in the Chinese history of the Tang dynasty (618-696) as Mi-li-ku, and if this be so the name is perhaps too old to be Arab."

c. 1430.—"Has (Java) ultra xv dierum cursu duae reperihunt insulae, orientem versus. Altera Sandali appellatur, in qua nunc muscatae et maces ; altera Bandam nomine, in qua sola garoifal producantur."—N. Couté, in Pogg. 1501.—The first mention of these islands by this name, that we know, is in a letter of Amerigo Vespucci (quoted under CANHAMEIRA), who in 1501, among the places heard of by Cabral's fleet, mentions the Maluche Islands.

1510.—"We disembarked in the island of Monoch, which is much smaller than Bandan; but the people are worse. . . Here the cloves grow, and in many other neighbouring islands, but they are small and uninhabited."—Varthema, 246.

1514.—"Further on is Timor, whence comes sandalwood, both the white and the red; and further on still are the Maluco, whence come the cloves. The bark of these trees I am sending you; an excellent thing it is; and so are the flowers."—Letter of Giovanni da Empoli, in Archivio Stor. Ital., p. 81.

1515.—"From Malacca ships and junks are come with a great quantity of spice, cloves, mace, nut (meg), sandalwood, and other rich things. They have discovered the five islands of Cloves; two Portuguese are lords of them, and rule the land with the rod. 'Tis a land of much meat, oranges, lemons, and clove-trees, which grow there of their own accord, just as trees in the woods with us . . . God be praised for such favour, and such grand things!'—Another letter of do., ibid. pp. 85-86.

1516.—"Beyond these islands, 25 leagues towards the north-east, there are five islands, one before the other, which are called the islands of Maluco, in which all the cloves grow. . . Their Kings are Moors, and the first of them is called Bachan, the second Magiana, the third is called Motil, the fourth Tidory, and the fifth Ternaty . . . every year the people of Malaca and Java come to these islands to ship cloves."—Barbosa, 201-202.

1521.—"Wednesday the 6th of November . . . we discovered four other rather high islands at a distance of 14 leagues towards the east. The pilot who had remained with us told us these were the Maluco islands, for which we gave thanks to God, and to comfort ourselves we discharged all our artillery . . . since we had passed 27 months all but two days always in search of Maluco."—Piggotta, Voyage of Magellan, Hak. Soc. 124.

1553.—"We know by our voyages that this part is occupied by sea and by land cut up into so many thousand islands, these together, sea and islands, embracing a great part of the circuit of the Earth . . . and in the midst of this great multitude of islands are those called Maluco . . . (These) five islands called Maluco . . . stand all within sight of one another embracing a distance of 25 leagues . . . we do not call them Maluco because they have no other names; and we call them five because in that number the clove grows naturally. Moreover, we call them in combination Maluco, as here among us we speak of the Canaries, the Terceiras, the Cabo-Verde islands, including under these names many islands each of which has a name of its own."—Barros, III. v. 5.

1605.—"As when far off at sea a fleet describes Hangs in the clouds, by equinocial winds Close sailing from Bengala, or the Isles Of Ternate and Tidore, whence merchants bring Their spicy drugs. . . ."—Paradise Lost, ii. 636-640.

MONKEY-BREAD TREE.  The Baobab, Adansonia digitata, L. "a fantastic-looking tree with innume elephantine stem and small twisted branches, laden in the rains with large white flowers; found all along the coast of Western India, but whether introduced by the Mahomedans from Africa, or by ocean-currents wafting its large light fruit, full of seed, across from shore to shore, is a nice speculation. A sailor once picked up a large seedy fruit in the Indian Ocean off Bombay, and brought it to me. It was very rotten, but I planted the seeds. It turned out to be Kigelia pinnata of E. Africa, and propagated so rapidly that in a few years I introduced it all over the Bombay Presidency. The Baobab however is generally found most abundant about the old ports frequented by the early Mahomedan traders" (Sir G. Bird-wood, MS.): We may add that it occurs sparsely about Allahabad, where it was introduced apparently in the Mogul time; and in the Gangetic valley as far E. as Calcutta, but always planted. There are, or were, noble specimens in the Botanic Gardens at Calcutta, and in Mr. Arthur Grote's garden at Alipûr. [See Watt, Econ.

MONSOON,  The name given to the periodical winds of the Indian seas, and of the seasons which they affect and characterize. The original word is the Ar. mausim, 'season,' which the Portuguese corrupted into monçao, and our people into monsoon. Dictionaries (except Dr. Badger's) do not apparently give the Arabic word mausim the technical sense of monsoon.

But there can be no doubt that it had that sense among the Arab pilots from whom the Portuguese adopted the word. This is shown by the quotations from the Turkish Admiral Sidi 'Ali. "The rationale of the term is well put in the Beirût Mûhit, which says: 'Mausim is used of anything that comes round but once a year, like the festivals. In Lebanon the musim is the season of working with the silk,' —which is the important season there, as the season of navigation is in Yemen." (W. R. S.)

The Spaniards in America would seem to have a word for season in analogous use for a recurring wind, as may be gathered from Tom Òringle.*

The Venetian, Leonardo Ca' Masser (below) calls the monsoons li tempi.

And the quotation from Garcia De Orta shows that in his time the Portuguese sometimes used the word for season without any apparent reference to the wind. Though monçao is general with the Portuguese writers of the 16th century, the historian Diogo de Couto always writes monçao, and it is possible that the n came in, as in some other cases, by a habitual misreading of the written u for n. Lin-schoten in Dutch (1596) has monsswyn and monssoen (p. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 33]).

It thus appears probable that we get our monsoon from the Dutch. The latter in modern times seem to have commonly adopted the French form mousson. [Prof. Skeat traces our monsoon from Ital. monsone.] We see below (Ces. Feder.) that Monsoon was used as synonymous with "the half year," and so it is still in S. India.

1505.—"De qui passano el colfo de Colocut che sono leghe 800 de pacizo

fatte (?) passano."—Leonardo di Ca' Masser, 26.

[1512.—"... because the maçam for both the voyages is at one and the same time."—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 30.]

1553.—"... and the more, because the voyage from that region of Malaca had to be made by the prevailing wind, which they call monçao, which was now near its end.

If they should lose eight days they would have to wait at least three months for the return of the time to make the voyage."—Barros, Dec. II. liv. II. cap. iv.

* "Don Ricardo began to fret and fidget most awfully —"Beginning of the seasons"—why, we may not get away for a week, and all the ships will be kept back in their loading."—Ed. 1663,

p. 309.
1554.—"The principal winds are four, according to the Arabs.... but the pilots call them by names taken from the rising and setting of certain stars, and assign them certain limits within which they begin or attain their greatest strength, and cease. These winds, limited by space and time, are called Mauzim."—The Mohit, by Sidi 'Ali Kaynudān, in J. As. Soc. Beng. iii. 548.

"Be it known that the ancient masters of navigation have fixed the time of the monsoon (in orig. doubtless mawzim), that is to say, the time of voyages at sea, according to the year of Yazdijird, and that the pilots of recent times follow their steps...." (Much detail on the monsoons follows.)—Ibid.

1563.—"The season (monçao) for these (i.e. mangoes) in the earlier localities we have in April, but in the other later ones in May and June; and sometimes they come as a rodolho (as we call it in our own country) in October and November."—Garcia, i. 134.

1568.—"Come s'arrina in vna città la prima cosa si piglia vna casa a fitto, ò per mesi ò per anno, seconda che si disegna di starui, e nel Pegh è costume di pigliarla per Moson, cioè per sei mesi."—Ces. Federici, in Rariumio, iii. 394.

MOOCY, s. One who works in leather, either as shoemaker or saddler. It is the name of a low caste, Hind. mouchi. The name and caste are also found in S. India, Telug. muchhe. These, too, are workers in leather, but also are employed in painting, gilding, and upholsterer's work, &c.

[1815.—"Cow-stealing ... is also practised by ... the Mooshees or Shoemaker cast."—Tylor, Considerations, i. 103.]

MOOKTEAR, s. Properly Hind, from Ar. muktdar, 'chosen,' but corruptly muhtyar. An authorised agent; an attorney. Mukhtyar-nama, 'a power of attorney.'

1866.—"I wish he had been under the scaffolding when the roof of that new Cutcherry he is building fell in, and killed two mookhtars."—The Dawk Bungalow (by G. O. Trevelyan), in Fraser's Mag. lxxii. p. 218.

1878.—"These were the mookhtars, or Criminal Court attorneys, teaching the witnesses what to say in their respective cases, and suggesting answers to all possible questions, the whole thing having been previously rehearsed at the mookhtyr's house."—Life in the Mofussil, p. 90.

1885.—"The wily Bengali mukhtears, or attorneys, were the bane of the Hill Tracts, and I never relaxed in my efforts to banish them from the country."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 336.

MOOLLAH, s. Hind. mulà, corr. from Ar. mulà, a der. from wird, 'propiunity.' This is the legal bond which still connects a former owner with his manumitted slave; and in virtue of this bond the patron and client are both called maula. The idea of patronage is in the other senses; and the word comes to mean eventually 'a learned man, a teacher, a doctor of the Law.'

In India it is used in these senses, and for a man who reads the Koran in a house for 40 days after a death. When oaths were administered on the Koran, the servitor who held the book was called Mulla Korani. Mullä is also in India the usual Mussulman term for 'a schoolmaster.'

1616.—"Their Moolas employ much of their time like Scrieners to doe business for others."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1476.

[1617. — "He had showed it to his Mulais."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 417.]

1638.—"While the Body is let down into the grave, the kindred mutter certain Prayers between their Teeth, and that done all the company returns to the house of the deceased, where the Mollas continue their Prayers for his Soul, for the space of two or three days. ..."—Mandelslo, E.T. 63.

1673.—"At funerals, the Mullahs or Priests make Orations or Sermons, after a Lesson read out of the Alchoran."—Fryer, 94.

1860.—"The old Mulla having been discharged for misconduct, another by name Cozze (see CAZEE) Mahmud entertained on a salary of 5 Pagodas per mensem, his duties consisting of the business of writing letters, &c., in Persian, besides teaching the Persian language to such of the Company's servants as shall desire to learn it."—Pt. St. Geo. Consn, March 11. Notes and Extts. No. iii. p. 12; [also see Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 2, with note].

1763.—"The Mulla in Indostan superstitions the practice, and punishes the breach of religious duties."—Orme, reprint, i. 26.

1809.—"The British Government have, with their usual liberality, continued the allowance for the Moolahs in order to read the Koran."—Ed. Valentia, i. 423.

1879.—"... struck down by a fanatical crowd impelled by a fierce Moola."—Sat. Rev. No. 1254, p. 494.

MOOLVEE, s. Popular Hind. mulâr, Ar. mulârvâ, from same root as mulâ (see MOOLLAH). A Judge, Doctor of the Law, &c. It is a usual prefix to the names of learned men and professors of law and literature. (See LAW-OFFICER.)

1784.—"A Pandit in Bengal or Molavee May daily see a carcasse burn; But you can't furnish for the soul of ye A dirge sans ashes and an urn."—N. B. Hatled, see Calc. Review, xxvi. 79.
MOONAUL, s. Hind. munāl or munda (it seems to be in no dictionary); [Platts gives "Munāl (dialec.)."] The Lopophorus Impeyanus, most splendid perhaps of all game-birds, rivalling the brilliancy of hue, and the metallic lustre of the humming-birds on the scale of the turkey. "This splendid pheasant is found throughout the whole extent of the Himalayas, from the hills bordering Afghanistan as far east as Sikkim, and probably also to Bootan" (Jerdon). "In the autumnal and winter months numbers are generally collected in the same quarter of the forest, though often so widely scattered that each bird appears to be alone" (Ibid.). Can this last circumstance point to the etymology of the name as connected with Skt. munī, 'an eremite'?

It was pointed out in a note on Marco Polo (1st ed. i. 246, 2nd ed. i. 272), that the extract which is given below from Aelian undoubtedly refers to the Munul. We have recently found that this indication had been anticipated by G. Cuvier, in a note on Pliny (tom. vii. p. 409 of ed. Ajasson de Grandsagne, Paris, 1830). It appears from Jerdon that Monaul is popularly applied by Europeans at Darjeeling to the Sikkim horned pheasant Ceriornis satyra, otherwise sometimes called 'Argus Pheasant'(q.v.).

C. A.D. 350.—"Cocks too are produced there of a kind bigger than any others. These have a crest, but instead of being red like the crest of our cocks, this is variegated like a coronet of flowers. The tail-feathers moreover are not arched, or bent into a curve (like a cock's), but flattened out. And this tail they trail after them as a peacock does, unless when they erect it, and set it up. And the plumage of these Indian cocks is golden, and dark blue, and of the hue of the emerald." —De Nat. Animal. vi. 2.

MOON BLINDNESS. This affection of the eyes is commonly believed to be produced by sleeping exposed to the full light of the moon. There is great difference of opinion as to the facts, some quoting experience as incontrovertible, others regarding the thing merely as a vulgar prejudice, without substantial foundation. Some remarks will be found in Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 308-10. The present writer has in the East twice suffered from a peculiar affection of the eyes and face, after being in sleep exposed to a bright moon, but he would hardly have used the term moon-blindness.

MOONG, MOONGO. s. Or. 'green-gram'; Hind. mung, [Skt. mūḍga]. A kind of vetche (Phaseolus Mungo, L.) in very common use over India; according to Garcia the musch (maāsh) of Avicenna. Garcia also says that it was popularly recommended as a diet for fever in the Deccan; [and is still recommended for this purpose by native physicians (Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. 191)].

c. 1396.—"The munj again is a kind of māsh, but its grains are oblong and the colour is light green. Munj is cooked along with rice, and eaten with butter. This is what they call Kichri (see KEDGEREE), and it is the diet on which one breakfasts daily."
— Ibn Batuta, iii. 131.

1557.—"The people were obliged to bring hay, and corn, and mungo, which is a certain species of seed that they feed horses with."—Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 132.

1563.—"Servant-maid. — That girl that you brought from the Deccan asks me for mungo, and says that in her country they give it them to eat, husked and boiled. Shall I give it her?"
"Orta.—Give it her since she wishes it; but bread and a boiled chicken would be better. For she comes from a country where they eat bread, and not rice."—Garcia, f. 145.

[1611.—"... for 25 maunds Moong, 28m. 09 p."—Darweys, Letters, i. 141.]

MOONGA, MOOGA. s. Beng. mūgay. A kind of wild silk, the produce of Antheraeas assama, collected and manufactured in Assam. ["Its Assamese name is said to be derived from the amber munga, 'coral' colour of the silk, and is frequently used to denote silk in general" (B. C. Allen, Mono. on the Silk Cloths of Assam, 1899, p. 10.).] The quotations in elucidation of this word may claim some peculiar interest. That from Purchas is a modern illustration of the legends which reached the Roman Empire in classic times, of the growth of silk in the Seric jungles ("velleraque ut foliis depectunt tenuis Seres"); whilst that from Robert Lindsay may possibly throw light on the statements in the Periplus regarding an overland importation of silk from Thin into Gangetic India.
MOORE, MOORMAN.

1626.—"... Moga which is made of the bark of a certaine tree."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1505.

c. 1678.—"The kingdom of Assen is one of the best countries of all Asia, ... There is a sort of Silk that is found under the trees, which is spun by a Creature like our Silk-worms, but rounder, and which lives all the year long under the trees. The Silks which are made of this Silk glist'n very much, but they fret presently."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 187-8; [ed. Ball, ii. 251].

1690.—"The Florella yarn or Muckta examined and priced. ... The Agent informed that 'twas called Arvuede, made neither with cotton nor silke, but of a kind of Herba spun by a worme that feeds upon the leaves of a stalke or tree called Arvuede which bears a round prickley berry, of which oyle is made; vast quantities of this cloth is made in the country about Goora Ghaut beyond Seripore Merchâ; where the wormes are kept as silke wormes here; twill never come white, but will take any colour &c.—R. St. Geo. Agent on Tour, Conmem., Nov. 19. — Notes and Eeta. iii. P. 58. Arumjui or regul is the castor-oil plant, and this must be the Attacija ricini, Jones, called in H. Arrindi, Arrindiarium (!) and in Bengali Eri, Erinu, Erindy, according to Forbes Watson's Nomenclature, No. 8002, p. 371. [For full details see Allen, Mono. pp. 5, seqq.]

1763.—"No duties have ever yet been paid on Lacks, Mugga-dooties, and other goods brought from Assam."
—In Van Sittart, I. 249.

c. 1778.—"... Silks of a coarse quality, called Moonga, duties, are also brought from the frontiers of China for the Malay trade."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsay, iii. 174.

MOONSHIE, s. Ar. munsfi, but written in Hind. munshi. The verb insha, of which the Ar. word is the participle, means 'to educate,'a youth, as well as 'to compose' a written document. Hence 'a secretary; a reader, an interpreter, a writer.' It is commonly applied by Europeans specifically to a native teacher of languages, especially of Arabic, Persian, and Urdu, though the application to a native amanuensis in those tongues, and to any respectable, well-educated native gentleman is also common. The word probably became tolerably familiar in Europe through a book of instruction in Persian bearing the name (viz. "The Persian Moonshie, by F. Gladwyn," 1st ed. s.a., but published in Calcutta about 1790-1800).

1777.—"Moonshi. A writer or secretary."—Halhed, Code, 17.

1782.—"The young gentlemen exercise themselves in translating ... they reason and dispute with their munchees (tutors) in Persian and Moors. ..."—Price's Tracts, i. 89.

1785.—"Your letter, requiring our authority for engaging in your service a Munshy, for the purpose of making out passports, and writing letters, has been received."—Tippoo's Letters, 67.

"A lasting friendship was formed between the pupil and his Moonshie. ... The Moonshie, who had become wealthy, afforded him yet more substantial evidence of his recollection, by earnestly requesting him, when on the point of leaving India, to accept a sum amounting to £1600, on the plea that the latter (i.e. Shore) had saved little."—Mem. of Lord Teignmouth, i. 32-33.

1814.—"They presented me with an address they had just composed in the Hindoo language, translated into Persian by the Durbar munsee."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 365; [2nd ed. ii. 344].

1817.—"Its authenticity was fully proved by ... and a Persian Moonshie who translated."—Mill, Hist. v. 127.

1867.—"When the Mirza grew up, he fell among English, and ended by carrying his rupees as a Moonshie, or a language-master, to that infidel people."—Select Writings of Viscount Strangford, i. 265.

MOONSF IF, s. Hind. from Ar. munsif, 'one who does justice' (insaf), a judge. In British India it is the title of a native civil judge of the lowest grade. This office was first established in 1793.

1812.—"... munsifs, or native justices."—Fifth Report, p. 32.

[1852.—"I wonder, Mr. Deputy, if Providence had made you a Moonshie, instead of a Deputy Collector, whether you would have been more lenient in your strictures upon our system of civil justice!"—Ruikes, Notes on the X. W. Provinces, 155.]

MOOR, MOORMAN, s. (and adj. MOORISH). A Mahommedan; and so from the habitual use of the term (Moure), by the Portuguese in India, particularly a Mahommedan inhabitant of India.

In the Middle Ages, to Europe generally, the Mahommedans were known as the Saracens. This is the word always used by Joinville, and by Marco Polo. Ibn Batuta also mentions the fact in a curious passage (ii. 425-6).

At a later day, when the fear of the Ottoman had made itself felt in Europe, the word Turk was that which identified itself with the Moslem, and thus we have in the Collect for Good Friday,—"Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics." But to the Spaniards and Portuguese, whose contact was with the Musulmans of Mauritania who had passed over and conquered the Peninsula, all Mahomedans were Moors. So the Mahomedans whom the Portuguese met with on their voyages to India, on what coast soever, were alike styled Mooros; and from the Portuguese the use of this term, as synonymous with Mahomedan, passed to Hollanders and Englishmen.

The word then, as used by the Portuguese discoverers, referred to religion, and implied no nationality. It is plain indeed from many passages that the Moors of Calicut and Cochin were in the beginning of the 16th century people of mixed race, just as the Moplahs (q.v.) are now. The Arab, or Arabo-African occupants of Mozambique and Melinda, the Sumalis of Magadoxo, the Arabs and Persians of Calhāt and Ormuz, the Boras of Guzerat, are all Moors to the Portuguese writers, though the more intelligent among these are quite conscious of the impropriety of the term. The Moors of the Malabar coast were middlemen, who had adopted a profession of Islam for their own convenience, and in order to minister for their own profit to the constant traffic of merchants from Ormuz and the Arabian ports. Similar influences still affect the boatmen of the same coast, among whom it has become a sort of custom in certain families, that different members should profess respectively Mahomedanism, Hinduisim, and Christianity.

The use of the word Moor for Mahomedan died out pretty well among educated Europeans in the Bengal Presidency in the beginning of the last century, or even earlier, but probably held its ground a good deal longer among the British soldiery, whilst the adjective Moorish will be found in our quotations nearly as late as 1840. In Ceylon, the Straits, and the Dutch Colonies, the term Moorman for a Musulman is still in common use. Indeed the word is still employed by the servants of Madras officers in speaking of Mahomedans, or of a certain class of these. Moor is still applied at Manilla to the Musulman Malays.

1498.—"... the Moors never came to the house when this trading went on, and we became aware that they wished us ill, insomuch that when any of us went ashore, in order to annoy us they would spit on the ground, and say 'Portugal, Portugal.'"—Roteiro de V. da Gama, p. 75.

"For you must know, gentlemen, that from the moment you put into port here (Calecut) you caused disturbance of mind to the Moors of this city, who are numerous and very powerful in the country."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 166.

1499.—"We reached a very large island called Sumatra, where pepper grows in considerable quantities.... The Chief is a Moor, but speaking a different language."—Santo Stefano, in India in the XVth Cent. [7].

1508.—"Adi 28 zigun vere in Venetia insieme co Sier Alvice de Boni un selav moor el qual portorobo i spagnoli da la insula spagniola."—MS. in Museo Civico at Venice. Here the term Moor is applied to a native of Hispaniola!

1513.—"Hanc (Malaccam) rex Maurus gubernabat."—Emmanuelis Regis Epistolae, f. 1. 1555.—"And for the hatred in which they hold them, and for their abhorrence of the name of Frangue, they call in reproach the Christians of our parts of the world Frangues (see FIRINGHEE), just as we improperly call them again Moors."—Barros, IV. iv. 16.

c. 1560.—"When we lay at Fuquien, we did see certain Moores, who knew so little of their secte that they could say nothing else but that Mahomet was a Moor, my father was a Moore, and I am a Moore."—Reports of the Province of China, done into English by R. Willes, in Hakti. ii. 567.

1563.—"And as to what you say of Lndovico Vartomano, I have spoken both here and in Portugal, with people who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and that he came back among us doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calecut and Cochin, nor indeed did we at that time navigate those seas that we now navigate."—Garcia, f. 30.

1569.—"... always whereas I have spoken of Gentiles is to be understood Idolaters, and whereas I speak of Moores, I mean Mahomet's secte."—Caeser Frederike, in Hakti. ii. 359.

1685.—"We put out a piece of a Red Ancient to appear like a Moor's Vessel: not judging it safe to be known to be English; Our nation having lately gott an ill name by abusing ye Inhabitants of these Islands: but no boat would come near us . . ." (in the Maldives).—Hedges, Diary, March 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 190].

1688. — "Lascars, who are Moors of India."—Dampier, ii. 57.

1689.—"The place where they went ashore was a Town of the Moors: Which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolators, Gentous or Rashroots (see RAJFOOT)."—Dampier, i. 507.

1747.—"We had the Misfortune to be reduced to almost inevitable Danger, for as our Success chiefly depended on the assistance of the Moors, We were soon brought to the utmost Extremity by being abandoned by them."—Letter from Ft. St. Geo. to the Court, May 2 (India Office MS. Records).

1752.—"His successor Mr. Godhues . . . even permitted him (Duplex) to continue the exhibition of those marks of Moorish dignity, which both Murzafa-jing and Sallah-bad-jing had permitted him to display."—Orme, i. 367.

1757.—In Ives, writing in this year, we constantly find the terms Moormen and Moorish, applied to the forces against which Clive and Watson were acting on the Hoogly.

1768.—"From these origins, time has formed in India a mighty nation of near ten millions of Mahomedans, whom Europeans call Moors."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 24.

1770.—"Before the Europeans doubled the Cape of Good Hope, the Moors, who were the only maritime people of India, sailed from Surat and Bengal to Malacca."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 210.

1781.—"Mr. Hicky thinks it a Duty incumbent on him to inform his friends in particular, and the Public in General, that an attempt was made to Assassinate him last Thursday Morning between the Hours of One and two o'Clock, by two armed Europeans aided and assisted by a Moorman . . ."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 7.

1784.—"Lieutenants Speediman and Rutledge . . . were bound, circumcised, and clothed in Moorish garments."—In Seton-Karr, i. 15.

1797.—"Under the head of castes entitled to a favourable term, I believe you comprehend Brahmans, Moormen, merchants, and almost every man who does not belong to the Sudra or cultivating caste . . ."—Minute of Sir T. Munro, in Arbuthnot, i. 17.

1807.—"The rest of the inhabitants, who are Moors, and the richer Gentooos, are dressed in various degrees and fashions."—Ld. Minto in India, p. 17.

1829.—"I told my Moorman, as they call the Mussulmans here, just now to ask the drum-major when the mail for the Pradwan (?) was to be made up."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed. p. 80.

1839.—"As I came out of the gate I met some young Moorish dandies on horseback; one of them was evidently a 'crack-rider,' and began to show off."—Letters from Madras, p. 290.

MOORA, s. Sea Hind. mūrā, from Port. mūra, Ital. muro; a tack ( Roe-buck).

MOORAH, s. A measure used in the sale of paddy at Bombay and in Guzerat. The true form of this word is doubtful. From Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. it would seem that mūdi and mūdī are properly cases of rice-straw bound together to contain certain quantities of grain, the former larger and the latter smaller. Hence it would be a vague and varying measure. But there is a land measure of the same name. See Wilson, s.v. Mādī. [The Madras Gloss. gives mooda, Mal. māṭa, from māṭra, 'to cover,' a fastening package; especially the packages in a circular form, like a Dutch cheese, fastened with wisps of straw, in which rice is made up in Malabar and Canara. The mooda is said to be 1 cubic foot and 1,116 cubic inches, and equal to 3 Kulsies (see CULSEY).]

1554.—"(At Baçaaim) the Mūra of bātē (see BATTĀ) contains 3 candis (see CANDY), which (bāte) is rice in the husk, and after it is stript it amounts to a candy and a half, and something more."—A. Nunes, p. 30.

1813.—"Batty Measure.—* * * *
25 parahs........make 1 moorah.*
4 candies........1 moorah."
Milburn, 2nd ed. p. 143.

MOOPUNKEY. s. Corr. of Moor-punkhī; 'peacock-tailed,' or 'peacock-winged'; the name given to certain state pleasure-boats on the Gangetic rivers, now only (if at all) surviving at Murshidabād. They are a good deal like the Burmese 'war-boats;' see cut in Mission to Ava (Major Phayre's), p. 4. [A similar boat was the Feelchehra (Hind. fil-chehra, 'elephant-faced'). In a letter of 1784 Warren Hastings writes: 'I intend to finish my voyage to-morrow in the feelchehra' (Busteed, Echoes, 3rd ed. 291).]

1767.—"Charges Dewanny, viz.:
'A few moorpunkeya and beadsoles (see BOLIAH) for the service of Mahomed Reza Khan, and on the service at the city some are absolutely necessary... 25,000 : 0 : 0.'
—Dacca Accounts, in Long, 524.

1780.—"Another boat... very curiously constructed, the Moor-punky: these are very long and narrow, sometimes extending to upwards of 100 feet in length, and not more than 8 feet in breadth; they are always paddled, sometimes by 40 men, and are steered by a large paddle from the stern, which rises in the shape of a peacock, a snake, or some other animal.'—Hodges, 40.

1785.—"... moor-punkees, or peacock-boats, which are made as much as possible to resemble the peacock.'—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 450."

MOORS, THE. s. The Hindustani language was in the 18th century commonly thus styled. The idiom is a curious old English one for the denomination of a language, of which 'broad Scots' is perhaps a type, and which we find exemplified in 'Mala-bars' (see MALABAR) for Tamil, whilst we have also met with Bengals for Bengāli, with Indostans for Urduī, and with Turks for Turkish. The term Moors is probably now entirely obsolete, but down to 1850, at least, some old officers of the Royal army and some old Madras civilians would occasionally use the term as synonymous with what the former would also call 'the black language.' [Moors for Urduī was certainly in use among the old European pensioners at Chunār as late as 1892.]

"—Si quid novisti rectius istic, Candidus imperiti; si non his utere mecum."

By Capt. George Hadley. London: Printed for T. Cadell in the Strand. MDCCCLXXI.

Captain Hadley's orthography is on a detestable system. He writes chookerav, chookeree, for chokhrā, chokhrī ('boy, girl'); dolchinney for dal-chinī ('cinnamon'), &c. His etymological ideas also are loose. Thus he gives 'shrimps=chinchra mutches, 'fish with legs and claws,' as if the word was from chang (Pers.), 'a hook or claw.' Bādor, 'a halter,' or as he writes, baug-doore, he derives from dīr, 'distance,' instead of dōr, 'a rope.' He has no knowledge of the instrumental case with terminal ne, and he does not seem to be aware that ham and tewn (hum and toom, as he writes) are in reality plurals ('we' and 'you'). The grammar is altogether of a very primitive and tentative character, and far behind that of the R. C. Missionaries, which is referred to s.v. Hindostanee. We have not seen that of Schulz (1745) mentioned under the same.

1752.—"The Centinell was sitting at the top of the gate, singing a Moorish song."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 272.

1767.—"In order to transact Business of any kind in this Country, you must at least have a smattering of the Language for few of the Inhabitants (except in great Towns) speak English. The original Language, of this Country (or at least the earliest we know of) is the Bengal or Genteo, ... But the politest Language is the Moors or Mussulmans and Persian.... The only Language that I know anything of is the

* Hadley, however, mentions in his preface that a small pamphlet had been received by Mr. George Bogle in 1770, which he found to be the multilated embryo of his own grammatical scheme. This was circulating in Bengal "at his expence," 1803.—"Conceive what society there will be when people speak what they don't think, in Moors."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 108.

1804.—"She had a Moorish woman interpreter, and as I heard her give orders to her interpreter in the Moorish language I must consider the conversation of the first authority."—Wellington, iii. 290.

"The Stranger's Guide to the Hindoostanee, or Grand Popular Language of India, improperly called Moorish; by J. Borthwick Gilchrist : Calcutta."

MOORUM, s. A word used in Western India for gravel, &c., especially as used in road-metal. The word appears to be Mahratti. Molesworth gives "murrum, a fissional kind of stone, probably decayed Trap." [Murrakalba is the Tel. name for Laterite. (Also see CABOOK.)]

[1875.—"There are few places where Murrum, or decomposed granite, is not to be found."—Gribble, Cuddapat, 247.

MOOTSUDDY, s. A native accountant. Hind, mutasaddi from Ar. mutasaddī.

1883.—"Cossadass ye Chief Secretary, Mutsuddies' and ye Nabobs Chief Eunuch will be paid all their money beforehand."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 81.]

1785.—"This representation has caused us the utmost surprise. Whenever the Mutsuqaddies belonging to your department cease to yield you proper obedience, you must give them a severe flogging."—Tipoo's Letters, p. 2.

"Old age has certainly made havock on your understanding; otherwise you would have known that the Mutsuqaddies here are not the proper persons to determine the market prices there."—Ibid. p. 118.

[1809.—"The regular battalions have also been riotous, and confined their Mootsuqaddees, the officer who keeps their accounts, and transacts the public business on the part of the commandant."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 135.]

MOPLAH, s. Malayil, māppila. The usual application of this word is to the indigenous Mahommudans of Malabar; but it is also applied to the indigenous (so-called) Syrian Christians of Cochin and Travancore. In Morton's Life of Leyden the word in the latter application is curiously misprinted as madilla. The derivation of the word is very obscure. Wilson gives mā-pillā, 'mother's son, "as sprung from the intercourse of foreign colonists, who were persons unknown, with Malabar women." Nelson, as quoted below interprets the word as 'bridegroom' (it should however rather be 'son-in-law').* Dr. Badger suggests that it is from the Arabic verb falāḥa, and means 'a cultivator' (compare the fellah of Egypt), whilst Mr. C. P. Brown expresses his conviction that it was a Tamil mispronunciation of the Arabic muw'ābbar, 'from over the water.' No one of these greatly commands itself. [Mr. Logan (Malabar, ii. cxi.) and the Madras Glossary derive it from Mal. mā, Skt. māha, 'great,' and Mal. pilla, 'a child.' Dr. Gundert's view is that Māpilla was an honorary title given to colonists from 1516.—"In all this country of Malabar there are a great quantity of Moors, who are of the same language and colour as the Gentiles of the country. . . . They call those Moors Mapulera; they carry on nearly all the trade of the seaports."—Barboza, 146.

1767.—"Ali Raja, the Chief of Cannore, who was a Muhammadan, and of the tribe called Mapilla, rejoiced at the success and conquests of a Muhammadan Chief."—H. of Hydur, p. 184.

1782.—"... les Maplets recurent les coutumes et les superstitions des Gentils, sous l'empire des quels ils vivoient. C'est pour se conformer aux usages des Malabars, que les enfans des Maplets n'héritent point de leurs pères, mais des frères de leurs mères."—Sonnerat, i. 193.

1787.—"Of Moplas fierce your hand has tam'd, And monsters that your sword has main'd."—Life and Letters of J. Ritson, 1833, i. 114.

1800.—"We are not in the most thriving condition in this country. Polegars, nairs, and moplas in arms on all sides of us."—Wellington, i. 43.

1813.—"At one period the Moplahs created great commotion in Travancore, and towards the end of the 17th century massacred the chief of Anjengo, and all the English gentlemen belonging to the settlement, when on a public visit to the Queen of Attinga."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 402; [2nd ed. i. 259].

1838.—"I may add in concluding my notice that the Kallans alone of all the castes of Madura call the Mahometans 'mispilleis' or bridegrooms (Moplahs)."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. ii. 55.

MORA, s. Hind. morhâ. A stool (tabouret); a footstool. 'In common colloquial use.

[1795.—"The old man, whose attention had been chiefly attracted by a Ramnaghrur morah, of which he was desirous to know the construction, . . . departed."—Capt. Blunt, in Asiat. Res., vii. 92.

MORCHAL, s. A fan, or a fly-whisk, made of peacock's feathers. Hind. morchal.

1673.—"All the heat of the Day they idle it under some shady Tree, at night they come in troops, armed with a great Pole, a Mirchal or Peacock's Tail, and a Wallet."—Fryer, 95.

1690.—(The heat) "makes us Employ our Peons in Fanning of us with Murchals made of Peacock's Feathers, four or five Foot long, in the time of our Entertainments, and when we take our Repose."—Ovington, 335.

[1826.—"They (Gosseins) are clothed in a ragged mantle, and carry a long pole, and a morchal, or peacock's tail."—Panckrew Hari, ed. 1873, i. 76.]

MORT-DE-CHIEN, s. A name for cholera, in use, more or less, up to the end of the 18th century, and the former prevalence of which has tended probably to the extraordinary and baseless notion that epidemic cholera never existed in India till the governorship of the Marquis of Hastings. The word in this form is really a corruption of the Portuguese mordexim, shaped by a fanciful French etymology. The Portuguese word again represents the Konkanani and Maharashtra modach, mOSHtI, or modwash; 'cholera,' from a Mahr. verb modnEN, 'to break up, to sink' (as under infirmities, in fact 'to collapse'). The Guzarat appears to be morchi or morachi.

[1504.—Writing of this year Correa mentions the prevalence of the disease in the Samorin's army, but he gives it no name. 'Besides other illness there was one almost sudden, which caused such a pain in the belly that a man hardly survived 8 hours of it.'—Correa, i. 489.]

1543.—Correa's description is so striking that we give it almost at length: "This winter they had in Goa a mortal distemper which the natives call morxy, and attacking persons of every quality, from the smallest infant at the breast to the old man of fourscore, and also domestic animals and birds, of which it affected every living thing, male and female. And this malady attacked people without any cause that could be assigned, falling upon sick and sound alike, on the fat and the lean; and nothing in the world was a safeguard against it. And this malady attacked the stomach, caused as some experts affirmed by chill; though later it was maintained that no cause whatever could be discovered. The malady was so powerful and so evil that it immediately produced the symptoms of strong poison; e.g., vomiting, constant desire for water, with drying of the stomach; and cramps that contracted the hams and the soles of the feet, with such pains that the patient seemed dead, with the eyes broken and the nails of the fingers and toes black and crumpled. And for this malady our physicians never found any cure; and the patient was carried off in one day, or at the most in a day and night; insomuch that not ten in a hundred recovered, and those who did recover were such as were healed in haste with medicines of little importance known to the natives. So great was the mortality this season that the bells were tolling all day... inasmuch that the governor forbade the tolling of the church bells, not to frighten the people... and when a man died in the hospital of this malady of morexy the Governor ordered all the experts to come together and open the body. But they found nothing wrong except that the paunch was shrunk up like a hen's gizzard, and wrinkled like a piece of scorched leather..."—Correa, iv. 288-289.

1563.—"Page.—Don Jeronymo sends to beg that you will go and visit his brother immediately, for though this is not the time of day for visits, delay would be dangerous, and he will be very thankful that you come at once.

"Orta. — What is the matter with the patient, and how long has he been ill?

"Page.—He has got morxi; and he has been ill two hours.

"Orta.—I will follow you.

"Roano.—Is this the disease that kills so quickly, and that few recover from? Tell me how it is called by our people, and by the natives, and the symptoms of it, and the treatment you use in it.

"Orta. — Our name for the disease is Colérica passio; and the Indians call it morzi; whence again by corruption we call it mordexi... It is sharper here than in our own part of the world, for usually it kills in four and twenty hours. And I have seen some cases where the patient did not live more than ten hours. The most that it lasts is four days; but as there is no rule without an exception, I once saw a man with great constancy of virtue who lived twenty days continually throwing up ("carginosa")... bile, and died at last. Let us go and see this sick man; and as for the symptoms you will yourself see what a thing it is."—Garcia, ff. 74v, 75.

1563.—"There is another thing which is usefully called by them canarina, which the Caranir Brahman physicians usually employ for the colérica passio sickness, which they call morxi; which sickness is so sharp that it kills in fourteen hours or less."—Acosta, Traducto, 27.

1598.—"There reigneth a sickness called Mordexinj which stealeth uppon men, and handeth them in such sort, that it weakeneth a man, and maketh him cast out all that he hath in his bodie, and many times his life withall."—Linschoten, 67; [Hak. Soc. i. 285; Morxi in ii. 22].

1599.—"The disease which in India is called Mordicin. This is a species of Colic, which comes on in those countries with such force and vehemence that it kills in a few hours; and there is no remedy discovered. It causes evacuations by stool or vomit, and makes one burst with pain. But there is a herb proper for the cure, which bears the same name of mordexin."—Carletti, 227.

1602.—"In those islets (off Aracan) they found bad and brackish water, and certain jeans like ours both green and dry, of which they ate some, and in the same moment this gave them a kind of dysentery, which in India they corruptly call mordexin, which ought to be morziis, and which the Arabs call sachauza (Ar. huyga), which is what Rasis calls suhida, a disease which kills in 24 hours. Its action is immediately to produce a sunken and slender pulse, with cold sweat, great inward fire, and excessive thirst, the eyes sunken, great vomitings, and in fact it leaves the natural power so collapsed (derivada) that the patient seems like a dead man."—Costa, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

C. 1610.—"Il regne entre eux vne autre maladie qui vient a l'improuviste, ils la nom-ment Mordesin, et vient auec grande douleur des testes, et vomissement, et crient fort, et le plus souvent en meurent."—Pyrand de Laval, ii. 19; [Hak. Soc. ii. 13].

1631.—"Pulvis ejus (Calumbac) ad scrup. unus pondus sumptus cholerae prodest, quam Mordex incoele vocant."—Jac. Bontii, lib. iv. p. 43.

1638.—"... celles qui y regnent le plus, sont celles qu'ils appellent Mordexin, qui tue subitement."—Mandeldso, 285.

1648.—See also the (questionable) Voyages Fameux du Sienor Victor le Blanc, 76.

C. 1665.—"Les Portugais appellent Mor-de-chin les quatre sortes de Coliques qu'on souffre dans les Indes ou elles sont fre-quentes... ceux qui ont la quatrième souf rent souvent en matre ensemble, a savoir le vomissement, le flux de ventre, les extremes douleurs, et je crois que cette dernière est le Colera-Morbus."—Thevenot, v. 324.

1673.—"They apply Cauteries most unmercifully in a Mordesheen, called so by the Portugalls, being a Vomiting with Loose-ness."—Pryer, 114.

[1674. — "The disease called Mordechigenerally commences with a violent fever, accompanied by tremblings, horrors and vomitings; these symptoms are generally followed by delirium and death. He prescribes a hot iron applied to the soles of the foot. He attributes the disease to indigestion, and remarks bitterly that at least the prisoners of the Inquisition were safe from this disease. —Dellom, Relation de l'Inquisition de Goa, ii. ch. 71.]

1690.—"The Mordechine is another Disease... which is a violent Vomiting and Looseness."—Ovington, 350.

C. 1690. — Rumphius, speaking of the Jack-fruit (q.v.): "Non nisi vacuo stomacho edendus est, alias enim... plerumque oritur Passio Cholerica, Portugalliis Mordexi dicta."—Herb. Amb., i. 106.

1702.—"Cette grande indigestion qu'on appele aux Indes Mordechin, et que quelques uns de nos Francois ont appelee Mort-de-Chien."—Lettres Edif., xi. 156.

Bluteau (s.v.) says Mordexin is properly a failure of digestion which is very perilous in those parts, unless the native remedy be used. This is to apply a thin rod, like a spit, and heated, under the heel, till the patient screams with pain, and then to slap the same part with the sole of a shoe, &c.

1705.—"Ce mal s'appelle mort-de-chien."—Lutillier, 113.

The following is an example of literal translation, as far as we know, unique:

1716.—"The extraordinary distempers of this country (I. of Bourbon) are the Cholick, and what they call the Dog's Disease, which is cured by burning the heel of the patient with a hot iron."—Acct. of the I. of Bourbon, in La Roge's Voyage to Arabia the Happy, &c., E.T. London, 1726, p. 155.

1727.—"... the Mordechin (which seizes one suddenly with such oppression and palpitation that he thinks he is going to die on the spot)."—Valentijn, v. (Malabar) 5. c. 1760.—"There is likewise known, on the Malabar coast chiefly, a most violent disorder they call the Mordechin; which seizes the patient with such fury of purging, vomiting, and torments of the intestines, that it will often carry him off in 30 hours."—Grose, i. 250.

1768.—"This (cholera morbus) in the East Indies, where it is very frequent and fatal, is called Mort-de-chien."—Lind, Essay on Diseases incidental to Hot Climates, 248.

1778.—In the Vocabulary of the Portuguese Grammatica Indostana, we find Mordexin, as a Portuguese word, rendered in Hind. by the word badazm, i.e. bad-hażni, 'dyspepsia' (p. 99). The most common modern Hind. term for cholera is Arab. haziż. The latter word is given by Garcia de Orta in the form hachaiya, and in the quotation from Couto as sachaiya (!). Jahāngīr speaks of one of his nobles as dying in the Decan, of haiţah, in A.D. 1615 (see note to Elliot, vi. 346). It is, however, perhaps not to be assumed that haiţah always means cholera. Thus Macpherson mentions that a violent epidemic, which raged in the Camp of Aurangzib at Bijapur in 1689, is called so. But in the history of Khān Khān Elliot, vii. 337) the general phrases ta'ān and vābāl are used in reference to this disease, whilst the description is that of bubonic plague.

1781.—"Early in the morning of the 21st June (1781) we had two men seized with the mort-de-chien."—Curris, Diseases of India, 3rd ed., Edinb., 1807.

1782.—"Les indigestions appelées dans l'Inde Mort-de-chien, sont fréquentes. Les Castes qui mangent de la viande, nourriture trop pesante pour un climat si chaud, en sont souvent attaquées."—Sowerat, i. 295. This author writes just after having described two epidemics of cholera under the name of Flux aigu. He did not apprehend that this was in fact the real Mort-de-chien.

1783.—"A disease generally called 'Mort-de-chien' at this time (during the defence of Onore) raged with great violence among the native inhabitants."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 322.

1796.—"Far more dreadful are the consequences of the above-mentioned intestinal colic, called by the Indians shani, mordexin and also Nircemben. It is occasioned, as I have said, by the winds blowing from the mountains...the consequence is that malignant and bilious slimy matter adheres to the bowels, and occasions violent pains, vomiting, fevers, and stupification; so that persons attacked with this disease die very often in a few hours. It sometimes happens that 30 or 40 persons die in this manner, in one place, in the course of the day...In the year 1782 this disease raged with much fury that a great many persons died of it."—Fra Paoloino, E.T. 409-410 (orig. see p. 353). As to the names used by Fra Paoloino, for his Shani or Ciuni, we find nothing nearer than Tamil and Mal. sami, 'convulsion, paraliy.' (Winslow in his Tamil Dict. specifies 13 kinds of sami. Komben is explained as 'a kind of cholera or smallpox' (!); and nir-komben (water-k.) as a kind of cholera or bilious distemper. Paoloino adds: 'La droga amara costa assai, e non si poteva amministrare a tanti miserabili che pervano. Adunque in mancanza di questa droga amara noi distillavamo in Togara, o acqua vite di cocom, molto stercoso di cavalli (!), o l'amministravamo agli infermi. Tutti quelli che prendevano questa guarivan.'

1808.—"Mörchee or Mortshee (Guz. and Mōde (Mah.).) A morbid affection in which the symptoms are convulsive action, followed by evacuations of the first passage up and down, with intolerable tenesmus, or by the occurrence of violent sensation in the intestines, corresponding remarkably with the cholera-morbos of European synoptists, called by the country people in England (?) mort-sheen, and by others mord-du-chien and Mane des chienes, as if it had come from France."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c. A curious notice; and the author was, we presume, from his title of "Dr.," a medical man. We suppose for England above should be read India.

The next quotation is the latest instance of the familiar use of the word that we have met with:

1812.—"General M— was taken very ill three or four days ago; a kind of fit—mort-de-chien—the doctor said, brought on by eating too many radishes."—Original Familiar Correspondence between Residents in India, &c., Edinburgh, 1846, p. 257.

1813.—"Mort de chien is nothing more than the highest degree of Cholera Morbus."—Johnson, Inf. of Tropical Climate, 405.

The second of the following quotations evidently refers to the outbreak of cholera mentioned, after Macpherson, in the next paragraph.

1780.—"I am once or twice a year (!) subject to violent attacks of cholera morbus, here called mort-de-chien. . . . "—Impyey to Dunning, quoted by Sir James Stephen, ii. 339.

1781.—"The Plague is now broke out in Bengal, and rages with great violence; it has swept away already above 4000 persons, 200 or upwards have been buried in the different Portuguese churches within a few days."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 21.

These quotations show that cholera, whether as an epidemic or as sporadic disease, is no new thing in India. Almost in the beginning of the Portuguese expeditions to the East we find apparent examples of the visitations of this terrible scourge, though no precise name is given in the narratives. Thus we read in the Life of Giovanni da Emboli, an adventurous young Florentine who served with the Portuguese, that, arriving in China in 1517, the ships' crews were attacked by a pessima malatia di frusso (virulent flux) of such kind that there died thereof about 70 men, and among these himself, and two other Florentines (Vita, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 33). Correa says that, in 1503, 20,000 men died of a like disease in the army of the Zamorin. We have given above Correa's description of the terrible Goa pest of 1543, which was most evidently cholera. Madras accounts, according to Macpherson, first mention the disease at Arcot in 1756, and there are frequent notices of it in that neighbourhood between 1763 and 1787. The Hon. R. Lindsay speaks of it as raging at Sylhet in 1781, after carrying off a number of the inhabitants of Calcutta (Macpherson, see the quotation of 1781 above). It also raged that year at Ganjam, and out of a division of 5000 Bengal troops under Col. Pearse, who were on the march through that district, 1143 were in a few days sent into hospital, whilst "death raged in the camp with a horror not to be described." The earliest account from the pen of an English physician is by Dr. Paisley, and is dated Madras, Feb. 1774. In 1783 it broke out at Hardwar Fair, and is said, in less than 8 days, to have carried off 20,000 pilgrims. The paucity of cases of cholera among European troops in the returns up to 1817, is ascribed by Dr. Macnamara to the way in which facts were disguised by the current nomenclature of disease. It need not perhaps be denied that the outbreak of 1817 marked a great rerudescence of the disease. But it is a fact that some of the more terrible features of the epidemic, which are then spoken of as quite new, had been prominently described at Goa nearly three centuries before.

See on this subject an article by Dr. J. Macpherson in Quarterly Review, for Jan. 1867, and a Treatise on Asiatic Cholera, by C. Macnamara, 1876. To these, and especially to the former, we owe several facts and references; though we had recorded quotations relating to mordexin and its identity with cholera some years before even the earlier of these publications.

MORDEXIM, MORDIXIM, s. Also the name of a sea-fish. Blunteau says 'a fish found at the Isle of Quix-enme on the Coast of Mozambique, very like bogas (?) or river-pikes.'

MOSELLAY, n.p. A site at Shīrāz often mentioned by Hāfiz as a favourite spot, and near which is his tomb.

C. 1350.—

"Boy! let thy liquid ruby flow,
And bid thy pensive heart be glad,
What'er the frowning zealots say;
Tell them that Eden cannot show
A stream so clear as Rosenabad;
A bower so sweet as Mossellay."

Hāfiz, rendered by Sir W. Jones.

1811.—"The stream of Rūknbād murmured near us; and within three or four hundred yards was the Mossella and the Tomb of Hāfiz."—W. Ousley's Travels, i. 318.

1813.—"Not a shrub now remains of the bower of Mossella, the situation of which is now only marked by the ruins of an ancient tower."—Macdonald Kinweir's Persia, 62.

MOSQUE, s. There is no room for doubt as to the original of this word being the Ar. masjid, 'a place of worship,' literally the place of sujād, i.e. 'prostration.' And the probable course is this. Masjid becomes (1) in Span. mesquita, Port. mesquita; * (2)

*According to Pyrard mesquite is the word used in the Maldives Islands. It is difficult to suppose the people would adopt such a word from the Portuguese. And probably the form both in east and west is to be accounted for by a hard pronunciation of the Arabic j, as in Egypt now; the older and probably the most widely diffused. [See Mr. Gray's note in Hak. Soc. ii. 417.]"
ITAL. meschita, moschea; French (old) mosquée, mosquée; (3) Eng. mosque. Some of the quotations might suggest a different course of modification, but they would probably mislead.

1543. — "And with the stipulation that the 5000 larin tangas which in old times were granted, and are deposited for the expenses of the mizquitas of Baçaim, are to be paid from the said duties as they always have been paid, and in regard to the said mizquitas and the prayers that are made in them there shall be no innovation whatever." — Treaty at Baçaim of the Portuguese with King Bardor of Canbaya (Bahâdûr Shâh of Guzerat) in S. Botelho, Tombo, 137. 1553.—"... but destined yet to unfurl that divine and royal banner of the Soldiery of Christ ... in the Eastern regions of Asia, amidst the infernal mesquitas of Arabia and Persia, and all the pagodes of the heathenism of India, on this side and beyond the Ganges." — Barros, i. 1. 1 [c. 1610.—"'The principal temple, which they call Oomoures misquitta" (Hukorna melikit, "Friday mosque"). — Pyrrard de Lavall, Hak. Soc. i. 72.]

1616.—"They are very jealous to let their women or Moschees be seen." — Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537; [Hak. Soc. ii. 21].

1623. — "We went to see upon the same Lake a meschita, or temple of the Mahometans." — P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 69.

1634. — "Que a de abominatione mesquita immunda Casa, a Deos dedicada hoje se veja." — Malaca Conquistada, l. xii. 43.

1638. — Mandelsoo unreasonably applies the term to all sorts of pagan temples, e.g.—

"Nor is it only in great Cities that the Benjana have their many Mosqueys ... " — E.T. 2nd ed. 1609, p. 52.

c. 1662.—"... he did it only for love to their Mammon; and would have sold after wards for as much more St. Peter's ... to the Turks for a Mosquito." — Cowley, Discourse concerning the Govt. of O. Cromwell.

1680.—*Connn. Ft. St. Geo. March 28: Records of the death of Casa Verona ... and a dispute arising as to whether his body should be burned by the Gentuses or buried by the Moors, the latter having stopped the procession on the ground that the deceased was a Muslemman and built a Muscet in the Towne to be buried in, the Governor with the advice of his Council sent an order that the body should be burned as a Genet, and not buried by the Moors, it being apprehended to be of dangerous consequence to admit the Moors such pretences in the Towne.* — Notes and Eets. No. iii. p. 14.

1727. — "There are no fine Buildings in the City, but many large Houses, and some Carnavanserays and Muscheits." — A. Hamilton, t. 161; [ed. 1774, t. 163].

c. 1760.—"'The Roman Catholic Churches, the Moorish Moschis, the Gentoo Pagodas, the worship of the Parsees, are all equally unmolested and tolerated.'" — Grose, i. 44.

[1862.—"... I slept at a Mushheed, or village house of prayer." — Brickmam, Rifle in Cashmere, 78.]

MOSQUITO, s. A gnat is so called in the tropics. The word is Spanish and Port. (dim. of mosca, a fly), and probably came into familiar English use from the East Indies, though the earlier quotations show that it was first brought from S. America. A friend annotates here: "Arctic mosquitoes are worst of all; and the Norfolk ones (in the Breeds) beat Calcutta!"

It is related of a young Scotch lady of a former generation who on her voyage to India had heard formidable, but vague accounts of this terror of the night, that on seeing an elephant for the first time, she asked: "Will you be what's called a mosquetae?"

1539.—"To this misery was there adicioned the great affliction, which the Fliis and Gnata (por parte dos otabôes e mosquitos), that coming out of the neighbouring Woods, bit and stung us in such sort, as not one of us but was gore blood," as to whether Pinto (orig. cap. xii.), in Cassia, p. 29.

1562. — "We were oftentimes greatly annoyed with a kind of fly, which in the Indian tongue is called Tiquari, and the Spanish call them Muskitos." — Miles Phillips, in * Hakl., iii. 654.*

1584. — "The 29 Day we set Saile from Saint Ichons, being many of vs stung before upon Shoare with the Muskitos; but the same night we tooke a Spanish Frigat." — MOTURPHA, s. Hind. from Ar. muhhtarafa, but according to C. P. B. muhtarifa; [rather Ar. muhhtarifa, mukhtarif, ‘an artizan’]. A name technically applied to a number of miscellaneous taxes in Madras and Bombay, such as were called sayer (q.v.), in Bengal.

[1813.—“Mohterefa. An artificer. Taxes, personal and professional, on artificers, merchants and others; also on houses, implements of agriculture, looms, & c., a branch of the sayer.”—Gloss. 5th Report, s.v.]

1826.—“... for example, the tax on merchants, manufacturers, &c. (called mohturfa). ...”—Grant Duff, H. of the Mahattas, 3rd ed. 356.]

MOULMEIN, n.p. This is said to be originally a Talaing name Mut-muva-lem, syllables which mean (or may be made to mean) ‘one-eye-destroyed’; and to account for which a cock-and-bull legend is given (probably invented for the purpose): “Tradition says that the city was founded ... by a king with three eyes, having an extra eye in his forehead, but that by the machinations of a woman, the eye in his forehead was destroyed. ...” (Mason’s Burmak, 2nd ed. p. 18). The Burmese corrupted the name into Mau-la-yaining, whence the foreign (probably Malay) form Moulmain. The place so called is on the opposite side of the estuary of the Saiwin R. from Marra-pan (q.v.), and has entirely superseded that once famous port. Moulmein, a mere site, was chosen as the headquarters of the Tenasserim provinces, when those became British in 1826 after the first Burmese War. It has lost political importance since the annexation of Pegu, 26 years later, but is a thriving city which numbered in 1881, 53,107 inhabitants; [in 1891, 55,785].

MOUNT DELY, n.p. (See DELLY, MOUNT.)

MOUSE-DEER, s. The beautiful little creature, Meminna indica (Gray), Tragulus meminna, the Indian Chevrotain (Blanford, Mammalia, 555), found in various parts of India, and weighing under 6 lbs., is so called. But the name is also applied to several pigmy species of the genus Tragulus, found in the Malay regions, [where, according to Mr. Skeat, it takes in popular tradition the place of Brer Rabbit, outwitting even the tiger, elephant, and crocodile.] All belong to the family of Musk-deer.

MUCHÁN, s. Hind. machań, Dekh. marchán, Skt. maincha. An elevated platform; such as the floor of huts among the Indo-Chinese races; or a stage or scaffolding erected to watch a tiger, to guard a field, or what not.

1662.—“... As the soil of the country is very damp, the people do not live on the ground-floor, but on the machań, which is the name for a raised floor.”—Skeat, Tātīsh, by Blockmann, in J. A. S. B. xii. Pt. i. 84.

1882.—“... In a shady green mechan in some fine tree, watching at the cool of evening. ...”—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed. 284.]

MUCHWA, s. Mahr, makhva, Hind. machwā, machwā. A kind of boat or barge in use about Bombay.

MUCKNA, s. Hind. makhwā, [which comes from Skt. makvāna, ‘a bug, a flea, a beardless man, an elephant without tusks’]. A male elephant without tusks or with only rudimentary tusks. These latter are familiar in Bengal, and still more so in Ceylon, where according to Sir S. Baker, "not more than one in 300 has tusks; they are merely provided with short grubbets, projecting generally about 3 inches from the upper jaw, and about 2 inches in diameter." (The Rifle and Hound in Ceylon, 11.) Sanderson (13 Years among the Wild Beasts of India, [3rd ed. 66]) says: "On the Continent of India muchunas, or elephants born without tusks, are decidedly rare ... Mucknas breed in the herds, and the peculiarity is not hereditary or transmitted." This author also states that out of 51 male elephants captured by him in Mysore and Bengal only 5 were muchunas. But the definition of a mukhna in Bengal is that which we have given, including those animals which possess only feminine or rudimentary tusks, the 'short grubbets' of Baker; and these latter can hardly be called rare among domesticated elephants. This may be partially due to a preference in purchasers.* The same author derives the term from mukhk, 'face'; but the reason is obscure. Shakespear and Platts give the word as also applied to 'a cock without spurs.'

c. 1780.—"An elephant born with the left tooth only is reckoned sacred; with black spots in the mouth unlucky, and not saleable; the mukna or elephant born without teeth is thought the best."—Hon. R. Lindsay in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 194.

MUOCA, MUKUVA, n.p. Malayal. and Tamil, mukkuwan (sing.), 'a diver,' and mukkwar (pl.). [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss. s.v.) derives it from Drav. mukkwa, 'to dive'; the Madras Gloss. gives Tam. mukhugu, with the same meaning.] A name applied to the fisherfolk of the western coast of the Peninsula near C. Comorin. [But Mr. Pringle (Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 187) points out that formerly as now, the word was of much more general application. Orme in a passage quoted below employs it of boatmen at Karikal. The use of the word extended as far N. as Madras, and on the W. coast; it was not confined to the extreme S.] It was among these, and among the corresponding class of Paravars on the east coast, that F. Xavier’s most noted labours in India occurred.

1510.—"The fourth class are called Mechua, and these are fishers."—Varthema, 142.

1525.—"And Dom João had secret speech with a married Christian whose wife and children were inside the fort, and a valiant man, with whom he arranged to give him 200 pardaos (and that he gave him on the spot) to set fire to houses that stood round the fort. ... So this Christian, called Duarte Fernandes ... put on a lot of old rags and tags, and powdered himself with ash in the fashion of jogues (see JOGEE), ... also defiling his hair with a mixture of oil and ashes, and disguising himself like a regular jogue, whilst he tied under his rags a parcel of gunpowder and pieces of slow-match, and so commending himself to God, in which all joined, slipped out of the fort by night, and as the day broke, he came to certain huts of macuas, which are fishermen, and began to beg alms in the usual palaver of the jogues, i.e. prayers for their long life and health, and the conquest of enemies, and easy deliveries for their womenkind, and prosperity for their children, and other grand things."—Correa, ii. 871.

1552.—Barros has mucuaria, 'a fisherman's village.'

1600.—"Those who gave the best reception to the Gospel were the Macós; and, as they had no church in which to assemble, they did so in the fields and on the shores, and with such fervour that the Father found himself at times with 5000 or 6000 souls about him."—Lucena, Vida do P. P. Xavier, 117.

[c. 1610.—"These mariners are called Moucois."—Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 314.]

1615.—"Edixit ut Macaus omnes, id est vilissima plebeacula et pisantu vivens, Christiana sacra suscipierrunt."—Jarric, i. 890.

1626.—"The Muchoa or Mechoe are Fishers ... the men Theeues, the women Harlotes, with whom they please."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 555.

1677.—Resolved "to raise the rates of hire of the Mesaulas (see MUSSOOLA) boatmen called Macquars."—Pt. St. Geo. Consan. Jan 12, in Notes and Extts. No. i. 54.

[1684.—"The Maquas or Boatmen ye Ordinary Astralagers (sic) for weather did ... prognosticate great Rains. ..."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. iii. 183.]

1727.—"They may marry into lower Tribes and so may the Muckwans, or Fishers, who, I think, are a higher tribe than the Poudias (see FOLEA)."—A. Hamilton, i. 310, [ed. 1744, i. 312].

* Sir George Yule notes: "I can distinctly call to mind 6 muchunas that I had (1 may have had more) out of 50 or 40 elephants that passed through my hands." This would give 15 or 20 per cent. of muchunas, but as the stud included females, the result would rather consist with Mr. Sanderson’s 5 out of 51 males.

a. Ar. Mufti, an expounder of the Mahomedan Law, the utterer of the fatwa (see FUTWAH). Properly the Mufti is above the Każi who carries out the judgment. In the 18th century, and including Regulation IX. of 1793, which gave the Company's Courts in Bengal the reorganization which substantially endured till 1862, we have frequent mention of both Cauzies and Müfties as authorized expounders of the Mahomedan Law; but, though Każis were nominally maintained in the Provincial Courts down to their abolition (1829-31), practically the duty of those known as Każis became limited to quite different objects and the designation of the Law-officer who gave the fatwa in our District Courts was Maulavi. The title Mufti has been long obsolete within the limits of British administration, and one might safely say that it is practically unknown to any surviving member of the Indian Civil Service, and never was heard in India as a living title by any Englishman now surviving. (See CAZEE, LAW-OFFICEÉ, MOOLVÉE).

b. A slang phrase in the army, for 'plain clothes.' No doubt it is taken in some way from a, but the transition is a little obscure. [It was perhaps originally applied to the attire of dressing-gown, smoking-cap, and slippers, which was like the Oriental dress of the Mufti who was familiar in Europe from his appearance in Molière's Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Compare the French en Pekin.]

MUDDÁR, s. Hind. madár, Skt. mandára; Calotropis procera, R. Brown, N.O. Asclepiadaceae. One of the most common and widely diffused plants in uncultivated plains throughout India. In Sind the bark is used for halters, &c., and experiment has shown it to be an excellent material worth £40 a ton in England, if it could be supplied at that rate; but the cost of collection has stood in the way of its utilisation. The seeds are imbedded in a silky floss, used to stuff pillows. This also has been the subject of experiment for textile use, but as yet without practical success. The plant abounds with an acrid milky juice which the Rajputns are said to employ for infanticide. (Punjab Plants.) The plant is called Ak in Sind and throughout N. India.

MUDDLE, s. (?) This word is only known to us from the clever—perhaps too clever—little book quoted below. The word does not seem to be known, and was probably a misapprehension of budlee. [Even Mr. Brandt and Mrs. Wyatt are unable to explain this word. The former does not remember hearing it. Both doubt its connection with budlee. Mrs. Wyatt suggests with hesitation Tamil mudder, 'boiled rice,' mudei-palli, 'the cook-house.']

1836-7.—"Besides all these acknowledged and ostensible attendants, each servant has a kind of muddle or double of his own, who does all the work that can be put off upon him without being found out by his master or mistresses."—Letters from Madras, 38.

"They always come accompanied by their Vakeels, a kind of Secretaries, or interpreters, or flappers,—their muddies in short; everybody here has a muddle, high or low."—Letters from Madras, 86.
MUGG, n.p. Beng. Magh. It is impossible to deviate without deterioration from Wilson's definition of this obscure name: "A name commonly applied to the natives of Arakan, particularly those bordering on Bengal, or residing near the sea; the people of Chittagong." It is beside the question of its origin or proper application, to say, as Wilson goes on to say, on the authority of Lieut. (now Sir Arthur) Phayre, that the Arakanese disclaim the title, and restrict it to a class held in contempt, viz. the descendants of Arakanese settlers on the frontier of Bengal by Bengali mothers. The proper names of foreign nations in any language do not require the sanction of the nation to whom they are applied, and are often not recognised by the latter. German is not the German name for the Germans, nor Welsh the Welsh name for the Welsh, nor Hindu (originally) a Hindu word, nor China a Chinese word. The origin of the present word is very obscure. Sir A. Phayre kindly furnishes us with this note: "There is good reason to conclude that the name is derived from Maga, the name of the ruling race for many centuries in Magadha (modern Behar). The kings of Arakan were no doubt originally of this race. For though this is not distinctly expressed in the histories of Arakan, there are several legends of Kings from Benares reigning in that country, and one regarding a Brahman who marries a native princess, and whose descendants reign for a long period. I say this, although Buchanan appears to reject the theory (see Montg. Martin, ii. 18 seqq.)" The passage is quoted below.

On the other hand the Mahomedan writers sometimes confound Buddhists with fire-worshippers, and it seems possible that the word may have been Pers. magh = 'magus.' [See Risley, Tribes and Castes, ii. 28 seq.] The Chittagong Muggs long furnished the best class of native cooks in Calcutta; hence the meaning of the last quotation below.

1585. — "The Mogen, which be of the kingdom of Recon (see ARAKAN) and Rame, be stronger than the King of Tipara; so that Chatigam or Porto Grande (q.v.) is often under the King of Reon." — R. Fitch, in Hakt. ii. 389.

c. 1590. — (In a country adjoining Pegu) "there are mines of ruby and diamond and gold and silver and copper and petroleum and sulphur and (the lord of that country) has war with the tribe of Magh about the mines; also with the tribe of Tipar there are battles." — Atn (orig.) i. 388; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 120].

c. 1604. — "Defeat of the Magh Raja. — This short-sighted Raja . . . became elated with the extent of his treasures and the number of his elephants. . . . He then openly rebelled, and assembling an army at Sinorganw laid siege to a fort in that vicinity . . . Raja Man Singh . . . despatched a force. . . . These soon brought the Magh Raja and all his forces to action . . . regardless of the number of his boats and the strength of his artillery." — Indiyatullah, in Elliot, vi. 109.

c. 1665. — "These many years there have always been in the Kingdom of Rakan or Moy (read Mog) some Portuguese, and with them a great number of their Christian Slaves, and other Franguis . . . That was the refuge of the Run-aways from Goa, Celebes, Cochín, Malacca (see MALACCA), and all the other places which the Portuguese formerly held in the Indies." — Bernier, E. T. p. 53; [ed. Constable, 109].

1676. — "In all Bengal this King (of Arakan) is known by no other name but the King of Mogue." — Tavernier, E. T. i. 8.

1752. — " . . . that as the time of the Muggs draws nigh, they request us to order the pinnace to be with them by the end of next month." — In Long, p. 87.

c. 1810. — "In a paper written by Dr. Leyden, that gentleman supposes . . . that Magadha is the country of the people whom we call Muggs . . . . The term Mugg, these people assured me, is never used by either themselves or by the Hindus, except when speaking the jargon commonly called Hindu-stani by Europeans. . ."—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, ii. 18.

1811.—"Mugs, a dirty and disgusting people, but strong and skilful. They are somewhat of the Malayan race."—Solyns, iii.

1866.—"That vegetable curry was excellent. Of course your cook is a Mug?"—The Dawk Bungalow, 380.

MUGGUR, s. Hind. and Mahr. magar and makar, from Skt. makara 'a sea-monster' (see MACAREO). The destructive broad-snouted crocodile of the Ganges and other Indian rivers, formerly called Crocodilus biocoruscus, now apparently subdivided into several sorts or varieties.

1611.—"Alagaters or Crocodiles there called Murgur match."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 426. The word is here intended for mugar-mats or makkh, 'crocodile-fish.'

1878.—"The muggur is a gross pleb, and his features stamp him as low-born. His manners are coarse."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 82-3.

1879.—"En route I killed two crocodiles; they are usually called alligators, but that is a misnomer. It is the muggar ... these muggers kill a good many people, and have a playful way of getting under a boat, and knocking off the steersman with their tails, and then swallowing him afterwards."—Pollok, Sport, &c., i. 168.

1881.—"Alligator leather attains by use a beautiful gloss, and is very durable ... and it is possible that our rivers contain a sufficient number of the two varieties of crocodile, the muggar and the garial (see GAVIAL) for the tanners and leather-dressers of Cawnpore to experiment on."—Pioneer Mail, April 26.

MUGGARABEE, n.p. Ar. maghrabi, 'western.' This word, applied to western Arabs, or Moors proper, is, as might be expected, not now common in India. It is the term that appears in the Hayraddin Mograbbin of Quentin Durward. From gharb, the root of this word, the Spaniards have the province of Algarve, and both Spanish and Portuguese have garbin, a west wind. [The magician in the tale of Alaeddin is a Maghrabi, and to this day in Languedoc and Gascony Magrarby is used as a term of cursing. (Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 35, 379). Muggerbee is used for a coin (see GUDBER.)] 1563.—"The proper tongue in which Avicenna wrote is that which is used in Syria and Mesopotamia and in Persia and in Tartary (from which latter Avicena came) and this tongue they call Araby; and that of our Moors they call Magaraby, as much as to say Moorish of the West. . . ."—Garcia, f. 19e.

MULL, s. A contraction of Mulligatawny, and applied as a distinctive sobriquet to members of the Service belonging to the Madras Presidency, as Bengal people are called Qui-his, and Bombay people Ducks or Be-nighted.

1860.—"It ys one darke Londe, and ther dwelling ye Cimmerians whereof speketh Homerus Poeta in his Odyssea, and to thys Daye thei clepen Tenebrosi or ye Benyghted ffolke.' But thei clepen hemselfs Mullys from Mulligatawnee which ys ane of theyr goddis from weh thei ben ysproung."—Ext. from a lately discovered MS. of Sir John Maundeville.

MULLIGATAWNY, s. The name of this well-known soup is simply a corruption of the Tamil mulagu-tamari, 'pepper-water'; showing the correctness of the popular belief which ascribes the origin of this excellent article to Madras, whence—and not merely from the complexion acquired there—the sobriquet of the preceding article.

"In vain our hard fate we repine;
In vain on our fortune we rail;
On Mullaghee-tawny we dine,
Or Congee, in Bangalore Jail."

Song by a Gentleman of the Navy (One of Hyde's Prisoners), in Selon-Kerr, i. 18.

[1823.—... in a brasen pot was mulugu tamni, a hot vegetable soup, made chiefly from pepper and capiscums."—Hoot, Missions in Madras, 2nd ed. 249.]

MULMULL, s. Hind. malmal; Muslin.

[c. 1590.—"Malmal, per piece ... 4 R."—Ain, ed. Blockmann, i. 94.]

1683.—"Ye said Ellis told your Petitioner that he would not take 500 Pieces of your Petitioner's mulmulls unless your Petitioner gave him 200 Rups, which your Petitioner being poor could not do."— MUNCHEEL, MANJEEL. 596 MUNGOOSE.

Petition of Rugeepee, Weaver of Hugly, in Hedges, Diary, March 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 73].

1705.—"Malle-moles et autre diverses sortes de toiles ... stinquercues et les belles mousselines."—Luillier, 78.

MUNCHEEL, MANJEEL, s. This word is proper to the S.W. coast; Malayal. manjal, mānchāl, from Skt. manchā. It is the name of a kind of hammock-litter used on that coast as a substitute for palankin or dooly. It is substantially the same as the dandy of the Himalaya, but more elaborate. Correa describes but does not name it.

1561.—"... He came to the factory in a litter which men carried on their shoulders. These are made with thick canes, bent upwards and arched, and from them are suspended some clothes half a fathom in width, and a fathom and a half in length; and at the extremities pieces of wood to sustain the cloth hanging from the pole; and upon this cloth a mattress of the same size as the cloth ... the whole very splendid, and as rich as the gentlemen ... may desire."—Correa, Three Voyages, &c., p. 199.

1811.—"The Inquisition is about a quarter of a mile distant from the convent, and we proceeded thither in manjeels."—Buchanan, Christian Researches, 2nd ed., 171.

1819.—"Muncheel, a kind of litter resembling a sea-cot or hammock, hung to a long pole, with a moveable cover over the whole, to keep off the sun or rain. Six men will run with one from one end of the Malabar coast to the other, while twelve are necessary for the lightest palanquin."—Welsh, ii. 142.

1844.—"Muncheels, with poles complete. ... Poles, Muncheel, Spare."—Jameson's Bombay Code, Ordinance Nomenclature.

1862.—"We ... started ... in Muncheels or hammocks, slung to bamboo, with a shade over them, and carried by six men, who kept up unearthly yells the whole time."—Markham, Peru and India, 323.

c. 1886.—"When I landed at Diu, an officer met me with a Muncheel for my use, viz. a hammock slung to a pole, and protected by an awning."—M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.

A form of this word is used at Réunion, where a kind of palankin is called "le manchy." It gives a title to one of Leconte de Lisle's Poems:

c. 1838.—
"Sous un nuage frais de claire mousseline Tous les dimanches au matin, Tu venais à la ville en manchy de rotin,
Par les rampes de la colline."

Le Manche.

The word has also been introduced by the Portuguese into Africa in the forms maxilla, and machilla.

1810.—"... tangas, que elles chamão maxilas."—Annaes Maritimas, iii. 434.

1880.—"The Portuguese (in Quilliman) seldom even think of walking the length of their own street, and ... go from house to house in a sort of palanquin, called here a machilla (pronounced masheeda). This usually consists of a pole placed upon the shoulders of the natives, from which is suspended a long plank of wood, and upon that is fixed an old-fashioned-looking chair, or sometimes two. Then there is an awning over the top, hung all round with curtains. Each machilla requires about 6 to 8 bearers, who are all dressed alike in a kind of livery."—A Journey in E. Africa, by M. A. Pringle, p. 89.

MUNGOOSE, s. This is the popular Anglo-Indian name of the Indian ichneumons, represented in the South by Mangusta Mungos (Elliott), or Herpestes greius (Geoffroy) of naturalists, and in Bengal by Herpestes malaccensis. [Blanford (Mammalia, 119 sqq.) recognises eight species, the "Common Indian Mongoose" being described as Herpestes mungo.] The word is Telugu, mangisu, or mungisa. In Upper India the animal is called neval, neold, or nayaul. Jerdon gives mangisus however as a Deccani and Mahr. word; [Platts gives it as dialectic, and very doubtfully derives it from Skt. makshu, 'moving quickly.' In Ar. it is bint-'arūs, 'daughter of the bridegroom,' in Egyptian kīt or katt Farāūn, 'Pharaoh's cat' (Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 369).

1673.—"... a Mongoose is akin to a Ferret. ..."—Fryer, 116.

1681.—"The knowledge of these antidotal herbs they have learned from the Mungutia, a kind of Ferret."—Knox, 115.

1685.—"They have what they call a Mangus, creatures something different from ferrets; these hold snakes in great antipathy, and if they once discover them never give up till they have killed them."—Ribeiro, t. 56v.

Bluteau gives the following as a quotation from a History of Ceylon, tr. from Portuguese into French, published at Paris in 1701, p. 153. It is in fact the gist of an anecdote in Ribeiro.

"There are persons who cherish this animal and have it to sleep with them, although it is ill-tempered, for they prefer to be bitten by a mangus to being killed by a snake."

1774.—"He (the Dharma Raja of Bohotan) has got a little lap-dog and a Mungoos, which he is very fond of."—Bogle's Diary, in Markham's Tibet, 27.
1790. — "His (Mr. Glan's) experiments have also established a very curious fact, that the ichneumon, or mongoose, which is very common in this country, and kills snakes without danger to itself, does not use antidotes . . . but that the poison of snakes is, to this animal, innocent."—Letter in Colebrooke's Life, p. 40.

1829.—"Il Mongüe animal simile ad una donna."—Papi, in de Gubernatis, St. dei Viagg. Ital., p. 279.

MUNJEET, s. Hind. majith, Skt. amyevishtha; a dye-plant (Rubra cordifolia, L., N.O. Cinchonaceae); 'Bengal Madder.'

MUNNEPORE, n.p. Properly Manipur; a quasi-independent State lying between the British district of Cachar on the extreme east of Bengal, and the upper part of the late kingdom of Burma, and in fact including a part of the watershed between the tributaries of the Brahmaputra and those of the Irawadi. The people are of genuinely Indo-Chinese and Mongolid aspect, and the State, small and secluded as it is, has had its turn in temporary conquest and domination, like almost all the States of Indo-China from the borders of Assam to the mouth of the Mekong. Like the other Indo-Chinese States, too, Manipur has its royal chronicle, but little seems to have been gathered from it. The Rājas and people have, for a period which seems uncertain, professed Hindu religion. A disastrous invasion of Manipur by Alompra, founder of the present Burmeese dynasty, in 1755, led a few years afterwards to negotiations with the Bengal Government, and the conclusion of a treaty, in consequence of which a body of British sepoys was actually despatched in 1763, but eventually returned without reaching Manipur. After this, intercourse practically ceased till the period of our first Burmeese War (1824-25), when the country was overrun by the Burmeese, who also entered Cachar; and British troops, joined with a Manipurī force, expelled them. Since then a British officer has always been resident at Manipur, and at one time (c. 1838-41) a great deal of labour was expended on opening a road between Cachar and Manipur. [The murder of Mr.
Quinton, Chief-Commissioner of Assam, and other British officers at Manipūr, in the close of 1890, led to the inflict-tion of severe punishment on the leaders of the outbreak. The Mahāraja, whose abdication led to this tragedy, died in Calcutta in the following year, and the State is now under British management during the minority of his successor.]

This State has been called by a variety of names. Thus, in Rennell's Memoir and maps of India it bears the name of Meckley. In Syme's Narrative, and in maps of that period, it is Cassay; names, both of which have long disappeared from modern maps. Meckley represents the name (Makli?) by which the country was known in Assam; Mojli (apparently a form of the same) was the name in Cachar; Ku-sē or Ku-the (according to the Ava pronunciation) is the name by which it is known to the Shan or Burmeese.

1755.—"I have carried my Arms to the confines of China . . . on the other quarter
I have reduced to my subjection the major part of the Kingdom of Cassay; whose Heir I have taken captive, see there he sits behind you. . . ."—Speech of Alompra to Capt. Baker at Mowchabne. Dalrymple, Or.
Rep., i. 152.

1759.—"Cassay, which . . . lies to the N. Westward of Ava, is a Country, so far as I can learn, hitherto unheard of in Europe. . . ."—Letter, dd. 22 June 1759, in ibid. 116.

1762. — "... the President sent the Board a letter which he had received from Mr. Verelst at Chittagong, containing an invitation which had been made to him and his Council by the Rajah of Meckley to assist him in obtaining redress . . . from the Burmas. . . ."—Letter, in Wheeler, Early Records, 291.

1763.—"Meckley is a Hilly Country, and is bounded on the North, South, and West by large tracts of Cookie Mountains, which prevent any intercourse with the countries beyond them; and on the East* by the Burampoota (see BURRAM-POOTER); beyond the Hills, to the North by Asam and Poong; to the West Cashar; to the South and East the Burmah Country, which lies between Meckley and China. . . .
The Burampoota is said to divide, somewhere to the north of Poong, into two large branches one of which passes through Asam, and down by the way of Dacca, the other through Poong into the Burma Country."—Act. of Meckley, by Nerker Dass

"... there is about seven days plain country between Moneypoor and Burampoota, after crossing which, about

* Here the Kyendwen R. is regarded as a branch of the Brahmaputra. See further on. seven days, Jungle and Hills, to the inhabited border of the Burmah country."— Ibid. 481.

1783.—"... The first ridge of mountains towards Thibet and Bootan, forms the limit of the survey to the north; to which I may now add, that the surveys extend no farther eastward, than the frontiers of Assam and Meckley. ... The space between Bengal and China, is occupied by the province of Meckley and other districts, subject to the King of Burmah, or Ava. ..."—Rennell's Memoir, 295.

1799.—(Referring to 1757). "Elated with success Alompra returned to Monchahoo, now the seat of imperial government. After some months ... he took up arms against the Cassayars. ... Having landed his troops, he was preparing to advance to Munneopora, the capital of Cassay, when information arrived that the Peguans had revolted. ..."—Symes, Narrative, 41-42.

"All the troopers in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Birmans."— Ibid. 318.

1819.—"Beyond the point of Negraglia (see NEGRAIS), as faras Azen (see ASSAM), and even further, there is a small chain of mountains that divides Aracan and Cassé from the Burmese. ..."—Sanguemano, p. 33.

1827.—"The extensive area of the Burman territory is inhabited by many distinct nations or tribes, of whom I have heard not less than eighteen enumerated. The most considerable of these are the proper Burmans, the Peguans or Talains, the Shans or people of Lao, the Cassay, or more correctly Kathé. ..."—Owens's Journal, 372.

1855.—"The weaving of these silks ... gives employment to a large body of the population in the suburbs and villages round the capital, especially to the Munni-poorians, or Kathé, as they are called by the Burmese.

"These people, the descendants of unfortunates who were carried off in droves from their country by the Birmans in the time of King Mentaragyi and his predecessors, form a very great proportion of the metropolitan population, and they are largely diffused in nearly all the dis-ctricts of Central Burma. ... Whatever work is in hand for the King or for any of the chief men near the capital, these people supply the labouring hands; if boats have to be manned they furnish the rowers; and whilst engaged on such tasks any remueration they may receive is very scanty and certain."—Tyle, Mission to Ava, 153-154.

MUNSUBDAR. Hind. from Pers. mansabdár, 'the holder of office or dignity' (Ar. mansab). The term was used to indicate quasi-feudal dependents of the Mogul Government who had territory assigned to them, on condition of their supplying a certain number of horse, 500, 1000 or more. In many cases the title was but nominal, and often it was assumed without warrant.
[Mr. Irvine discusses the question at length and represents mansab by 'the word 'rank,' as its object was to settle precedence and fix gradation of pay; it did not necessarily imply the exercise of any particular office, and meant nothing beyond the fact that the holder was in the employ of the State, and bound in return to yield certain services when called upon."
(J.R.A.S., July 1896, pp. 510 seqq.)

[1617.—"... slew one of them and twelve Maancipdars."—Sir T. Roe, Hak.
Soc. ii. 417; in ii. 461, "Mancipdaries."

[1923. — "... certain Officers of the Militia, whom they call Mansubdar."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 97.]

c. 1665.—"Mansubdars are Cavaliers of Manseb, which is particular and honourable Pay; not so great indeed as that of the Omrahs ... they being esteemed as little Omrahs, and of the rank of those, that are advanced to that dignity."—Berner, E.T.
p. 67; [ed. Constable, 215].

1673.—"Munsubdar or petty omrahs."—
Fryer, 195.

1758.—"... a munsubdar or commander of 6000 horse."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 278.

MUNTRA, s. Skt. mantra, 'a text of the Vedas; a magical formula.'

1612.—"... Trata da causa primeira, segundo os livros que tem, chamados Terum Mandra mole" (mantra-müta, mula 'text').—Couto, Dec. V. liv. vi cap. 3.

1776.—"Mantur—a text of the Shaster."— Hathed, Code, p. 17.

1817.—"... he is said to have found the great mantra, spell or talisman."—Mill, Hist. ii. 149.

MUNTREE, s. Skt. Mantri. A minister or high official. The word is especially affected in old Hindu States, and in the Indo-Chinese and Malay States which derive their ancient civilisation from India. It is the word which the Portuguese made into mandarin (q.v.).

1810.—"When the Court was full, and Ibrahim, the son of Candu the merchant, was near the throne, the Raja entered. ... But as soon as the Rajah seated himself, the muntries and high officers of state arrayed themselves according to their rank."—In a Malay's account of Government House at Calcutta, transl. by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, p. 200.

1829.—"The Mantris of Mewar prefer estates to pecuniary stipend, which gives more consequence in every point of view."—

Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 150.]

MUNZIL, s. Ar. manzil, 'descending or alighting,' hence the halting place of a stage or march, a day's stage.

1685. — "We were not able to reach Obedeen-Deen (ye usual Menzil) but lay at a sorry Caravan Sarai."—Hedges, Diary, July 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 203. In i. 214, manzil].

MUSCÁT, n.p., properly Māskāt.
A port and city of N.E. Arabia; for a long time the capital of 'Omān. (See IMAUM.)

[1659.—"The Governor of the city was Chah-Navaze-kan . . . descended from the ancient Princes of Machata . . ."—Bernier, ed. Constant, 73.]

1673.—"Muschat." See under IMAUM.

MUSIC. There is no matter in which the sentiments of the people of India differ more from those of Englishmen than on that of music, and curiously enough the one kind of Western music which they appreciate, and seem to enjoy, is that of the bagpipe. This is testified by Captain Munro in the passage quoted below; but it was also shown during Lord Canning's visit to Lahore in 1869, in a manner which dwells in the memory of one of the present writers. The escort consisted of part of a Highland regiment. A venerable Sikh chief who heard the pipes exclaimed: 'That is indeed music! it is like that which we hear of in ancient story, which was so exquisite that the hearers became insensible (behosh).'

1780.—"The bagpipe appears also to be a favourite instrument among the natives.
They have no taste indeed for any other kind of music, and they would much rather listen to this instrument a whole day than to an organ for ten minutes."—Munro's Narrative, 39.

MUSK, s. We get this word from the Lat. muschus, Greek μοῦχος, and the latter must have been got, probably through Persian, from the Skt. mushka, the literal meaning of which is rendered in the old English phrase 'a cod of musk.' The oldest known European mention of the article is that which we give from St. Jerome; the oldest medical prescription is in a work of Aetius, of Amida (c. 540). In the quotiation from Cosmas the word used is μοῦχος, and kastāri is a Skt. name, still, according to Royle, applied to the musk-deer in the Himalaya. The transfer of the name to (or from) the article called by the Greeks καστόριον, which is an analogous product of the beaver, is curious. The Musk-deer (Moschus moschiferus, L.) is found throughout the Himalaya at elevations rarely (in summer) below 8000 feet, and extends east to the borders of Szechuan, and north to Siberia.

c. 390.—"Odoris autem suavitas, et diversa thyminata, et amorum, et cyphi, oeanthe, musci, et peregrini multa pellicula, quod dissoluitis et amatoribus conventus, nemnisi dissolultus negat."—St. Jerome, in Lib.
col. 337.

c. 545.—"This little animal is the Musk (μοῦχος). The natives call it in their own tongue καστορία. They hunt it and shoot it, and binding tight the blood collected about the navel they cut this off, and this is the sweet smelling part of it, and what we call musk."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi.

["Muske commeth from Tartaria . . .
There is a certain beast in Tartaria, which is wilde and big as a wolf, which beast they take alive, and beat him to death with small stones & his blood may be spread through his whole body, then they cut it in pieces, and take out all the bones, and beat the flesh with the blood in a mortar very smal, and dry it, and make purses to put it in of the skins and these be the Codes of Muske."— Caesar Frederick, in Hakt. ii. 572.]

1673.—"Musk. It is best to buy it in the Cod . . . that which openeth with a bright Musk colour is best."—Fryer, 212.

MUSK-RAT, s. The popular name of the Sorex caerulescens, Jerdon, [Orocidura caerulea, Blanford], an animal having much the figure of the common shrew, but nearly as large as a small brown rat. It diffuses a strong musky odour, so penetrative that it is commonly asserted to affect bottled beer by running over the bottles in a cellar. As Jerdon judiciously observes, it is much more probable that the corks have been affected before being used in bottling; [and Blanford (Mammalia, 237) writes that "the absurd story . . . is less credited in India than it formerly was, owing to the discovery that liquors bottled in Europe and exported to India are not liable to be tainted."] When the female is in heat she is often seen to be followed by a string of males giving out the odour strongly. Can this be the mus peregrinus mentioned by St. Jerome (see MUSK), as P. Vincenzo supposes?

1590.—"Here (in Tooman Bekhrad, n. of Kabul R.) are also nice that have a fine musky scent."—Aggen, by Gladwin (1900) ii. p. 406 [Harrel, ii. 169].

1598.—"They are called sweet smelling Rattes, for they have a smell as if they were full of Muske."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 303.

1672.—P. Vincenzo Maria, speaking of his first acquaintance with this animal (il ratto del musco), which occurred in the Capuchin Convent at Surat, says with simplicity (or malignity?): "I was astonished to perceive an odour so fragrant* in the vicinity of those most religious Fathers, with whom I was at the moment in conversation."—Viaggio, p. 385.

1681.—"This country has its vermin also. They have a sort of Rats they call Musk-rats, because they smell strong of musk. These the inhabitants do not eat of, but of all other sorts of Rats they do."—Knox, p. 31.

1799.—H. Muiru in his Narrative (p. 34) absurdly enough identifies this animal with the Bandicoot, q.v.

1813.—See Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42; [2nd ed. i. 26].

MUSLIN, s. There seems to be no doubt that this word is derived from Mosul (Mausol or Mausil) on the Tigris,† and it has been from an old date the name of a texture, but apparently not always that of the thin semi-transparent tissue to which we now apply it. Dozy (p. 323) says that the Arabs employ musa'il in the same sense as our word, quoting the Arabian Nights (Macnaghten’s ed., i. 176, and ii. 159), in both of which the word indicates the material of a fine turban. [Burton (i. 211) translates ‘Mosul stuff,’ and says it may mean either of ‘Mosul fashion,’ or muslin.] The quotation from Ives, as well as that from Marco Polo, seems to apply to a different texture from what we call muslin.

1298.—"All the cloths of gold and silk that are called Mosolins are made in this country (Mausil)."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. chap. 5.

c. 1544.—"Almusosili est regio in Mesopotamia, in qua texturatur telae ex bombyce valde pulchrae, quae apud Syros et Aegyptios et apud mercatoras Venetos appellantur musolisi, ex hoc regionis nomine. Et principes Aegyptii et Syri, tempore aestatis sedentes in loco honorauiliori induunt vestes ex bujusmodi musolisi."—Andvrae Bellu- nessias, Arabiolorum nominum quae in libris Ardecia et Arabiea sparsim legebantur Interpretatio.

1573.—". . . you have all sorts of Cotton-works, Handkerchiefs, long Fillets, Girdles . . . and other sorts, by the Arba- dians called Mossolini (after the Country Musoli, from whence they are brought, which is situated in Mesopotamia), by us Musuln."—Rawolf, p. 84.

1580.—"For the rest the said Agiani (misprint for Bagnani, Banyans) wear clothes of white musolosi or sosse (?)! having their garments very long and crossed over the breast."—Gaspare Balbi, t. 336.

1673.—"Le drap qu’on estend sur les matelas est une toile assy fine que de la musceline."—App. to Journal d’Ant. Galland, ii. 198.

1685.—"I have been told by several, that muscelin (so much in use here for cravats) and Calligio (!), and the most of the Indian linens, are made of netles, and I see not the least improbability but that they may be made of the fibres of them."—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray Correspondence, 1848, p. 163.

c. 1760.—"This city (Mosul)’s manufacture is Mussolin [read Mussolen] (a cotton cloth) which they make very strong and pretty fine, and sell for the European and other markets."—Isee, Voyage, p. 324.

MUSNUD, s. H.—Ar. masned, from root sonad, ‘he leaned or rested upon it.’ The large cushion, &c., used by native Princes in India, in place of a throne.

1752.—"Salabat-jing . . . went through the ceremony of sitting on the musnud or throne."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 250.

1757.—"On the 29th the Colonel went to the Soubah’s Palace, and in the presence of all the Rajahs and great men of the court, MUSSAULGHEE.  601  MUSSAULCHEE.

1803.—"The Peshwha arrived yesterday, and is to be seated on the musnud."—A. Wellesley, in Munro's Life, i. 343.

1809.—"In it was a musnud, with a carpet, and a little on one side were chairs on a white cloth."—Ld. Valentia, i. 346.

1824.—"They spread fresh carpets, and prepared the royal musnud, covering it with a magnificent shawl."—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 142.

1827.—"The Prince Tippoo had sorely dismounted from his elephant, and occupied the musnud, or throne of cushions."—Sir W. Scott, Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

MUSSALA, s. P.—H. (with change of sense from Ar. mus'ilih, pl. of mus'ilah) 'materials, ingredients,' lit. 'things for the good of, or things or affairs conducive to good.' Though sometimes used for the ingredients of any mixture, e.g. to form a cement, the most usual application is to spices, curry-stuffs and the like. There is a tradition of a very gallant Governor-General that he had found it very tolerable, on a sharp but brief campaign, to ‘rough it on chuprasses and mussalchees' (q.v.), meaning chupatties and mussalla.

1780.—"A dose of marsall, or purgative spices."—Munro, Narrative, 85.

1809.—"At the next hut the woman was grinding missala or curry-stuff on a flat smooth stone with another shaped like a rolling pin."—Maria Graham, 20.

MUSSAUL, s. Hind. from Ar. mash'al, 'a torch.' It is usually made of rags wrapt round a rod, and fed at intervals with oil from an earthen pot.

c. 1407.—"Suddenly, in the midst of the night they saw the Sultan's camp approaching, accompanied by a great number of mashal."—Abdurazzak, in N. & Extts. xiv. Pt. i. 153.

1673.—"The Duties* march like Furies with their lighted mussels in their hands, they are Pots filled with Oyl in an Iron Hoop like our Beacons, and set on fire by stinking rags."—Fryer, 33.

1705.—"...flambeaux qu'ils appellent Mansalles."—Luillier, 59.

1809.—"These Mussal or link-boys."—Ld. Valentia, i. 17.

1810.—"The Mussal, or flambeau, consists of old rags, wrapped very closely round a small stick."—Williamson, V. M. i. 219.

1813.—"These nocturnal processions illuminated by many hundred massauls or torches, illustrate the parable of the ten virgins... ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 274.

1857.—"Near him was another Hindoo... he is called a Mussal; and the lamps and lights are his special department."—Lady Falkland, Chow-Chor, 2nd ed. i. 35.]

MUSSAULCHEE, s. Hind. mash' alchi from mash'al (see MUSSAUL), with the Turkish termination ch'i, generally implying an agent. [In the Arabian Nights (Burton, i. 239) al-masha'ili is the executioner.] The word properly means a link-boy, and was formerly familiar in that sense as the epithet of the person who ran alongside of a palankin on a night journey, bearing a mussaul. "In Central India it is the special duty of the barber (nāi) to carry the torch; hence nāi commonly = 'torch-bearer'" (M.-Gen. Keatinge). The word [or sometimes in the corrupt form mussaul] is however still more frequent as applied to a humble domestic, whose duty was formerly of a like kind, as may be seen in the quotation from Ld. Valentia, but who now looks after lamps and washes dishes, &c., in old English phrase 'a scullion.'

1610.—"He always had in service 500 Massalgees."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 432.

1662.—(In Asam) "they fix the head of the corpse rigidly with poles, and put a lamp with plenty of oil, and a mash'alchi [torch-bearer] alive into the vault, to look after the lamp." —Shihabuddin Tāliš, tr. by Blochmann, in J.A.S.B. xli. Pt. i. 82.

[1665.—"They (flambeaux) merely consist of a piece of iron hafted in a stick, and surrounded at the extremity with linen rags steeped in oil, which are renewed... by the Massalchis, or link boys, who carry the oil in long narrow-necked vessels of iron or brass."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 361.]

1673.—"Trois Massalguis du Grand Seigneur vinrent faire honneur à, M. l'Ambassadeur avec leurs feux allumés."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 103.

1888.—"After strict examination he chose out 2 persons, the Chont (Chons?), an Armenian, who had charge of watching my tent that night, and my Mossalagee, a person who carries the light before me in the night."—Hedges, Diary, July 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 292].

MUSSENDOM, CAPE. 602 MUSSOOLA, MUSSOOLAH.

1791.—"... un masolchi, ou porte-flambeau, pour la nuit."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chauvière Indienne, 16.

1809.—"It is universally the custom to drive out between sunset and dinner. The Massaschees, when it grows dark, go out to meet their masters on their return, and run before them, at the full rate of eight miles an hour, and the numerous lights moving along the esplanade produce a singular and pleasing effect."—Ed. VALENTIA, i. 240.

1813.—"The occupation of massaulchee, or torch-bearer, although generally allotted to the village barber, in the purgannas under my charge, may vary in other districts."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 417; [2nd ed. ii. 43].

1826.—"After a short conversation, they went away, and quickly returned at the head of 200 men, accompanied by Massaschees or torch-bearers."—Pantherang Habi, 557; [ed. 1873, ii. 69].

MUSSENDOM, CAPE, n.p. The extreme eastern point of Arabia, at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. Properly speaking, it is the extremity of a small precipitous island of the name, which protrudes beyond the N.E. horn of Omân. The name is written Musündim in the map which Dr. Badger gives with his H. of Oman. But it is Râs Masandum (or possibly Masandum) in the Mohit of Sidi 'Ali Kapudân (J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 459). Sprenger writes Mosandum (Alt. Geog. Arabiens, p. 107). [Morier gives another explanation (see the quotation below).]

1516.—"... it (the coast) trends to the N.E. by N. 30 leagues until Cape Mocondon, which is at the mouth of the Sea of Persia."

—Barboun, 32.

1553.—"... before you come to Cape Moçandam, which Ptolemy calls Asaboro ("Ασάβωρ ακρον) and which he puts in 23°, but which we put in 26°; and here terminates our first division" (of the Eastern Coasts).—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1572.—"Olha o cabo Asábro que chamado Agora he Moçandão dos navegantes; Por aqui entro o lago, que he fechado De Arábia, e Persius terras abundantes."

Camões, x. 102.

By Burton:

"Behold of Asabón the Head, now hight Mosandam, by the men who plough the Main:

Here lies the Gulf whose long and lake-like Bight, parts Araby from fertile Persia's plain."

The fact that the poet copies the misprint or mistake of Barros in Asaboro, shows how he made use of that historian.

1673.—"On the one side St. Jaques (see JASK) his Headland, on the other that of Mussendown appeared, and a few days we entered the Straights Mouth."—Fryer, 221.

1727.—"The same chain of rocky Mountains continues as high as Zear, above Cape Mussenden, which Cape and Cape Jaques begin the Gulf of Persia."—A. Hamilton, i. 71; [ed. 1744, i. 78].

1777.—At the mouth of the Strait of Mocanden, which leads into the Persian gulf, lies the island of Gombroon (†)—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 86.

[1808.—"Musseldom is a still stronger instance of the perversion of words. The genuine name of this head-land is Mama Selemeh, who was a female saint of Arabia, and lived on the spot or in its neighbourhood."—Morier, Journey through Persia, p. 6.]

MUSSOOLA, MUSSOOLAH, BOAT. s. The surf boat used on the Coromandel Coast; of capacious size, and formed of planks sewn together with cori-twine; the open joints being made good with a caulkling or wadding of twisted coir. The origin of the word is very obscure. Leyden thought it was derived from "masaula... the Mahrratta term for fish" (Morton's Life of Leyden, 64). As a matter of fact the Mahr. word for fish is māsul, Konk. māsuli. This etymology is substantially adopted by Bp. Heber (see below); [and by the compiler of the Madras Gloss., who gives Tel. māsula, Hind. machhi]. But it may be that the word is some Arabic sea-term not in the dictionaries. Indeed, if the term used by C. Federici (below) be not a clerical error, it suggests a possible etymology from the Ar. masəd, 'the fibrous bark of the palm-tree, a rope made of it.' Another suggestion is from the Ar. mawsal, 'joined,' as opposed to 'dug-out,' or canoes; or possibly it may be from māḥṣal, 'tax,' if these boats were subject to a tax. Lastly it is possible that the name may be connected with Masulipatam (q.v.), where similar boats would seem to have been in use (see Fryer, 26). But these are conjectures. The quotation from Gasparo Balbi gives a good account of the handling of these boats, but applies no name to them.

c. 1560.—"Spaventosa cosa è chi nò ha più visto, l'imbarcare e scarcar le mercantie e le persone a San Tomè... adoperano MUSSULMAN.

MUSSOLA, MUSSOOLAH.

MUSSULMAN.

MUSSUCLT, s. The leathern water-bag, consisting of the entire skin of a large goat, strip of the hair and dressed, which is carried by a bhishiti (see BHEESTY). Hind. masshak, Skt. mashaoka.

MUSSULMAN, adj. and s. Mahomedan. Muslim, 'resigning' or 'submitting' (sc. oneself to God), is the name given by Mahomedans to the Faithful. The Persian plural of this is MUSULMUN, which appears to have been adopted as a singular, and the word MUSLIM or MUSSULMAN thus formed. [Others explain it as either from Ar. pl. MUSLIM, or from MUSLIM-MUN, 'like a Muslim,' the former of which is adopted by Platts as most probable.]

MUSSULMAN.

1783.—"The want of Mussoola boats (built expressly for crossing the surf) will be severely felt."—In Life of Colebrooke, 9.

1826.—"The musuli-boats (which first word is mere'y a corruption of 'muchli,' fish) have been often described, and except that they are sewed together with coco-nut twine, instead of being fastened with nails, they very much resemble the high, deep, charcoal boats ... on the Ganges."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 174.

1879.—"Madras has no harbour; nothing but a long open beach, on which the surf dashes with tremendous violence. Unlucky passengers were not landed there in the ordinary sense of the term, but were thrown violently on the shore, from springy and elastic Musulah boats, and were occasionally carried off by sharks, if the said boats chanced to be upset in the rollers."—Saty. Review, Sept. 29.

cercle barchette fatte aposta molto alte e larghe, ch' essi chiamano Masudi, e sono fatte con tanele sottili, e con corde sottili, cucite insieme via tana cola con l'altrd, &c. (there follows a very correct description of their use).—C. Federici, in Rammuto, iii. 391.

c. 1580.—'... where (Negapatam) they cannot land anything but in the Maquyles of the same country."—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 93.

c. 1582.—'... There is always a heavy sea there (San Thomé), from swell or storm; so the merchanti'de and passengers are transported from shipboard to the town by certain boats which are sewn with fine cords, and when they approach the beach, where the sea breaks with great violence, they wait till the perilous wave has past, and then, in the interval between one wave and the next, those boatsmen pull with great force, and so run apace, and being there overtaken by the waves they are carried still further up the beach. And the boats do not break, because they give to the wave, and because the beach is covered with sand, and the boats stand upright on their bottoms."—G. Balbi, f. 59.

1673.—'I went ashore in a Mussoola, a Boat wherein ten Men paddle, the two aftermost of whom are Steersmen, using their Paddles instead of a Rudder. The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers, as ours are; the bented Planks are sewed together with Rope-Yarn of the Cocco, and caleed with Dammar (see DAMMER) (a sort of Resin taken out of the Sea), so artificially that it yields to every ambitious Surf."—Pryer, 37.

[1677.—"Mesulas." See MUCAOA.]

1678.—'Three Englishmen drowned by upsetting of a Mussoola boat. The fourth on board saved with the help of the Muckawa" (see MUCAOA).—Ft. St. Geo. Cons., Aug. 13. Notes and Ects., No. i. p. 78.

1683.—'This Evening about seven a Clock a Musulla coming ashore ... was oversett in the Surf and all four drowned."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. ii. 54.]

1685.—"This morning two Musoolas and two Cattamaraus came off to ye Shippe."—Hedges, Diary, Feb. 3; [Hak. Soc. i. 182.]

1706.—"As soon as the yaws and pin nuances reached the surf they dropped their grappling, and cast off the masoolas, which immediately rowed ashore, and landed the troops."—Orme, iii. 617.

1762.—"No European boat can land, but the natives make use of a boat of a particular construction called a Massole. &c.—MS. Letter of James Rennell, April 1.

[1773.—"... the governor ... sent also four Mossulas, or country boats, to accommodate him ..."—Ives, 182.]
wish to be styled Besermani, and by this name the Turks also desire to be styled."—Herberstein, in Ramusio, ii. f. 171.

[1568.—“I have noted here before that if any Christian will become a Busorman, ... and be a Mahometan of their religion, they give him any gifts ...”—A. Edward, in Hakl. i. 442.]

1619.—“... i Musulmani, cioè i salvati; che cosa pazzamente si chiamano fra di loro i maomettàni.”—P. della Valle, i. 794.

1673.—“Yet here are a sort of bold, lusty, and most an end, drunken Beggars of the Muslemen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good clothes, mounted on a stately horse ... are presently upon their Punticillo’s with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go a Foot, and in Rags, and this Coffery (see CAFFER) (Un-believer) to vaunt it thus!”—Fryer, 91.

1788.—“We escape an ambigous termination by adopting Moslem instead of Musulman in the plural number.”—Gibbon, pref. to vol. iv.

MUST, adj. Pers. mast, ‘drunk.’ It is applied in Persia also, and in India specially, to male animals, such as elephants and camels, in a state of periodical excitement.

[1882.—“Fits of Must differ in duration in different animals (elephants); in some they last for a few weeks, in others for even four or five months.”—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed., 59.]

MUSTEES, MESTIZ, &c., s. a half-caste. A corruption of the Port. mestísco, having the same meaning; “a mixing; applied to human beings and animals born of a father and mother of different species, like a mule” (Bluteau); French, métis et métis.

1546.—“The Governor in honour of this great action (the victory at Diu) ordered that all the mestísco who were in Diu should be inscribed in the Book, and that pay and subsistence should be assigned to them, ... subject to the King’s confirmation. For a regulation had been sent to India that no mestísco of India should be given pay or subsistence: for, as it was laid down, it was their duty to serve for nothing, seeing that they had their houses and heritages in the country, and being on their native soil were bound to defend it.”—Correa, iv. 580.

1552.—“... the sight of whom as soon as they came, caused immediately to gather about them in number the natives, Moors in belief, and Negroes with curly hair in appearance, and some of them only swarthly, as being mistícos.”—Barros, i. ii. 1.

1556.—“... che se sono nati qua di donne indiane, gli domandano mestízi.”—Sassetti, in De Gubernatis, 188.

1558.—“... an Interpretour ... which was a Mestizo, that is half an Indian, and half a Portuguese.”—Candish, in Hakl. iv. 337.

1610.—“Le Capitaine et les Marchands estoient Mestíz, les autres Indiens Christians.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 165; [Hak. Soc. i. 78; also see i. 240]. This author has also Mestís, (ii. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 373]), and again: ... : qu’ils appellant Métícès, c’est à dire Métís, meslez” (ii. 23; [Hak. Soc. ii. 38]).

1615.—“A Mestizo came to demand passage in our junck.”—Cocke’s Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 216.

1658.—(At Goa) “Les Mestíssos sont de plusieurs sortes, mais fort mespris des Réinois et Castissoes (see CASTES), parce qu’il y a eu vn peu de sang noir dans la generation de leurs ancestres ... la tache d’auoir eu pour ancesse une Indienne leur demeure inusques à la centisme generation: ils peuent toutefois estre soldats et Capitaines de forteresses ou de vaisseaux, s’ils font profession de suivre les cours, et s’ils se iettont du costé de l’Eglise ils peuent estre Lecteurs, mais non Prouinciaux.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 226.

1665.—“... And, in a word, Bengal is a country abounding in all things; and ’tis for this very reason that so many Portuguese, Mestícks, and other Christians are fled thither.”—Bernier, E.T. 140; [ed. Constable, 438].

1673.—“Beyond the Outworks live a few Portugalos Musteroes or Misteradores.”—Fryer, 57.

1678.—“Noe Roman Catholicick or Papist, whether English or of any other nation shall bear office in this Garrison, and shall have no more pay than 80 farmaus per mensem, as private centinalls, and the pay of those of the Portuguese nation, as Europeans, Místeroes, and Topasses, is from 70 to 40 farmaus per mensem.”—Articles and Orders ... of Ft. St. Geo., Madraspatam. In Notes and Exts., i. 88.

1699.—“Wives of Frecemen, Mustíses.”—Census of Company’s Servants on the Coast, in Wheeler, i. 356.

1727.—“A poor Seaman had got a pretty Mustíce Wife.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 10; [ed. 1744, ii. 8].

MUXADABAD.

1781.—"Eloped from the service of his Mistress a Slave Boy aged 20 years, or thereabouts, pretty white or colour of Musty, tall and slender."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, Feb. 24.

1799.—"August 13th. ... Visited by appointment ... Mrs. Carey, the last survivor of those unfortunate persons who were imprisoned in the Black Hole of Calcutta. ... This lady, now fifty-eight years of age, as she herself told me, is ... of a fair Mestiza colour. ... She confirmed all which Mr. Holwell has said. ..."—Note by Thomas Boileau (an attorney in Calcutta, the father of Major-Generals John Theophilus and A. H. E. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal)), quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 34.

1834.—"You don't know these Baboos. ... Most of them now-a-days have their Misteesa Beebes, and their Moosulmannes, and not a few their Gorra Beebes likewise."—The Baboo, &c., 167-168.

1868.—"These Mestizas, as they are termed, are the native Indians of the Philippines, whose blood has to a great extent perhaps been mingled with that of their Spanish rulers. They are a very exclusive people ... and have their own places of amusement ... and Mestiza balls, to which no one is admitted who does not don the costume of the country."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 296.

MUSTER, s. A pattern, or a sample. From Port, mostra (Span. muestra, Ital. mostra). The word is current in China, as well as India. See Wells Williams's Guide, 237.

c. 1444.—"Vierão as nossas Galês por comissão sua com algumas amostras de açucar da Madeira, da Sangue de Dragão, e de outras cousas."—Codamosta, Navegação primeira, 6.

1563.—"And they gave me a mostra of annomum, which I brought to Goa, and showed to the apothecaries here; and I compared it with the drawings of the simples of Dioscorides."—Garcia, f. 15.

1612.—"A Moore came aboord with a muster of Cloves."—Surti, in Purchas, i. 357.

1702.—" ... Packing Stuff, Packing Materials, Musters."—Quinquepartite Indenture, in Charts of the E. I. Co., 325.

1727.—"He advised me to send to the King ... that I designed to trade with his Subjects ... which I did, and in twelve Days received an Answer that I might, but desired me to send some person up with Musters of all my Goods."—A. Hamilton, ii. 200; [ed. 1743].

c. 1760.—"He (the tailor) never measures you; he only asks muster for muster, as he terms it, that is for a pattern."—Ives, 52.

1772.—"The Governor and Council of Bombay must be written to, to send round Musters of such kinds of silk, and silk piece-goods, of the manufacture of Bengal, as will serve the market of Surat and Bombay."—Price's Travels, i. 38.

[1846. — The above muster was referred to a party who has lately arrived from ... England. ...—J. Agri. Hort. Soc., in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. p. 601.]

MUTLUB, s. Hind. from Ar. matlab. The Ar. from talab, 'he asked,' properly means a question, hence intention, wish, object, &c. In Anglo-Indian use it always means 'purpose, gist,' and the like. Illiterate natives by a common form of corruption turn the word into muttal. In the Punjab this occurs in printed books; and an adjective is formed, muttalī, 'opinionated,' and the like.

MUTT, MUTH, s. Skt. māṭha; a sort of convent where a celibate priest (or one making such profession) lives with disciples making the same profession, one of whom becomes his successor. Buildings of this kind are very common all over India, and some are endowed with large estates.

1874.—"The monastic Order is celibate, and in a great degree erratic and mendicant, but has anchorage places and head-quarters in the maths."—Cali. Review, cxvii. 212.

MUTTONGOSHT, s. (i.e. 'Mutton-flesh') Anglo-Indian domestic Hind. for 'Mutton.'

MUTTONGYE, s. Sea-Hind. mātangai, a (nautical) martingale; a corruption of the Eng. word.

MUTTRA, n.p. A very ancient and holy Hindu city on the Jamuna, 30 miles above Agra. The name is Mathura, and it appears in Ptolemy as Μόθυρα ή των Θεων. The sanctity of the name has caused it to be applied in numerous new localities; see under MADURA. [Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 240) calls it Matura, and Bernier (ed. Constable, 66), Maturas.]

MUXADABAD, n.p. Ar.—P. Māṭsādābād, a name that often occurs in books of the 18th century. It pertains to the same city that has latterly been called Muxadabad, the capital of the Nawabs of Bengal since the beginning of the 18th century. The town Maksudabad is stated by Tiefenthaler to have been founded by Akbar. The Governor of Bengal, Murshid Kuli Khan (also called in English histories Jafer Khan), moved the seat of Government hither in 1704, and gave the place his own name. It is written Muxudaavd in the early English records down to 1760 (Str W. W. Hunter).

1884.—"Dec. 26. — In ye morning I went to give Bulchand a visit according to his invitation, who rose up and embraced me when I came near him, enquired of my health and bid me welcome to Muxoodavad...

..."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 59.

1703.—"The first act of the Nawab, on his return to Bengal, was to change the name of the city of Maksosouabad to Moorshudabad; and by establishing in it the mint, and by erecting a palace... to render it the capital of the Province."—Stewart, H. of Bengal, 309.

1726.—"Muxadabath."—Valentijn, Chorom., &c., 147.

1727.—"Muxadabaud is but 12 miles from it (Cossimbazar), a Place of much greater Antiquity, and the Mogul has a Mint there; but the ancient name of Muxadabaud has been changed for Rajahmal; for above a Century."—A. Hamilton, ii. 20; [ed. 1744]. (There is great confusion in this.)

1751.—"I have heard that Ram Kissen Seat, who lives in Calcutta, has carried goods to that place without paying the Muxidavad Syre (see BAYER) Chowkey duties. I am greatly surprised, and send a Chubdar to bring him, and desire you will be speedy in delivering him over."—Letter from Nawab Allyverdi Chace to the Prest. of Council, dated Muxidavad, May 20, 1755.

1758.—"En omettant quelques lieux de moindre considération, je m'arrête d'abord à Moosudabad. Ce nom signifie ville de la monnoie. Et en effet c'est là où se frappe celle du pays; et un grand faubourg de cette ville, appelé Azingongo, est la résidence du Nabab, qui gouverne le Bengale presque souverainement."—D'Anville, 63.

1756.—"The Nabob, irritated by the disappointment of his expectations of immense wealth, ordered Mr. Holwell and the two other prisoners to be sent to Muxadavad."—Orme, ii. 79.

1762.—"If you demand an account of the East Indies, the Mogul's dominions and Muxadabad... I imagine when you made the above requisition that you did it with a view rather to try my knowledge than to increase your own, for your great skill in geography would point out to you that Muxadabad is as far from Madras, as Constantinople is from Glasgow."—T. Munro—his brother William, in Life, &c. iii. 41.

1884.—It is alleged in a passage introduced in Mrs. C. Mackenzie's interesting memoir of her husband, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, that "Admiral Watson used to sail up in his ships to Mooreshabad." But there is no ground for this statement. So far as I can trace, it does not appear that the Admiral's flag-ship ever went above Chandernagor, and the largest of the vessels sent to Hoogly even was the Bridgewater of 20 guns. No vessel of the fleet appears to have gone higher.

MUZBEE, s. The name of a class of Sikhs originally of low caste, vulg. mazbi, apparently mazhabi from Ar. mazhab, 'religious belief.' Cunningham indeed says that the name was applied to Sikh converts from Mahommadanism (History, p. 379). But this is not the usual application now. [*"When the sweepers have adopted the Sikh faith they are known as Mazhabis. ]

... When the Chukra is circumcised and becomes a Musulman, he is known as a Musalli or a Kokana" (Maclagan, Punjab Census Rep., 1891, p. 202.) The original corps of Muzbees, now represented by the 32nd Bengal N.I. (Pioneers) was raised among the men labouring on the Baree Doab Canal.

1858.—"On the 19th June (1857) I advocated, in the search for new Military classes, the raising of a corps of Muzzbees... The idea was ultimately carried out, and improved by making them pioneers."—Letter from Col. H. B. Edwardees to R. Montgomery, Esq., March 23.

... To the same destination (Delhi) was sent a strong corps of Muzhubees (low-caste) Sikhs, numbering 1200 men, to serve as pioneers."—Letter from R. Temple, Secretary to Punjab Govt., dd. Lahore, May 26, 1858.

MYDAN, MEIDAUN, s. Hind. from Pers. maiddn. An open space, an esplanade, parade-ground or green, in or adjoining a town; a piazz (in the Italian sense); any open plain with grass on it; a chaugan (see CHICANE) ground; a battle-field. In Ar., usually, a hippodrome or race-course.

c. 1330.—"But the brethren were meanwhile brought out to the Medan, i.e., the piazza of the City, where an exceeding great fire had been kindled. And Friar Thomas went forward to cast himself into the fire, but as he did so a certain Saracen caught him by the hood . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cathey, 68.

1618.—"When it is the hour of complines, or a little later to speak exactly, it is the time for the promenade, and every one goes on horseback to the meidan, which is always kept clean, watered by a number of men whose business this is, who water it carrying the water in skins slung over the shoulder, and usually well shaded and very cool."—P. della Valle, l. 707.

c. 1665.—"Celti (Quervansera) des Étrangers est bien plus spaceux que l’autre et est quarré, et tous deux font face au Meidan."—Thevenot, v. 214.

1670.—"Before this house is a great square meidan or promenade, planted on all sides with great trees, standing in rows."—Andresen, 35.

1673.—"The Midan, or open Space before the Caun’s Palace, is an Oblong and Stately Piazza, with real not belted Cloisters."—Fryer, 249.

1828.—"All this was done with as much coolness and precision, as if he had been at exercise upon the maidaua."—The Kuzzil-bash, i. 223.

1859.—"A 24-pound howitzer, hoisted on to the maintop of the Shannon, loomed menacingly over the Maidaun (at Calcutta)."—Ogilbany, Narrative of Lie. Elgin’s Mission, i. 60.

MYNA, MINA, &c. s. Hind. maind. A name applied to several birds of the family of starlings. The common myna is the Acridotheres tristis of Linn. ; the southern Hill-Myna is the Gracula, also Eulabes religiosa of Linn. ; the Northern Hill-Myna, Eulabes intermedia of Hay (see Jordon’s Birds, ii. Pt. i. 325, 337, 339). Of both the first and last it may be said that they are among the most teachable of imitative birds, articulating words with great distinctness, and without Polly’s nasal tone. We have heard a wild one (probably the first), on a tree in a field, spontaneously echoing the very peculiar call of the black partridge from an adjoining jungle, with unmistakable truth. There is a curious description in Aelian (De Nat. An. xvi. 2) of an Indian talking bird which we thought at one time to be the Myna; but it seems to be nearer the Shāmā, and under that head the quotation will be found. [Mr. McCrindle (Invasion of India, 186) is in favour of the Myna.]

1690.—"The Mynah is twice the size of the Shārak, with glossy black plumage, but with the bill, wattles and tail coverts yellow. It imitates the human voice and speaks with great distinctness."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, iii. 121.]

1691.—Jac. Bontius describes a kind of Myna in Java, which he calls Pica, seu auritus Sturnus indicae. "The owner, an old Mussulman woman, only lent it to the author to be drawn, after great persuasion, and on a stipulation that the beloved bird should get no swine’s flesh to eat. And when he had promised accordingly, the avis passerina immediately began to chant: Orang Namrani catijor macan babi! i.e. ‘Dog of a Christian, eater of swine!’"—Lib. v. cap. 14, p. 87.

1693.—"In the Duke’s chamber there is a bird, given him by Mr. Pierce, the surgeon, from the East Indys, black the greatest part, with the finest collar of white about the neck; but talks many things and ney'es like the horse, and other things, the best almost that ever I heard bird in my life."—Pepys, Diary, April 25, Prof. Newton in Mr. Wheatley’s ed. (iv. 118) is inclined to identify this with the Myna, and notes that one of the earliest figures of the bird is by Eleazar Albin (Nat. Hist. of Birds, ii. pl. 58) in 1738.

MR. ARNOLD makes too many!

MYROBALAN, s. A name applied to certain dried fruits and kernels of
The kinds recognised in the Medieval pharmacopoeia were five, viz.:

1. The Emblica myrobalan; which is the dried astringent fruit of the Anovula, anwla of Hind., the Emblica officinalis of Gaertner (Phyllanthus Emblica, L. N. O. Euphorbiaceae). The Persian name of this is émlák, but, as the Arabic amlag suggests, probably in older Persian amlag, and hence no doubt Emblica. Garcia says it was called by the Arab physicians ambelgi (which we should write ambalji).

2. The Belleric Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Bellerica, Roxb. (N. O. Combretaceae), consisting of a small nut enclosed in a thin exterior rind. The Arabic name given in Ibn Baitar is balilî; in the old Latin version of Avicenna bellegè; and in Persian it is called balî and balila. Garcia says the Arab physicians called it belerţgi (balìrîj, and in old Persian probably balîrîj) which accounts for Bellerica.

3. The Chebulic Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Chebula, Roxb. The derivation of this name which we have given under CHEBULI is confirmed by the Persian name, which is Halîla-i-Kabûli. It can hardly have been a product of Kabul, but may have been imported into Persia by that route, whence the name, as calicoes got their name from Calicut. Garcia says these myrobalans were called by his Arabs qعبلإj. Ibn Baitar calls them halîlaj, and many of the authorities whom he quotes specify them as Kâbulî.

4. and 5. The Black Myrobalan, otherwise called ‘Indian,’ and the Yellow or Citrine. These, according to Royle (Essay on Antiq. of Hindoo Medicine, pp. 36-37), were both products of T. Chebula in different states; but this does not seem quite certain. Further varieties were sometimes recognised, and nine are said to be specified in a paper in an early vol. of the Philos. Transactions. One kind *a This article we have been unable to find. Dr. Hunter in As. Res. (xi. 182) quotes from a Persian work of Mahomed Husain Shirázî, communicated to him by Mr. Colebrooke, the names of 6 varieties of Hâlitâ (or Myrobalan) as afforded in different stages of maturity by the Terminalia Chebula. 1. H. Zîrâ, when just set (from Zîrâ, cummin-seed). 2. H. Jowî (from Jowî, barley). 3. Zanjî or Hindî (The Black M.). 4. H. Chîfît. 5. H. Jûsîf, or Yellow. 6. H. Kâbuli, the mature fruit. [See Dr. Murray's article in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 29 seqq.]" called Śīni or Chinese, is mentioned by one of the authors of Ibn Baithar, quoted below, and is referred to by Garcia.

The virtues of Myrobalans are said to be extolled by Charaka, the oldest of the Sanskrit writers on Medicine. Some of the Arabian and Medieval Greek authors, referred to by Royle, also speak of a combination of different kinds of Myrobalan called Tryphera or Tryphala; a fact of great interest. For this is the tryphala ("Three-fruits") of Hindu medicine, which appears in Amarakosha (c. A.D. 500), as well as in a prescription of Susruta, the disciple of Charaka, and which is still, it would seem, familiar to the native Indian practitioners. It is, according to Royle, a combination of the black, yellow and Chebulic; but Garcia, who calls it tine-pala (tin-phalin in Hindu), seems to imply that it consisted of the three kinds known in Goa, viz. citrina (or yellow), the Indian (or black), and the belleric. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 32 seqq.] The emblem, he says, were not used in medicine there, only in tanning, like sumach. The Myrobalans imported in the Middle Ages seem often to have been preserved (in syrup ?).

Some people say that in India they are candied when unripe (accerbo), just as we candy the unripe tender walnuts, and that when they are candied in this way they have no nut within, but are all through tender like our walnut-comfits. But if this is really done, anyhow none reach us except those with a nut inside, and often very hard nuts too. † This is surely not what we now call Cassia Fistula, the long cylindrical pod of a leguminous tree, affording a mild laxative. But Hambury and Flückiger (pp. 195, 475) show that some Cassia bark (of the cinnamon kind) was known in the early centuries of our era as kassia cypriygenos and cassia fistularis; whilst the drug now called Cassia Fistula, L., is first noticed by a medical writer of Constantinople towards a.d. 1300. Pegolotti, at p. 266, gives a few lines of instruction for judging of cassia fistula: "It ought to be black, and thick, and unbroken (sellito), and heavy, and the thicker it is, and the blacker the outside rind is, the riper and better it is; and it retains its virtue well for 2 years. This is not very decisive, but on the whole one should suppose Pegolotti's cassia fistula to be either a spice-bark, or solid twigs of a like plant (H. & F. 476).

† This is probably Balantia egyptica, Delile, the zik of the Arabs, which is an unkind way of saying a Myrobalan fruit and yields an oil much used medicinally. The negroes of the Niger make an intoxicating spirit of it.

MYSSORE, n.p. Tam. Maisur, Can. Maisuri. The city which was the capital of the Hindu kingdom, taking its name, and which last was founded in 1610 by a local chief on the decay of the Vijayanagar (see BISNAGAR, NARSINGA) dynasty. C. P. Brown gives the etym. as Maisi-ür, Maisi being the name of a local goddess like Pomona or Flora: ʻür, 'town, village.' It is however usually said to be a corruption of Mahish-āsura, the buffalo demon slain by the goddess Durga or Kali. [Rice (Myssore, i. 1) gives Can. Maissa, from Skt. Mahisha, and ʻür, 'town.]

NABÔB, s. Port. Nababo, and Fr. Nabob, from Hind. Nawab, which is the Ar. pl. of sing. Ndub (see NAIB), 'a deputy,' and was applied in a singular sense* to a delegate of the supreme chief, viz. to a Viceroy or chief Governor under the Great Mogul, e.g. the Nawâb of Surat, the Nawâb of Oudh, the Nawâb of Arcot, the Nawâb Nadzim of Bengal. From this use it became a title of rank without necessarily having any office attached. It is now a title occasionally conferred, like a peerage, on Mahommedan gentlemen of distinction and good service, as Râd and Rajâ are upon Hindus.

Nabob is used in two ways: (a) simply as a corruption and representative of Nawâb. We get it direct from the Port. nababo, see quotation from Bluteau below. (b) It began to be applied in the 18th century, when the transactions of Clive made the epithet familiar in England, to Anglo-Indians who returned with fortunes from the East; and Foote's play of 'The Naabôb' (Nobèt) (1768) aided in giving general currency to the word in this sense.

It is purism quite erroneously applied when we find Nabob in this sense miswritten Nawavab; thus:

1878.—"These were days when India, little known still in the land that rules it, was less known than it had been in the previous generation, which had seen Warren Hastings impeached, and burghs* bought and sold by Anglo-Indian Nawabs."—Smith's Life of Dr John Wilson, 30.

But there is no question of purism in the following delicious passage:

1878.—"If ... the spirited proprietor of the Daily Telegraph had been informed that our aid of their friends the Turks would have been the form of a tax upon paper, and a concession of the Levits to act as Commanders of Regiments of Bashishooums, with a request to the Generalissimo to place them in as forward a position as Nabob was given in the host of King David, the harp in Peterborough Court would not have twanged long to the tune of a crusade in behalf of the Sultan of Turkey."—Truth, April 11, p. 470. In this passage in which the wit is equalled only by the scriptural knowledge, observe that Nabob=Naboth, and Naboth=Uriah.

NACODA, NACDER, &c., s. Pers. Nākhuḍa (navis dominus) "a skipper"; the master of a native vessel. (Perhaps the original sense is rather the owner of the ship, going with it as his own supercargo.) It is hard to understand why Reinaud (Relation, ii. 42) calls this a "Malay word ..."

NAGA, n.p. The name applied to an extensive group of uncivilised clans of warlike and vindictive character in the eastern part of the hill country which divides Assam Proper (or the valley of the Brahmaputra) from Kachâr and the basin of the Surma. A part of these hills was formed into a British district, now under Assam, in 1867, but a great body of the Nâga clans is still independent. The etymology of the name is disputed; some identifying it with the Nâga or Snake Aborigines, who are so prominent in the legends and sculptures of the Buddhists. But it is, perhaps, more probable that the word is used in the sense of 'naked' (Skt. naga, Hind. nangâ, Beng. nentâ, &c.), curiously enough, is that which Ptolemy attributes to the name, and which the spelling of Shihabuddin also indicates. 1852.—"Before the expiration of this time we were overtaken by ye Caddie's Neip, ye Meerbear's (see MEERBAR) deputy, and ye Dutch Director's Vakill (see VAKEEL) (by the way it is observable ye Dutch omit no opportunity to do us all the prejudices that Ives in their power)."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 11; [Hak. Soc. i. 35].

The word Nagâ is spelt with a nasal n, "Nâgâ" (p. 76).
1765.—"... this person was appointed Naib, or deputy governor of Orissa."—Hollstel, Hist. Events, i. 53.

[1556.—"The Naib gave me letters to the chiefs of several encampments, charging them to provide me with horses."—Perrier, Caravan Journeys, 237.]

NAIK, NAIQUE, &c. s. Hind. náyak. A term which occurs in nearly all the vernacular languages; from Skt. náyaka, 'a leader, chief, general.' The word is used in several applications among older writers (Portuguese) referring to the south and west of India, as meaning a native captain or headman of some sort (a). It is also a title of honour among Hindus in the Deccan (b). It is again the name of a Telugu caste, whence the general name of the Kings of Vijayanagara (A.D. 1325-1674), and of the Lords of Madura (1559-1741) and other places (c). But its common Anglo-Indian application is to the non-commissioned officer of Sepoys who corresponds to a corporal, and wears the double chevron of that rank (d).

He fell, but in dying hurled his axe against the enemy."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, i. 37-38.
NAMBOOEE.

We may add as a special sense that in West India Naīk is applied to the head-man of a hamlet (Kāri) or camp (Tūnda) of Brīnjaries (q.v.). [Bhangi and Jhang Naiks, the famous Banjāra leaders, are said to have had 180,000 bullocks in their camp. See Berar Gazetteer, 196.]

NĀIR. 8. Malayal. Nāyār; from the same Skt. origin as Naik. Name of the ruling caste in Malabar. [The Greek νδούπα as a tract stood for the country of the Nairs. For their customs, see Logan, Malabar, i. 131.]

1510.—"The first class of Pagans in Calicut are called Brahmans. The second are Naari, who are the same as the gentlefolk amongst us; and these are obliged to bear sword and shield or bows and lances."—Vartthema, pp. 141-142.

1516.—"These kings do not marry...only each has a mistress, a lady of great lineage and family, which is called nayre."—Barboza, 165.

1553.—"And as...the Gentiles of the place are very superstitious in dealing with people foreign to their blood, and chiefly those called Brammanes and Nairs."—Barnes, Dec. i. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1582.—"...The Men of Warre which the King of Calicut and the other Kings have, are Nayres, which be all Gentlemen."—Cas-\ud201;anda (by N. L.), t. 351.

1644.—"We have much Christian people throughout his territory, not only the Christians of St. Thomas, who are but soldiers that he (the King of Cochín) has, but also many other vassals who are converts to our Holy Catholic Faith, through the preaching of the Gospel, but none of these are Nayres, who are his fighting men, and his nobles or gentlemen."—Bocarro, MS., t. 315.

1755.—"The king has disciplined a body of 10,000 Nairs; people of this denomination are by birth the Military tribe of the Malabar coast."—Orme, i. 400.

1781.—"The soldiers preceded the Nairs or nobles of Malabar."—Gibbon, ch. xviii.

It may be added that Nāyār was also the term used in Malabar for the mahout of an elephant; and the fact that Nāyār and Nāyaka are of the same origin may be considered with the etymology which we have given of Cornac (see García, 85v).

NALKEE, s. Hind. nālki. A kind of litter formerly used by natives of rank; the word and thing are now obsolete. [It is still the name of the bride's litter in Behar (Grierson, Bihār Peasant Life, 46).] The name was perhaps a fictitious imitation of palkī? [Platts suggests Skt. nālka, 'a tube.]

1789.—"A nāleky is a palkī, either opened or covered, but it bears upon two bamboos, like a sedan in Europe, with this difference only, that the poles are carried by four or eight men, and upon the shoulders."—Note by Tr. of Seér Mutagharia, iii. 260.

[1844.—"This litter is called a nālki. It is one of the three great insignia which the Mogul emperors of Delhi conferred upon independent princes of the first class, and could never be used by any person upon whom, or upon whose ancestors, they had not so been conferred. These were the nālki, the order of the Fish, and the fan of peacock's feathers."—Sleeman, Rambles, ed. V. A. Smith, i. 165.]

NAMBEADARIM, s. Malayāl. nambiyattūri, nambiyattiri, a general, a prince. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 121.]

1508.—"Afterwards we were presented to the King called Nambioda; who received us with no small gladness and kindness."—Guer. du Europe, in Ramusio, i. f. 146.

1552.—"This advice of the Nambeadarim was disapproved by the kings and lords."—Costancheda; see also Transl. by N. L., 1582, f. 147.

1557.—"The Nambeadarim who is the principal governor."—D'Albomquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 9. The word is, by the translator, erroneously identified with Nambūdīri (see NAMBOOEE), a Malabar Brahman.

1634.—"Entra em Cochim no thalamo secreto Aonde Nambodera dorme quieto."—Malaca Conquista. i. 50.

NAMBOOEE, Malayāl. nambīdīri, Tam. nambūri; [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss. cxxi.) gives nambūti, nambūri, from Drav. nambuka, 'to trust, tīri, Skt. śrī, 'blessed.' The Madras Gloss. has Mal. nambu, 'the Veda, ōthu, 'to teach,' tīri, 'holy.'] A Brahman of Malabar. (See Logan, i. 118 seqq.).

1644.—"No more than any of his Nambures (among Christian converts) who are his padres, for you would hardly see any one of them become converted and baptized because of the punishment that the king has attached to that."—Bocarro, MS., t. 313.

1727.—"The Nambouries are the first in both Capacities of Church and State, and some of them are Popes, being sovereign Princes in both."—A. Hamilton, i. 312; [ed. 1744].

1800.—"The Namburis eat no kind of animal food, and drink no spirituous liquors."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 426.]
NANKEEN, s. A cotton stuff of a brownish yellow tinge, which was originally imported from China, and derived its name from the city of Nanking. It was not dyed, but made from a cotton of that colour, the Gossypium religiosum of Roxb., a variety of G. herbaceum. It was, however, imitated with dyed cotton in England, and before long exports of this imitation were made to China. Nankeen appears to be known in the Central Asia markets under the modified name of Nanka (see below).

1793-4.—"The land in this neighbourhood produces the cloth usually called Nankeens in Europe . . . in that growing in the province of Kiangnan, of which the city of Nan-kin is the capital, the down is of the same yellow tinge which it possesses when spun and woven into cloth."—Staunton's Narr. of Ed. Macartney's Embassy, ii, 425.

1794-5.—"The colour of Nam-King is thus natural, and not subject to fade. . . . The opinion (that it was dyed) that I combat was the cause of an order being sent from Europe a few years ago to dye the pieces of Nam-king of a deeper colour, because of late they had grown paler."—Van Braam's Embassy, E.T. ii, 141.

1797.—"China Investment per Upton Castle. . . Company's broad and narrow Nankeen, brown Nankeen."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 836.

1838.—"Nanka is imported in the greatest quantity (to Kabul) from Russia, and is used for making the outer garments for the people, who have a great liking to it. It is similar to nankeen cloth that comes to India from China, and is of a strong durable texture."—Report by Baines, in Pwajeb Trade Report, App. p. ix. See also p. clxxix.

1845.—"Don't be trying to depreciate the value of the lot, Mr. Moss," Mr. Hamme- rdown said; 'let the company examine it as a work of art—the attitude of the gallant animal quite according to nature, the gentleman in a nankeen-jacket, his gun in hand, is going to the chase; in the distance a bangkhan tree (see BANYAN-TREE) and a pagody."—Vanity Fair, i. 178.

NANKING, n.p. The great Chinese city on the lower course of the Yangtsékiang, which was adopted as capital of the Empire for a brief space (1368-1410) by the (native) Ming dynasty on the expulsion of the Mongol family of Chinghiz. The city, previously known as Kin-ling-fu, then got the style of Nan-king, or 'South Court.' Peking ('North Court') was however re-occupied as imperial residence by the Emperor Ching-su in 1410, and has remained such ever since. Nanking is mentioned as a great city called Chilenfu (Kin-ling), whose walls had a circuit of 40 miles, by Friar Odoric (c. 1323). And the province bears the same name (Chekim) in the old notices of China translated by R. Willes in Hakluyt (ii. 546).

It appears to be the city mentioned by Conti (c. 1430), as founded by the emperor: "Hinc prope XV. diem in itinere (i.e. from Cambalec or Peking), alia civitas Nampeti nomine, ab imperatore condita, cujus ambitus patet triginta milliaribus, etaque est populosissima omnium." This is evidently the same name that is coupled with Cambalec, in Petis de la Croix's translation of the Life of Timour (iii. 218) under the form Nemmat. The form Lankin, &c., is common in old Portuguese narratives, probably, like Liampo (q.v.), a Fuhkien form.

c. 1520.—"After that follows Great China, the king of which is the greatest sovereign in the world. . . . The port of this kingdom is called Quan-tan, and among the many cities of this empire two are the most important, namely Nankin and Comlaka (read Combalak), where the king usually resides."—Pigafetta's Magellans (Hak. Soc.), p. 156.

1540.—"Thereunto we answered that we were strangers, natives of the Kingdom of Siam, and that coming from the port of Lianpoo to go to the fishery of Nanquin, we were cast away at sea . . . that we purposed to go to the city of Nanquin there to imbarque ourselves as rowers in the first Lantea (see LANTEAS) that should put to sea, for to pass unto Canton. . . ."—Pinto, E.T. p. 99 (orig. cap. xxxi).

1553.—"Further, according to the Cosmographies of China . . . the maritime provinces of this kingdom, which run therefrom in a N.W. direction almost, are these three: Nanquij, Xanton (Shantung), and Quinéij (Kingsze or capital, i.e. Pechel).—Barros, i. ix: 1.

1556.—"Ogni anno va di Persia alla China una grossa Carauana, che camina sei mesi prima ch'arrivi alla città de Lanchin, Città nella quale risiede il Re con la sua Corte."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391v.

NARCONDAM, n.p. The name of a strange weird-looking volcanic cone, which rises, covered with forest, to a height of some 2,330 feet straight out of the deep sea, to the eastward of the Andamans. One of the present writers has observed (Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 13, note) that in the name of Narcondam one cannot but recognise Narak, 'Hell'; perhaps Naraka-kundam, 'a pit of hell'; adding: "Can it be that in old times, but still contemporary with Hindu navigation, this volcano was active, and that some Brahmin St. Brandon recognised in it the mouth of Hell, congenial to the Rakshasas of the adjacent group' of the Andamans? We have recently received an interesting letter from Mr. F. R. Mallet of the Geological Survey of India, who has lately been on a survey of Narcondam and Barren Island. Mr. Mallet states that Narcondam is "without any crater, and has certainly been extinct for many thousand years. Barren Island, on the other hand, forms a complete amphitheatre, with high precipitous encircling walls, and the volcano has been in violent eruption within the last century. The term 'pit of hell,' therefore, while quite inapplicable to Narcondam, applies most aptly to Barren Island." Mr. Mallet suggests that there may have been some confusion between the two islands, and that the name Narcondam may have been really applicable to Barren Island. [See the account of both islands in Ball, Jungle Life, 397 seqq.] The name Barren Island is quite modern. We are told in Purdy's Or. Navigator (350) that Barren Island was called by the Portuguese Ilha alta, a name which again would be much more apt for Narcondam, Barren Island being only some 800 feet high. Mr. Mallet mentions that in one of the charts of the E.I. Pilot or Oriental Navigator (1781) he finds "Narcondam according to the Portuguese" in 13° 45' N. lat. and 110° 35' E. long. (from Ferro) and "Narcondam or High Island, according to the French," in 12° 50' N. lat. and 110° 55' E. long. This is valuable as showing both that there may have been some confusion between the islands, and that Ilha alta or High Island has been connected with the name of Narcondam. The real positions by our charts are of Narcondam, N. lat. 13° 24', E. long. 94° 12'. Barren Island, N. lat. 12° 16', E. long. 93° 54'.

The difference of lat. (52 miles) agrees well with that between the Portuguese and French Narcondam, but the difference in long., though approximate in amount (18 or 20 miles), is in one case plus and in the other minus; so that the discrepancies may be due merely to error in the French reckoning. In a chart in the E.I. Pilot (1778) "Monday or Barren Island, called also High Island" and "Ayconda or Narcondam," are marked approximately in the positions of the present Barren Island and Narcondam. Still, we believe that Mr. Mallet's suggestion is likely to be well founded. The form Ayconda is nearer that found in the following:

1598.—"... as you put off from the Ilandes of Andaman towards the Coast... there lyeth only in the middle way an Ilande which the inhabitants call Viscondam, which is a small Island having faire ground round about it, but very little fresh water."—Linschoten, p. 328.

The discrepancy in the position of the islands is noticed in D'Anville:

1753.—"Je n'oublierai pas Narcondam, et d'autant moins que ce que j'en trouve dans les Portugais ne repond point à la position que nos cartes lui donnent. Le routier de Gaspar Pereira de los Reys indique l'Ile Narcondao ou Narcondam à 6 lieues des lies Coreas, 12 de la tête de l'Andaman; et le rhumb de vent à l'égard de ce point il le determine, teste quarta da nordeste, meja quarta mais para les nordestes, c'est à dire à peu-près 17 degrés de l'est au nord. Selon les cartes Françaises, Narcondam s'ecarte environ 25 lieues marines de la tête d'Andaman; et au lieu de prendre plus du nord, cette île baisse vers le sud d'une fraction de degré plus ou moins considérable selon différentes cartes."—D'Anville, Eclaire., 141-142.

I may add that I find in a French map of 1701 (Carte Marine depuis Suratte jusqu'au Detroit de Malaca, par le Père P. P. Tachard) we have, in the (approximately) true position of Narcondam, Isle Haute, whilst an islet without name appears in the approximate position of Barren Island.

NARD, s. The rhizome of the plant Nardostachys Jatamansi, D.C., a native of the loftier Himalaya (allied to Valerian). This is apparently an Indian word originally, but, as we have it, it has come from the Skt. nalāda through Semitic media, whence the change of i into r; and in this form it is found both in Hebrew and Greek. [Prof. Skeat gives: "F. nard, L. nardus. Greek νάρδος, Pers. nard (whence Skt. nalada), spikenard. Skt. nado, a reed."] The plant was first identified in modern times by Sir W. Jones. See in Canticles, i. 12, and iv. 13, 14.

NARSINGA, n.p. This is the name most frequently applied in the 16th and 17th centuries to the kingdom in Southern India, otherwise termed Vijayanagara or Bisnagar (q.v.), the latest powerful Hindu kingdom in the Peninsula. This kingdom was founded on the ruins of the Belá dynasty reigning at Dwára Samudra, about A.D. 1341 [see Rice, Mysore, i. 344 seqq.]. The original dynasty of Vijayanagara became extinct about 1487, and was replaced by Narasasváka, a prince of Telugu origin, who reigned till 1508. He was therefore reigning at the time of the first arrival of the Portuguese, and the

NASSICK, n.p. Näsìk; Naśika of Ptolemy (vii. i. 63); an ancient city of Hindu sanctity on the upper course of the Godavery R., and the headquarter of a district of the same name in the Bombay Presidency. A curious discussion took place at the R. Geog.
Society in 1867, arising out of a paper by Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Campbell, in which the selection of a capital for British India was determined on logical principles in favour of Nassick. But logic does not decide the site of capitals, though government by logic is quite likely to lose India.
Certain highly elaborated magic squares and magic cubes, investigated by the Jour., 1857) have been called by him Nàsik squares, and Nassik cubes, from his residence in that ancient place (see

NAT, s. Burmese nàt, [apparently from Skt. nátha, 'lord']; a term applicated to all spiritual beings, angels, els, demons, or what not, including the gods of the Hindus.

1878.—"Indeed, with the country population of Pegu the worship, or it should rather he said the propitiation of the 'Nàts' ordinary life, and Buddha's doctrine seems kept for sacred days and their visits to the kyoung (monastery) or to the pagoda."—

made of the coarsest earthenware, and are very capacious. Those I used were nearly a yard in diameter and about eighteen inches deep."—Thornhill, Haunts and Hobbies of an Indian Official, 79."

NAUTH. s. A kind of ballet-dance performed by women; also any kind of stage entertainment; an European ball. Hind. and Mahr. naţh, from Skt. nṛtya, dancing and stage-playing, through Prakrit nacchā. The word is in European use all over India. [A poggly nauth (see POGGLE) is a fancy-dress ball. Also see POOTLY NAUTH.] Browning seems fond of using this word, and persists in using it wrongly. In the first of the quotations below he calls Fifie the 'European nauth,' which is like calling some Hindu 'dancing-girl' 'the Indian ballet.' He repeats the mistake in the second quotation.

[1809.—"You Europeans are apt to picture to yourselves a Nach as a most attractive spectacle, but once witnessed it generally dissolves the illusion."—Broughton, Letters from a Maharatta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 142.]

1823.—"I joined Lady Macnaghten and a large party this evening to go to a Nach given by a rich native, Roupall Mullich, on the opening of his new house."—Mrs. Heber, in Heber, ed. 1844, i. 37.

[1829.—"... a dance by black people which they calls a Notch. ..."—Oriental Sport. Mag. ed. 1873, i. 129.]

c. 1831.—"Elle (Begum Sumrou) fit enterrer vivante une jeune esclave, dont elle était jalouse, et donna à son mari un nauth (bal) sur cette horrible tombe."—Jacquemont, Correspondance, ii. 221.

1872.—"... let be there was no worst Of degradation spared Fifine; ordained from first To last, in body and soul, for one life-long debauch, The Parish of the North, the European Nauth!"—Fifine at the Fair, 31.

1876.—"... I locked in the swarth little lady— I swear, From the head to the foot of her,—well quite as bare! 'No Nauth shall cheat me,' said I, taking my stand At this bolt which I draw. ..."—Natural Magic, in Pacchiarotto, &c.

NAUTH-GIRL. s. (See BAYADERE, DANCING-GIRL.) The last quotation is a glorious jumble, after the manner of the compiler.

[1809.—"Nach Girls are exempted from all taxes, though they pay a kind of voluntary one monthly to a Fugee. ..."—Broughton, Letters from a Maharatta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 113-4.]

1825.—"The Nach women were, as usual, ugly, huddled up in huge bundles of red petticoats; and their exhibition as dull and insipid to an European taste, as could well be conceived."—Heber, ii. 102.

1836.—"In India and the East dancing-girls are trained called Almeh, and they give a fascinating entertainment called a natch, for which they are well paid."—In R. Phillips, A Million of Facts, 322.

NAVAIT, NAITEA, NEVOYAT, &c., n.p. A name given to Mahomedans of mixt race in the Konkan and S. Canara, corresponding more or less to Moplabs (q.v.) and Lubbyes of Malabar and the Coromandel coast. [The head-quarters of the Navayats are in N. Canara, and their traditions state that their ancestors fled from the Persian Gulf about the close of the 7th century, to escape the cruelty of a Governor of Iran. See Sturrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 181.] It is apparently a Konkani word connected with Skt. nava, 'new,' and implying 'new convert.' [The Madras Gloss. derives the word from Pers. ناذی, from نایت, the name of an Arab clan.]

1552.—"Sons of Moors and of Gentile women, who are called Neiteas. ..."—Castanheda, iii. 24.

1553.—"Neiteas que são mésticos: quanto aos padres de geração dos Arábios e perparte das mães das Gentias."—Barros, i. ix. 3.

And because of this fertility of soil, and of the trade of these ports, there was here a great number of Moors, natives of the country, whom they call Neiteas, who were accustomed to buy the horses and sell them to the Moors of the Decan. ..."—Ibid. I. viii. 9.

c. 1612.—"From this period the Mahomedans extended their religion and their influence in Malabar, and many of the princes and inhabitants, becoming converts to the true faith, gave over the management of some of the seaports to the strangers, whom they called Nowayits (literally the New Race). ..."—Piriska, by Briggs, iv. 533.

1615.—"... et passim infiniti Mahometani reperiebantur, tum indigenae quos neiteas vocabant, tum externi. ..."—Jurric, i. 57.

1626.—"There are two sorts of Moors, one: Mesticos of mixed seed of Moore-fathers and Ethniike-mothers, called Naiteani, Mungrels also in their religion, the other Forreiners: ..."—Pucaus, Pilgrimage, 554.
NAZIR, s. Hind, from Ar. nāzīr, 'inspector' (nazar, 'sight'). The title of a native official in the Anglo-Indian Courts, sometimes improperly rendered 'sheriff,' because he serves processes, &c.

1670.—"The Khan ... ordered his Nazir, or Master of the Court, to assign something to the servants. . . ."—Andriez, 41.

1708.—"He especially, who is called Nadir, that is the chief of the Mahal . . . ."—Catron, II. of the Mogul Dynasty, E.T. 295.

1826.—"The Nazir is a perpetual sheriff, and executes writs and summonses to all the parties required to attend in civil and criminal cases."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 118. 1878.—"The Nazir had charge of the treasury, stamps, &c., and also the issue of summonses and processes."—Life in the Mogusstis, i. 204.

NEELĀM, LEELĀM, s. Hind. nilām, from Port. leilão. An auction or public outcry, as it used to be called in India (corresponding to Scotch rooup; comp. Germ. rufen, and outroop of Linschoten's translator below). The word is, however, Oriental in origin, for Mr. C. P. Brown (MS. notes) points out that the Portuguese word is from Ar. ilām (al-īlām), 'proclamation, advertisement.' It is omitted by Dozy and Engelmann. How old the custom in India of prompt disposal by auction of the effects of a deceased European is, may be seen in the quotation from Linschoten.

1515.—"Pero d'Alpoim came full of sorrow to Cochin with all the apparel and servants of Afonso d'Albuquerque, all of which Dom Gracia took charge of; but the Governor (Lopo Soares) gave orders that there should be a leilão (auction) of all the wardrobe, which indeed made a very poor show. Dom Gracia said to D. Aleixo in the church, where they met: The Governor your uncle orders a leilão of all the old wardrobe of Afonso d'Albuquerque. I cannot praise his intention, but what he has done only adds to my uncle's honour; for all the people will see that he gathered no rich Indian stuffs, and that he despised everything to be foremost in honour."—Correa, ii. 469.

1527.—"And should any man die, they at once make a Leylam of his property."—India Office MSS., Corpus Chronologico, vol. i.

Letter of Fernando Nunes to the King, Sept. 7.

1554.—"All the spoil of Mombasa that came into the general stock was sold by leilão."—Castanheda, Bk. ii. ch. 13.

1598.—"In Goa there is holden a daylie assembly ... which is like the meeting upō the burse in Andwarpe ... and there are all kinds of Indian commodities to sell, so that in a manner it is like a Faire ... it beginith in the morning at 7 of the clocke, and continueth till 9 ... in the principal strete of the citie ... and is called the Leylon, which is as much as to say, as an outroop ... and when any man dieth, all his goods are brought thereto and sold to the last pennieworth, in the same outroop, whatsoever they be, yea although they were the Viceroyes goodes."—Linschoten, ch. xxix.; [Hak. Soc. i. 184, and compare Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 52, who spells the word Laylon].

1610.—"... the mary vient frapper à la porte, dont la femme faisant fort l'aston-née, prie le Portugais de se cacher dans une petite cuve à pourceaine, et l'ayant fait entrer là dedans, et ferne tres bien à clef, ouuir la porte a son mary, qui ... le laissa tremper là iusqu'au lendemain matin, qu'il fit porter ceste cuve au marché, ou lailan ainsi qu'ils appellent. ..."—Moquet, 344.

Linschoten gives an engraving of the Rua Direita in Goa, with many of these auctions going on, and the superscription: "O Leilão que se faz cada dia pola menhā na Rua direita de Goa." The Portuguese word has taken root at Canton Chinese in the form yelang; but more distinctly betrays its origin in the Amoy form lé-lang and SWATow loyi-lang (see Giles; also Denys's Notes and Queries, vol. i.).

NEELGYE, NILGHAU, &c., s. Hind. nilgāt, nilgāī, nilgāi, i.e. 'blue cow'; the popular name of the great antelope, called by Pallas Antilope tragocamelus (Portax pictus, of Jerdon, [Boiselaphus tragocamelus of Blanford, Mammalia, 517]), given from the slaty blue which is its predominant colour. The proper Hind. name of the animal is rogh (Skt. rīgha, or rīshya).

1663.—"After these Elephants are brought divers named Gazelles, which are made to fight with one another; as also some Nil- gaux, or grey oxen, which in my opinion are a kind of Elads, and Rhinoceros, and those great Buffals of Bengal . . . to combat with a Lion or Tiger."—Berger, E.T. p. 84; [ed. Constable, 262; in 218 nilgaux; in 364, 377, nil-gauxa].

1773.—"Captain Hamilton has been so obliging as to take charge of two deer, a male and a female, of a species which is NEEM, s. The tree (N.O. Meliaceae) Azadirachta indica, Jussieu; Hind. nim (and nimb, according to Playfair, Taleef Shereef, 170), Mahr. nimb, from Skt. nimba. It grows in almost all parts of India, and has a repute for various remedial uses. Thus poultices of the leaves are applied to boils, and their fresh juice given in various diseases; the bitter bark is given in fevers; the fruit is described as purgative and emollient, and as useful in worms, &c., whilst a medicinal oil is extracted from the seeds; and the gum also is reckoned medicinal. It is akin to the bakain (see BUCKYNE), on which it grafts readily.

1563.—"R. I beg you to recall the tree by help of which you cured that valuable horse of yours, of which you told me, for I wish to remember it.

"O. You are quite right, for in sooth it is a tree that has a great repute as valuable and medicinal among nations that I am acquainted with, and the name among them all is nimbo. I came to know its virtues in the Balaghat, because with it I there succeeded in curing sore backs of horses that were most difficult to clean and heal; and these sores were cleaned very quickly, and the horses very quickly cured. And this was done entirely with the leaves of this tree pounded and put over the sores, mixed with lemon-juice. . . ."—Garcia, i. 153.

1578.—"There is another tree highly medicinal. . . which is called nimbo; and the Malabars call it Besopole [Malayall. vëppal]."—Acosta, 284.

[1813. "... the principal square . . . regularly planted with beautiful nymp or lym-trees."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445.

[1856.—"Once on a time Gaj Singh . . . said to those around him, 'Is there any one who would leap down from that limb tree into the court?"—Forbes, Rats Mala, ed. 1878, p. 465.

1877.—"The elders of the Clans sat every day on their platform, under the great neem tree in the town, and attended to all complaints."—Meadore Taylor, Story, &c., ii. 85.

NEGRAIS, Cape, n.p. The name of the island and cape at the extreme south end of Arakan. In the charts the extreme south point of the mainland is called Pagoda Point, and the seaward promontory, N.W. of this, Cape Negrais. The name is a Portuguese corruption probably of the Arab or Malay form of the native name which the Burmese express as Naga-rit, 'Dragon's whirlpool.' The set of the tide here is very apt to carry vessels ashore, and thus the locality is famous for wrecks. It is possible, however, that the Burmese name is only an effort at interpretation, and that the locality was called in old times by some name like Nāgarāḍastra. Ibn Batuta touched at a continental coast occupied by uncivilised people having elephants, between Bengal and Sumatra, which he calls Baranaghr. From the intervals given, the place must have been near Negrais, and it is just possible that the term Barra de Negrais, which frequently occurs in the old writers (e.g. see Balbi, Fitch, and Bocarro below) is a misinterpretation of the old name used by Ibn Batuta (iv. 224-228).

1553.—"Up to the Cape of Negrais, which stands in 16 degrees, and where the Kingdom of Pegu commences, the distance may be 100 leagues."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1558.—"Then the wind came from the S.W., and we made sail with our stern to the N.E., and running our course till morning we found ourselves close to the Bar of Negrais, as in their language they call the port which runs up into Pegu."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 92.

1586.—"We entered the barre of Negrais, which is a braue barre," kc. (see COSMIN).

—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 390.

1613.—"Philip de Brito having sure intelligence of this great armament . . . ordered the arming of seven ships and some sangriuelas, and appointing as their commodore Paulo de Rego Pinheiro, gave him precise orders to engage the prince of Arracan at sea, before he should enter the Bawand rivers of Negrais, as form the mouth of all those of the kingdom of Pegb."—Fitch, 157.

1727.—"The Sea Coast of Aracan reaches from Xatigam (see CHITTAGONG) to Cape Negrais, about 400 Miles in length, but few places inhabited . . ." (after speaking of "the great Island of Negrais") . . . he goes on. . . ."The other Island of Negrais, which makes the Point called the Cape . . . is often called Diamond Island, because its Shape is a Rhombus. . . . Three Leagues to the Southward of Diamond Island lies a Reef of Rocks a League long . . . conspicuous at all Times by the Sea breaking over them . . . the Rocks are called the Legarti, or in English, the Lizard."—A. Hamilton, ii. 29. This reef is the Alagado, on which a noble lighthouse was erected by Capt. (afterwards Lieut.-Gen.) Sir A. Fraser, C.B., of the Engineers, with great labour and skill. The statement of Hamilton suggests that the original name may have been Lagarto. But Alagado, "overflowed," is the real origin. It appears in the old French chart of d'Aprés as Ile Nouée. In Dunn it is Negoda or Nejada, or Lequado, or Sunken Island (V. Dir. 1780, 325).

1759.—"The Dutch by an Inscription in Teutonic Characters, lately found at Negrais, on the Tomb of a Dutch Colonel, who died in 1607 (qu. if not 1627?), appear then to have had Possession of that Island."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 98.

1763.—"It gives us pleasure to observe that the King of the Burmahns, who caused our people at Negrais to be so cruelly massacred, is since dead, and succeeded by his son, who seems to be of a more friendly and humane disposition."—Fort William Consns., Feb. 19. In Long, 288.

1819.—"Negraglia." See under MUN.-NEEPORE.

NELLY, NELE. s. Malayāl. nel, "rice in the husk"; [Tel. and Tam. nellī, 'rice-like']. This is the Dravidian equivalent of paddy (q.v.), and is often used by the French and Portuguese in South India, where Englishmen use the latter word.

1606.—". . . when they sell nele, after they have measured it out to the purchaser, for the seller to return and take out two-grains for himself for luck (com superstição), things that are all heathen vanities, which the synod entirely prohibits, and orders that those who practise them shall be severely punished by the Bishop."—Gouvea, Synodo, f. 520.

1651.—"Nili, that is unpounded rice, which is still in the husk."—Rogerius, p. 93.

[1796.—"75 parahs Nelly."—List of Export Duties, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 285.]

NELLORE, n.p. A town and district north of Madras. The name may be Tamil. Nall-ūr, 'Good Town.' But the local interpretation is from nel (see NELLY); and in the local records it is given in Skt. as Dhānaya-puram, meaning "rice-town" (Seshagirī Sāstri). [The Madras Mun. (ii. 214) gives Nall-ūr, 'Good-town'; but the Gloss. (s.v.) has nello, 'paddy,' āru, 'village.' Mr. Boswell (Nellore, 687) suggests that it is derived from a nelli chett tree under which a famous lingam was placed.]

c. 1310.—"Ma'bar extends in length from Kulum to Nilāwar, nearly 300 parasangs along the sea coast."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 32.

NERBUDDA R., n.p. Skt. Nar-madd, 'causing delight'; Ptol. Nāµµâdos; Peripl. Ἀναµµαόος (amended by Fabricius to Nāµµādos). Dean Vincent's conjectured etymology of Nahr-Budda, 'River of Buddha,' is a caution against such guesses.

c. 1020.—"From Dhâr southwards to the R. Nerballa nine (parasangs) ; thence to Maharat-des ... eighteen ..."—Al-Birâni, in Elliot, i. 60. The reading of Nerballa is however doubtful.

c. 1310.—"There were means of crossing all the rivers, but the Nerballa was such that you might say it was a remnant of the universal deluge."—Amir Khosrâ, in Elliot, i. 79.

[1616.—"The King rode to the riner of Darbâdah.—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 183. In his list (ii. 539) he has Nerballa.]

1727.—"The next Town of Note for Commerce is Baroach... on the Banks of the River Nerbadda."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 145.

NERCHA, s. Malayâl. nercha, 'a vow,' from verb nerwa, 'to agree or promise.'

1606.—"They all assemble on certain days in the porches of the churches and dine together... and this they call nercha."—Gowen, Synod, f. 63. See also f. 11. This term also includes offerings to saints, or to temples, or particular forms of devotion. Among Hindus a common form is to feed a lamp before an idol with ghee instead of oil.

NERRICK, NERRUCK, NIRK, &c., s. Hind. from Pers. nirkh, vulgarly nirakh, nirikh. A tariff, rate, or price-current, especially one established by authority. The system of publishing such rates of prices and wages by local authority prevailed generally in India a generation or two back, and is probably not quite extinct even in our own territories. [The provincial Gazettes still publish periodical lists of current prices, but no attempt is made to fix such by authority.] It is still in force in the French settlements, and with no apparent ill effects.

1799.—"I have written to Campbell a long letter about the nerrick of exchange, in which I have endeavoured to explain the principles of the whole system of shroffing (see SHROFF)."—Wellington, i. 56.

1800.—"While I was absent with the army, Col. Sherbrooke had altered the nerrick of artificers, and of all kinds of materials for building, at the instigation of Capt. Norris... and on the examination of the subject a system of engineering came out, well worthy of the example set at Madras."—Ibid. i. 67.

[", "Here is established a mirus, or regulation, by which all coins have a certain value affixed to them; and at this rate they are received in the payment of the revenue; but in dealings between private persons attention is not paid to this rule."—F. Buchanan, Myore, ii. 279.]

1878.—"On expressing his surprise at this, the man assured him that it was really the case that the bazar 'nerik' or market-rate, had so risen."—Life in the Mofussil, i. p. 33.

NGAPEE, s. The Burmese name, ngâpi, 'pressed fish,' of the odorous delicacy described under BALACHONG. [See Forbes, British Burma, 83.]

1855.—"Makertich, the Armenian, assured us that the jars of ngâpe at Amara-poora exhibited a flux and reflux of tide with the changes of the moon. I see this is an old belief. De la Loubère mentions it in 1688 as held by the Siamese."—Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 160.

NICOBAR ISLANDS, n.p. The name for centuries applied to a group of islands north of Sumatra. They appear to be the Bâdrovorsâ of Ptolemy, and the Lankha Balûs of the oldest Arab Relation. [Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with the Island of the Bell (Nâkâs) to which Sindbad, the Seaman, is carried in his fifth voyage. (Report on Old Records, 108; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 368.)] The Danes attempted to colonize the islands in the middle of the 18th century, and since, unsuccessfully. An account of the various attempts will be found in the Voyage of the Novara. Since 1869 they have been partially occupied by the British Government, as an appendage of the Andaman settlement. Comparing the old forms Lankha and Nakkâvâram, and the nakedness constantly attributed to the people, it seems possible that the name may have had reference to this (ñâyâ). [Mr. Man (Journ. Anthropol. Institute, xviii. 359) writes: 'A possible derivation may be suggested by the following extract from a paper by A. de Candolle (1885) on 'The Origin of Cultivated Plants': 'The presence of the coconut in Asia three or four thousand years ago is proved by several Sanskrit names... The Malays have a name widely diffused in the Archipelago, kalupa, klapa, klopa. At Sumatra and Nicobar we find the name vjór, vir, in the Philippines wîng, at Bali, wîng, wîjo...'] While the Nicobars have long been famed for the excellence of their coconuts, the only words which bear any resemblance to the forms above given
The name appears as Nakka-vāram in the great Tanjore Inscription of the 11th century. The island they have no king nor chief, but live like beasts.

And the islands, which produce plenty of red amber. Men and women go naked, except that the latter cover the pudenda with coconuts leaves. They are all subject to the Kānān.

NIGHERY, NEILGHERY, &c., n.p. The name of the Mountain Peninsula at the end of the Mysore table land (originally known as Malar-nādu, 'Hill country'), which is the chief site of hill sanatoria in the Madras Presidency. Skt. Nilagirī, 'Blue Mountain.' The name Nila or Nīlādri (synonymous with Nilagirī) belongs to one of the mythical or semi-mythical ranges of the Puranic Cosmography (see Vishnu Purāna, in Wilson's Works, by Hall, ii. 102, 111, &c.), and has been applied to several ranges of more assured locality, e.g. in Orissa as well as in S. India. The name seems to have been fancifully applied to the Ootacamund range about 1820, by some European. [The name was undoubtedly applied by natives to the range before the appearance of Europeans, as in the Kongū-deśa Rajākāl, quoted by Grigg (Nilagirī Man. 363), and the name appears in a letter of Col. Mackenzie of about 1816 (Ibid. 278).] Mr. T. M. Horsfall writes:

or 4000 pardoas of rent; they are related to one another, and are placed as guards in the outlying parts. —S. Botelho, Cartas, 111.

1582.—"A negroe of John Cambrayes, Pilot to Paulo de la Gama, was that day run away to the Moors." —Castañeda, by N. L., f. 19.

[1608.—"The King and people niggers." —Dawers, Letters, i. 10.]

1622.—Ed. Grant, pursuer of the Diamond, reports capture of vessels, including a junk "with some stoor of nigers, which was devided bytwick the Duch and the English." —Sainsbury, iii. p. 78.

1666.—"Ives, Voyage, p. 23.

1670.—"The Dress of this Country is entirely linen, save Hats and Shoes; the latter are made of tanned希ides as in England... only that they are no thicker than coarse paper. These shoes are neatly made by Negros, and sold for about 10d. a Pr. each of which will last two months with care." —MS. Letter of James Renwol, Sept. 30.

1866.—"Now the political creed of the frequenters of dawk bungalows is too uniform... it consists in the following tenets... that Sir Mordaunt Wells is the greatest judge that ever sat on the English bench; and that when you hit a nigger he dies on purpose to spite you." —The Dawk Bunglow, p. 225.
"The name is in common use among all classes of natives in S. India, but when it may have become specific I cannot say. Possibly the solution may be that the Nilgiris being the first large mountain range to become familiar to the English, that name was by them caught hold of, but not coined, and stuck to them by mere priority. It is on the face of it improbable that the Englishmen who early in the last century discovered these Hills, that is, explored and shot over them, would call them by a long Skt. name."]

Probably the following quotation from Dampier refers to Orissa, as does that from Hedges:

"One of the English ships was called the Nellgree, the name taken from the Nelligree Hills in Bengal, as I have heard."—Dampier, ii. 145.

1683.—"In ye morning early I went up the Nilligree Hill, where I had a view of a most pleasant fruitfull valley."—Hedges, Diary, March 2 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 67].

The following also refers to the Orissa Hills:

1752.—"Weavers of Balasore complain of the great scarcity of rice and provisions of all kinds occasioned by the devastations of the Mahratas, who, 600 in number, after plundering Balasore, had gone to the Nelligree Hills."—In Long, 42.

a. The name of a stemless palm (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.), which abounds in estuaries from the Ganges delta eastwards, through Tenasserim and the Malay countries, to N. Australia, and the leaves of which afford the chief material used for thatch in the Archipelago. "In the Philippines," says Crawfurd, "but not that I am aware of anywhere else, the sap of the Nipa. . . is used as a beverage, and for the manufacture of vinegar, and the distillation of spirits. On this account it yields a considerable part of the revenue of the Spanish Government." (Desp. Dict. p. 301). But this fact is almost enough to show that the word is the same which is used in sense b; and the identity is placed beyond question by the quotations from Teixeira and Mason.

b. Arrack made from the sap of a palm tree, a manufacture by no means confined to the Philippines. The Portuguese, appropriating the word Nipa to this spirit, called the tree itself nipeira.

1611.—"Other wine is of another kind of palm which is called Nipa (growing in watery places), and this is also extracted by distillation. It is very mild and sweet, and clear as pure water; and they say it is very wholesome. It is made in great quantities, with which ships are laden in Pegu and Tenasserim, Malaca, and the Philippines, or Manila; but that of Tenasserim exceeds all in goodness."—Teixeira, Relaciones, i. 17.

1613.—"And then on from the marsh to the Nypeiras or wild-palms of the rivulet of Paret China."—Godinho de Eredia, 6.

", "And the wild palms called Nypeiras . . . from those flowers is drawn the liquor which is distilled into wine by an alembic, which is the best wine of India."—Ibid. 16c.

[1817.]—"In the maritime districts, atap, or thatch, is made almost exclusively from the leaves of the nipa or bâpu."—Raffles, H. of Java, 2nd ed. i. 185.

1848. —"Steamimg amongst the low swampy islands of the Sunderbunds . . . the paddles of the steamer tossed up the large fruits of the Nipa fruticans, a low stemless palm that grows in the tidal waters of the Indian ocean, and bears a large head of nuts. It is a plant of no interest to the common observer, but of much to the geologist, from the nuts of a similar plant abounding in the tertiary formations at the mouth of the Thames, having floated about there in as great profusion as here, till buried deep in the silt and mud that now form the island of Sheppey."—Hooker, Himalayan Journals, i. 1-2.

1860.—"The Nipa is very extensively cultivated in the Province of Tavoy. From incisions in the stem of the fruit, toddy is extracted, which has very much the flavour of mead, and this extract, when boiled down, becomes sugar."—Mason's Burmah, p. 506.

1874.—"It (sugar) is also got from Nipa fruticans, Thunb., a tree of the low coast-regions, extensively cultivated in Tavoy."—Harbury and Flückiger, 655.

These last quotations confirm the old travellers who represent Tenasserim as the great source of the Nipa spirit.

b.—

c. 1567.—"Every yeere is there lade (at Tenasserim) some ships with Verzino, Nipa, and Benjamine."—Ces. Federici (E.T. in Hakl.), ii. 359.

1568.—"Nipa, qual' è vn Vino eccellentissimo che nasce nel fior d'vn arbore chiamato Niper, il cui liquore si distilla, e se ne fa vnà beuanda eccellentisima."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 392v.

1588.—"I Portoghesi e noi altri di queste bande di quà non mangiamo nel Regno di Pegù pane di grano . . . ne si beve vino; ma una certa acqua lambicciata da vn albero detto Anippna, ch'è alla bocca assai gustose: ma al corpo giova e nuoce, secondo le complessioni de gli huomini."—G. Balbi, f. 127.

1591.—"Those of Tanaseri are chiefly freighted with Rice and Nipar wine, which is very strong."—Barker's Account of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hakt. ii. 592.

In the next two quotations nipe is confounded with coco-nut spirit.

1598.—"Likewise there is much wine brought therewith, which is made of-Coccus or Indian Nuttes, and is called Nypee de Tanassaria, that is Aqua Composita of Tanassaria."—Linschoten, 90; [Hak. Soc. i. 103].

"The Sura, being distilled, is called Futa (see FOOL'S RACK) or Nipe, and is an excellent Aqua Vinea as any is made in Dort."—Ibid. 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

[1616.—"One jar of Nepee."—Foster, Letters, iv. 192.]

1623.—"In the daytime they did nothing but talk a little with one another, and some of them get drunk upon a certain wine they have of raisins, or on a kind of aqua viti with other things mixt in it, in India called nippa, which had been given them."—P. della Valle, ii. 669; [Hak. Soc. ii. 272].

We think there can be little doubt that the slang word nip, for a small dram of spirits, is adopted from nipa. [But compare Dutch nippen, 'to take a dram.' The old word nipittatum was used for 'strong drink'; see Stanf. Diet.]

NIRVĀṆA. s. Skt. nirvīṇa. The literal meaning of this word is simply 'blown out,' like a candle. It is the technical term in the philosophy of the Buddhists for the condition to which they aspire as the crown and goal of virtue, viz. the cessation of sentient existence. On the exact meaning of the term see Childer's Pali Dictionary, s.v. nibbāṇa, an article from which we quote a few sentences below, but which covers ten double-column pages. The word has become common in Europe along with the growing interest in Buddhism, and partly from its use by Schopenhauer. But it is often employed very inaccurately, of which an instance occurs in the quotation below from Dr. Draper. The oldest European occurrence of which we are aware is in Purchas, who had met with it in the Pali form common in Burma, &c., nibban.

1626.—"After death they (the Talapoyis) beleev three Places, one of Pleasure Sennam (perhaps sukham) like the Mahumitane Paradise; another of Torment Naxae (read Nurae); the third of Annihilation which they call Niba."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 506.

c. 1815.—"... the state of Nibān, which is the most perfect of all states. This consists in an almost perpetual extacy, in which those who attain it are not only free from troubles and miseries of life, from death, illness and old age, but are abstracted from all sensation; they have no longer either a thought or a desire."—Swengerman, Burmese Empire, p. 6.

1558,—"... Transience, Pain, and Unreality... these are the characters of all existence, and the only true good is exemption from these in the attainment of nirvāṇa, whether that be, as in the view of the Brahmin or the theistic Buddhist, absorption into the supreme essence; or whether it be, as many have thought, absolute nothingness; or whether it be, as Mr. Hodgson quaintly phrases it, the "ubh or the modūs in which the infinitely attenuated elements of all things exist, in this last and highest state of abstraction from all particular modifications such as our senses and understandings are cognisant of."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 296.

"When from between the sāl trees at Kusināra he passed into nirvāṇa, he (Buddha) ceased, as the extinguished fire ceases."—Ibid. 239.

1869.—"What Bishop Bigandet and others represent as the popular July, of the Nirvāṇa, in contradistinction to that of the Buddhist divines, was, in my opinion, the conception of Buddha and his disciples. It represented the entrance of the soul into rest, a subduing of all wishes and desires, indifference to joy and pain, to good and evil, an absorption of the soul into itself, and a freedom from the circle of existences from birth to death, and from death to a new birth. This is still the meaning which educated people attach to it, whilst Nirvāṇa suggests rather a kind of Mohammedan Paradise or of blissful Elysian fields to the minds of the larger masses."—Prof. Max Müller, Lecture on Buddhistic Nikhilm, in Trübner's Or. Record, Oct. 16.

1875.—"Nībbāṇa. Extinction; destruction; annihilation; annihilation of being, Nirvāṇa; annihilation of human passion, Arhatship or final sanctification. ... In Trübner's Record for July, 1870, I first propounded a theory which meets all the difficulties of the question, namely, that the word Nirvāṇa is used to designate two different things, the state of blissful sanctification called Arhatship, and the annihilation of existence in which Arhatship ends."—Childers, Pali Dictionary, Pp. 265-266.

"But at length reunion with the universal intellect takes place; Nirvana is reached, oblivion is attained... the state in which we were before we were born."—Draper, Conflict, &c., 122.
1879.—
"And how—in fullness of the times—it fell
That Buddha died . . .
And how a thousand thousand crores since then Have trod the Path which leads whither he went Unto Nirvana where the Silence lives."
Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, 237.

NIZAM, THE, n.p. The hereditary style of the reigning prince of the Hyderabad Territories; 'His Highness the Nizám,' in English official phraseology. This in its full form, Nizam-ul-Mulk, was the title of Asaf Jäh, the founder of the dynasty, a very able soldier and minister of the Court of Aurangzib, who became Súbádár (see SOUBADAR) of the Deccan in 1713. The title is therefore the same that had pertained to the founder of the Ahmednagar dynasty more than two centuries earlier, which the Portuguese called that of Nizamaluco. And the circumstances originating the Hyderabad dynasty were parallel. At the death of Asaf Jäh (in 1748) he was independent sovereign of a large territory in the Deccan, with his residence at Hyderabad, and with dominions in a general way corresponding to those still held by his descendant.

NIZAMALUCO, n.p. Izam Maluco is the form often found in Correa. One of the names which constantly occur in the early Portuguese writers on India. It represents Nizam-ul-Mulk (see NIZAM). This was the title of one of the chiefs at the court of the Bāhmání king of the Deccan, who had been originally a Brahman and a slave. His son Ahmed set up a dynasty at Ahmednagar (A.D. 1490), which lasted for more than a century. The sovereigns of this dynasty were originally called by the Portuguese Nizamaluco. Their own title was Nizam Shāh, and this also occurs as Nizamoza. [Linschoten’s etymology given below is an incorrect guess.]

1521.—"Meanwhile (the Governor Diego Lopes de Sequiära) . . . sent Fernão Camello as ambassador to the Nizamaluco, Lord of the lands of Choul, with the object of making a fort at that place, and arranging for an expedition against the King of Cambaya, which the Governor thought the Nizamaluco would gladly join in, because he was in a quarrel with that King. To this he made the reply that I shall relate hereafter."—Correa, ii. 623.

c. 1539.—"Trelado do Contrato que o Viso Rey Dom, Garcia de Noronha fez com hu Niza Muxaa, que dantes se chamava Hu Niza Maluco."—Tombo, in Súbádios, 115.

1543.—"Izam maluco." See under COTAMALUCO.

1553.—"This city of Chaul . . . is in population and greatness of trade one of the chief ports of that coast; it was subject to the Nizamaluco, one of the twelve Captains of the Kingdom of Decan (which we call Decan). The Nizamaluco being a man of great estate, although he possessed this maritime city, and other ports of great revenue, generally in order to be closer to the Kingdom of the Deccan, held his residence in the interior in other cities of his dominion; instructing his governors in the coast districts to aid our fleets in all ways and content their captains, and this was not merely out of dread of them, but with a view to the great revenue that he had from the ships of Malabar. . ."—Borros, II. ii. 7.

1553.—". . . This King of Dely conquered the Decan (see DECCAN and the Cunçam (see CONCAM); and retained the dominion a while; but he could not rule territory at so great a distance, and so placed in it a nephew crowned as king. This king was a great favourer of foreign people, such as Turks, Ramis, Corações, and Arabs, and he divided his kingdom into capitanies, bestowing upon Adelham (whom we call Izamaluco see IDALCAN) the coast from Angediva to Cifardam . . . and to Nizamaluco the coast from Cifardam to Negotana. . ."—Garcia, f. 34v.

"R. Let us mount and ride in the country; and by the way you shall tell me who is meant by Nizamoza, as you often use that term to me.

"O. At once I tell you he is a king in the Balaghat (see BALAGHAUT) (Baputate for Balagate), whose father I have often attended, and call Daquem. I have heard the Nizamaluco being a man of great estate, although he possessed this maritime city, and other ports of great revenue, generally in order to be closer to the Kingdom of the Deccan, held his residence in the interior in other cities of his dominion; instructing his governors in the coast districts to aid our fleets in all ways and content their captains, and this was not merely out of dread of them, but with a view to the great revenue that he had from the ships of Malabar. . ."—Borros, II. ii. 7.

1598.—"Maluco is a Kingdome, and Niza a Lance or Speare, so that Niza Maluco is as much as to say as the Lance or Speare of the Kingdom."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 172. As if Niza-ul-mulk, 'spear of the kingdom.'

NOKAR, s. A servant, either domestic, military, or civil, also pl. Nokar-logue, 'the servants.' Hind. naukar, from Pers. and naukar-lóg. Also naukar-chákar, 'the servants,' one of those jingling double-barrelled phrases in which Orientals delight even more than Englishmen (see LOOTY). As regards Englishmen, compare hugger-mugger, hurdy-gurdy, tip-top, highfly-tighty, higgledy-piggledy, hocus-pocus, tit for tat, tospsy-turvy, harum-scarum, roly-poly, fiddle-faddle, rump and stump, slip-slop. In this case chakur (see CHACKUR) is also Persian. Naukur would seem to be a Mongol word introduced into Persia by the hosts of Chinghiz. According to I. J. Schmidt, Forschungen im Gebiete der Volker Mittel Asiens, p. 96, nikkur is in Mongol, 'a comrade, dependent, or friend.'

c. 1407.—"L'Emir Khodaiad fit partir avec ce député son serviteur (naukar) et celui de Mirza Dijhanghir. Ces trois personnages joignent la cour auguste."—Abd urraszk, in Notices et Études, XIV. i. 146.

c. 1660.—"Mahmud Sultan . . . understood accounts, and could reckon very well by memory the sums which he had to receive from his subjects, and those which he had to pay to his 'naukar' (apparently armed followers)."—Abulghazi, by Desmaisons, 271.

[1810.—"Noker." See under CHACKUR.

[1834.—"Its (Balkh) present population does not amount to 2000 souls; who are chiefly . . . the remnant of the Kara Naukur, a description of the militia established here by the Afghans."—Burnes, Travels into Bokhara, i. 238.]

1840.—"Noker, 'the servant'; this title was borne by Tuli the fourth son of Chengan Khan, because he was charged with the details of the army and the administration."—Hammer, Golden Horde, 460.

NOL-KOLE, s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian name of a vegetable a good deal grown in India, perhaps less valued in England than it deserves, and known here (though rarely seen) as Kol-rabi, kohi-rabi, 'cabbage-turnip.' It is the Brassica oleracea, var. caulo-rapa. The stalk at one point expands into a globular mass resembling a turnip, and this is the edible part. I see my friend Sir G. Birdwood in his Bombay Products spells it Knolkhok. It is apparently Dutch, 'Knolkool,' 'Turnip-cabbage; Choucrave of the French.'

NON-REGULATION, adj. The style of certain Provinces of British India (administered for the most part under the more direct authority of the Central Government in its Foreign Department, in which the ordinary Laws (or Regulations, as they were formerly called) are not in force, or are in force only so far as they are specially declared by the Government of India to be applicable. The original theory of administration in such Provinces was the union of authority in all departments under one district chief, and a kind of paternal despotism in the hands of that chief. But by the gradual restriction of personal rule, and the multiplication of positive laws and rules of administration, and the division of duties, much the same might now be said of the difference between Regulation and Non-regulation Provinces that a witty Frenchman said of Intervention and Non-intervention:

"La Non-intervention est une phrase politique et technique qui veut dire enfin à-peu-près la même chose que l'Intervention."

Our friend Gen. F. C. Cotton, R.E., tells us that on Lord Dalhousie's visit to the Neilgherry Hills, near the close of his government, he was riding with the Governor-General to visit some new building. Lord Dalhousie said to him: "It is not a thing that one must say in public, but I would give a great deal that the whole of India should be Non-regulation."

The Punjab was for many years the greatest example of a Non-regulation Province. The chief survival of that state of things is that there, as in Burma and a few other provinces, military men are still eligible to hold office in the civil administration.

1867.—". . . We believe we should indicate the sort of government that Sicly wants, tolerably well to Englishmen who know anything of India, by saying that it should be treated in great measure as a 'non-regulation' province."—Quarterly Review, Jan. 1867, p. 135.

1883.—"The Delhi district, happily for all, was a non-regulation province."—Life of Lt. Lawrence, i. 44.

[1615.—"He kept himselfe close in a neremon."—Cocks's Diary, i. 104.]

1618.—"As we were going out of the town, the street being full of hackneymen and horses, they would not make me way to passe, but fell a quarreling with my neremoners, and offred me great abuse.
..."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 99; [neremonears in ii. 23].

1768-71. "Sedan-chairs are not in use here (in Batavia). The ladies, however, sometimes employ a conveyance that is somewhat like them, and is called a nori-mon."—Slavonicus, E.T. i. 324.

NOR'-WESTER, s. A sudden and violent storm, such as often occurs in the hot weather, bringing probably a '\n\ndust-storm' at first, and culminating in hail or torrents of rain. (See TYphoon).

1810.—"... those violent squalls called '\nnorth-westers,' in consequence of their usually either commencing in, or veering round to that quarter. ... The force of these north-westers is next to incredible."
—Williamson, V. M. ii. 35.

1827.—"A most frightful nor west had come on in the night, every door had burst open, the peals of thunder and torrents of rain were so awful...."—Mrs. Fenton, Diary, 98.

NOWBEHAR, n.p. This is a name which occurs in various places far apart, a monument of the former extension of Buddhism. Thus, in the early history of the Mahommedans in Sind, we find repeated mention of a temple called Nauvihdar (Nava-vihdra, 'New Monastery'). And the same name occurs at Balth, near the Oxus.
(See VIHARA).

NOWROZE, s. Pers. nau-roz, 'New (Year's) Day'; i.e. the first day of the Solar Year. In W. India this is observed by the Parsees. [For instances of such celebrations at the vernal equinox, see Frazer, Pausanias, iv.
75.]

C. 1590.—"This was also the cause why the Naurús i Jalalí was observed, on which day, since his Majesty's accession, a great feast was given. ... The New Year's Day feast ... commences on the day when the Sun in his splendour moves to Aries, and lasts till the 19th day of the month (Fardahrn)."—Asa, ed. Blockmann, i. 183, 276.

1614. "Their Noroose, which is an annual feast of 20 days continuance kept by the Mahrutes, with great solemnity."— Foster, Letters, iii. 65.

1615.—"The King and Prince went a hunting ... that his house might be fitted against the Norose, which began the first Newe Moon in March."—Sir T. Roe, Hak.
Soc. i. 138; also see 142.

1638.—"There are two Festivals which are celebrated in this place with extraordinary ceremonies; one whereof is that of the first day of the year, which, with the Persians, they call Naurus, Nauros, or Norose, which signifies nine days, though now it lasts eighteen at least, and it falls at the moment that the Sun enters Aries."—Mandelslo, 41.

1673.—"On the day of the Vernal Equa-noe, we returned to Gomboon, when the Moors introduced their New Year Jede (see EED) or Noe Rose, with Banquetting and great Solemnity."—Fryer, 306.

1712.—"Restat Naurus, i.e. vertentis anni initium, incidens in diem equinocii vern. Non legalis est, sed ab antiquis Persis haereditate accepta festivitas, omnium caeterarum maxima et solennissima."
—Kaempfer, Am. Eact. 162.

1815.—"Jemsheed also introduced the solar year; and ordered the first day of it, when the sun entered Aries, to be celebrated by a splendid festival. It is called Nauroze, or new year's day, and is still the great festival in Persia."—Malcolm, H. of Persia,
i. 17.

1832.—"Now-ruz (new year's day) is a festival or eed of no mean importance in the estimation of Mussulman society. ... The trays of presents prepared by the ladies for their friends are tastefully set out, and the work of many days' previous arrangement. Eggs are boiled hard, some of these are stained in colours resembling our mottled papers; others are neatly painted in figures and devices; many are ornamented with gilding; every lady evincing her own peculiar taste in the prepared eggs for now-ruz."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Obes. on the Musulmans of India, 283-4.

NOWSHADDER, s. Pers. nausha-dar (Skt. narasāra, but recent), Sal-ammoniac, i.e. chloride of ammonium.

C. 1300.—We find this word in a medieval list of articles of trade contained in Capmany's Memorias de Barcelona (ii. App.
74) under the form noxadre.

1343.—"Salamoniac ois lisciadro, e non si dà nò sacco ne cassa con essa."— Pegolotti, p. 17; also see 57, &c.

[1834. — "Sal ammoniac (noonchadur) is found in its native state among the hills near Juzzak."—Burnes, Travels into Bohkara,
ii. 166.]

NUDEEAA RIVERS, n.p. See under HOOGLY RIVER, of which these are branches, intersecting the Nadiya District. In order to keep open navigation by the directest course from the Ganges to Calcutta, much labour is, or was, annually expended, under a special officer, in endeavouring during the dry season to maintain sufficient depth in these channels.
NUJEEB, s. Hind, from Ar. najib, 'noble.' A kind of half-disciplined infantry soldiers under some of the native Governments; also at one time a kind of militia under the British; receiving this honorary title as being gentlemen volunteers.

[c. 1790.—"There were 1000 men, nudjeves, sword men . . ." Evidence of Sheikh Mohammed, quoted by Mr. Plumer, in Trial of W. Hastings, in Bond, iii. 393.

1796.—"The Nezibs are Matchlock men."—W. A. Tonic, A Letter on the Mahratta People, Bombay, 1798, p. 50.]

1813.—"There are some corps (Mahratta) styled Nujeeb or men of good family. . . . These are foot soldiers invariably armed with a sabre and matchlock, and having adopted some semblance of European discipline are much respected."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 46; [2nd ed. i. 343].

NULLAH. s. Hind. nullā. A watercourse; not necessarily a dry watercourse, though this is perhaps more frequently indicated in the Anglo-Indian use.

1776.—"When the water falls in all the nullahs..."—Halhed's Code, 52.

1817.—"In some instances they are called Nujeeb (literally, Noble) and would not deign to stand sentry or perform any fatiguing duty."—V. Blacker, Mem. of the Operations in India in 1817-19, p. 22.

OTHER TERMS APPLIED HAVE BEEN NUMERATORIA, QUANTITATIVE AUXILIARIES, NUMERAL AUXILIARIES, SEGREGATIVES, &C.

NULLAH, NUMNA. s. Hind. namāda, namātā, from Pers. namad, [Skt. namata]. Felt; sometimes a woolen saddle-cloth, properly made of felt. The word is perhaps the same as Ar. namat, 'a coverlet,' spread on the seat of a sovereign, &c.

1774.—"The apartment was full of people seated on Nāmātās (fefts of camel hair) spread round the sides of the room..."—Haw脱y, Hist. Account of British Trade, i. 226.

1815.—"That chief (Temugin or Chingis), we are informed, after addressing the Khans in an eloquent harangue, was seated upon a black felt or nummud, and reminded of the importance of the duties to which he was called."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 410.

1819.—"A Kattie throws a nunda on his mare."—Tran. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 279.

1828.—"In a two-poled tent of a great size, and lined with yellow woolen stuff of Europe, sat Nader Koole Khan, upon a coarse numud..."—The Kuzzilibash, i. 254.

1850.—"The natives use (for their tents) a sort of woolen stuff, about half an inch thick, called 'numba.'... By the bye, this word 'numba,' is said to be the origin of the word nomade, because the nomade tribes used the same material for their tents"—Letter in Notes and Queries, 1st ser. i. 342.

NUMERICAL AFFIXES, COEFFICIENTS, OR DETERMINATIVES.* What is meant by these expressions can perhaps be best elucidated by an extract from the Malay Grammar of the late venerable John Crawfurd:

"In the enumeration of certain objects, the Malay has a peculiar idiom which, as far as I know, does not exist in any other language of the Archipelago. It is of the same nature as the word 'head,' as we use it in the tale of cattle, or 'sail' in the enumeration of ships; but in Malay it extends to many familiar objects. Alai, of which the original meaning has not been ascertained, is applied to such tenuous objects as leaves, grasses, &c.; Batang, meaning 'stem,' or 'trunk,' to trees, logs, spears, and javelins; Bantak, of which the meaning has not been ascertained, to such objects as rings; Bidang, which means 'spreading' or 'spacious,' to mats, carpets, thatch, sails, skins, and hides; Bjöii, 'seeds,' to corn, seeds, stones, pebbles, gems, eggs, the eyes of animals, lamps, and candlesticks," and so on. Crawfurd names 8 or 9 other terms, one or other of which is always used in company with the numeral, in enumerating different classes of objects, as if, in English, idiom should compel us to say 'two stems of spears,' 'four spreads of carpets,' 'six corns of diamonds.' As a matter of fact we do speak of 20 head of cattle, 10 jile of soldiers, 100 sail of ships, 20 pieces of cannon, a dozen stand of rifles. But still the practice is in none of these cases obligatory, it is technical and exceptional; insomuch that I remember, when a boy, in old Reform-Bill days, and when disturbances were expected in a provincial town, hearing it stated by a well-informed lady that a great proprietress in the neighbourhood was so alarmed that she had ordered from town a whole stand of muskets!

To some small extent the idiom occurs also in other European languages, including French and German. Of French I don't remember any example now except tête (de betail), nor of German except Stück, which is, however, almost as universal as the Chinese piecey. A quaint example dwells in my memory of a German courier, who, when asked whether he had any employer at the moment, replied: 'Ja freilich! dreizehn Stück Amerikamer!' The same peculiar idiom that has been described in the extract from Crawfurd as existing in Malay, is found also in Burmese. The Burmese affixes seem to be more numerous, and their classification to be somewhat more arbitrary and sophisticated. Thus oos, a root implying 'chief' or 'first,' is applied to kings, divinities, priests, &c.; Yawh, 'a male,' to rational beings not divine; Gyaung, 'a brute beast,' to irrational beings; Pya, implying superficial extent, to dollars, countries, dishes, blankets, &c.; Lwn, implying rotundity, to eggs, loaves, bottles, cups, toes, fingers, candles, bamboo, hands, feet, &c.; Tseng and Gyaung, 'extension in a straight line,' to rods, lines, spears, roads, &c. The same idiom exists in Siamese, and traces of it appear in some of the vocabularies that have been collected of tribes on the frontier of China and Tibet, indicated by the fact that the numerals in such vocabularies in various instances show identity of origin in the essential part of the numeral, whilst a different aspect is given to the whole word by a variation in what appears to be the numeral-affix* (or what Mr. Brian Hodgson calls the 'servile affix'). The idiom exists in the principal vernaculars of China itself, and it is a transfer of this idiom from Chinese dialects to Pigeon-English which has produced the piecey, which in that quaint jargon seems to be used as the universal numerical affix ("Two piecey cooly," "three piecey dollar," &c.). This one pigeon phrase represents scores that are used in the vernaculars. For in some languages the system has taken what seems an extravagant development, which must form a great difficulty in the acquisition of colloquial use by foreigners. Some approximate statistics on this subject will be given below.

The idiom is found in Japanese and Corean, but it is in these cases possibly not indigenous, but an adoption from the Chinese. It is found in several languages of C. America, i.e. the Quiché of Guatemala, the Nahault of Mexico Proper; and in at least two other languages (Tep and Pirinda) of the same region. The following are given as the coefficients or determinatives chiefly used in the (Nahault or) Mexican. Compare them with the examples of Malay and Burmese usage already given:

Teti (a stone) used for roundish or cylindrical objects; e.g. eggs, beans, cacao beans, cherries, prickly-pears, Spanish loaves, &c., also for books, and fowls:

Pantli (?) for long rows of persons and things; also for walls and furrows:

Tlamantli (from mana, to spread on the ground), for shoes, dishes, basins, paper, &c., also for speeches and sermons:

Olotl (maize-grains) for ears of maize, cacao-pods, bananas: also for flint arrow-heads (see W. v. Humboldt, Kawi-Sprache, ii. 265).

I have, by the kind aid of my friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie, compiled a list of nearly fifty languages in which this curious idiom exists. But it takes up too much space to be inserted here. I may, however, give his statistics of the number of such determinatives, as assigned in the grammars of some of these languages. In Chinese vernaculars, from 33 in the Shanghai vernacular to 110 in that of Fuchau. In Corean, 12; in Japanese, 16; in Annamite, 106; in Siamese, 24; in Shan, 42; in Burmese, 40; in Malay and Javanese, 19.

If I am not mistaken, the propensity to give certain technical and appropriated titles to couples of certain beasts and birds, which had such an extensive development in old English sporting phraseology, and still partly survives, had its root in the same state of mind, viz. difficulty in grasping the idea of abstract numbers, and a dislike to their use. Some light to me was, many years ago, thrown upon this feeling, and on the origin of the idiom of which we have been speaking, by a passage in a modern book, which is the more noteworthy as the author does not make any reference to the existence of this idiom in any language, and possibly was not aware of it:

"On entering into conversation with the (Red) Indian, it becomes speedily apparent that he is unable to comprehend the idea of abstract numbers. They exist in his mind only as associated ideas. He has a distinct conception of five dogs or five deer, but he is so unaccustomed to the idea of number as a thing apart from specific objects, that I have tried in vain to get an Indian to admit that the idea of the number five, as associated in his mind with five dogs, is identical, as far as number is concerned, with that of five fingers."—(Wilson's Pre-historic Man, 1st ed. ii. 470.) [Also see Tylor, Primitive Culture, 2nd ed. i. 252 seqq.]

Thus it seems probable that the use of the numeral co-efficient, whether in the Malay idiom or in our old sporting phraseology, is a kind of survival of the effort to bridge the difficulty felt, in identifying abstract numbers as applied to different objects, by the introduction of a common concrete term.

Traces of a like tendency, though probably grown into a mere fashion and artificially developed, are common in Hindustani and Persian, especially in the official written style of munshis, who delight in what seemed to me, before my attention was called to the Indo-Chinese idiom, the wilful surplusage (e.g.) of two 'sheets' (fard) of letters, also used with quilts, carpets, &c.; three 'persons' (nafar) of barkdazes; five 'rope' (ras) of buffaloes; ten 'chains' (zanjir) of elephants; twenty 'greps' (kabza) of swords, &c. But I was not aware of the extent of the idiom in the munshi's repertory till I found it displayed in Mr. Carnegie's Kachahri Technicalities, under the head of Mahawara (Idioms or Phrases). Besides those just quoted, we there find 'udad ('number') used with coins, utensils, and sleeveless garments; daina ('grain') with pearls and coral beads; dast ('hand') with falcons, &c., shields, and robes of honour; jild ('volume, lit. 'skin') with books; mauhar ('nose-bit') with camels; kita ('portion, piecey') with precious stones, gardens, tanks, fields, letters; mansil ('a stage on a journey, an alighting place') with tents, boats, houses, carriages, beds, howdas, &c.; siz ('an instrument') with guitars, &c.; sulk ('thread') with necklaces of all sorts, &c. Several of these, with others purely Turkish, are used also in Osmanli Turkish.*

NUNCATIES, s. Rich cakes made by the Mahommedans in W. India chiefly imported into Bombay from Surat. [There is a Pers. word, nam-khatāî, 'bread of Cathay or China,' with which this word has been connected. But Mr. Weir, Collector of Surat, writes that it is really namkhatāî, Pers. nān, 'bread,' and Mahr. khat, shat, 'six'; meaning a special kind of cake composed of five ingredients—wheat-flour, eggs, sugar, butter or ghee, leaven produced from toddy or grain, and almonds.]

[1819. — "An old fashioned nath or nose-ring, stuck full of precious or false stones." — Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 284.

[1832. — "The nut (nose-ring) of gold wire, on which is strung a ruby between two pearls, worn only by married women." — Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Obsns. i. 45.]

NUT PROMOTION, s. From its supposed indigestible character, the kernel of the cashew-nut is so called in S. India, where, roasted and hot, it is a favourite dessert dish. [See Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 28.]

NUZZER, s. Hind. from Ar. nazār or nazar (prop. nakhdr), primarily 'a vow or votive offering'; but, in ordinary use, a ceremonial present, properly an offering from an inferior to a superior, the converse of inām. The root is the same as that of Nazavīte (Numbers, vi. 2).

[1765. — "The congratulatory nazirs, &c., shall be set opposite my ordinary expenses; and if ought remains, it shall go to Poplar, or some other hospital." — Letter of Lt. Clive, Sept. 30, in Verelst, View of Bengal, 127.]

* Some details on the subject of these determinatives, in reference to languages on the eastern border of India, will be found in Prof. Max Müller's letter to Bunsen in the latter's Outlines of the Phil. of Universal History, 1. 890 seqq.; as well as in W. von Humboldt, quoted above. Prof. Max Müller refers to Humboldt's Complete Works, vi. 402; but this I have not been able to find, nor, in either writer, any suggested rationale of the idiom.
OLD STRAIT, s. A coco-nut garden. The word is peculiar to Western India, and is a corruption of Port. orta (now more usually horta). "Any man's particular allotment of coco-nut trees in the groves at Mahim or Girgaum is spoken of as his oart." (Sir G. Birdwood).

1564.—"... e me praz de fazer merce a dita cidade emfatia para sempre que a ortalıça das ortas dos moradores Portuguezes o christiões que nesta cidade de Goa e ilha 18... possão vender..." &c.—Proclamation of Dom Sebastian, in Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. 2, 157.
c. 1610.—"Il y a vn grand nombre de Palmero ou orta, comme vous diriez ici de nos vergers, pleins d'arbres de Cocos, plantez bien pres à pres; mais ils ne viennent qu'es lieux aquatiques et bas..."—Pyrand de Lowal, ii. 17-18; [Hak. Soc. ii. 28].

1613.—"E os naturaes habitaõ ao longo do ryo de Malaca, em seus pomares e erthas..."—Galdinho de Eragia, 11.

1673.—"Old Goa... her Soil is luxurious and Campaign, and abounds with Rich Inhabitants, whose Rural Palaces are imured with Groves and Hortas..."—Pryer, 154.

[1749. — ... as well Vargens (Port. vargen, 'a field') lands as Hortas.—Letter in Logus, Malabar, iii. 48.]
c. 1760.—"As to the Oarts, or Coco-nut groves, they make the most considerable part of the landed property."—Grose, i. 47.

1793.—"For sale... That neat and commodious Dwelling House built by Mr. William Beal; it is situated in a most lovely Oart. ..."—Bombay Courrier, Jan. 12.

OBANG, s. Jap. Oh-o-ben, lit. 'greater division.' The name of a large oblong Japanese gold piece, similar to the kobang (q.v.), but of 10 times the value; 5 to 6 inches in length and 3 to 4 inches in width, with an average weight of 2564 gvs. troy. First issued in 1580, and last in 1860. Tavemrier has a representation of one.

[1662. — "A thousand Oebans of gold, which amount to forty seven thousand Thayls, or Crowns."—Mandelslo, E.T. Bk. ii. 147 (Stanf. Dict.).]
[1859.—"The largest gold coin known is the Obang, a most inconvenient circulating medium, as it is nearly six inches in length, and three inches in a half in breadth."—Elephant, Narrative of Mission, ii. 292.]

OLD STRAIT, n.p. This is an old name of the narrow strait between the island of Singapore and the mainland, which was the old passage followed by ships passing towards China, but has long been abandoned for the wider strait south of Singapore and north of Bintang. It is called by the Malays Salat Tambrav, from an edible fish called by the last name. It is the Strait of Singapura of some of the old navigators; whilst the wider southern strait was known as New Strait or Governor's Straits (q.v.).

1727.—"... Johore Lami, which is sometimes the Place of that King's Residence, and has the Benefit of a fine deep large River, which admits of two Entrances into it. The smallest is from the Westward, called by Europeaus the Straights of Singapore; but by the Natives Salleta de Breu" (i.e. Salat Tambrav, as above).—A. Hamilton, ii. 92; [ed. 1744].
1860.—"The Old Straits, through which formerly our Indiamen passed on their way to China, are from 1 to 2 miles in width, and except where a few clearings have been made... with the shores on both sides covered with dense jungle... doubtless, in old times, an isolated vessel... must have kept a good look out against attack from piratical prahus darting out from one of the numerous creeks."—Cavenough, Rem. of an Indian Official, 285-6.

OLLAH. s. Tam. ola, Mal. ola. A palm-leaf; but especially the leaf of the Palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis) as prepared for writing on, often, but incorrectly, termed cadjan (q.v.). In older books the term ola generally means a native letter; often, as in some cases below, a written order. A very good account of the royal scribes at Calicut, and their mode of writing, is given by Barbosa as follows:—

1516.—"The King of Calicut keeps many clerks constantly in his palace; they are all in one room, separate and far from the king, sitting on benches, and there they write all the affairs of the king's revenue, and his alms, and the pay which is given to all, and the complaints which are presented to the king, and, at the same time, the accounts of the collectors of taxes. All this is on broad stiff leaves of the palm-tree, without ink, with pens of iron; they write their letters in lines drawn like ours, and write in the same direction as we do. Each of these clerks has great bundles of these written leaves, and wherever they go they carry them under their arms, and the iron pen in their hands... and amongst these are 7 or 8 who are great confidants of the king, and men held in great honour, who always stand before him with their pens in their hand and a bundle of paper under their arm; and each of them has always several of these leaves in blank but signed at the top by the king, and when he commands them to despatch any business they write it on these leaves."—Pp. 110-111, Hak. Soc., but translation modified.

1538.—"All the Gentiles of India... when they wish to commit anything to written record, do it on certain palm-leaves which they call ola, of the breadth of two fingers."—Barros, i. ix. 3.

1561.—"All the rest of the town was of wood, thatched with a kind of palm-leaf, which they call ola."—Ibid. i. iv. vii.

1561.—"All this was written by the king's writer, whose business it is to prepare his olas, which are palm-leaves, which they use for writing-paper, scratching it with an iron point."—Correa, 212-213. Correa uses the word in three applications: (a) for a palm-leaf as just quoted; (b) for a palm-leaf letter; and (c) for (Coco) palm-leaf thatch.

1868.—"... in the Maldives Islands they make a kind of vessel which with its nails, its sails, and its cordage is all made of palm; with the fronds (which we call olla in Malavar) they cover houses and vessels."—Garcia, f. 67.

1586.—"I answered that I was from Venice, that my name was Gasparo Balbi... and that I brought the emeralds from Venice expressly to present to his majesty, whose fame for goodness, courtesy, and greatness flew through all the world... and all this was written down on an olla, and read by the aforesaid 'Master of the Word' to His Majesty."—G. Balbi, f. 104.

"But to show that he did this as a matter of justice, he sent a further order that nothing should be done till they received an olla, or letter of his sign manual written in letters of gold; and so he (the King of Pegü) ordered all the families of those nobles to be kept prisoners, even to the women big with child, and the infants in hands, and so he caused the whole of them to be led upon the said scaffolding; and then the king sent the olla, ordering them to be burnt; and the Decagini executed the order, and burned the whole of them."—Ibid. f. 112-113.

1598.—"Sayles which they make of the leaves which are called Olas."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 45.

1611.—"Two Ollahs, one to Gimpa Raya... "—Danaors, Letters, i. 154.

1628.—"The writing was on leaves of Palm, which they call Oilla."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 554.

1673.—"The houses are low, and thatched with olas of the Cocco-Tree."—Fryer, 66.

c. 1690.—"... Ola peculiariter Mahabari dicta, et inter alia Papyri loco adhibetur."—Rhumphius, i. 2.

1718.—"... Damulian Leaves, commonly called Oles."—Prop. of the Gospel, &c., ii. 37.

1760.—"He (King Alompra) said he would give orders for Olios to be made out for delivering of what Englishmen were in his Kingdom to me."—Capt. Alves, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 377.

1806.—"Many persons had their Ollahs in their hands, writing the sermon in Tamil shorthand."—Buchanan, Christian Res. 2nd ed. 70.

1860.—"The books of the Singhalese are formed to-day, as they have been for ages past, of olas, or strips taken from the young leaves of the Talipot or the Palmyra palm."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 512.

1870.—"... Un manuscrit sur olies..."—Revue Critique, June 11, 374.

OMEDWAUR. s. Hind. from Pers. ummedwâvar (ummed, umed, 'hope'); literally, therefore, 'a hopeful one'; i.e. "an expectant, a candidate for employment, one who awaits a favourable answer to some representation or request." (Wilson.)
1816.—"The thoughts of being three or four years an omeedwar, and of staying out here till fifty deterred me."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 344.

OMLAH. s. This is properly the Ar. pl. 'amalat, 'amalat, of 'amil (see AUMIL). It is applied on the Bengal side of India to the native officers, clerks, and other staff of a civil court or cutcherry (q.v.) collectively.

OLAH. c. 1778.—"I was at this place met by the Omlah or officers belonging to the establishment, who hailed my arrival in a variety of boats dressed out for the occasion."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 167.

1866.—"At the worst we will hint to the Omlahs to discover a fast which it is necessary they shall keep with great solemnity."—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 390.

The use of an English plural, omalahs, here is incorrect and unusual; though omrah is used (see next word).

1878.—"... the subordinate managers, young, inexperienced, and altogether in the hands of the Omlah."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 6.

OMRAH, s. This is properly, like the last word, an Ar. pl. (Umar, pl. of Amīr—see Ameer), and should be applied collectively to the higher officials at a Mahomedan Court, especially that of the Great Mogul. But in old European narratives it is used as a singular for a lord or grandee of that Court; and indeed in Hindustani the word was similarly used, for we have a Hind. plural umardhān, 'ourahs.' From the remarks and quotations of Blochmann, it would seem that Mans unabārs (see MUNSUB-DAR), from the commandant of 1000 upwards, were styled umara-i-kabār, or umara-i-'izām, 'Great Amirs;' and these would be the Omrah properly. Certain very high officials were styled Amīr-ul-Umarā (Ain, i. 239-240), a title used first at the Court of the Caliphs.

1616.—"Two Omrah who are great Commanders."—Sir T. Roe.

[ [], "The King lately sent out two Vmbrais with horse to fetch him in."—Ibid. Hak. Soc. ii. 417; in the same page he writes Vmreb, and in ii. 445, Vmraes.]

c. 1630.—"Howbeit, out of this prodigious rent, goes yearely many great payments: to his Lieutenants of Provinces, and Vmibrayes of Townes and Forts."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 55.

1638.—"Et sous le commandement de plusieurs autres seigneurs de ceux qu'il appelleOmmeraudes."—Mandelslo, Paris, 1659, p. 174.

1653.—"Il y a quantité d'elephants dans les Indes... les Omras s'en servent par grandeur."—De la Boullaye-le-Gon, ed. 1657, p. 250.

c. 1664.—"It is not to be thought that the Omrah, or Lords of the Mogul's Court, are sons of great Families, as in France... these Omrah then are commonly but Adventurers and Strangers of all sorts of Nations, some of them slaves; most of them without instruction, which the Mogul thus raiseth to Dignities as he thinks good, and degrades them again, as he pleaseth."—Bertié, E. T. 66; [ed. Constable, 211].

c. 1666.—"Les Omras sont les grand seigneurs du Royaume... qui sont pour la plupart Persans ou fils de Persans."—Thierry, v. 307.

1673.—"The President... has a Noise of Trumpets... an Horse of State led before him, a Mirchal (see MORGHAL) (a Fan of Ostrich Feathers) to keep off the Sun, as the Omrah or Great Men have."—Fryer, 86.

1676.—"Their standard, planted on the battlefield, Despair and death among the soldiers sent; You the bold Omrah tumbled from the wall, And shouts of victory pursued the fall."—Dryden, Aurungzebe, ii. 1.

1710.—"Donna Juliana... let the Heer Ambassador know... that the Emperor had ordered the Ammaras Enay Ullah Chan (K.) to take care of our interests."—Valentijn, iv. Surate, 254.

1727.—"You made several complaints against former Governors, all of which I have here from several of my Umbraes."—Firmān of Aurungzib, in A. Hamilton, ii. 227; [ed. 1744, i. 231].

1791.—"... les Omras ou grands seigneurs Indiens..."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaumière Indienne, 52.

OMUM WATER, s. A common domestic medicine in S. India, made from the strong-smelling carminative seeds of an umbelliferous plant, Carum copticum, Bent. (Ptychotis coptica, and Ptych. Ajowan of Decand), called, in Tamil omam, [which comes from the Skt. amanti, vyavani, in Hind. ajwān.] See Hanbury and Flückiger, 209.

OJOYNE, n.p. Ujjayyani, or, in the modern vernacular, Ujjain, one of the most ancient of Indian cities, and one of their seven sacred cities. It was the capital of King Vikramaditya, and was the first meridian of Hindu astronomers, from which they calculated their longitudes.
The name of Ujjain long led to a curious imbroglio in the interpretation of the Arabian geographers. Its meridian, as we have just mentioned, was the zero of longitude among the Hindus. The Arab writers borrowing from the Hindus wrote the name apparently Azīn, but this by the mere omission of a diacritical point became Arīn, and from the Arabs passed to medieval Christian geographers as the name of an imaginary point on the equator, the intersection of the central meridian with that circle. Further, this point, or transposed city, had probably been represented on maps, as we often see cities on medieval maps, by a cupola or the like. And hence the “Cupola of Arīn or Arym,” or the “Cupola of the Earth” (Al-kubba al-ardh) became an established commonplace for centuries in geographical tables or statements. The idea was that just 180° of the earth’s circumference was habitable, or at any rate cognizable as such, and this meridian of Arīn bisected this habitable hemisphere. But as the western limit extended to the Fortunate Isles, it became manifest to the Arabs that the central meridian could not be so far east as the Hindu meridian of Arīn (or of Lanka, i.e. Ceylon). (See quotation from the Aryabhatta, under JAVA.) They therefore shifted it westward, but shifted the mystic Arīn along the equator westward also. We find also among medieval European students (as with Roger Bacon, below), a confusion between Arīn and Syene. This Reinaud supposes to have arisen from the ‘EssaVA έμπιστον of Ptolemy, a place which he locates on the Zanzibar coast, and approximating to the shifted position of Arīn. But it is perhaps more likely that the confusion arose from some survival of the real name Azīn. Many conjectures were mainly made as to the origin of Arym, and M. Sedillot was very positive that nothing more could be learned of it than he had been able to learn. But the late M. Reinaud completely solved the mystery by pointing out that Arīn was simply a corruption of Ujjain. Even in Arabic the mistake had been thoroughly ingrained, insomuch that the word Arīn had been adopted as a generic name for a place of medium temperature or qualities (see Jorfiānī, quoted below).

OOOLOOBALLONG, s. Malay, Ulubalang, a chosen warrior, a champion. [Mr. Skeat notes: "hulu or ulu certainly means 'head,' especially the head of a Raja, and balang probably means 'people'; hence ulu-balang, 'men of the head,' or 'body-guard.']
c. 1546.—"Four of twelve gates that were in the Town were opened, thorough each of the which sailed forth one of the four Captains with his company, having first sent out for Spies into the Camp six Orobalons of the most valiant that were about the King. . . ."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 260.

OOPLEH, s. Cow dung patted into cakes, and dried and stacked for fuel. Hind. upleo. It is in S. India called bratty (q.v.).
1672.—"The allowance of cowdung and wood was—for every basket of cowdung, 2 cakes for the Gentu Pagoda; for Peddi-nagg the watchman, of every basket of cowdung, 5 cakes."—Orders at Ft. St. Geo., Notes and Ects. i. 56.

[Another name for the fuel is kandê.
[1804.—". . . small flat cakes of cow-dung, mixed with a little chopped straw and water, and dried in the sun, are used for fuel; they are called kundhas . . ."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 158.]
This fuel which is also common in Egypt and Western Asia, appears to have been not unknown even in England a century ago, thus:—
1789.—"We rode about 20 miles that day (near Woburn), the country . . . is very open, with little or no wood. They have even less fuel than we (i.e. in Scotland), and the poor burn cow-dung, which they scrape off the ground, and set up to burn as we do divots (i.e. turf)."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 301.
1863.—A passage in Mr. Marsh's Man and Nature, p. 242, contains a similar fact in reference to the practice, in consequence of the absence of wood, in France between Grenoble and Briançon.

[For the use of this fuel, in Tartary under the name of argols, see Huc, Travels, 2nd ed. i. 23. Numerous examples of its use are collected in 8 ser. Notes and Queries, iv. 226, 277, 377, 417.]

OORDOO, s. The Hindustani language. The (Turki) word urdstit means properly the camp of a Tartar Khan, and is, in another direction, the original of our word horde (Russian ordu), [which, according to Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 30, note), "is now commonly used by the Russian soldiers and Cossacks in a very amusing manner as a contemptuous term for an Asiatic"]). The 'Golden Horde' upon the Volga was not properly (pace Littré) the name of a tribe of Tartars, as is often supposed, but was the style of the Royal Camp, eventually Palace, of the Khans of the House of Batu at Sarai. Horde is said by Pihan, quoted by Dozy (Oosterl. 43) to have been introduced into French by Voltaire in his Orphelin de la Chine. But Littré quotes it as used in the 16th century. Urdu is now used in Turkistan, e.g. at Tashkend, Khokhand, &c., for a 'citadel' (Schweyler, loc. cit. i. 30). The word urdă, in the sense of a royal camp, came into India probably with Baber, and the royal residence at Delhi was styled urdă-i-mu'alla, 'the Sublime Camp.' The mixt language which grew up in the court and camp was called zabān-i-urdă, 'the Camp Language,' and hence we have elliptically Urdu. On the Peshawar frontier the word urdă is still in frequent use as applied to the camp of a field-force.

OORIAL, Pauj. urul, Ovis cycloceros, Hutton. [Ovis vignei, Blanford (Mammalia, 497), also called the Shad;] the wild sheep of the Salt Range and Sulimâni Mountains.

OORIYA, n.p. The adjective ‘pertaining to Orissa’ (native, language, what not); Hind. Urda. The proper name of the country is Odra-desa, and Or-desa, whence Oriya and Ur-iya. [The Ooryah bearers were an old institution in Calculutta, as in former days palankeens were chiefly used. From a computation made in 1776, it is stated that they were in the habit of carrying to their homes every year sums of money sometimes at much as three lakhs made by their business (Carey, Good Old Days of Honble. John Company, ii. 148).]

OOTACAMUND, n.p. The chief station in the Neilgherry Hills, and the summer residence of the Governor of Madras. The word is a corruption of the Badaga name of the site of 'Stone-house,' the first European house erected in those hills, properly Hottaga-mand (see Metz, Tribes of the Neelgherries, 6). [Mr. Grigg (Man. of the Nilagiris, 6, 189), followed by the Madras Gloss., gives* Tam. Ottagaimandu, from Can. ottai, 'dwarf bamboo,' Tam. kay, 'fruit,' mandu, 'a Toda village. ']

OPAL, s. This word is certainly of Indian origin: Lat. opalus, Greek δράλως, Skt. upała, 'a stone.' The European word seems first to occur in Pliny. We do not know how the Skt. word received this specific meaning, but there are many analogous cases.

OPIUM. s. This word is in origin Greek, not Oriental. [The etymology accepted by Platts, Skt. ahiphena, 'snake venom' is not probable.] But from the Greek φυύν the Arabs took afjân, which has sometimes reacted on old spellings of the word. The collection of the ὀπίῳ, or juice of the poppy-capsules, is mentioned by Dioscorides (c. A.D. 77), and Pliny gives a pretty full account of the drug as opium (see Hanbury and Flüeigleger, 40). The Opium-poppy was introduced into China, from Arabia, at the beginning of the 9th century, and its earliest Chinese name is 阿富英, a representation of the Arabic name. The Arab ṣaffa is sometimes corruptly called affin, of which affin, 'imbecue,' is a popular etymology. Similarly the Bengaleses derive it from ṣaffin, 'serpent-home.' [A number of early references to opium smoking have been collected by Burnell, Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 113.]

1568.—"I went then to Cambaya... and there I bought 60 parcels of Opium, which cost me two thousand and a hundreth dukets, every duket at foure shillings two pence."—Master C. Frederike, in Halk. ii. 871. The original runs thus, showing the looseness of the translation: "... compral sessanta man d'Afion, che mi costò 2100 ducati seminari (see XERAFINE), che a nostro conto possiamo valere 5 lire l'uno."—In Rannusio, iii. 396e.

1770.—"Patna... is the most celebrated place in the world for the cultivation of opium. Besides what is carried into the inland parts, there are annually 3 or 4000 chests exported, each weighing 300 lbs... An excessive fondness for opium prevails in all the countries to the east of India. The Chinese emperors have suppressed it in their dominions, by condemning to the flames every vessel that imports this species of poison."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 424.

ORANGE, s. A good example of plausible but entirely incorrect etymology is that of orange from Lat. aurantium. The latter word is in fact an ingenious medieval fabrication. The word doubtless came from the Arab. nārānj, which is again a form of Pers. nārāng, or nārangi, the latter being still a common term for the orange in Hindustan. The Persian indeed may be traced to Skt. nāgaraṅga, and nārāṅga, but of these words no satisfactory etymological explanation has been given, and they have perhaps been Sanscritized from some southern term. Sir W. Jones, in his article on the Spikenard of the Ancients, quotes from Dr. Anderson of Madras, "a very curious philological remark, that in the Tamil dictionary, most words beginning with nar have some relation to fragrance; as narukerau, to yield an odour; nārtum pillei, lemon-grass; nārti, citron; nārta manum (read mārum), the wild orange-tree; nārum panei, the Indian jasmine; nārum alleri, a strong smelling flower; and nārtu, which is put for nard in the Tamil version of our scriptures." (See As. Res. vol. ii. 414.) We have not been able to verify many of these Tamil terms. But it is true that in both Tamil and Malayalam naru is 'fragrant.' See, also, on the subject of this article, A. E. Pott, in Lassen's Zeitschrift f. d. Kunde des Morgenlandes, vii. 114 seq.

The native country of the orange is believed to be somewhere on the northern border of India. A wild orange, the supposed parent of the cultivated species, both sweet and bitter, occurs in Garhwal and Sikkim, as well as in the Kásia (see COSSYA) country, the valleys of which last are still abundantly productive of excellent oranges. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 336 seq.] It is believed that the orange first known and cultivated in Europe was the bitter or Seville orange (see Honby and Flüchiger, 111-112).

From the Arabic, Byzantine Greek got ῥαδρίτζαν, the Spaniards narango, old Italian narancia, the Portuguese larança, from which last, or some similar form, by the easy detachment of the l (taken probably, as in many other instances, for an article), we have the Ital. arancia, L. Latin aurantium, French orange, the modification of these two being shaped by aurum and or. Indeed, the quotation from Jacques de Vitry possibly indicates that some form like al-arangi may have been current in Syria. Perhaps, however, his phrase ab indigenis nuncupantur may refer only to the Frank or quasi-Frank settlers, in which case we should have among them the birthplace of our word in its present form. The reference to this passage we derived in the first place from Helnh, who gives a most interesting history of the introduction of the various species of citrus into Europe. But we can hardly think he is right in supposing that the Portuguese first brought the sweet orange (Citrus aurantium dulce) into Europe from China, c. 1548. No doubt there may have been a re-introduction of some fine varieties at that time.* But as early as the beginning of the 14th century we find Abulfeda extolling the fruit of Cintra. His words, as rendered by M. Reinaud, run: "Au nombre des dependances de Lisbonne est la ville de Schintara; à Schintara on recueille des pommes admirables pour la grosseur et le gout." (244 f). That these pommes were the famous Cintra oranges can hardly be

* There seems to have been great oscillation of traffic in this matter. About 1673, one of the present writers, then resident at Palermo, sent, in compliance with a request from Labors, a collection of plants of many (about forty) varieties of citrus cultivated in Sicily, for introduction into the Punjab. This despatch was much aided by the kindness of Prof. Todaro, in charge of the Royal Botanic Garden at Palermo.

doubted. For Baber (Autobiog. 328) describes an orange under the name of Sangtarah, which is, indeed, a recognised Persian and Hind. word for a species of the fruit. And this early propagation of the sweet orange in Portugal would account not only for such wide diffusion of the name of Cntra, but for the persistence with which the alternative name of Portugals has adhered to the fruit in question. The familiar name of the large sweet orange in Sicily and Italy is portogallo, and nothing else; in Greece τορτογάλα, in Albanian protokale, among the Kurds portoghâl; whilst even colloquial Arabic has burtukân. The testimony of Maš'ūdi as to the introduction of the orange into Syria before his time (c. A.D. 930), even if that were (as it would seem) the Seville orange, renders it quite possible that better qualities should have reached Lisbon or been developed there during the Saracen occupation. It was indeed suggested in our hearing by the late Sir Henry M. Elliot that sangtarah might be interpreted as sang-tar, 'green stones' (or in fact 'moist pips'); but we hardly think he would have started this had the passage in Abulfeda been brought to his notice. [In the Aín (ed. Gladwin, 1800, ii. 20) we read: 'Sircar Silhet. . . . Here grows a delicious fruit called Soontara, in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form.' This passage reads in Col. Jarrett's translation (ii. 124): 'There is a fruit called Sántarâh in colour like an orange but large and very sweet.' Col. Jarrett disputes the derivation of Sangtarah from Cntra, and he is followed by Mr. H. Beveridge, who remarks that Humayun calls the fruit Sanatra. Mr. Beveridge is inclined to think that Santra is the Indian hill name of the fruit, of which Sangtarah is a corruption, and refers to a village at the foot of the Bhutan Hills called Santra-bârî, because it had orange groves.]

A.D. c. 930.—"The same may be said of the orange-tree (Shajr-ul-nâranj) and of the round citron, which were brought from India after the year (A.H.) 300, and first sown in 'Omam. Thence they were transplanted to Basra, to 'Irâk, and to Syria . . . but they lost the sweet and penetrating odour and beauty that they had in India, having no longer the benefits of the climate, soil, and water peculiar to that country."—Mas'ūdi, ii. 433-9.

c. 1220.—"In parvis arboribus quaedam crescentia alia poma citrina, minornis quantitatis frigida et acidi seu pontici (bitter) saporis, quae poma orangeres ab indigenis nuncupatur."—Jacobus Vitriacus, in Bongars. These were apparently our Seville oranges.

c. 1290.—"In the 18th of Edward the first a large Spanish ship came to Portsmouth; out of the cargo of which the Queen bought one frail (see FRAZÂLA) of Seville figs, one frail of raisins or grapes, one bale of dates, two hundred and thirty pomegranates, fifteen citrons, and seven oranges (Poma de orange)."—Manners and Household Expenses of England in the 13th and 15th Centuries, Roxb. Club, 1841, p. xlviii. The Editor deigns only to say that 'the MS. is in the Tower.' [Prof. Skeat writes (9 ser. Notes and Queries, v. 321): 'The only known allusion to oranges, previously to 1400, in any piece of English literature (I own, a household document) is in the 'Alliterative Poems,' edited by Dr. Morris, ii. 1044. The next reference, soon after 1400, is in Lydgate's 'Minor Poems,' ed. Halliwell, p. 15. In 1440 we find orange in the Promptorium Parvulorum, and in 1470 we find orænges in the 'Paston Letters,' ed. Gairdner, ii. 394.]

1481.—"Item to the galeman (galley man) brought the lampreas and oranges . . . illijd."—Household Book of John D. of Norfolk, Roxb. Club, 1844, p. 38.

c. 1526.—"They have besides (in India) the nàrânj [or Seville orange, Tr.] and the various fruits of the orange species . . . It always struck me that the word nàrânj was accented in the Arab fashion; and I found that it really was so; the men of Bajour and Siwâd call náránj nárânt] (or perhaps rather nàrâng).—Baber, 328. In this passage Baber means apparently to say that the right name was nàrânj, which had been changed by the usual influence of Arabic pronunciation into nàrânj.

1888.—"Sometimes the foreign products thus cast up (on Shetland) at their doors were a new revelation to the islanders, as when a cargo of oranges was washed ashore on the coast of Delting, the natives boiled them as a new kind of potatoes."—Saty. Review, July 14, p. 57.

ORANG-OTAN, ORANG-OUTAN, &c. s. The great man-like ape of Sumatra and Borneo; Simiis Satyrus, L. This name was first used by Bontius (see below). It is Malay, orâng-âlin, 'homo sylvaticus.' The proper name of the animal in Borneo is mias. Crawford says that it is never called orang-utan by 'the natives.' But that excellent writer is often too positive—especially in his negatives! Even if it be not (as is probable) anywhere a recognised specific name, it is hardly possible that the name should not be sometimes applied popularly. We remember a tane hooluck belonging to a gentleman in E. Bengal, which was habitually known to the natives as jangli adini, literally = orang-utan. [There seems reason to believe that Crawford was right after all. Mr. Scott (Malayan Words in English, p. 87) writes: “But this particular application of orang utan to the ape does not appear to be, or ever to have been, familiar to the Malays generally; Crawford (1852) and Swettenham (1889) omit it, Pijnappel says it is ‘Low Malay,’ and Klinkert (1893) denies the use entirely. This uncertainty is explained by the limited area in which the animal exists within even native observation. Mr. Wallace could find no natives in Sumatra who ‘had ever heard of such an animal,’ and no ‘Dutch officials who knew anything about it.’ Then the name came to European knowledge more than 260 years ago; in which time probably more than one Malay name has faded out of general use or wholly disappeared, and many other things have happened.” Mr. Skeat writes: “I believe Crawford is absolutely right in saying that it is never called orang-utan by the natives. It is much more likely to have been a sailor’s mistake or joke than an error on the part of the Malays who know better. Throughout the Peninsula orang-utan is the name applied to the wild tribes, and though the mawas or minas is known to the Malays only by tradition, yet in tradition the two are never confused, and in those islands where the mawas does exist he is never called orang-utan, the word orang being reserved exclusively to describe the human species.”]

ORANKAY, ARANGKAIO, &c. 3. Malay Orang kaya. In the Archipelago, a person of distinction, a chief or noble, corresponding to the Indian omrah; literally ‘a rich man,’ analogous therefore to the use of riche-homme by Joinville and other old French authors. [Mr. Skeat notes that the terminal o in arangkaio represents a dialectical form used in Sumatra and Java. ORMUS, ORMUZ, n.p. Properly Hurmuw or Hurmūz, a famous maritime city and minor kingdom near the mouth of the Persian Gulf. The original place of the city was on the northern shore of the Gulf, some 30 miles east of the site of Bandar Abbās or Gombroon (q.v.); but about A.D. 1300, apparently to escape from Tartar raids, it was transferred to the small island of Gerūn or Jerūn, which may be identified with the Organa of Nearculus, about 12 m. westward, and five miles from the shore, and this was the seat of the kingdom when first visited and attacked by the Portuguese under Albuquerque in 1506. It was taken by them about 1515, and occupied permanently (though the nominal reign of the native kings was maintained), until wrested from them by Shāh ʿAbbās, with the assistance of an English squadron from Surat, in 1622. The place was destroyed by the Persians, and the island has since remained desolate, and all but uninhabited, though the Portuguese citadel and water-tanks remain. The islands of Hormuz, Kismh, &c., as well as Bandar 'Abbās and other ports on the coast of Kerman, had been held by the Sultans of Omān as fiefs of Persia, for upwards of a century, when in 1854 the latter State asserted its dominion, and occupied those places in force (see Badger's Imams of Omān, &c., p. xciv.).

ORMBUS, ORMUZ. 646

s. This odd word seems to have been used as griffin (q.v.) now is. It is evidently the Malay orang-baharu, or orang bharu, 'a new man, a novice.' This is interesting as showing an unquestionable instance of an expression imported from the Malay factories to Continental India. [Mr. Skeat remarks that the form of the word shows that it came from the Malay under Portuguese influence.]
ORTOLAN, s. This name is applied by Europeans in India to a small lark, Calandrella brachyptactyla, Tenm., in Hind. bargit and bagret, [Skt. varga, 'a troop']. Also sometimes in S. India to the finch-lark, Pyrrhalaua grisea, Scopoli.

OTTA, OTTER, s. Corruption of attā, 'flour,' a Hindi word having no Skt. original; but Platts gives Skt. ārdra, 'soft'. Popular rhyme:

"At terti Shekhawati Ādha attā ādha mati!"

"Confounded this Shekhawati land,
My bread's half wheat-meal and half sand."

Boileau, Tour through Rajpura, 1857, p. 274.

[1853.—"After travelling three days, one of the prisoners bought some ottah. They prepared bread, some of which was given him; after eating it he became insensible. . . ."—Law Report, in Cheved, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 166.]

OTTO, OTTER, s. Or usually 'Otto of Roses;' or by imperfect purists 'Attar of Roses,' an essential oil obtained in India from the petals of the flower, a manufacture of which the chief seat is at Ghāzipur on the Ganges. The word is the Arab. 'itr, 'perfume.' From this word are derived 'attār, a 'perfumer or druggist,' attārī, adj., 'pertaining to a perfumer.' And a relic of Saracen rule in Palermo is the Via Litterini, 'the street of the perfumers' shops.' We find the same in an old Spanish account of Fez:

1673.—"Issuing thence to the Câyzerie by a gate which faces the north there is a handsome street which is called of the Atarim, which is the Spicery.'—Marmol, Africa, ii. 1. 98.

'[itr of roses is said to have been discovered by the Empress Nūr-jahān on her marriage with Jahāngīr. A canal in the palace garden was filled with rose-water in honour of the event, and the princess, observing a scum on the surface, caused it to be collected, and found it to be of admirable fragrance, whence it was called 'itr-i-jahangīr."

1711.—At Madras . . . "refreshments for the Men, which they are presently supply'ed with from Country Boats and Cattamarans, who make a good Pony at the first coming of Orombarros, as they call those who have not been there before."—Lockyer, 28.

OUDH, OUDE, n.p. Awadh; properly the ancient and holy city of Ayodhya (Skt. 'not to be warred against'), the capital of Rāma, on the right bank of the river Sarayu, now commonly called the Gogra. Also the province in which Ayodhya was situated, but of which Lucknow for about 170 years (from c. 1732) has been the capital, as that of the dynasty of the Nawabs, and from 1814 kings, of Oudh. Oudh was annexed to the British Empire in 1856 as a Chief Commissionership. This was re-established after the Mutiny was subdued and the country reconquered, in 1858. In 1877 the Chief Commissionership was united to the Lieut.-Governorship of the N.W. Provinces. (See JUDEA.)

B. C. a.—"The noble city of Ayodhya crowned with a royal highway had already cleaned and besprinkled all its streets, and spread its broad banners. Women, children, and all the dwellers in the city eagerly looking for the consecration of Rāma, waited with impatience the rising of the morrow's sun.'—Rāmāyana, Bk. iii. (Ayodhya Kanda), ch. 3.

636. —"Departing from this Kingdom (Kanyākhija or Kanauja) he (Hwen T'sang) travelled about 600 li to the S.E., crossed the Ganges, and then taking his course southerly he arrived at the kingdom of 'Oyut'o (Ayōdhyā)."—Pēlerins Boudah, ii. 267.

1255.—"A peremptory command had been issued that Malik Kutbugh Khan . . . should leave the province of Awadh, and proceed to the fie of Bharāj, and he had not obeyed. . . ."—Tabakat-i-Nasirī, E.T. by Raverty, 107.

c. 1335.— "The territories to the west of the Ganges, and where the Sultan himself lived, were afflicted by famine, whilst those to the east of it enjoyed great plenty. These latter were then governed by 'Ain-ul-Mulk . . . and among their chief towns we may name the city of Awadh, and the city of Zafarabad and the city of Laknaû, et cetera." — Ibn Batûta, iii. 342.

c. 1340.— The 23 principal provinces of India under Mahommed Tughblak are thus stated, on the authority of Sirâjuddîn Abû-l-fatah Oam, a native of *Awadh: "(1) Al-kûn Dîhâ, (2) Mutlûn, (3) Kâhvân (Guhâm), and (4) Sâmûn (both about Sîrhind), (5) Siwâstân (Sewhân in Sind), (6) Wâjû (Ujâ, i.e. Úch), (7) Hâis (Hânis), (8) Sarâtî (Sirâs), (9) Mârîr (Coromandel), (10) Tilîng (Kalinga), (11) Gojûrât, (12) Baddûn, (13) *Awadh, (14) Kowsoû, (15) Kalâñwût (i.e. Bengal), (16) Bahûd, (17) Karra (Lower Doabh), (18) Malâswâ (Malwa), (19) Lakhûvâr (Lahore), (20) Kalanârû (E. Punjab), (21) Jângâvâr (Orissa), (22) Tîlîng (f), (23) Dersuamand (Mysore)."—Shiâhûdûdîn, in Notices et Extra. xiii. 167-171.

OUTCRY, s. Auction. This term seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England. (See NEELAM). The old Italian expression for auction seems to be identical in sense, viz. gridaggio, and the auctioneer gridatore, thus:

c. 1343.— "For jewels and plate; and (other) merchandise that is sold by outcry (gridaggio), i.e. by auction (onceante) in Cyprus, the buyer pays the crier (gridatore) one quarter carat per bezant on the price bids for the thing bought through the crier, and the seller pays nothing except," &c. — Pegolotti, 74.

1787.— "Having put up the Madras Galley at Outcry and nobody offering more for her than 2300 Rupees, we think it more for the Company's Int. to make a Sloop of Her than let Her go at so low a price." — Pt. William M.S. Reports, March.

1841.— "When a man dies in India, we make short work with him; . . . an outcry is held, his goods and chattels are brought to the hammer. . . ."— Society in India, ii. 227.

OVERLAND. Specifically applied to the Mediterranean route to India, which in former days involved usually the land journey from Antioc or thereabouts to the Persian Gulf; and still in voyage, though any land journey may now be entirely dispensed with, thanks to M. Lesseps.

1612.— "His Catholic Majesty the King Philip III. of Spain and II. of Portugal, our King and Lord, having appointed Dom Hieronymo de Azvedo to succeed Ruy Lourenço de Tavira . . . in January 1612 ordered that a courier should be despatched overland (por terru) to this Government to carry these orders and he, arriving at Ormuz at the head of May following. . . . —Boccali, Decada, p. 7.

1629.— "The news of his Exploits and Death being brought together to King Philip the Fourth, he writes with his own hand as follows. Considering the two Pins that were fitting for India may be gone without an account of my Concern for the Death of Nunno Alvarez Botello, an Express shall immediately be sent by Land with advice." — Faria y Sousa (Stevens), iii. 373.

1673.— "French and Dutch Jewellers coming overland . . . have made good Purchase by buying Jewels here, and carrying them to Europe to Cut and Set, and returning thence sell them here to the Ombrâhs (see OMAH), among whom were Monsieur Tavernier. . . . — Fryer, 89.

1675.— "Our last to you was dated the 17th August past, overland, transcripts of which we herewith send you."—Letter from Court to Pt. St. Geo. In Notes and Exts. No. i. p. 5.

1676.— "Docket Copy of the Company's General Overland. . . . Our Agent and Council Fort St. George. . . . "

1684.— "That all endeavors would be used to prevent my going home the way I intended, by Persia, and so overland."— Hedges, Diary, Aug. 19; [Hak. Soc. i. 155].

c. 1686.— "Those Gentlemen's Friends in the Committee of the Company in England, acquainted them by Letters over Land, of the Danger they were in, and gave them Warning to be on their guard." — A. Hamilton, i. 196; [ed. 1744, i. 196].

1737.— "Though so far apart that we can only receive letters from Europe once a year, while it takes 18 months to get an answer, we Europeans get news almost every year over land by Constantinople, through Arabia or Persia. . . . A few days ago we received the news of the Peace in Europe; of the death of Prince Eugene; of the marriage of the P. of Wales with the Princess of Saxe-Gotha.

1763.—"We have received Overland the news of the taking of Hawannah and the Spanish Fleet, as well as the defeat of the Spaniards in Portugal. We must surely make an advantageous Peace, however I'm no Politician."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, June 1, fr. Madras.

1774.—"Les Marchands á Bengale envoyèrent un Vaisseau á Suez en 1772, mais il fut endommagé dans le Golfe de Bengale, et obligé de retourner; en 1773 le Sr. Holford entreprit encore ce voyage, réussit cette fois, et fut ainsi le premier Anglois qui eut conduit un vaisseau á Suez... On s'est déjà servi plusieurs fois de cette route comme d'un chemin de poste; car le Gouvernement actuel des Indes a complètement dans des cas d'importance ses Courriers par Suez en Angleterre, et peut presqu'avoir plutôt reponse de Londres que leurs lettres ne peuvent venir en Europe par le Chemin ordinaire du tour du Cap de bonne esperance."—Niedrkr, Voyage, ii. 10.

1776.—"We had advices long ago from England, as late as the end of May, by way of Suez. This is a new Route opened by Govr. Hastings, and the Letters which left Marseilles the 3rd June arrived here the 20th August. This, you'll allow, is a ready communication with Europe, and may be kept open at all times, if we chuse to take a little pains."—MS. Letter from James Rennell, Oct. 16, "from Islamabad, capital of Chittagong."

1781.—"On Monday last was Married Mr. George Greenley to Mrs. Anne Barrington, relict of the late Capt. William B—, who unfortunately perished on the Desart, in the attack that was made on the Carravan of Bengal Goods under his and the other Gentlemen's care between Suez and Grand Cairo."—India Gazette, March 7.

1782.—"When you left England with an intention to pass overland and by the route of the Red Sea into India, did you not know that no subject of these kingdoms can lawfully reside in India... without the permission of the United Company of Merchants?..."—Price, Tracts, i. 130.

1783.—"... Mr. Paul Benfield, a gentleman whose means of intelligence were known to be both extensive and expeditions, publicly declared, from motives the most benevolent, that he had just received overland from England certain information that Great Britain had finally concluded a peace with all the belligerent powers in Europe."

—Murray's Narrative, 317.

1786.—"The packet that was coming to us overland, and that left England in July, was cut off by the wild Arabs between Aleppo and Bussora."—Lord Cornwallis, Dec. 28, in Correspondence, &c. i. 217.

1789.—"Ext. of a letter from Poonama ee, dated 7th June. 'The dispatch by way of Suez has put us all in a commotion.'—Bombay Courier, June 29.

OVIDORE, s Port. Ouvidor, i.e. 'auditor,' an official constantly mentioned in the histories of Portuguese India. But the term is also applied in an English quotation below to certain Burmese officials, an application which must have been adopted from the Portuguese. It is in this case probably the translation of a Burmese designation, perhaps of Nehkan-daw, 'Royal Ear,' which is the title of certain Court officers.

1500.—"The Captain-Major (at Melinde) sent on board all the ships to beg that no one when ashore would in any way misbehave or produce a scandal; any such offence would be severely punished. And he ordered the mariners of the ships to land, and his own Provost of the force, with an Ouvidor that he had on board, that they might keep an eye on our people to prevent mischief."—Correa, i. 185.

1597.—"And the Viceroy ordered the Ouvidor General to hold an inquiry on this matter, on which the truth came out clearly that the Holy Apostle (Sanetiago) showed himself to the Moors when they were fighting with our people, and of this he sent word to the King, telling him that such martyrs were the men who were serving in these parts that our Lord took thought of them and sent them a Helper from Heaven."—Ibid. i. 717.

1698.—(At Syriam). "Ovidores (Persons appointed to take notice of all passages in the Runaday [office of administration] and advise them to Ava... Three Ovidores that always attend the Runaday, and are sent to the King, upon errands, as occasion obliges."—Fleetwood's Diary, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 355, 360.

[OWL. s. Hind. aul, 'any great calamity, as a plague, cholera,' &c.

1787.—"At the foot of the hills the country is called Teriani (see TERA) and people in their passage catch a disorder, called in the language of that country aul, which is a putrid fever, and of which the generality of persons who are attacked with it die in a few days. ..."—Asiat. Res. ii. 307.

1816.—"... rain brings alone with it the local malady called the Owl, so much dreaded in the woods and valleys of Nepal."

—Asiatic Journal, ii. 405.
PADDY. 650  PADDY-FIELD.

1858.—"I have known European officers, who were never conscious of having drunk either of the waters above described, take the fever (owl) in the month of May in the Tanaré."—Steeman, Journey in Oudh, ii. 103.

PADDY, s. Rice in the husk; but the word is also, at least in composition, applied to growing rice. The word appears to have in some measure, a double origin.

There is a word batty (see Batta) used by some writers on the west coast of India, which has probably helped to propagate our uses of paddy. This seems to be the Canarese batta or bhatta, ‘rice in the husk,’ which is also found in Mahr, as bhatt with the same sense, a word again which in Hind. is applied to ‘cooked rice.’ The last meaning is that of S. bhakti, which is perhaps the original of all these forms.

But in Malay padi [according to Mr. Skeat, usually pronounced pâdi] Javan. pāri, is ‘rice in the straw. And the direct parentage of the word in India is thus apparently due to the Archipelago; arising probably out of the old importance of the export trade of rice from Java (see Raffles, Java, i. 239-240, and Crawfurd’s Hist. iii. 345, and Descript. Dict., 368). Crawfurd, (Journ. Ind. Arch., iv. 187) seems to think that the Malayo-Javanese word may have come from India with the Portuguese. But this is impossible, for as he himself has shown (Desc. Dict., u. s), the word pāri, more or less modified, exists in all the chief tongues of the Archipelago, and even in Madagascar, the connection of which last with the Malay regions certainly was long prior to the arrival of the Portuguese.

1580.—"Certeine Words of the naturall language of Java. . . Paree, ryce in the huske."—Sir F. Drake’s Voyage, in Hakl. iv. 246.

1598.—"There are also divers other kinds of Rice, of a lesse price, and slighter than the other Ryce, and is called Batte . . ."—Linschoten, 79; [Hak. Soc. i. 246].

1600.—"In the fields is such a quantity of rice, which they call bate, that it gives its name to the kingdom of Calou, which is called on that account Batesalou."—Lucena, Vida do Padre F. Xavier, 121.

1615.—". . . oryzae quoque agri fercaces quam Batum incolae dicunt."—Jurrio, Theaurus, i. 461.

1673.—"The Ground between this and the great Broach is well ploughed, and bears good Battie."—Fryer, ed. 67, see also 125. But in the Index he has Paddy.

1798.—"The pddie which is the name given to the rice, whilst in the husk, does not grow . . . in compact ears, but like oats, in loose spikes."—Slovacus, tr. i. 231.

1837.—"Parrots brought 900,000 loads of hill-paddy daily, from the marshes of Chandatta,—nice husking the hill-paddy, without breaking it, converted it into rice."—Toursur’s Mahawanso, 22.

1871.—"In Ireland Paddy makes riots, in Bengal raiyats make paddy; and in this lies the difference between the paddy of green Bengal, and the Paddy of the Emerald Isle."—Gowndi Samanta, ii. 25.

1878.—"Il est établi un droit sur les riz et les paddys exportés de la colonie, excepté pour le Cambodge par la voie du fleuve."—Courrier de Saigon, Sept. 20.

PADDY-BIRD, s. The name commonly given by Europeans to certain baser species of the family Ardeidae or Herons, which are common in the rice-fields, close in the wake of grazing cattle. Jerdon gives it as the European’s name for the Ardea leucoptera, Boddaert, andha baqla (‘blind heron’) of the Hindus, a bird which is more or less coloured. But in Bengal, if we are not mistaken, it is more commonly applied to the pure white bird—Herodias alba, L., or Ardea Torra, Buch. Ham., and Herodias egrettoides, Temminck, or Ardea putea, Buch. Ham.

1727.—"They have also Store of wild Fowl; but who have a Mind to eat them must shoot them. Flamingoes are large and good Meat. The Paddy-bird is also good in their season."—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 162-3].

1868.—"The most common bird (in Formosa) was undoubtedly the Padi bird, a species of Heron (Ardea prasinocotes), which was constantly flying across the padi, or rice-fields."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, 44.

PADDY-FIELD, s. A rice-field, generally in its flooded state.

1759.—"They marched onward in the plain towards Preston’s force, who, seeing them coming, halted on the other side of a long morass formed by paddy-fields."—Orme, ed. 1803, iii. 430.

1800.—"There is not a single paddy-field in the whole county, but plenty of cotton PADRE, s. A priest, clergyman, or minister, of the Christian Religion; when applied by natives to their own priests, as it sometimes is when they speak to Europeans, this is only by way of accommodation, as 'church' is also sometimes so used by them.

The word has been taken up from the Portuguese, and was of course applied originally to Roman Catholic priests only. But even in that respect there was a peculiarity in its Indian use among the Portuguese. For P. della Valle (see below) notices it as a singularity of their practice at Goa that they gave the title of Padre to secular priests, whereas in Italy this was reserved to the religiosi or regulars. In Portugal itself, as Bluteau's explanation shows, the use is, or was formerly, the same as in Italy; but, as the first ecclesiastics who went to India were monks, the name apparently became general among the Portuguese there for all priests.

It is a curious example of the vitality of words that this one which had thus already in the 16th century in India a kind of abnormally wide application, has now in that country a still wider, embracing all Christian ministers. It is applied to the Protestant clergy at Madras early in the 18th century. A bishop is known as Lord (see LAT) padre. See LAT Sédéh.

According to Leland the word is used in China in the form pa-ti-li.

1654.—"Chegando a Porta da Igreja, o sahirão a receber oito Padres."—Pinto, ch. lix. (see Coogan, p. 85).

1654.—"It was the will of God that we found there two Padres, the one an Englishman, and the other a Fleming."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 381.

"... had it not pleased God to put it into the minds of the archbishop and other two Padres of Jesuits of S. Paul's Colledge to stand our friends, we might have rotted in prison."—Neuberre, ibid.

ii. 380.

c. 1590.—"Learned monks also come from Europe, who go by the name of Padré. They have an infallible head called Pápe. He can change any religious ordinances as he may think advisable, and kings have to submit to his authority."—Baddam, in Blockmann's Aen., i. 182.

c. 1606.—"Et ut adesse Patres competentior, minor exclamant Padrigi, Padrigi, id est Domine Pater, Christianus sum."—Jarré, iii. 165.

1614.—"The Padres make a church of one of their Chambers, where they say Masse twice a day."—W. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 486.

1616.—"So seeing Master Terry whom I brought with me, he (the King) called to him, Padre you are very welcome, and this house is yours."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 564; [Hak. Soc. ii. 385].

1623.—"I Portoghesi chiamano anche i preti seculari padri, come noi i religiosi..."—P. della Valle, ii. 586; [Hak. Soc. i. 142].

1665.—"They (Hindu Jogis) are impertinent enough to compare themselves with our Religious Men they meet with in the Indies. I have often taken pleasure to catch them, using much ceremony with them, and giving them great respect; but I soon heard them say to one another, This François knows who we are, he hath been a great while in the Indies, he knows that we are the Padrys of the Indians. A fine comparison, said I, within myself, made by an impertinent and idolatrous rabble of Men!"—Bernier, E.T. 104; [ed. Constable, 323].

1675.—"The Padre (or Minister) complains to me that he hath not that respect and place of preference at Table and elsewhere that is due unto him... At his request I promised to move it at ye next meeting of ye Council. What this little Sparke may enkindle, especially should it break out in ye Pulpit, I cannot foresee further than the inflaming of ye dyning Roome wth sometimes is made almost intolerable hot upon other Accts."—Mr. Puckle's Diary at Metchlapatam, MS. in India Office.

1676.—"And whilst the French have no settlement near hand, the keeping French Padrys here instead of Portuguese, destroys the encroaching growth of the Portugall interest, who used to entail Portugalism as well as Christianity on all their converts."—Madras Consrs., Feb. 29, in Notes and Exts. i. p. 46.

1680.—"... where as at the Dedication of a New Church by the French Padrys and Portugez in 1675 guns had been fired from the Fort in honour thereof, neither Padry nor Portugez appeared at the Dedication of our Church, nor as much as gave the Governor a visit afterwards to give him joy of it."—Ibid. Oct. 28. No. III. p. 37.

c. 1692.—"But their greatest act of tyranny (at Goa) is this. If a subject of these misbelievers dies, leaving young children, and no grown-up son, the children are considered wards of the State. They take them to their places of worship, their churches... and the padris, that is to say the priests, instruct the children in the Christian religion, and bring them up in their own faith, whether the child be a Mussulman sinajād or a Hindu brāhman."—Kohā Khan, in Elliot, vii. 345.

1711.—"The Danish Padre Bartholomew Ziegenbalgh, requests leave to go to Europe in the first ship, and in consideration that he is head of a Protestant Mission, espoused by the Right Reverend the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury ... we have presumed to grant him his passage."—In Wheeler, ii. 177.

1726.—"May 14. Mr. Leeke went with me to St. Thomas's Mount. ... We conversed with an old Padre from Silesia, who had been 27 years in India. ..."—Diary of the Missionary Schultze (in Notices of Madras, &c., 1558), p. 12.

"May 17. The minister of the King of Pegu called on me. From him I learned, through an interpreter, that Christians of all nations and professions have perfect freedom at Pegu; that even in the Capital two French, two Armenian, and two Portuguese Patres, have their churches. ..."—Ibid. p. 15.

1803.—"Lord Lake was not a little pleased at the Begum's loyalty, and being a little elevated by the wine ... he gallantly advanced, and to the utter dismay of her attendants, took her in his arms, and kissed her ... Recieving courteously the proffered attention, she turned calmly round to her astonished attendants—'It is,' said she, 'the salute of a padre (or priest) to his daughter.'"—Skinner's Mem. i. 293.

1809.—"The Padre, who is a half cast Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ed. Valentia, i. 329.

1830.—"Two fat naked Brahmins, bedaubed with paint, had been importing me for money ... upon the ground that they were padres."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, iii.

1867.—"There is Padre Blunt for example,—we always call them Padres in India, you know,—makes a point of never going beyond ten minutes, at any rate during the hot weather."—The Dilemma, ch. xliii.

PADSHA\W, PODSHA\W, s. Pers. —Hindi, pādīshāh (Pers. pad, pad, 'throne,' shah, 'prince'), an emperor; the Great Mogul (q.v.); a king.

[1553.—"Patzah." See under POORUB.

[1612.—"He acknowledges no Paden-\awe or King in Christendom but the Portugals' King."—Dawers, Letters, i. 175.]

c. 1630.—"... round all the roome were placed tacite Mircoes, Chauns, Sultans, and Beglerbegs, above threscore; who like so many inanimate Statues sat crosse-leggd ... their backs to the wall, their eyes to a constant object; not daring to speak to one another, sneeze, cough, spit, or the like, it being heid in the Potshaw's presence a sinne of too great presumption."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1668, p. 189. At p. 171 of the same we have Potshaw; and in the edition of 1677, in a vocabulary of the language spoken in Hindustan, we have "King, Patchaw." And again: "Is the King at Agra? ..."

a. This word, the Malay for a 'fence, enclosure,' occurs in the sense of 'factory' in the following passage:

1702.—"Some other out-pagars or Factories, depending upon the Factory of Ben-coolen."—Charters of the E.I. Co. p. 324.

In some degree analogous to this use is the application, common among Hindustani-speaking natives, of the Hind.—Arab. word īhāta, 'a fence, enclosure,' in the sense of Presidency: Bombay kī [ka] īhāta, Bangal kī [ka] īhāta, a sense not given in Shakespeare or Forbes; [it is given in Fallon and Platt's. Mr. Skeat points out that the Malay word is pāgar, 'a fence,' but that it is not used in the sense of a 'factory' in the Malay Peninsula. In the following passage it seems to mean 'factory stock':

[1615.—"The King says that at her arrival he will send them their house and pagarr upon rafts to them."—Poster, Letters, iii. 151.]

b. (pagār). This word is in general use in the Bombay domestic dialect for wages, Mahr. pagār. It is obviously the Port. verb pagar, 'to pay;' used as a substantive.

[1875.—"... the heavy-browed sultana of some Gangetic station, whose stern look palpably interrogates the amount of your monthly paggar."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 46.]

PAGODA, s.

This obscure and remarkable word is used in three different senses.

a. An idol temple; and also specifically, in China, a particular form of religious edifice, of which the famous 'Porcelain tower' of Nanking, now destroyed, may be recalled as typical. In the 17th century we find the word sometimes missapplied to places of Mahomedan worship, as by Faria-y-Sousa, who speaks of the 'Pagoda of Mecca.'
b. An idol.

c. A coin long current in S. India. The coins so called were both gold and silver, but generally gold. The gold pagoda was the varāha or hūm of the natives (see HOON); the former name (fr. Skt. for 'bear') being taken from the Boar avatar of Vishnu, which was figured on a variety of ancient coins of the South; and the latter signifying 'gold,' no doubt identical with sona, and an instance of the exchange of h and s. (See also PARDAO.)

Accounts at Madras down to 1818 were kept in pagodas, fanams, and kās (see CASH); 8 kās = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 pagoda. In the year named the rupee was made the standard coin.* The pagoda was then reckoned as equivalent to 34 rupees.

In the suggestions of etymologies for this word, the first and most prominent meaning alone has almost always been regarded, and doubtless justly; for the other uses are deducible from it. Such suggestions have been many.

Thus Chinese origins have been propounded in more than one form; e.g. Pao-tah, 'precious pile,' and Poh-kuk-tah ('white-bones-pile').† Anything can be made out of Chinese monosyllables in the way of etymology; though no doubt it is curious that the first at least of these phrases is actually applied by the Chinese to the polygonal towers which in China foreigners specially call pagodas. Whether it be possible that this phrase may have been in any measure formed in imitation of pagoda, so constantly in the mouth of foreigners, we cannot say (though it would not be a solitary example of such borrowing—see NEELAM); but we can say with confidence that it is impossible pagoda should have been taken from the Chinese. The quotations from Corsali and Barbosa set that suggestion at rest.

Another derivation is given (and adopted by so learned an etymologist as H. Wedgwood) from the Portuguese pagão, 'a pagan.' It is possible that this word may have helped to facilitate the Portuguese adoption of pagoda; it is not possible that it should have given rise to the word. A third theory makes pagoda a transposition of dagoba. The latter is a genuine word, used in Ceylon, but known in Continental India, since the extinction of Buddhism, only in the most rare and exceptional way.

A fourth suggestion connects it with the Skt. bhagavat, 'holy, divine,' or Bhagavati, applied to Durgā and other goddesses; and a fifth makes it a corruption of the Pers. but-kadah, 'idol-temple'; a derivation given below by Ovington. There can be little doubt that the origin really lies between these two.

The two contributors to this book are somewhat divided on this subject:—

(1) Against the derivation from bhagavat, 'holy,' or the Mahr. form bhagavant, is the objection that the word pagode from the earliest date has the final e, which was necessarily pronounced. Nor is bhagavant a name for a temple in any language of India. On the other hand but-kadah is a phrase which the Portuguese would constantly hear from the Mahomedans with whom they chiefly had to deal on their first arrival in India. This is the view confidently asserted by Rei-

As regards the coins, it has been supposed, naturally enough, that they were called pagoda, because of the figure of a temple which some of them bear; and which indeed was borne by the pagodas of the Madras Mint, as may be seen in Thomas's Prinsep, pl. xliv. But in fact coins with this impress were first struck at Ikkeri at a date after the word pagode was already in use among the Portuguese. However, nearly all bore on one side a rude representation of a Hindu deity (see e.g. Krishparaja's pagoda, c. 1520), and sometimes two such images. Some of these figures are specified by Prinsep (Useful Tables, p. 41), and Varthema speaks of them: 'These pardaiz... have two devils stamped upon one side of them, and certain letters on the other' (115-116). Here the name may have been appropriately taken from bhagavat (A. B.).

On the other hand, it may be urged that the resemblance between but-kadah and pagode is hardly close enough, and that the derivation from but-kadah does not easily account for all the uses of the word. Indeed, it seems admitted in the preceding paragraph that bhagavati may have had to do with the origin of the word in one of its meanings.

Now it is not possible that the word in all its applications may have had its origin from bhagavat, or some current modification of that word? We see from Marco Polo that such a term was currently known to foreign visitors of S. India in his day—a term almost identical in sound with pagoda, and bearing in his statement a religious application, though not to a temple.* We thus have four separate applications of the word pacawta, or pagoda, picked up by foreigners on the shores of India from the 13th century downwards, viz. to a Hindu ejaculatory formula, to a place of Hindu worship, to a Hindu idol, to a Hindu coin with idols represented on it. Is it not possible that all are to be traced to bhagavat, 'sacred,' or to Bhagavat and Bhagavati, used as names of divinities—of Buddha in Buddhist times or places, of Krishna and Durga in Brahminical times and places? (uses which are fact). How common was the use of Bhagavati as the name of an object of worship in Malabar, may be seen from an example. Turning to Wilson's work on the Mackenzie MSS., we find in the list of local MS. tracts belonging to Malabar, the repeated occurrence of Bhagavati in this way. Thus in this section of the book we have at p. xcvii. (vol. ii.) note of an account "of a temple of Bhagavati"; at p. ciii. "Temple of Mannadi Bhagavati goddess..."; at p. civ. "Temple of Mangombu Bhagavati..."; "Temple of Paddeparkave Bhagavati..."; "Temple of the goddess Pannayennar Kave Bhagavati..."; "Temple of the goddess Patali Bhagavati..."; "Temple of Bhagavati..."; p. cvii., "Account of the goddess Bhagavati at, &c. ..."; p. cviii., "Acc. of the goddess Yalanga Bhagavati," "Acc. of

* "The prayer that they say daily consists of these words: 'Pacawta! Pacawta! Pacawta!' And this they repeat 104 times." (1bk. iii. ch. 17.) The word is printed in Ramusio pacawta; but no one familiar with the constant confusion of c and t in medieval manuscript will reject this correction of M. Pauthier. Bishop Caldwell observes that the word was probably Bhagavā, or Pogodi, the Tamil form of Bhagavata, "Lord"; a word reiterated in their sacred formula by Hindus of all sorts, especially Vaishnava devotees. The words given by Marco Polo, if written "Pagoda! Pagoda! Pagoda!" would be almost indistinguishable in sound from Pocawta.

the goddess Vallur Bhagavati." The term Bhagavati seems thus to have been very commonly attached to objects of worship in Malabar temples (see also Fra Paolini, p. 79 and p. 57, quoted under c. below). And it is very interesting to observe that, in a paper on "Coorg Superstitions," Mr. Kittel notices parenthetically that Bhadrā Kāli (i.e. Durgā) is "also-called Pogodi, Pavodi, a tandhavas of Bagavati" (Ind. Antiq. ii. 170)—an incidental remark that seems to bring us very near the possible origin of pagode. It is most probable that some form like pogodi or pagode was current in the mouths of foreign visitors before the arrival of the Portuguese; but if the word was of Portuguese origin there may easily have been some confusion in their ears between Bagavati and but-kadah which shaped the new word. It is no sufficient objection to say that bhagavati is not a term applied by the natives to a temple; the question is rather what misunderstanding and mispronunciation by foreigners of a native term may probably have given rise to the term?—(H. Y.)

Since the above was written, Sir Walter Elliot has kindly furnished a note, of which the following is an extract:—

"I took some pains to get at the origin of the word when at Madras, and the conclusion I came to was that it arose from the term used generally for the object of their worship, viz., Bhagavat, 'god'; bhagavati, 'goddess.'

"Thus, the Hindu temple with its lofty gopura or propylion at once attracts attention, and a stranger enquiring what it was, would be told, 'the house or place of Bhagavat.' The village divinity throughout the south is always a form of Durga, or, as she is commonly called, simply 'Devi' (or Bhagavati, 'the goddess'). . . . In like manner a figure of Durga is found on most of the gold Huns (i.e. pagoda coins) current in the Dakhan, and a foreigner inquiring what such a coin was, or rather what was the form stamped upon it, would be told it was 'the goddess,' i.e., it was 'Bhagavati.'"

As my friend, Dr. Burnell, can no longer represent his own view, it seems right here to print the latest remarks of his on the subject that I can find. They are in a letter from Tanjore, dated March 10, 1880:—

"I think I overlooked a remark of yours regarding my observation that the e in Pagode was pronounced, and that this was a difficulty in deriving it from Bhagavat. In modern Portuguese e is not sounded, but verses show that it was in the 16th century. Now, if there is a final vowel in Pagoda, it must come from Bhagavati; but though the goddess is and was worshipped to a certain extent in S. India, it is by other names (Amma, &c.). Gundert and Kittel give 'Pogodi' as a name of a Durga temple, but assuredly this is no corruption of Bhagavati, but Pagoda! Malayalam and Tamil are full of such adopted words. Bhagavati is little used, and the goddess is too insignificant to give rise to pagoda as a general name for a temple.

"Bhagavat can only appear in the S. Indian languages in its (Skt.) nominative form bhagavān (Tamil paravān). As such, in Tamil and Malayalam it equals Vishnu or Siva, which would suit. But pagoda can't be got out of bhagavān; and if we look to the N. Indian forms, bhagavant, &c., there is the difficulty about the e, to say nothing about the nt."

The use of the word by Barbosa at so early a date as 1516, and its application to a particular class of temples must not be overlooked.

1516.—"There is another sect of people among the Indians of Malabar, which is called Coivara [Kushavan, Logan, Malabar, i. 115]. . . . Their business is to work at baked clay, and tiles for covering houses, with which the temples and Royal buildings are roofed. . . . Their idolatry and their idols are different from those of the others; and in their houses of prayer they perform a thousand acts of witchcraft and necromancy; they call their temples pagodes, and they are separate from the others."—Barbosa, 135. This is from Lord Stanley of Alderley's translation from a Spanish MS. The Italian of Ramusio reads: "nelle loro orationi fanno molte strighe e necromanzie, le quali chiamano Pagodes, differrenti assai dall' altre" (Ramusio, i. f. 308c.). In the Portuguese MS. published by the Lisbon Academy in 1832, the words are altogether absent; and in interpolating them from Ramusio the editor has given the same sense as in Lord Stanley's English.

1516.—"In this city of Goa, and all over India, there are an infinity of ancient build-nings of the Gentiles, and in a small island near this, called Dinari, the Portuguese, in order to build the city, have destroyed an ancient temple called Pagode, which was built with marvellous art, and with ancient figures wrought to the greatest perfection in a certain black stone, some of which remain standing, ruined and shattered, because these Portuguese care nothing about them. If I can come by one of these shattered images I will send it to your Lordship, that you may perceive how much in old times sculpture was esteemed in every part of the world."—Letter of Andrea Corsali to Giuliano de Medici, in Ramusio, f. t. 177.

1548.—"And with this fleet he anchored at Couilão (see QUILON) and landed there with all his people. And the Governor (Martim Afonso de Sousa) went thither because of information he had of a pagode which was quite near in the interior, and which, they said, contained much treasure. . . . And the people of the country seeing that the Governor was going to the pagode, they sent to offer him 50,000 pardaos not to go."—Correa, iv. 325-326.

1554.—"And for the monastery of Santa Fee 845,000 reis yearly, besides the revenue of the Pagunderes which His Highness bestowed upon the said House, which gives 800,000 reis a year. . . ."—Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 73.

1803.—"It frequently happens that in the bazaar, the star pagoda exchanges for 4 rupees, and at other times for not more than 3."—Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 375.

PAGODA-TREE. A slang phrase once current, rather in England than in India, to express the openings to rapid fortune which at one time existed in India. [For the original meaning, see the quotation from Ryklof Van Goens under BO TREE. Mr. Skew writes: "It seems possible that the idea of a coin tree may have arisen from the practice, among some Oriental nations at least, of making cash in moulds, the design of which is based on the plan of a tree. On the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula the name cash-tree (poko' pitis) is applied to cash cast in this form. Gold and silver tributary trees are sent to Siam by the tributary States: in these the leaves are in the shape of ordinary tree leaves.

1777.—"India has been transferred from the regions of romance to the realms of fact . . . the mines of Golconda no longer pay the cost of working, and the pagoda-tree has been stripped of all its golden fruit."—Blackwood's Magazine, 575.

1881.—"It might be mistaken . . . for the work of some modern architect, built for the Nabob of a couple of generations back, who had enriched himself when the pagoda-tree was worth the shaking."—Sot. Review, Sept. 8, p. 307.

PAHLAVI, PEHLVI. The name applied to the ancient Persian language in that phase which prevailed from the beginning of the Sassanian monarchy to the time when it became corrupted by the influence of Arabic, and the adoption of numerous Arabic words and phrases. The name Pahlavi was adopted by Europeans from the Parsi use. The language of Western Persia in the time of the Achaemenian kings, as preserved in the cuneiform inscriptions of Persepolis, Behistun, and elsewhere, is nearly akin to the dialects of the Zend-Avesta, and is characterised by a number of inflections agreeing with those of the Avesta and of Sanskrit. The dissolution of inflectional terminations is already indicated as beginning in the later Achaemenian inscriptions, and in many parts of the Zend-Avestas but its course cannot be traced, as there are no inscriptions in Persian.
language during the time of the Arsacidae; and it is in the inscriptions on rocks and coins of Ardashir-i-Papakn (A.D. 226-240)—the Ardashir Babagan of later Persian—that the language emerges in a form of that which is known as Pahlavi. "But, strictly speaking, the medieval Persian language is called Pahlavi when it is written in one of the characters used before the invention of the modern Persian alphabet, and in the peculiarly enigmatical mode adopted in Pahlavi writings. . . . Like the Assyrians of old, the Persians of Parthian times appear to have borrowed their writing from a foreign race. But, whereas the Semitic Assyrians adopted a Turanian syllabary, these later Aryan Persians accepted a Semitic alphabet. Besides the alphabet, however, which they could use for spelling their own words, they transferred a certain number of complete Semitic words to their writings as representatives of the corresponding words in their own language. . . . The use of such Semitic words, scattered about in Persian sentences, gives Pahlavi the motley appearance of a compound language. . . . But there are good reasons for supposing that the language was never spoken as it was written. The spoken language appears to have been pure Persian; the Semitic words being merely used as written representatives, or logograms, of the Persian words which were spoken. Thus, the Persians would write malkdn malkd, 'King of Kings,' but they would read shdkdn shd. . . . As the Semitic words were merely a Pahlavi mode of writing their Persian equivalents (just as 'viz.' is a mode of writing 'namely' in English*), they disappeared with the Pahlavi writing, and the Persians began at once to write all their words with their new alphabet, just as they pronounced them? (E. W. West, Introd. to Pahlavi Texts, p. xiii.; Sacred Books of the East, vol. v.)."†

tions from the Avesta, and others—almost entirely of a religious character. Where the language is transcribed, either in the Avesta characters, or in those of the modern Persian alphabet, and freed from the singular system indicated above, it is called Pazand (see PAZEND); a term supposed to be derived from the language of the Avesta, paizizanti, with the meaning 're-explanation.'

Various explanations of the term Pahlavi have been suggested. It seems now generally accepted as a changed form of the Parthea of the cuneiform inscriptions, the Parthia of Greek and Roman writers. The Parthians, though not a Persian race, were rulers of Persia for five centuries, and it is probable that everything ancient, and connected with the period of their rule, came to be called by this name. It is apparently the same word that in the form pahlav and pahlavan, &c., has become the appellation of a warrior or champion in both Persian and Armenian, originally derived from that most warlike people the Parthians. (See PULWAUN.) Whether there was any identity between the name thus used, and that of Pahlava, which is applied to a people mentioned often in Sanskrit books, is a point still unsettled.

The meaning attached to the term Pahlavi by Orientals themselves, writing in Arabic or Persian (exclusive of Parsis), appears to have been 'Old Persian' in general, without restriction to any particular period or dialect. It is thus found applied to the cuneiform inscriptions at Persepolis. (Derived from West as quoted above, and from Haug's Essays, ed. London, 1878.)

c. 930.—"Quant au mot direkhs, en pahlvi (al-fakhviya) c'est à dire dans la langue primitive de la Perse, il signifie drapeau, pique et étendard."—Mag'addi, iii. 232.

c. A.D. 1000.—"Gayomarth, who was called Girshd, because Gir means in Pahlavi a mountain. . . ."—Abd'urrahmon, Chronology, 108.

1 PAILOO, s. The so-called 'triumphal arches,' or gateways, which form so prominent a feature in Chinese landscape, really monumental erections in honour of deceased persons of eminent virtue. Chin. pat, 'a tablet,' and lo, 'a stage or erection.' Mr. Fergusson has shown the construction to have been derived from India with Buddhism (see Indian and Eastern Architecture, pp. 700-702). [So the Torii of Japan seem to represent Skt. torana, 'an archway' (see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 407 seq.)]

PÁLAGILÁSS. s. This is domestic Hind. for 'Asparagus' (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 189).

PALANKEEN, PALANQUIN, s. A box-litter for travelling in, with a pole projecting before and behind, which is borne on the shoulders of 4 or 6 men—4 always in Bengal, 6 sometimes in the Telugu country.

The origin of the word is not doubtful, though it is by no means clear how the Portuguese got the exact form which they have handed over to us. The nasal termination may be dismissed as a usual Portuguese addition, such as occurs in mandarin, Baqaim (Wasai), and many other words and names as used by them. The basis of all the forms is Skt. paryaṇa, or pālyaṇa, 'a bed,' from which we have Hind. and Mahr. palam, 'a bed,' Hind. pālki, 'a palankin,' [Telugu palla ki, which is perhaps the origin of the Port. word], Pali pallanno, 'a couch, bed, litter, or palankin,' (Childers), and in Javanese and Malay palaingki, 'a litter or sedan' (Oraefurdf).

It is curious that there is a Spanish word palanca (L. Lat. phalango) for a pole used to carry loads on the shoulders of two bearers (called in Sp. palanquinos); a method of transport more common in the south than in England, though even in old English the thing has a name, viz. 'a cowlestaff' (see N.E.D.). It is just possible that this word (though we do not find it in the Portuguese dictionaries) may have influenced the form in which the early Portuguese visitors to India took up the word.

'The thing appears already in the Rāmāyana. It is spoken of by Ibn Batuta and John Marignolli (both c. 1350), but neither uses this Indian name; and we have not found evidence of palki older than Akbar (see Elliot, iv. 515, and Ain, i. 254).

As drawn by Linschoten (1597), and as described by Grose at Bombay (c. 1760), the palankin was hung from a bamboo which bent in an arch over the vehicle; a form perhaps not yet entirely obsolete in native use. Williamson (V. M., i. 316 seqq.) gives an account of the different changes in the fashion of palankins, from which it would appear that the present form must have come into use about the end of the 18th century. Up to 1840-50 most people in Calcutta kept a palankin and a set of bearers (usually natives of Orissa—see OORIYA), but the practice and the vehicle are now almost, if not entirely, obsolete among the better class of Europeans. Till the same period the palankin, carried by relays of bearers, laid out by the post-office, or by private chowdries (q.v.), formed the chief means of accomplishing extensive journeys in India, and the elder of the present writers has undergone hardly less than 8000 or 9000 miles of travelling in going considerable distances (excluding minor journeys) after this fashion. But in the decade named, the palankin began, on certain great roads, to be superseded by the dawk-garry (a Palkee-garry or palankin-carriage, horsed by ponies posted along the road, under the post-office), and in the next decade to a large extent by railway, supplemented by other wheel-carriage, so that the palankin is now used rarely, and only in out-of-the-way localities.

c. 1340.—"Some time afterwards the pages of the Mistress of the Universe came to me with a dāla. . . . It is like a bed of state . . . with a pole of wood above . . . this is curved, and made of the Indian cane, solid and compact. Eight men, divided into two relays, are employed in turn to carry one of these; four carry the palankin whilst four rest. These vehicles serve in India the same purpose as donkeys in Egypt; most people use them habitually in going and coming. If a man has his own slaves, he is carried by them; if not he hires men to carry him. There are also a few found for hire in the city, which stand in the bazars, at the Sultan's gate, and also at the gates of private citizens."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 386.

c. 1350.—"Et eciam homines et mulieres portant super scapulas in lectis de quibus in Cantricis: ferculum fecit sibi Salomon de

* In Canticles, iii. 9, the "ferculum quod fecit sibi rex Salomon de lignis Libani" is in the Hebrew esprryg, which has by some been supposed to be Greek fopseov; highly improbable, as the litter came to Greece from the East. Is it possible that the word can be in some way taken from paryaṇa? The R.V. has palanquin. (See the discussion in Encyclopaedia Biblica, ii. 2804 seq.)

1616. "... Abdalla Chan, the great governor of Amadavas, being sent for to Court in disgrace, coming in Pilgrim's Clothes with fortie servants on foot, aboute sixtie miles in counterfeit humiliation, finished the rest in his Pallankee."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 552; [Hak. Soc. ii. 273, which reads Palankee, with other minor variances].

In Terry's account, in Purchas, ii. 1475, we have a Pallankee, and (p. 1481) Palanka; in a letter of Tom Coryate's (1615) Palankee.

1623. "In the territories of the Portuguese in India it is forbidden to men to travel in palankin (Palanckino) as in good sooth too effeminate a proceeding; nevertheless the Portuguese pay very little attention to their laws, as soon as the rains begin to fall they commence getting permission to use the palanckin, either by favour or by bribery; and so, gradually, the thing is relaxed, until at last nearly everybody travels in that way, and at all seasons."—P. della Valle, i. 611; [comp. Hak. Soc. i. 31].

1659. "The designing raseal (Sivaji) . . . conciliated Afsal Khan, who fell into the snare. . . . Without arms he mounted the palki, and proceeded to the place appointed under the fortress. He left all his attendants at the distance of a long arrow-shot. . . . Sivaji had a weapon, called in the language of the Dakhin bichâ (i.e. 'scorpion') on the fingers of his hand, hidden under his sleeve. . . ."—Khâd Khan, in Elliot, ii. 250. See also p. 509.

c. 1690. "... From Golconda to Mashi-pan tan there is no travelling by waggons. . . . But instead of Coaches they have the convenience of Palankies, wherein you are carried with more speed and more ease than in any part of India."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 70; [ed. Ball, i. 175]. This was quite true up to our own time. In 1840 the present writer was carried on that road, a stage of 25 miles in little more than 5 hours, by 12 bearers, relieving each other by sires.

1672. The word occurs several times in Baldesius as Pallinkijn. "Tavernier writes Pallek and sometimes Palanquin [Ball, i. 45, 175, 390, 392]; Bernardus has Paleky [ed. Constable, 214, 283, 372].

1673. "... ambling after these a great pace, the Palankanee-Boys support them four of them, two at each end of a Bambu, which is a long hollow Cane ... arched in the middle ... where hangs the Palen-keen, as big as an ordinary Couch, broad enough to tumble in. ...” —Fryer, 34.

1768.—“The permission you are pleased to give us to buy a Pallakee on the Company's Acct. Shall make use off as Soone as can possibly meet with one y° may be fitt for ye purpose. ...”—MS. Letter from Factory at Baltasore to the Council (of Fort. St. George), March 9, in India Office.

chants of my acquaintance do attend me kine-bearers). — Talentjyn, Ceylon, 45.

1738.—“Pallanquin, a kind of chaise or chair, borne by men on their shoulders, much used by the Chinese and other Eastern peoples for travelling from place to place.” —Baily's Dict. 2nd ed.

1750-52. “The greater nobility are carried in a palekee which looks very like a hammock fastened to a pole.” —Toren's Voyage to Swatate, China, &c., i. 201.

1754-58.—In the former year the Court of Directors ordered that Writers in their Service should “lay aside the expense of either horse, chair, or Palankeen, during their Writership.” The Writers of Fort William (4th Nov. 1756) remonstrated, begging “to be indulged in keeping a Palankeen for such months of the year as the excessive heats and violent rains makes it impossible to go on foot without the utmost hazard of their health.” The Court, at one sight had, winged (11th Feb. 1758).
“We very well know that the indulging Writers with Palankeens has not a little contributed to the neglect of business we complain of, by affording them opportunities of rambling”; and again, with an obdurac-y and fervour too great for grammar (March 3, 1758): “We do most positively order and direct (and will admit of no representation for postponing the execution of) that no Writer whatsoever be permitted to keep either palankeen, horse, or chaise, during his Writership, on pain of being immediately dismissed from our service.” —In Long,
pp. 54, 71, 130.

1780.—“The Nawaub, on seeing his con-1804.—“Give orders that a pallanquin may be made for me; let it be very light, with the pannels made of canvas instead of wood, and the poles fixed as for a dooley.

Your Bengally pallanquins are so heavy that they cannot be used out of Calcutta.”
—Wellington (to Major Shaw), June 20.

The following measures a change in ideas. A palarkin is now hardly ever used by a European, even of humble position, much less by the opulent:

1808.—“Palkie. A litter well known in India, called by the English Palankeen.
A Guzerat punster (aware of no other) hazards the Etyymology Pal-lakke [palolakt] a thing requiring an annual income of a quarter Lacc to support it and corresponding luxuries.” —R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

“... The conveyances of the island (Madeira) are of three kinds, viz.: horses, mules, and a litter, ycleped a pallanquin, being a chair in the shape of a bathing-tub, with a pole across, carried by two men, as dooles are in the east.” —Welsh, Reminiscences, i. 282.

1809.—“Woe! Woe! around their pallankeen,
As on a bridal day
With symphony and dance and song,
Their kindred and their friends come on,
The dance of sacrifice! The funeral song!”
Kehama, i. 6.

1830.—“Un curieux indiscret requit un galet dans la tète; on l'emporta baigané de sang, couché dans un pallanquin.” —I.
Jacquemont, Corr. i. 67.

1880.—“It will amaze readers in these days to learn that the Governor-General sometimes condescended to be carried in a Palanquin—a mode of conveyance which, except for long journeys away from railroads, has long been abandoned to portly Babos, and Eurasian clerks.” —Nat. Rev.,

1881.—“In the great procession on Corpus Christi Day, when the Pope is carried in a palanquin round the Piazza of St. Peter, it is generally believed that the cushions and furniture of the pallanquin are so arraigned as to enable him to bear the fatigue of the ceremony by sitting whilst to the spectator he appears to be kneeling.” —Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 287.

PALAVERAM, n.p. A town and cantonment 11 miles S.W. from Madras. The name is Pallāvavaram probably Palla-puram, Pallavarapura.
the 'town of the Pallas'; the latter a caste claiming descent from the Pallavas who reigned at Conjeveram (Seshagiri Śāstrī). [The Madras Gloss. derives their name from Tam. palam, 'low land,' as they are commonly employed in the cultivation of wet lands.]

(1801.—1) 1. Pale Ale: 2. strong ale; 3. small beer; 4. brilliant beer; 5. strong porter; 6. light porter; 7. brown stout."—Advt. in Carev. Good Old Days, i. 147.

1848. — "Constant dinners, tiffins, pale ale, and claret, the prodigious labour of cutchery, and the refreshment of brandy pawnee, which he was forced to take there, had this effect upon Waterloo Sedley."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 258.

1858. — "Parmi les cafés, les cabarets, les gargotes, l'on rencontre ça et là une taverne anglaise placardée de sa pancarte de porter simple et double, d'old Scotch ale, d'East India Pale beer."—Th. Gautier, Constantino- nople, 22.

1867.—
"Pain bis, galette ou paneton,

Th. Gautier à Ch. Garnier.

PALEMPORE. s. A kind of chintz bed-cover, sometimes made of beautiful patterns, formerly made at various places in India, especially at Sadras and Masulipatam, the importation of which into Europe has become quite obsolete, but under the greater appreciation of Indian manufactures has recently shown some tendency to revive. The etymology is not quite certain,—we know no place of the name likely to have been the eponym,—and possibly it is a corruption of a hybrid (Hind. and Pers.) palang-pose, 'a bed-cover,' which occurs below, and which may have been perverted through the existence of Salempore as a kind of stuff. The probability that the word originated in a perversion of palang-posh, is strengthened by the following entry in Bluteau's Dict. (Suppt. 1727.)

"Chaudus or Chaudrus sōn huns panos grandes, que servem para cobrir canas e

 outras coisas. São pintados de cores muy vystosas, e alguns mais finos, a que chamão palangapuzes. Fabricião-se de algodão em Bengala e Choromandel,—i.e. "Chaudus ou Chaudena" (this I cannot identify, perhaps the same as Choutar among Piece-goods) 'are a kind of large cloths serving to cover beds and other things. They are painted with gay colours, and there are some of a finer description which are called palang-poshes,' &c.

[For the mode of manufacture at Masulipatam, see Journ. Ind. Art., iii. 14. Mr. Pringle (Madras Selections, 4th ser. p. 71, and Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 173) has questioned this derivation. The word may have been taken from the State and town of Palampur in Guzerat, which seems to have been an emporium for the manufactures of N. India, which was long noted for chintz of this kind.]

1848.—"Int Governe van Raga mandraga . . . werden veel . . . Salampori . . . gemaeckt."—Van den Broeck, 87.

Byron, The Giaour.

1814.—"A variety of tortures were inflicted to extort a confession; one was a sofa, with a platform of tight cordage in network, covered with a palampore, which concealed a bed of thorns placed under it: the collector, a corpulent Banián, was then stripped of his jama (see JAMMA), or muslin robe, and ordered to lie down."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 429; [2nd ed. ii. 54].

1862.—"Bala posh, or Palang posh, quilt or coverlet, 300 to 1000 rupees."—Panjab Trade Report, App. p. xxxviii.

1880.—". . . and third, the celebrated palampores, or 'bed-covers,' of Masulipatam, Patebgarh, Shikarpur, Hazara, and other places, which in point of art decoration are simply incomparable."—Birdwood, The Industrial Arts of India, 260.

PALL. s. The name of the sacred language of the Southern Buddhists, in fact, according to their apparently well-founded tradition Magadhī, the dialect of what we now call South Bahar, in which Sakya Muni discoursed. It is one of the Prākrits (see PRACRIT) or Aryan vernaculars of India, and has probably been a dead language for nearly 2000 years. Pāli in Skt. means 'a line, row, series' ; and by the Buddhists is used for the series of their Sacred Texts. Pāli-bhāṣa is then 'the language of the Sacred Texts,' i.e. Magadhī; and this is called elliptically by the Singhalese Pāli, which we have adopted in like use. It has been carried, as the sacred language, to all the Indo-Chinese countries which have derived their religion from India through Ceylon. Pāli is 'a sort of Tuscan among the Prākrits' from its inherent grace and strength (Childers). But the analogy to Tuscan is closer still in the parallelism of the modification of Sanskrit words, used in Pāli, to that of Latin words used in Italian.

Robert Knox does not apparently know by that name the Pāli language in Ceylon. He only speaks of the Books of Religion as 'being in an eloquent style which the Vulgar people do not understand' (p. 75); and in another passage says: 'They have a language something differing from the vulgar tongue (like Latin to us) which their books are writ in' (p. 109).

249.—"Les nous font valoir le style de leur Alcoran, les autres de leur Bāli."—LETTRÉS ÉDIT. XXV. 61.

1890.—"... this Doubt proceeds from the SIAMENES understanding two Languages, viz., the Vulgar, which is a simple Tongue, consisting almost wholly of Monoeyllables, without Conjugation or Declension; and another Language, which I have already spoken of, which to them is a dead Tongue, known only by the Learned, which is called the Balie Tongue, and which is enriched with the inflexions of words, like the Languages we have in Europe. The terms of Religion and Justice, the names of Offices, and all the Ornaments of the Vulgar Tongue are borrow'd from the Balie."—De la Louvère's SIAM, E.T. 1893, p. 9.

1784.—"The spoken language of Italy was to be found in a number of provincial dialects, each with its own characteristics, the Piedmontese harsh, the Neapolitan nasal, the Tuscan soft and flowing. These dialects had been rising in importance as Latin declined; the birth-time of a new literary language was imminent. Then came Dante, and choosing for his immortal Commedia the finest and most cultivated of the vernaculars, raised it at once to the position of dignity for which it still retains. Read Sanskrit on the vulgar language of Tuscan, and the Three Baskets for the Divina Commedia, and the parallel is complete. Like Italian Pāli is at once flowing and sonorous; it is a characteristic of both languages that nearly every word ends in a vowel, and that all harsh conjunctions are softened down by assimilation, elision, or crisis, while on the other hand both lend themselves easily to the expression of sublime and vigorous thought."—Childers, Preface to Pali Dict. pp. xiii-xiv.

PALKEE-GARRY, s. A ‘palankin-coach,’ as it is termed in India; i.e. a carriage shaped somewhat like a palankin on wheels; Hindi. pakhi-gar. The word is however one formed under European influences. ["The system of conveying passengers by palkee carriages and trucks was first established between Cawnpore and Allahabad in May 1843, and extended to Alliyghur in November of the same year; Delhi was included in June 1845, Agra and Meerut about the same time; the now-going line not being, however, ready till January 1846"] (Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 91.)

1875.—"The Governor-General’s carriage may be jestled by the hired ‘pakhi-garry,’ with its two wretched ponies, rope harness, nearly naked driver, and wheels whose simious motions impress one with the idea that they must come off at the next revolution."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 38.

This description applies rather to the cranchee (q.v.) than to the palkee-garry, which is (or used to be) seldom so sordidly equip.t. [Mr. Kipling’s account of the Calcutta pakki gari (Beast and Man, 192) is equally uncomplimentary.]

PALMYRAS, s. The fan-palm (Borassus flabelliformis), which is very commonly cultivated in S. India and Ceylon (as it is also indeed in the Ganges valley from Farrukhabad down to the head of the Delta), and hence was called by the Portuguese par excellence, palmeira or ‘the palm-tree.’ Sir J. Hooker writes: "I believe this palm is nowhere wild in India; and have always suspected that it, like the tamarind, was introduced from Africa."

[So Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 504.] It is an important tree in the economy of S. India, Ceylon, and parts of the Archipelago as producing jaggery (q.v.) or ‘palm-sugar’; whilst the wood affords rafters and laths, and the leaf gives a material for thatch, mats, umbrellas, fans, and a substitute for paper. Its minor uses are many: indeed it is supposed to supply nearly all the wants of man, and a Tamil proverb ascribes to it 801 uses (see Ferguson’s Palmyra-Palm of Ceylon, and Tennent’s Ceylon, i. 111, ii. 519 seqq.; also see BRAB).

1563.—"... A ilha de Ceilão... ha muitas palmeiras."—Garcia, ff. 66v-66.

1673.—"Their Buildings suit with the Country and State of the inhabitants, being mostly contrived for Convenience: the Poorer are made of Bougns and ollas of the Palmereos."—Fryer, 199.

1718.—"... Leaves of a Tree called Palmeira."—Prop. of the Gospel in the East, iii. 85.

1756.—"‘The interval was planted with rows of palmyra, and coco-nut trees.”—Orme, ii. 90, ed. 1803.

1860.—"‘Here, too, the beautiful palmyra palm, which abounds over the north of the Island, begins to appear.”—Tennent’s Ceylon, ii. 54.

PALMYRA POINT, n.p. Otherwise called Pt. Pedro, a corruption of the Port. Punta das Pedras, ‘the rocky cape,’ a name descriptive of the natural features of the coast (Tennent, ii. 525). This is the N.E. point of Ceylon, the high palmyra trees on which are conspicuous.

PALMYRAS, POINT, n.p. This is a headland on the Orissa coast, quite low, but from its prominence at the most projecting part of the combined Mahanadi and Brâhmanâi delta an important landmark, especially in former days, for ships bound from the south for the mouth of the Hoogly, all the more for the dangerous shoal off it. A point of the Mahanadi delta, 24 miles to the south-west, is called False Point, from its liability to be mistaken for P. Palmyras.

1553.—"... o Cabo Segugora, a que os nossos chamam das Palmeiras por humas quelli estam, as quaes os navigantes notam por lhes dar conhecimento da terra. E deste cabo... fazemos fim do Reyno Orixa."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1598.—"... 2 miles (Dutch) before you come to the point of Palmerias, you shall see certaine blakke howels standing ypon a land that is higher than all the land thereabouts, and from thence to the Point it beginneth againe to be low ground and... you shall see some small (but not ouer white) sandie Downs... you shall finde being right against the point de Palmiras... that ypon the point there is nether tree nor bush, and although it hath the name of the Point of Palm-trees, it hath notwithstanding right forth, but one Palm tree."—Linschoten, 3d Book, ch. 12.

[c. 1665.—"Even the Portuguese of Opôli (see HOOGLY), in Bengale, purchased without sculpure these wretched captives, and the horrid traffic was transacted in the vicinity of the island of Galles, near Cape das Palmars."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 1767.

1823.—"It is a large delta, formed by the mouths of the Maha-Nudoe and other rivers, the northernmost of which insulates Cape Palmiras."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 88.

[PAMBRE, s. An article of dress which seems to have been used for various purposes, as a scarf, and perhaps as a turban. Mr. Yusuf Ali (Monograph on Silk Fabrics, 81) classes it among 'fabrics which are simply wrapped over the head and shoulders by men and women'; and he adds: "The Pamri is used by women and children, generally amongst Hindus." His specimens are some 3 yards long by 1 broad, and are made of pure silk or silk and cotton, with an ornamental border. The word does not appear in the Hind. dictionaries, but Molesworth has Mahr. pāmārī, 'a sort of silk cloth.'

For some of the following quotations and notes I am indebted to Mr. W. Foster.

[1627.—"L'on y [Kashmir] travaille aussi plusieurs Vomeries [misprint for Pomeris, which he elsewhere mentions as a stuff from Kashmir and Lahore], qui sont des pieces d'estoffes longues de trois, aulnes, et largers de deux, faite de laine de montsou, qui croit au derriere de ces bestes, et qui est aussi fine que de la soye: on tient ces estoffes exposées au froid pendant l'huyver: elles ont un beau lustre, semblables aux tabis de nos cartiers."—François Pelsart, in Thouvenet's Rédactions de divers voyages, vol. i. pt. 2.

[1834.—A letter in the India Office of Dec. 29 mentions that the Governor of Surat presented to the two chief Factors a horse and "a coat and pamarine" apiece.

PANDÁRAM. 666 PANDARANI.

PANDARANI, n. p. The name of a port of Malabar of great reputation in the Middle Ages, a name which has gone through many curious corruptions. Its position is clear enough from Varthema’s statement that an uninhabited island stood opposite at three leagues distance, which must be the “Sacrifice Rock” of our charts. [The Madras Gloss, identifies it with Collam.] The name appears upon no modern map, but it still attaches to a miserable fishing village on the site, in the form Pantalani (approx. lat. 11° 26’), a little way north of Koilandi. It is seen below in Ibn Batuta’s notice that Pandarini afforded an exceptional shelter to shipping during the S.W. monsoon. This is referred to in an interesting letter to one of the present writers from his friend Col. (now Lt.-Gen.) R. H. Sankey, C.B., R.E., dated Madras, 13th Feby., 1881: “One very extraordinary feature on the coast is the occurrence of mud-banks in from 1 to 6 fathoms of water, which have the effect of breaking both surf and swell to such an extent that ships can run into the patches of water so sheltered at the very height of the monsoon, when the elements are raging, and not only find a perfectly still sea, but are able to land their cargoes. Possibly the snugness of some of the harbours frequented by the Chinese junkies, such as Pandarani, may have been mostly due to banks of this kind? By the way, I suspect your ‘Pandarani’ was nothing but the roadstead of Coule (Coulendi or

PANDÁRAM. s. A Hindu ascetic mendicant of the (so-called) Śūdra, or even of a lower caste. A priest of the lower Hindu castes of S. India and Ceylon. Tamil, pandaram. C. P. Brown says the Pandaram is properly a Vaishnava, but other authors apply the name to Śaiva priests. [The Madras Gloss, derives the word from Skt. pāṇḍu-rango, ‘white-coloured.’ Messrs. Cox and Stuart (Man of N. Arcot, i. 199) derive it from Skt. bhaṅ-ḍugāra, ‘a temple-treasury,’ wherein were employed those who had renounced the world. “The Pandarams seem to receive numerous recruits from the Śaivite Śūdra castes, who choose to make a profession of piety and wander about begging. They are, in reality, very lax in their modes of life, often drinking liquor and eating animal, food furnished by any respectable Śūdra. They often serve in Śiva temples, where they make up garlands of flowers to decorate the lingam, and blow brass trumpets when offerings are made or processions take place” (ibid.).]

1711.—“... But the destruction of 50 or 60,000 pagodas worth of grain... and killing the Pandaram; these are things which make his demands really carry too much justice with them.”—Letter in Wheeler, ii. 168.

1717.—“... Bramans, Pantarongal, and other men.”—Phillips’s Account, 18. The word is here in the Tamil plural.

1718.—“Abundance of Bramanes, Pantares, and Poets... flock together.”—Prope. of the Gospel, ii. 18.

1745.—“On voit ici quelquefois les Pandarams ou Pénitens qui ont été en pélerinage à Bengale; quand ils retournent ils apportent ici avec grand soin de l’eau du Gange dans des pots ou vases bien formés,”—Norbert, Mém. iii. 28.

c. 1760.—“The Pandarams, the Mahometan priests, and the Bramins themselves yield to the force of truth.”—Grose, i. 252.

c. 1296. — "In the year (1296) it was prohibited to merchants who traded in fine or costly products with Mapar (Malabar or Coromandel), Pei-nan ([?) and Fantalaina, three foreign kingdoms, to export any one of them more than the value of 50,000 ting in paper money.” — Chinese Annals of the Mongol Dynasty, quoted by Pauthier, Marc Pol, 392.

c. 1300. — "Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindibird, then Faknir, then the country of Manjarird, then the country of Hil, then the country of (Fandarina).” — Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 95.

c. 1321. — "And the forest in which the pepper groweth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there are two cities, the whereof is called Flandrina, and the other Cyngilin” (see SHINKALI). — Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 75.

c. 1343. — "From Bodofattan we proceeded to Fandarina, a great and fine town with gardens and barracks. The Musulmans there occupy three quarters, each having its mosque. It is at this town that the ships of China pass the winter” (i.e. the S.W. monsoon). — Ibn Batuta, iv. 88. (Compare Roteiro below.)

c. 1442. — "The humble author of this narrative having received his order of dismissal departed from Calicut by sea, after having passed the port of Bendinaneh (read Bandarana, and see MANGALORE, a) situated on the coast of Malabar, (he) reached the port of Mangalore.” — Abdurrazzaq, in India in Xvth Cent., 20.

c. 1506. — "Questo capitano si trovò nave 17 de mercadani Mori in uno porto se china Pandarani, e combattè con queste le quali se messero in terra; per modo che questo capitano mandò tutti li soi copani ben armati con un baril de polverie per cadaun copano, e mise fuoco dentro dette navi de Mori; e tutte quelle brasolte, con tutte quelle spezierie che erano carghe per la Mecha, e s’intende ch’erano molto ricche. ...” — Leonardo Co' Masser, 20-21.

1510. — "Here we remained two days, and then departed, and went to a place which is called Pandarani, distant from this one day’s journey, and which is subject to the King of Calicut. This place is a wretched affair, and has no port.” — Varthema, 153.

1516. — "Further on, south-south-east, is another Moorish place which is called Pandarani, in which there also are many ships.” — Barbosa, 152.

In Rowlandson's Translation of the Tokfut-ul-Majwahin (Or. Transl. Fund, 1835), the name is habitually misread Fundreah for Fundarain.

1536. — "Martim Afonso ... ran along the coast in search of the paraos, the galleys and caravels keeping the sea, and the foists hugging the shore. And one morning they came suddenly on Cunhalmarcar with 25 paraos, which the others had sent to collect rice; and on catching sight of them as they came along the coast towards the Isles of Pandarane, Diogo de Reynoso, who was in advance of our foists, he and his brother ... and Diogo Corvo ... set off to engage the Moors, who were numerous and well armed. And Cunhal, when he knew it was Martim Afonso, laid all pressure on his oars to double the Point of Tiracole.” — Correa, iii. 775.

PANDARANI, s. The most current colloquial name for the Sepoy mutineer during 1857-58. The surname Pandé [Skt. Pandita] was a very common one among the high-caste Sepoys of the Bengal army, being the title of a Jüt [got, gotra] or subdivisional branch of the Brahmins of the Upper Provinces, which furnished many men to the ranks. "The first two men hung" (for mutiny) "at Barrackpore were Pandies by caste, hence all sepoys were Pandies, and ever will be so called” (Bourchier, as below).

"In the Bengal army before the Mutiny, there was a person employed in the quarter-guard to strike the gong, who was known as the gunt Pandy” (M.-G. Keatinge). Ghatou’a gong or bell.

1857. — "As long as I feel the entire confidence I do, that we shall triumph over this iniquitous combination, I cannot feel gis. I leave this feeling to the Pandies, who have sacrificed honour and existence to the ghost of a delusion.” — H. Greathead, Letters during the Siege of Delhi, 99.

PANGOLIN, s. This book-name for the Manis is Malay Pangulang, 'the creature that rolls itself up.' [Scott says: "The Malay word is peng-guling, transcribed also peng-guling; Katingan penggiling. It means 'roller,' or, more literally, 'roll up.' The word is formed from goling, 'roll, wrap,' with the denominative prefix pe-, which takes before g the form peng." Mr. Skeat remarks that the modern Malay form is teng-giling or senggiling, but the latter seems to be used, not for the Manis, but for a kind of centipede which rolls itself up. "The word pangolin, to judge by its form, should be derived from guling, which means to 'roll over and over.' The word pangguling or peng-guling in the required sense of Manis, does not exist in standard Malay. The word was either derived from some out-of-the-way dialect, or was due to some misunderstanding on the part of the Europeans who first adopted it."

Its use in English begins with Pennant (Synopsis of Quadrupeds, 1771, p. 329). Adam Burt gives a dissection of the animal in Asiatic, Res. ii. 353 seqq. It is the Manis pentedactyla of Linn.; called in Hind, baajkî (i.e. Skt. vajra-kîta 'adamant reptile'). We have sometimes thought that the Manis might have been the creature which was shown as a gold-digging ant (see Busbeck below); was not this also the creature that Bertrand de la Broc-quière met with in the desert of Gaza? When pursued, "it began to cry like a cat at the approach of a dog. Pierre de la Vandrie struck it on the back with the point of his sword, but it did no harm, from being covered with scales like a sturgeon." A.D. 1432. (T. Wright's Early Travels in Palestine, p. 290) (Bohn). It is remarkable to find the statement that these ants were found in the possession of the King of Persia recurring in Herodotus and in Busbeck, with an interval of nearly 2000 years! We see that the suggestion of the Manis being the gold-digging ant has been anticipated by Mr. Blakesley in his Herodotus. ["It is now understood that the gold-digging ants were neither, as ancients supposed, an extraordinary kind of real ants, nor, as many learned men have since supposed, large animals mistaken for ants, but Tibetan miners who, like their descendants of the Soc.) speaks of a "kind of raft called a panguaye," on which Mr. Gray comments: "As Rivara points out, Pyrard mistakes the use of the word panguye, or, as the Portuguese write it, pangiao, which was a small sailing canoe. . . . Rivara says the word is still used in Portuguese India and Africa for a two-masted barge with lateen sails. It is mentioned in Lancaster's Voyages (Hak. Soc. pp. 5, 6, and 26), where it is described as being like a barge with one mat sail of coco-nut leaves. 'The barge is sowed together with the rindes of trees and pinned with wooden pinnes.' See also Alb. Comm. Hak. Soc. iii. p. 60, note; and Dr. Burnell's note to Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. p. 32, where it appears that the word is used as early as 1505, in Dom Manoel's letter."]

PANTHAY, PANTHÉ. s. This is the name applied of late years in Burma, and in intelligence coming from the side of Burma, to the Mahomedans of Yunnan, who established a brief independence at Talifu, between 1867 and 1873. The origin of the name is exceedingly obscure. It is not, as Mr. Baber assures us, used or known in Yunnan itself (i.e. by the Chinese). It must be remarked that the usual Burmese name for a Mahomedan is Pathé, and one would have been inclined to suppose Panthé to be a form of the same; as indeed we see that Gen. Fytyche has stated it to be (Burma, Past and Present, ii. 297-8). But Sir Arthur Phayre, a high authority, in a note with which he has favoured us, observes: 'Panthé, I believe, comes from a Chinese word signifying 'native or indigenous.' It is quite a modern name in Burma, and is applied exclusively to the Chinese Mahomedans who come with caravans from Yunnan. I am not aware that they can be distinguished from other Chinese caravan traders, except that they do not bring hams for sale as the others do. In dress and appearance, as well as in drinking samshu (see Samsshoo) and gambling, they are like the others. The word Pa-thi again is the old Burmese word for 'Mahomedan.' It is applied to all Mahomedans other than the Chinese Panthé. It is in no way connected with the latter word, but is, I believe, a corruption of Pârsâ or Fârsî, i.e. Persian." He adds: —"The Burmese call their own indigenous Mahomedans Pathî-Kulâ, and Hindus Hindu-Kulâ, when they wish to distinguish between the two" (see KULA). The last suggestion is highly probable, and greatly to be preferred to that of M. Jacquet, who supposed that the word might be taken from Pasei in Sumatra, which was during part of the later Middle Ages a kind of metropolis of Islam, in the Eastern Seas.*

We may mention two possible origins for Panthé, as indicating lines for enquiry:

* See Journ. As., Ser. II., tom. viii. 352.
PAPAYA, PANTHÉ. 670  PAPAYA, PAPAW.

a. The title Pathi (or Passi, for the former is only the Burmese lisping utterance) is very old. In the remarkable Chinese Account of Camboja, dating from the year 1296, which has been translated by Abel-Rémusat, there is a notice of a sect in Camboja called Pa-se. The author identifies them in a passing way, with the Tao-se, but that is a term which Fah-hian also in India uses in a vague way, apparently quite inapplicable to the Chinese sect properly so called. These Pa-se, the Chinese writer says, "wear a red or white cloth on their heads, like the head-dress of Tartar women, but not so high. They have edifices or towers, monasteries, and temples, but not to be compared for magnitude with those of the Buddhists. ... In their temples there are no images ... they are allowed to cover their towers and their buildings with tiles. The Pa-se never eat with a stranger to their sect, and do not allow themselves to be seen eating; they drink no wine," &c. (Rémusat, Nouv. Méll. As., i. 112). We cannot be quite sure that this applies to Mahommedans, but it is on the whole probable that the name is the same as the Pathi of the Burmese, and has the same application. Now the people from whom the Burmese were likely to adopt a name for the Yunnan Mahommedans are the Shans, belonging to the great Siamese race, who occupy the intermediate country. The question occurs:—Is Pathé a Shan term for Mahommedan? If so, is it not probably only a dialectic variation of the Passe of Camboja, the Pathé of Burma, but entering Burma from a new quarter, and with its identity thus disguised? (Cushing, in his Shan Dict., gives Paí for Mahommedan. We do not find Pathé). There would be many analogies to such a course of things.

["The name Panthay is a purely Burmese word, and has been adopted by us from them. The Shan word Pang-hse is identical, and gives us no help to the origin of the term. Among themselves and to the Chinese they are known as Hui-hui or Hui-tzu (Mahommedans)."—J. G. Scott, Gazetteer Upper Burma, i. 606.]

b. We find it stated in Lieut. Garnier's narrative of his great expedition to Yunnan that there is a hybrid Chinese race occupying part of the plain of Tali-fu, who are called Pen-ti (see Garnier, Voy. d'Expl. i. 518) This name again, it has been suggested, may possibly have to do with Panthé. But we find that Pen-ti ('root-soil') is a generic expression used in various parts of S. China for 'aborigines'; it could hardly then have been applied to the Mahommedans.

PANWELL, n.p. This town on the mainland opposite Bombay was in pre-railway times a usual landing-place on the way to Poona, and the English form of the name must have struck many besides ourselves. [Hamilton (Descr. ii. 151) says it stands on the river Pan, whence perhaps the name]. We do not know the correct form; but this one has substantially come down to us from the Portuguese: e.g.

1644.—"This Island of Caranja is quite near, almost frontier-place, to six cities of the Moors of the Kingdom of the Melique, viz. Carnattli, Drugo, Pene, Sabaya, Abita, and Panoei."—Bacarro, MS. f. 227.

1804.—"P.S. Tell Mrs. Waring that notwithstanding the debate at dinner, and her recommendation, we propose to go to Bombay, by Panwell, and in the balloon!"—Wellington, from "Candolli," March 8.

PAPAYA, PAPAW, s. This word seems to be from America like the insipid, not to say nasty, fruit which it denotes (Carica papaya, L). A quotation below indicates that it came by way of the Philippines and Malaccas. [The Malay name, according to Mr. Skeat, is betik, which comes from the same Ar. form as pateca, though papaya and kapaia have been introduced by Europeans.] Though of little esteem, and though the tree's peculiar quality of rendering fresh meat tender which is familiar in the W. Indies, is little known or taken advantage of, the tree is found in gardens and compounds all over India, as far north as Delhi. In the N.W. Provinces it is called by the native gardeners arand-kharbëa, 'castor-oil-tree-melon,' no doubt from the superficial resemblance of its foliage to that of the Palma Christi. According to Mooden Sheriff it has a Perso-Arabic name 'anbah-i-Hindi; in Canarese it is called Parangi-khawu or -mara ('Frank or Portuguese fruit, tree'). The name papaya according to Oviedo as quoted by Littré ("Oviedo, t. i. p. 333, Madrid, 1851,"—we cannot find it in Ramusio) was that used in Cuba, whilst the Carib name was ababa.* [Mr. J. Platt, referring to his article in 9th Ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 515, writes: "Malay popaya, like the Accra term kpaka, is a European loan word. The evidence for Carib origin is, firstly, Oviedo's Historia, 1555 (in the ed. of 1851, vol. i. 323): 'Del arbol que en esta isla Española llaman popaya, y en la tierra firme los llaman los Españoles los hogos del mastuerzo, y en la provinicia de Nicaragua llaman a tal arbol olocoton.' Secondly, Breton, Dictionnaire Caraïbe, has: 'Ababa, papayer.' Gililj, Saggio, 1782, iii. 146 (quoted in N. & Q., u.s.), says the Otamic word is papaii.""] Strange liberties are taken with the spelling. Mr. Robinson (below) calls it popoya; Sir L. Pelly (J.R.G.S. xxxv. 332), poppon (ὀ πόππον !). Papaya is applied in the Philippines to Europeans who, by long residence, have fallen into native ways and ideas.

1878.—". . . the rank popeyas clustering beneath their coronal of stately fruit."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 50.

PAPUA, u.p. This name, which is now applied generically to the chief race of the island of New Guinea and resembling tribes, and sometimes (improperly) to the great island itself, is a Malay word papuwaḥ, or sometimes puwaḥ-puwaḥ, meaning 'frizzled-haired,' and was applied by the Malays to the people in question.

1528.—"And as the wind fell at night the vessel was carried in among the islands, where there are strong currents, and got into the Sea of the Strait of Magalhães, where he encountered a great storm, so that but for God's mercy they had all been lost, and so they were driven on till they made the land of the Papasas, and then the east winds began to blow so that they could not sail to the Moluccas till May 1527. And with their stay in these lands much people got ill and many died, so that they came to Molucca much shattered."—Correa, iii. 173-174.

1553.—(Referring to the same history.) "Thence he went off to make the islands of a certain people called Papasas, whom many on account of this visit of Don Jorge (de Menezes) call the Islands of Don Jorge, which lie east of the Moluccas some 200 leagues. . . ."—Burros, IV. 1. 6.

PARABYKE, s. Burmese para-bëik; the name given to a species of writing book which is commonly used in Burma. It consists of paper made from the bark of a spec. of daphne, which is agglutinated into a kind of pasteboard and blackened with a paste of charcoal. It is then folded, screen-fashion, into a note-book and written on with a steelie pencil. The same mode of writing has long been used in Canara; and from La Loubère we see that it is or was used also in Siam. The Canara books are called kadam, and are described by Col. Wilks under the name of cudduttum, carruttum, or currut (Hist. Sketches, Pref. I. xii.). They appear exactly to resemble the Burmese para-beik, except that the substance blackened is cotton cloth instead of paper. "The writing is similar to that on a slate, and may be in like manner rubbed out and renewed. It is performed by a pencil of the balapum [Can. balapa] or lapis ollaris; and this mode of writing was not only in ancient use for records and public documents, but is still universally employed in Mysoor by merchants and shopkeepers, I have even seen a bond, regularly witnessed, entered in the cudduttum of a merchant, produced and received in evidence."

"This is the word kirret, translated 'palm-leaf' (of course conjecturally) in Mr. Crisp's translation of Tipoo's regulations. The Sultan prohibited its use in recording the public accounts; but although liable to be exunged, and affording facility to permanent entries, it is a much more durable material and record than the best writing on the best paper. . . . It is probable that this is the linen or cotton cloth described by Arrian, from Nearchus, on which the Indians wrote." (Strabo, XV. i. 67.)

1688. "The Siamese make Paper of old Cotton rags, and likewise of the bark of a Tree named Ton cot, . . . but these Papers have a great deal less Equality, Body and Whiteness than ours. The Siameses cease not to write thereon with China Ink. Yet most frequently they black them, which renders them smoother, and gives them a greater body; and then they write thereon with a kind of Crayon, which is made only of a clayish earth dry'd in the Sun. Their Books are not bound, and consist only in a very long Leaf . . . which they fold in and out like a Fan, and the way which the Lines are wrote, is according to the length of the folds. . . ."—De la Loubère, Siam, E.T. p. 12.

1855. "Booths for similar goods are arrayed against the corner of the palace palisades, and at the very gate of the Palace is the principal mart for the stationers who deal in the para-beiks (or black books) and stationery pencils, which form the only ordinary writing materials of the Burmese in their transactions."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 139.

PARANGHEE, s. An obstinate chronic disease endemic in Ceylon. It has a superficial resemblance to syphilis; the whole body being covered with ulcers, while the sufferer rapidly declines in strength. It seems to arise from insufficient diet, and to be analogous to the pellagra which causes havoc among the peasants of S. Europe. The word is apparently firinghee, 'European,' or (in S. India) 'Portuguese'; and this would point perhaps to association with syphilis.

PARBUTTY, s. This is a name in parts of the Madras Presidency for a subordinate village officer, a writer under the patel, sometimes the village-crier, &c., also in some places a superintendent or manager. It is a corruption of Telug. and Canarese parapatti, pargapatti, Mahr. and Konkani, parpatya, from Skt. pravritti, 'employment.' The term frequently occurs in old Port. documents in such forms as perpatim, &c. We presume that the Great Duke (audax omnia perpetui!) has used it in the Anglicised form at the head of this article; for though we cannot find it in his Despatches, Gurwood's Explanation of Indian Terms gives "Parbutty, writer to the Patell." [See below.]

1567.—". . . That no unbeliever shall serve as scribeven, shroff (zarafti), moosuddum, naique (see NAIK), peon, parpatrim, collector (succeeder), constable (? corrector), interpreter, procurator, or solicitor in court, nor in any other office or charge by which they may in any way whatever exercise authority over Christians. . . ."—Decree 27 of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Arch. Port. Orient, fasc. 4.

1800. "In case of failure in the payment of these instruments, the crops are seized, and sold by the Parputty or accountant of the division."—Buchanan's Mysore, ii. 151-2. The word is elsewhere explained by Buchanan, as "the head person of a Hoby in Mysore." A Hoby [Canarese and Malayal. hobati] is a sub-division of a talook (l. 270).

1803.—"Neither has any one a right to compel any of the inhabitants, much less the particular servants of the government, to attend him about the country, as the soubahadar (see SOUBADAR) obliged the parputty and patel (see PATEL) to do, running before his horse."—Wellington, Desp. i. 323. (Stanf. Dict.)

1878.—"The staff of the village officials . . . in most places comprises the following members . . . the crier (parpati). . . ."—Fonseca, Sketch of Goa, 21-22.

PARDAO, s. This was the popular name among the Portuguese of a gold coin from the native mints of Western India, which entered largely into the early currency of Goa, and the name of which afterwards attached to a silver money of their own coinage, of constantly degenerating value.

There could hardly be a better word with which to associate some connected account of the coinage of Portuguese India, as the pardao runs through its whole history, and I give some space to the subject, not with any idea of weaving such a history, but in order to furnish a few connected notes on the subject, and to correct some flagrant errors of writers to whose works I naturally turned for help in such a special matter, with little result except that of being puzzled and misled, and having time occupied in satisfying my self regarding the errors alluded to. The subject is in itself a very difficult one, perplexed as it is by the rarity or inaccessibility of books dealing with it, by the excessive rarity (it would seem) of specimens, by the large use in the Portuguese settlements of a variety of native coins in addition to those from the Goa mint,* by the frequent shifting of nomenclature in the higher coins and constant degeneration of value in the coins that retained old names. I welcomed as a hopeful aid the appearance of Dr. Gerson D'Acunha's Contributions to the Study of Indo-Chinese Numismatics. But though these contributions afford some useful facts and references, on the whole, from the rarity with which they give data for the intrinsic value of the gold and silver coins, and from other defects, they seem to me to leave the subject in utter chaos. Nor are the notes which Mr. W. de G. Birch appendes, in regard to monetary values, to his translation of Albuquerque, more to be commended. Indeed Dr. D'Acunha, when he goes astray, seems sometimes to have followed Mr. Birch.

The word pardao is a Portuguese (or perhaps an indigenous) corruption of Skt. परद्वा, 'splendour, majesty,' &c., and was no doubt taken, as Dr.

* Antonio Nunez, "Contador da Casa del Rey no Señor," who in 1554 compiled the Livro dos Pescos da Índia e asy Medidas e Moedas, says of Dui in particular:

"The moneys here exhibit such variations and such differences, that it is impossible to write anything certain about them; for every month, every 8 days indeed, they rise and fall in value, according to the money that enters the place " (p. 2).

D'Acunha says, from the legend on some of the coins to which the name was applied, e.g. that of the Raja of Ikkeri in Canara: Sri Pratåpa drishtåya.

A little doubt arises at first in determining to what coin the name pardao was originally attached. For in the two earliest occurrences of the word that we can quote—on the one hand Abdurrazzâk, the Envoy of Shâh Rukh, makes the partâb (or pardâo) half of the Varåha ("boar," so called from the Boar of Vishnu figured on some issues), हून, or what we call pagoda;—whilst on the other hand, Ludovico Varthema's account seems to identify the pardao with the pagoda itself. And there can be no doubt that it was to the pagoda that the Portuguese, from the beginning of the 16th century, applied the name of pardao d'ouro. The money-tables which can be directly formed from the statements of Abdurrazzâk and Varthema respectively are as follows:*

Abdurrazzâk (a.d. 1443).

| 3 Jitals (copper) | = 1 Tar (silver). |
| 6 Tars | = 1 Fanam (gold). |
| 10 Fanams | = 1 Partâb. |
| 2 Partâbs | = 1 Varåha. |

And the Varåha weighed about 1 Mithkål (see MISCALL), equivalent to 2 dïnârs Kopeki.

Varthema (a.d. 1504-5).

| 16 Cas (see CASH) | = 1 Tare (silver). |
| 16 Tare | = 1 Fanam (gold). |
| 20 Fanams | = 1 Pardao. |

And the Pardao was a gold ducat, smaller than the seraphim (see XERAFINE) of Cairo (gold dúnâr), but thicker.

The question arises whether the varåha of Abdurrazzâk was the double pagoda, of which there are some examples in the S. Indian coinage, and his partâb therefore the same as Varthema's, i.e. the pagoda itself; or whether his varåha was the pagoda, and his partâb a half-pagoda. The weight which he assigns to the varåha, "about one mithkål" a weight which may be taken at 73 grs., does not well suit either one or the other. I find the mean weight of 27 different issues of the (single) हून or pagoda, given in Pinsep's Tables, to be 43 grs., the maximum being 45 grs. And the fact that both the Envoy's varaha and the Italian traveller's pardao contain 20 fanams is a strong argument for their identity.*

In further illustration that the pardao was recognised as a half hân or pagoda, we quote in a foot-note "the old arithmetical tables in which accounts are still kept" in the south, which Sir Walter Elliot contributed to Mr. E. Thomas's excellent Chronicles of the Pathan Kings of Delhi, illustrated, &c.†

Moreover, Dr. D'Acunha states that in the "New Conquests," or provinces annexed to Goa only about 100 years ago, "the accounts were kept until lately in sauvoy and ninxe pagodas, each of them being divided into 2 pratâps . . . ." &c. (p. 46, note).

As regards the value of the pardao d'ouro, when adopted into the Goa currency by Alboquerque, Dr. D'Acunha tells us that it was equivalent to 370 reis, or 1s. 6d. † English." Yet he accepts the identity of this pardao d'ouro with the hân current in Western India, of which the Madras pagoda was till 1818 a living and unchanged representative, a coin which was, at the time of its abolition, the recognised equivalent of 3½ rupees, or 7 shillings. And doubtless this, or a few pence more, was the intrinsic value of the pardao. Dr. D'Acunha in fact has made his calculation from the present value of the (imaginary) rei. Seeing that a milrei is now reckoned equal to a dollar, or 50d., we have a single rei = 2½d., and 370 reis = 1s. 6½d. It seems not to have occurred to the author that the rei might have degenerated in value as well as every other denomination of money with which he has to do, every other in fact of which we can at this moment remember anything, except the pagoda,

* The issues of fanams, q.v., have been infinite; but they have not varied much in weight, though very greatly in alloy, and therefore in the number reckoned to a pagoda.
† "2 duguas = 1 chavula (= the panam or fanam), 2 chavulas = 1 hona (= the pratapa, mohan, or half pagoda),
2 honas = 1 Varaha (the hân or pagoda)."

"The gañjâ or unit (¼ fanam) is the rati, or Sanskrit raktaka, the seed of the abrum."—Op. cit. p. 294, note. See also Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India, p. 50.
† 360 reis is the equivalent in the authorities, so far as I know, the Venetian sequin, and the dollar.* Yet the fact of this degeneration everywhere stretches him in the face. Correa tells us that the cruzado which Alboquerque struck in 1510 was the just equivalent of 420 reis. It was indubitably the same as the cruzado of the mother country, and indeed A. Nunez (1554) gives the same 420 reis as the equivalent of the cruzado d'ouro de Portugal, and that amount also for the Venetian sequin and for the sultani or Egyptian gold dinâr. Nunez adds that a gold coin of Cambaye, which he calls Madrâfâxâo (q.v.), was worth 1260 to 1440 reis, according to variations in weight and exchange. We have seen that this must have been the gold-mohr of Muzaffar-Shâh II. of Guzerat (1511-1526), the weight of which we learn from E. Thomas's book.

From the Venetian sequin (content of pure gold 52-27 grs. value 111d.) the value of the rei at 1440 of this was . . . .264d.

From the Muzaffar Shâhi mohr (weight 185 grs. value, if pure gold, 392-52d.) value of rei at 1440 . . . .0 272d.

Mean value of rei in 1513 . . . .268d. i.e. more than five times its present value.

Dr. D'Acunha himself informs us (p. 56) that at the beginning of the 17th century the Venetian was worth 690 to 720 reis (mean 705 reis), whilst

* Even the pound sterling, since it represented a pound of silver sterlings, has come down to one-third of that value; but if the value of silver goes on dwindling as it has done lately, our pound might yet justify its name again!
I have remarked elsewhere: "Everybody seems to tickle at the notion that the Scotch Pound or Livre was only 20 pence. Nobody finds it funny that the French or Italian livre or Pound is only 20 halfpence or less!" I have not been able to trace how high the rei began, but the moreded entered life as a gold piece, equivalent to the Saracen mithkal, and ended† † I calculate all gold values in this paper at those of the present English coinage.

Besides the gradual depreciation of the Portugal rei, so prominently noticed in this paper, there was introduced in Goa a reduction of the rei locally below the rei of Portugal in the ratio of 15 to 8. I do not know the history or understand the object of such a change, nor do I see that it affects the calculations in this article. In a table of values of coins current in Portuguese India, given in the Annaes Maritimos of 1844, each coin is valued both in reis of Goa and in reis of Portugal, bearing the above ratio. My kind correspondent, Dr. J. N. Fonseca, author of the capital History of Goa, tells me that this was introduced in the beginning of the 17th century, but that he has yet found no document throwing light upon it. It is a matter quite apart from the secular depreciation of the rei.
the pagoda was worth 570 to 600 reis (mean 585 reis).

These statements, as we know the intrinsic value of the sequin, and the approximate value of the pagoda, enable us to calculate the value of the rei of about 1600 at ... 0·16d. Values of the malrei given in Milburn's Oriental Commerce, and in Kelly's Cambist, enable us to estimate it for the early years of the last century. We have then the progressive deterioration as follows:

Value of rei in the beginning of the 16th century ... 0·268d.
Value of rei in the beginning of the 17th century ... 0·16d.
Value of rei in the beginning of the 18th century ... 0·06 to 0·066d.
Value of rei at present ... 0·06d.

Yet Dr. D'Acunha has valued the coins of 1510, estimated in reis, at the rate of 1880. And Mr. Birch has done the same.*

The Portuguese themselves do not seem ever to have struck gold pardaos or pagodas. The gold coin of Alboquerque's coinage (1510) was, we have seen, a cruzado (or manuel), and the next coinage in gold was by Garcia de Sá in 1548-9, who issued coins called San Thome, worth 1000 reis, say about £1, 2s. 4d.; with halves and quarters of the same. Neither, according to D'Acunha, was there silver money of any importance coined at Goa from 1510 to 1550, and the coins then issued were silver San Thomes, called also pardaos (see PATACA). Nunez in his Tables (1554) does not mention these by either name, but mentions repeatedly pardaos, which represented 5 silver tangas, or 300 reis, and this D'Acunha speaks of as silver coins. Nunez, as far as I can make out, does not speak of them as coins, but rather implies that in account so many tangas of silver were reckoned as a pardao. Later in the century, however, we learn from Balbi (1580), Barrett * (1584), and Linschoten (1583-89), the principal currency of Goa consisted of a silver coin called xerajin (or XERAFINE) and pardao-xerajin, which was worth 5 tangas, each of 60 reis. (So these had been from the beginning, and so they continued, as is usual in such cases. The scale of sub-multiples remains the same, whilst the value of the divisible coin diminishes. Eventually the lower denominations become infinitesimal, like the maravedis and the reis, and either vanish from memory, or survive only as denominations of account). The data, such as they are, allow us to calculate the pardao or xerajin at this time as worth 4s. 2d. to 4s. 6d.

A century later, Fryer's statement of equivalents (1676) enables us to use the stability of the Venetian sequin as a gauge; we then find the tanga gone down to 6d. and the pardao or xerajin to 2s. 6d. Thirty years later Lockyer (1711) tells us that one rupee was reckoned equal to 1½ perdo. Calculated by Firishhta to have been paid by the Bāhmāni King, about A.D. 1470, as the annual cost of a body of 500 horse, with the cost of a British corps of Irregular horse of the same strength in Briggs's own time (say about 1810).

The Bāhmāni charge was 350,000 Rs.; the British charge 219,000 Rs. A corps of the same strength would now cost the British Government, as near as I can calculate, 287,300 Rs.

The price of an Arab horse imported into India (then a great traffic) was in Marco Polo's time about three times what it was in our own, up to 1850. The salary of the Governor at Goa, c. 1550, was 8000 cruzados, or nearly £500 a year; and the salaries of the commandants of the fortresses of Goa, of Malacca, of Dino, and of Bassain, 600,000 reis, or about £670.

The salary of Ibn Batuta, when Judge of Delhi, about 1340, was 1000 silver tankas or dinars as he calls them (practically 1000 rupees) a mouth, which was in addition to an assignment of villages bringing in 5000 tankas a year. And yet he got into debt in a very few years to the tune of £5,000 tankas—say £5,500! * Dr. D'Acunha has set this English traveller down to 1684, and introduces a quotation from him in illustration of the coinage of the latter period, in his quasi-chronological notes, a new element in the confusion of his readers.

* Thus Alboquerque, returning to Europe in 1504, gives a "Moorish" pilot, who carried him by a new course straight from Cannanore to Mozambique, a bucklish of 50 cruzados; this is explained as £5—a mild misnomer for such a feast. In truth it was nearly £24, the cruzado being about the same as the sequin (see l. p. 17).

The mint at Goa was carried out by the same great man, after the conquest, for 600,000 reis, amounting, we are told, to £125. It was really £670 (iii. 41).

Alboquerque demands as ransom to spare Muscat, "10,000 xerajins of gold." And we are told by the translator that this ransom of a wealthy trading city like Muscat amounted to £285. The coin in question is the ashraf, or gold dinar, as much as, or more than the sequin in value, and the sum more than £5000 (i. p. 82).

In the note to the first of these cases it is said that the xerajin is "a silver coin (formerly gold), now equivalent to 480 reis, or about 2s. English money, but probably worth much more relatively in the time of Alboquerque." "Much more relatively," means of course that the 2s. had much more purchasing power. This is a very common way of speaking, but it is often very fallaciously applied. The change in purchasing power in India generally till the beginning of last century was probably not very great. There is a curious note by Gen. Briggs in his translation of Firishhta, comparing the amount... ing the Surat Rupee, which may have been probably his standard, still by help of the Venetian (p. 262) at about 2s. 3d., the pardao would at this time be worth 1s. 6d. It must have depreciated still further by 1728, when the Goa mint began to strike rupees, with the effigy of Dom João V., and the half-rupee appropriated the denomination of pardao. And the halfrupee, till our own time, has continued to be so styled. I have found no later valuation of the Goa Rupee than that in Princeps’s Tables (Thomas’s ed. p. 55), the indications of which, taking the Company’s Rupee at 2s., would make it 21d. The pardao therefore would represent a value of 10½d., and there we leave it.

[On this Mr. Whiteway writes: “Should it be intended to add a note to this, I would suggest that the remarks on coinage commencing at page 67 of my Rise of the Portuguese Power in India be examined, as though I have gone to Sir H. Yule for much, some papers are now accessible which he does not appear to have seen.
There were two pardaos, the pardao d’ouro and the pardao de tanga, the former of 360 reis, the latter of 300.
This is clear from the Foral of Goa of Dec. 18, 1758 (India Office MSS. Cons-elho Ultramarina), which passage is again quoted in a note to Fasc. 5 of the Archiv. Port. Orient. p. 326. Apparently patecoons were originally coined in value equal to the pardao d’ouro, though I say (p. 71) their value is not recorded. The patecoon was a silver coin, and when it was tampered with, it still remained of the nominal value of the pardao d’ouro, and this was the cause of the outcry and of the injury the people of Goa suffered.
There were monies in Goa which I have not shown on p. 69. There was the tanga branca used in revenue accounts (see Nunez, p. 31), nearly but not quite double the ordinary tanga. This money of account was of 4 barganins (see BARGANY) each of 24 bazarucos (see BUDROOK), that is rather over 111 reals. The whole question of coinage is difficult, because the coins were continually being tampered with. Every ruler, and they were numerous in those days, stamped a piece of metal at his pleasure, and the trader had to calculate its value, unless as a subject of the ruler he was under compulsion.”]

1444. — “In this country (Vijayanagar) they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloys: one called vondaka weighs about a mithkal, equivalent to two dinars kopeki; the second, which is called pertab, is the half of the first; the third, called fanom, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last-mentioned coin. Of these different coins the fanom is the most useful...”—Abdurrazzak, in India in the 17th Cent. p. 26.

c. 1504-5; pubd. 1510. — “I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island, which... is called Goga (Goa) and which pays annually to the King of Docan 19,000 gold ducats, called by them pardais. These pardais are smaller than the seraphim of Cairo, but thicker, and have two devils stamped on one side, and certain letters on the other.”—Varthema, pp. 115-116.

1510.—“Meanwhile the Governor (Albro-querque) talked with certain of our people who were goldsmiths, and understood the alligation of gold and silver, and also with goldsmiths and money-changers of the country who were well acquainted with that business. There were in the country par-daos of gold, worth in gold 360 reis, and also a money of good silver which they called bargany (see BARGANY) of the value of 2 vintens, and a money of copper which they called bazarucos (see BUDROOK) of the value of 2 reis. Now all these the Governor sent to have weighed and assayed.
And he caused to be made cruzados of their proper weight of 420 reis, on which he figured on one side the cross of Christ, and on the other a sphere, which was the device of the King Dom Manuel; and he ordered that this cruzado should pass in the place (Goa) for 480 reis, to prevent their being exported... and he ordered silver money to be struck which was of the value of a bargany: on this money he caused the device to be figured on one side a Greek A, and on the other side a sphere, and gave the coin the name of Espera; it was worth 2 vintens; also there were half esperas worth one vinten; and he made bazarucos of copper of the weight belonging to that coin, with the A and the sphere; and each bazaruco he divided into 4 coins which they called cepayquas (see SAPECA), and gave the bazarucos the name of loaes. And in changing the cruzado into these smaller coins it was reckoned on 489 reis.”—Correia, ii. 70-77.

1516.—“There are current here (in Bati-cala—see BATCUL) the pardaos, which are a gold coin of the kingdom, and it is worth here 360 reis, and there is another coin of silver, called dama, which is worth 20 reis.
...”—Barbos, Lisbon ed. p. 293.
1516. — "There is used in this city (Bisnagar) and throughout the rest of the Kingdom much pepper, which is carried hither from Malabar on ozen and assed; and it is all bought and sold for pardaos, which are made in some places of this Kingdom, and especially in a city called Hora, (8) wherefore they are called hordo." — Barboes, Lisbon ed. p. 297.

1553. — "R. Let us mount our horses and take a ride in the country, and as we ride you shall tell me what is the meaning of Nizamara (see NIZAMALUCO) as you have frequently mentioned such a person.

"O. I can tell you that at once; it is the name of a King in the Bagulat (read Balagat, Balaghaut), whose father I often attended, and the son also not so often. I received from him from time to time more than 12,000 pardaos; and he offered an income of 40,000 pardaos if I would pay him a visit of several months every year, but this I did not accept." — Garcia, f. 33c.

1584. — "For the money of Goa there is a kind of money made of lead and tin mingled, being thicke and round, and stamped on the one side with the sphære or globe of the world, and on the other side two arrows and five rounds; and this kind of money is called Basaruchi, and 15 of them make a vinten of naughty money, and 5 vintens make a tanga, and 4 vintenas make a tanga of base money... and 5 tangas make a seraphine of gold (read 'silver'), which in marchandize is worth 6 tangas good money: but if one would change them into basaruchies, he may have 5 tangas, and 16 basaruchies, which matter they call cervaggio. and when the bargain of the pardaw is gold, each pardaw is meant to be 6 tangas good money; but in marchandize, the use is not to demand pardawes of gold in Goa, except it be for jewels and horses, for all the rest they take of seraphins of silver, per aduiso. The ducat of gold is worth 9 tangas and a halfe good money, and yet not stable in price, for that when the ships depart from Goa to Cochín, they pay them at 9 tangas and 3 fourth partes, and 10 tangas, and that is the most that they are worth..." — W. Barret, in Hakl. ii. 410. I retain this for the old.

English, but I am sorry to say that I find it is a mere translation of the notes of Gaspar Balbi, who was at Goa in 1580. We learn from Balbi that there were at Goa tangas not only of good money worth 75 basaruchi, and of bad money worth 80 basaruchi, but also of another kind of bad money used in buying wood, worth only 50 basaruchi!

1598. — "The principall and commonest money is called Pardaus Xeraphins, and is silver, but very brasse (read 'base'), and is coyned in Goa. They have Saint Sebastian on the one side, and three or four arrows in a bundle on the other side, which is as much as three Testones, or three hundred Reis Portingall money, and riseth or falloth little lesse or more, according to the exchange. There is also a kind of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such coined, but are so named only in telling, five Tangas is one Pardaw or Xeraphin, badde money, for you must understand that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde... Wherefore when they buy and sell, they bargain for good or badde money," &c. — Linschoten, ch. 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 241, and for another version see XERAPHINE].

"They have another kind of money called Pagodes which is of Gold, of two or three sortes, and are above 8 tangas in value. They are Indian and Heathenish money, with the feature of a Devil upon them, and therefore they are called Pagodes. There is another kind of gold money, which is called Venetanders; some of Venice, and some of Turkish coin, and are commonly (worth) 2 Pardawaes Xeraphins. There is yet another kind of golde called S. Thomas, because Saint Thomas is his name, and is worthe about 7 and 8 Tangas: There are likewise Rialles of 8 which are brought from Portingall, and are Pardawes de Reales. They are worth at their first coming out 436 Reyes of Portingall; and after are rayesed by exchaynge, as they are sought for when men travell for China. They use in Goa in their buying and selling a certaine manner of reckoning or telling. There are Pardawes Xeraphins, and these are silver. They name likewise Pardawes of Gold, and those are not in kinde or in cowne, but only so named in telling and reckoning: for when they buy and sell Pearles, stones, golde, silver and horses, they name but so many Pardawes, and then you must understand that one Pardaw is sixe Tangas: but in other ware, when you make not your bargaine before hand, but plainly name Pardawes, they are Pardawes Xeraphins of 5 Tangas the piece. They use also to say a Pardaw of Larins (see LARIN), and are Larins for every Pardaw. — Ibid.; [Hak. Soc. i. 187].

This extract is long, but it is the completest picture we know of the Goa currency. We gather from the passage (including a part that we have omitted) that in the latter part of the 16th century there were really no national coins there used intermediate between the basarucchi, worth at this time 0:133d., and the pardao xeratin worth 50d.* The vintens and tangas that were nominally interposed were mere names for certain quantities of basaruccos, or rather of reis represented by basaruccos. And our interpretation of the statement about parado of gold in a note above is here expressly confirmed.

[1599.—"Perdaw." See under TAEI.] c. 1620.—"The gold coin, struck by the réis of Bijanagar and Tiling, is called han and partáb."—Firishta, quoted by Quatre-mère, in Notices et Essais, xiv. 509.

PARELL, n.p. The name of a northern suburb of Bombay where stands the residence of the Governor. The statement in the Imperial Gazetteer that Mr. W. Hornby (1776) was the first Governor who took up his residence at Parell requires examination, as it appears to have been so occupied in Grose’s time. The 2nd edition of Grose, which we use, is dated 1773, but he appears to have left India about 1760. It seems probable that in the following passage Niebuhr speaks of 1763-4, the date of his stay at Bombay, but as the book was not published till 1774, this is not absolutely certain. Evidently Parell was occupied by the Governor long before 1776.

"Les Jesuites avoient autrefois un beau couvent aups du Village de Parell au milieu de l’île, mais il y a déjà plusieurs années, qu’elle est devenue la maison de campagne du Gouverneur, et l’Eglise est actuellement une magnifique salle à manger et de danse, qu’on n’en trouve point de pareille en toutes les Indes."—Niebuhr, Voyage, ii. 12.

[Mr. Douglas (Bombay and W. India, ii. 7, note) writes: "High up and outside the dining-room, and which was the chapel when Parell belonged to the Jesuits, is a plaque on which is printed: — ‘Built by Honourable Hornby, 1771.’"]

1554.—Parell is mentioned as one of 4 aldeas, “Parell, Varella, Varel, and Siva, attached to the Kazbah (Capçab—see CUSBAH) of Maim.”—Botelho, Tumbo, 157, in Subsidios.

c. 1750-60.—“A place called Parell, where the Governor has a very agreeable country-house, which was originally a Romish chapel belonging to the Jesuits, but confiscated about the year 1719, for some foul practices against the English interest."—Grose, i. 46; [1st ed. 1757, p. 72].

PARIAH, PARIAR, &c., s.

a. The name of a low caste of Hindus in Southern India, constituting one of the most numerous castes, if not the most numerous, in the Tamil country. The word in its present shape means properly ‘a drummer.’ Tamil Pari is the large drum, beaten at certain festivals, and the hereditary beaters of it are called (sing.) paraiygan, (pl.) paraiyar. [Dr. Oppert’s theory (Oryg. Inhabitants, 32 seq.) that the word is a form of Pahariya, ‘a mountaineer’ is not probable.] In the city of Madras this caste forms one fifth of the whole population, and from it come (unfortunately) most of the domestics in European service in that part of India. As with other castes low in caste-rank they are also low in habits, frequently eating carrion and other objectionable food, and addicted to drink. From their coming into contact with and under observation of Europeans, more habitually than any similar caste, the name Pariah has come to be regarded as applicable to the whole body of the lowest castes, or even to denote out-castes or people without any caste. But this is hardly a correct use. There are several castes in the Tamil country considered to be lower than the Pariahs, e.g., the caste of shoemakers, and the lowest caste of washermen. And the Pariah deals out the same disparaging treatment to these that he himself receives from higher castes. The Pariahs constitute a well-defined, distinct, ancient caste, which has ‘subdivisions’ of its own, its own peculiar usages, its own traditions, and its own jealousy of the encroachments of the castes which are above it and below it. They constitute, perhaps, the most numerous caste in the Tamil country. In the city of Madras they number 21 per cent. of the Hindu people.”—Bp. Caldwell, u. i., p. 545. Sir Walter Elliot, however, in the paper referred to further on includes under the term Paraiyga all the servile class not recognised by Hindus of caste as belonging to their community.

A very interesting, though not con-inclusive, discussion of the ethnological position of this class will be found in Jp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar (pp. 540-554). That scholar's deduction is, on the whole, that they are probably Dravidians, but he states, and recognises force in, arguments for believing that they may have descended from a race older in the country than the proper Dravidian, and reduced to slavery by the first Dravidians. This last is the view of Sir Walter Elliot, who adds a variety of interesting facts in its favour, in his paper on the Characteristics of the Population of South India.*

Thus, in the celebration of the Festival of the Village Goddess, prevalent all over Southern India, and of which a remarkable account is given in that paper, there occurs a sort of Saturnalia in which the Pariahs are the officiating priests, and there are several other customs which are most easily intelligible on the supposition that the Pariahs are the representatives of the earliest inhabitants and original masters of the soil. In a recent communication from this venerable man he writes: 'My brother (Col. C. Elliot, C.B.) found them at Raipur, to be an important and respectable class of cultivators. The Pariahs have a sacerdotal order amongst themselves.' [The view taken in the Madras Gloss. is that 'they are distinctly Dravidian without fusion, as the Hinduized castes are Dravidian with fusion.]

The mistaken use of pariah, as synonymous with out-caste, has spread in English parlance over all India. Thus the lamented Prof. Blochmann, in his School Geography of India: "Outcasts are called pariahs." The name first became generally known in Europe through Somerat's Travels (pub. in 1782, and soon after translated into English). In this work the Pariahs figure as the lowest of castes. The common use of the term is however probably due, in both France and England, to the appearance in the Abbé Raynal's famous Hist. Philosophique des Établissements dans les Indes, formerly read very widely in both countries, and yet more perhaps to its use in Bernardin de St. Pierre's preposterous though once popular tale, La Chaumeière Indienne, whence too the misplaced halo of sentiment which reached its acme in the drama of Casimir Delavigne, and which still in some degree adheres to the name. It should be added that Mr. C. P. Brown says expressly: "The word Paria is unknown" (in our sense) "to all natives, unless as learned from us."

b. See PARIAH-DOG.

1516.—"There is another low sort of Gentiles, who live in desert places, called Pareas. These likewise have no dealings with anybody, and are reckoned worse than the devil, and avoided by everybody; a man becomes contaminated by only looking at them, and is excommunicated. . . . They live on the imane (imane, i.e. yams), which are like the root of icca or botate found in the West Indies, and on other roots and wild fruits."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, 1. i. 310. The word in the Spanish version transl. by Lord Stanley of Alderley is Parent, in the Portuguese of the Lisbon Academy, Parens. So we are not quite sure that Parea is the proper reading, though this is probable.

1629.—"... The Pareas are of worse esteem."—(W. Method, in) Paralea, Pilgrimage, 553.

"... the worst whereof are the abhorred Piriaues . . . they are in publike Justice the hateful executioners, and the basest, most stinking, ill-favored people that I have seen."—Ibid. 998-9.

1648.—"... the servants of the factory even will not touch it (beef) when they put it on the table, nevertheless there is a caste called Pareyees (they are the most contemned of all, so that if another Gentoo touches them, he is compelled to be dipp in the water) who eat it freely."—Van de Broecke, 82.

1672.—"The Pareas are the basest and vilest race (accustomed to remove dung and all uncleanness, and to eat with vile rafles), in a word a contemned and stinking vile people."—Baldaeus ( Germ. ed.), 410.

1711.—"The Company allow two or three Peons to attend the Gate, and a Parrear Fellow to keep all clean."—Lockyer, 20.

And there . . . is such a resort of basket-makers, Scavengers, people that look after the buffaloes, and other Parriars, to drink Toddy, that all the Punch-houses in Madras have not half the noise in them."—Wheeler, ii. 125.

1717.—"... Barrier, or a sort of poor people that eat all sort of Flesh and other things, which others deem unclean."—Phillips, Account, &c., 127.

1726.—"As for the separate generations and sorts of people who embrace this religion, there are, according to what some folks say, only 4; but in our opinion they are 5 in number, viz.:

α. The Bramins.
β. The Settareas.
γ. The Weynys or Veysnas.
δ. The Sudras.
ε. The Perriars, whom the High-Dutch and Danes call Barriars."—Valentijn, Chorom. 73.

1745.—"Les Parreas ... sont regardés comme gens de la plus vile condition, exclus de tous les honneurs et prérogatives. Jusques-là qu’on ne sauroit les souffrir, ni dans les Pagodes des Gentils, ni dans les Eglises des Juives."—Norbert, i. 71.

1750.—"K. Es ist der Mist von einer Kuh, deren keine reine die Parreyer-Weiber, machen runde Kuchen daraus, und wenn sie in der Sonne genug getrocken sind, so verkaufen sie dieselben (see OOPLAIH).

1770.—"The fate of these unhappy wretches who are known on the coast of Coromandel by the name of Parias, is the same even in those countries where a foreign dominion has contributed to produce some little change in the ideas of the people."—Raynal, Hist. &c., see ed. 1783, i. 63.

"... The idol is placed in the centre of the building, so that the Parias who are not admitted into the temple may have a sight of it through the gates."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. p. 57.

1780.—"If you should ask a common cooly, or porter, what cast he is of, he will answer, 'the same as master, pariar-cast.'"—Munro's Narrative, 28-9.

1787.—"... I cannot persuade myself that it is judicious to admit Parias into battalions with men of respectable casts. ..."—Col. Fullarton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1791.—"Le masalchi y courut pour allumer un flambeau; mais il revient un peu après, pris d'haléine, criant: 'N'approchez pas d'ici; il y a un Paria!' Aussitôt la troupe effrayée cria: 'Un Paria! Un Paria!' Le docteur, croyant que c'était quelque animal féroce, mit la main sur ses pistolets. 'Qu'est ce que qu'un Paria ?' demanda-t-il à son porte-flambeau."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaumière Indienne, 48.

1800.—"The Pariah, and other impure tribes, comprising what are called the Punchum Bhardum, would be beaten, were they to attempt joining in a Procession of any of the gods of the Brahmins, or entering any of their temples."—Buchanan's Myore, i. 20.

c. 1805-6.—"The Dubashes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of cast and absolute destruction to any Brahmin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their language to a Pariah Frenzi. This reproach of Pariah is what we have tamely and strangely submitted to for a long time, when we might with a great facility have assumed the respectable character of Chatriya."—Letter of Leyden, in Morton's Memoir, ed. 1819, p. lxi.

1809.—"Another great obstacle to the reception of Christianity by the Hindoos is the admission of the Parias in our Churches. ..."—Ed. Valentia, i. 246.

1821.—"It is sur ce rivage une race flétrie, Une race étrangère au sein de sa patrie. Sans abri protecteur, sans temple hospitalier, Abominable, impie, horrible au peuple entier.
Les Parias; le jour à regret les échaîne, La terre sur son sein les porte avec colère. * * *
El bien! mais je frémis; tu vas me fuir peut-être;
Je suis un Paria. ..."
Casimir Delavigne, Le Paria, Acte i. Sc. 1.

1843.—"The Christian Pariah, whom both sects curse, Does all the good he can and loves his brother."—Forster's Life of Dickens, ii. 91.

1873.—"The Tamils hire a Pariya (i.e. drummer) to perform the decapitation at their Badra Kali sacrifices."—Kittel, in Ind. Ant. ii. 170.

1878.—"L'hypothèse la plus vraisemblable, en tout cas la plus heureuse, est celle qui suppose que le nom propre et spécial de cette race [i.e. of the original race inhabiting the Deccan before contact with northern invaders] était le mot 'paria'; ce mot dont l'orthographe correcte est pareiya, dérivé de par'i, 'bruit, tambour,' et à trois-bien, pu avoir le sens de 'parleur, doux de la parole' (!?)—Hvelaquin and Vinson, Études de Linguistique, &c., Paris, 67.

1872.—"... Fiiine, ordained from first to last, In body and in soul For one life-long debauch,
The Pariah of the north,
The European wantch."—Browning, Fiiine at the Fair.
Very good rhyme, but no reason. See under NAUTCH.

The word seems also to have been adopted in Java, e.g.:

1860.—"... We Europeans ... often ... stand far behind compared with the poor parials."—Max Havelaar, ch. vii.
PARIAH-ARRACK, s. In the 17th and 18th centuries this was a name commonly given to the poisonous native spirit commonly sold to European soldiers and sailors. [See FOOL'S RACK.]

1671-72.—"The unwholesome liquor called Parrier-arrack . . ."—Sir W. Langhorne, in Wheeler, iii. 422.

1711.—"The Tobacco, Beetle, and Pariaarrack, on which such great profit arises, are all expended by the Inhabitants."—Lockyer, 13.

1754.—"I should be very glad to have your order to bring the ship up to Calcutta . . . as . . . the people cannot here have the opportunity of intoxicating and killing themselves with Pariar Arrack."—In Long, 51.

PARIAH-DOG, s. The common ownerless yellow dog, that frequents all inhabited places in the East, is universally so called by Europeans, no doubt from being a low-bred casteless animal; often elliptically 'pariah' only.

1789.—". . . A species of the common cur, called a pariah-dog."—Mannro, Narr. p. 36.

1810.—"The nuisance may be kept circling for days, until forcibly removed, or until the pariah dogs swim in, and draw the carcass to the shore."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 261.

1824.—"The other beggar was a Pariah dog, who sneaked down in much bodily fear to our bivouac."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 79.

1875.—"Le Musulman qui va prier à la mosquée, maudit les pariahs hõmnes."—Rev. des Deux Mondes, April, 539.

[1883.—"Paraya Dogs are found in every street."—T. V. Row, Man. of Tanjore Dist. 104.]

PARIAH-KITE, s. The commonest Indian kite, Milvus Govinda, Sykes, notable for its great numbers, and its impudence. "They are excessively bold and fearful, often snatching morsels off a dish en route from kitchen to hall, and even, according to Adams, seizing a fragment from a man's very mouth" (Jerdon). Compare quotation under BRAHMINY KITE.

[1880.—"I had often supposed that the scavenger or Pariah Kites (Milvus govindae), which though generally to be seen about the tents, are not common in the jungles, must follow the camp for long distances, and today I had evidence that such was the case. . . ."—Bali, Jungle Life, 655.]

PARSEE, n.p. This name, which distinguishes the descendants of those emigrants of the old Persian stock, who left their native country, and, retaining their Zoroastrian religion, settled in India to avoid Mahomedan persecution, is only the old form of the word for a Persian, viz., Pārsi, which Arabic influences have in more modern times converted into Fārsi. The Portuguese have used both Parse and Perso. From the latter some of our old travellers have taken the form Persé; from the former doubtless we got Parsee. It is a curious example of the way in which different accidental mouldings of the same word come to denote entirely different ideas, that Persian, in this form, in Western India, means a Zoroastrian fire-worshipper, whilst Pathi (see PANTHAY), a Burmese corruption of the same word, in Burma means a Mahomedan.

c. 1325.—"There be also other pagan folk in this India who worship fire; they bury not their dead, neither do they burn them, but cast them into the midst of a certain roofless tower, and there expose them totally uncovered to the fowls of heaven. These believe in two First Principles, to wit, of Evil and of Good, of Darkness and of Light."—Friar Jordanus, 21.

1552.—"In any case he dismissed them with favour and hospitality, showing himself glad of the coming of such personages, and granting them protection for their ships as being (Parseos) Persians of the Kingdom of Ormuz."—Barros, I. viii. 9.

". . . especially after these were induced by the Persian and Guzerati Moors (Mouros, Parseos e Guzarates) to be converted from heathen (Gentios) to the sect of Mahamed."—Ibid. II. vi. 1.

[1563.—"There are other herb-sellers (mercaadores de boticas) called Coaris, and in the Kingdom of Cambay they call them Esparcis, and we Portuguese call them Jews, but they are not, only Hindus who came from Persia, and have their own writing."—Garcia, p. 213.]

1616.—"There is one sect among the Gentiles, which neither burne nor interre their dead (they are called Parcoes) who incircle pieces of ground with high stone walls, remote from houses or Road-ways, and therein lay their Carcasses, wrapped in Sheeets, thus having no other Tombes but the gorges of raunous Fowles."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1479.

1630.—"Whilst my observation was bestowed on such inquiry, I observed in the town of Surrat, the place where I resided, another Sect called the Persee. . . ."—Lord, Two Forraigne Sects.
1638.—"Outre les Benjamins il y a encore vne autre sorte de Payens dans le royaume de Guernante, qu'ils appellent Parsis. Ce sont des Perses de Fars, et de Chorasan."—Mandelslo (Paris, 1659), 213.

1648.—"They (the Persisans of India, i.e. Parsees) are in general a fast-grasping and avaricious nation (not unlike the Benjans and the Chinese), and very fraudulent in buying and selling."—Van Twist, 48.

1672.—"Non tutti ancora de' Gentili sono d' una medesima fede. Alcuni descendono dalla Persiana, li quali si conoscono dal colore, ed adorano il fuoco. ... In Suratte ne trouai molti."—P. F. Vincenzo Maria, Viaggio, 234.

1673.—"On this side of the Water are people of another Offspring than those we have yet mentioned, these be called Parseys ... these are somewhat white, and I think nastier than the Gentues. ..."—Fryer, 117.

"The Parsies, as they are called, are of the old Stock of the Persians, worship the Sun and Adore the Elements; are known only about Surat."—Ibid. p. 197.

1689.—"... the Persies are a Sect very considerable in India. ..."—Ovington, 370.

1726.—"... to say a word of a certain other sort of Heathen who have spread in the City of Suratte and in its whole territory, and who also maintain themselves in Agra, and in various places of Persia, especially in the Province of Kerman, at Yazd, and in Isphahan. They are commonly called by the Indians Parsees or Parsis, but by the Persians Gours or Gebbers, and also Atekh Peres or adorers of Fire."—Valentijn, iv. (Surat) 153.

1727.—"The Parsees are numerous about Surat and the adjacent Countries. They are a remnant of the ancient Persians."—A. Hamilton, ch. xiv; [ed. 1744, i. 159].

1877.—"... en selevant, le Parsi, après s'etre lavé les mains et la figure avec l'urine du taureau, met sa ceinture en disant: Souverain soitOrmuz, abattu soit Ahriman."—Dormeaudet, Ormuz et Ahriman, p. 2.

PARVOE, PURVO. s. The popular name of the writer-of-the-case in Western India, Prabhâ or Parbhâ, 'lord or chief' (Skt. prabhâ), being an honorific title assumed by the caste of Kâyath or Kâyastha, one of the mixt castes which commonly furnished writers. A Bombay term only.

1548.—"And to the Purvo of the Tenadar Mor 1500 reis a year, being 3 parduas a month. ..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 211.

[1773.—"Conicopolis (see CONICOPOLY). ... At Bombay he is stiled Purvo, and is of the Gentoo religion."—Ives, 49 seq.]

1809.—"The Brahmins of this village speak and write English; the young men are mostly parvoes, or writers."—Maria Graham, 11.

1813.—"These writers at Bombay are generally called Purvoes; a faithful diligent class."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 156-157; [2nd ed. i. 100].

1833.—"Every native of India on the Bombay Establishment, who can write English, and is employed in any office, whether he be a Brahman, Goldsmith, Parwary, Portuguese, or of English descent, is styled a Purvo, from several persons of a caste of Hindos termed Prabhooe having been among the first employed as English writers at Bombay."—Macintosh on the Tribe of Rumoostes, p. 77.

PASADOR, s. A marlin-spike. Sea-Hind., from Port. passador.—Roe buck.

PASEI, PACEM, n.p. The name of a Malay State near the N.E. point of Sumatra, at one time predominant in those regions, and reckoned, with Malacca and Majapahit (the capital of the Empire of Java), the three greatest cities of the Archipelago. It is apparently the Basma of Marco Polo, who visited the coast before Islam had gained a footing.

c. 1292.—"When you quit the kingdom of Ferroo you enter upon that of Basma. This also is an independent kingdom, and the people have a language of their own; but they are just like beasts, without laws or religion."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 9.

1511.—"Next day we departed with the plunder of the captured vessel, which also we had with us; we took our course forward until we reached another port in the same island Trapobana (Sumatra), which was called Pazzie; and anchoring in the said port we found at anchor there several junks and ships from divers parts."—Empoli, p. 53.

1553.—"In the same manner he (Diogo Lopes) was received in the kingdom of Pacem ... and as the King of Pedir had given him a cargo of pepper ... he did not think well to go further ... in case ... they should give news of his coming at Malaca, those two ports of Pedir and Pacem being much frequented by a multitude of ships that go there for cargoes."—Barros, II. iv. 31.
PĀT. 683  PATCHOULI, PATCH-LEAF.

1726.—"Next to this and close to the East-point of Sumatra is the once especially famous city Pasi (or Parem), which in old times, next to Magaphit and Malakka, was one of the three greatest cities of the East ... but now is only a poor open village with not more than 4 or 500 families, dwelling in poor bamboo cottages."—Valentijn, (v.) Sumatra, 10.

1727.—"And at Pissang, about 10 Leagues to the Westward of Diamond Point, there is a fine deep River, but not frequented, because of the treachery and bloody disposition of the Natives."—A. Hamilton, ii. 125; [ed. 1744].

PĀT, s. A can or pot. Sea-Hind. from English.—Koebuck.

PATACA, PATACOON, s. Ital. patacco; Provenç. patac; Port. pataco and patapão; also used in Malayalam. A term, formerly much diffused, for a dollar or piece of eight. Littré connects it with an old French word potard, a kind of coin, "du reste, origine inconnue." But he appears to have overlooked the explanation indicated by Volney (Voyage en Egypte, &c., ch. ix. note) that the name abatāka (or corruptly bātāka, see also Dozy & Eng. s.v.) was given by the Arabs to certain coins of this kind with a scutcheon on the reverse, the term meaning 'father of the window, or niche'; the scutcheon being taken for such an object. Similarly, the pillar-dollars are called in modern Egypt abā madofī, 'father of a cannon'; and the Maria Theresa dollar abā tera, 'father of the bird.' But on the Red Sea, where only the coinage of one particular year (or the modern imitation thereof, still struck at Trieste from the old die), is accepted, it is abā nukkīt, 'father of dots,' from certain little points which mark the right issue.

[1687.—"Pray if can procure a good Pallenkeen bamboo and 2 patch of ye finest with what colours you thinke hansom for my own wear, chockloes and susaes (see SOOSIE)."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cdxi.]

PATCHARÉE, PATCHERRY, PARCHERRY. s. In the Bengal Presidency, before the general construction of "married quarters" by Government, patcharé was the name applied in European corps to the cottages which used to form the quarters of married soldiers. The origin of the word is obscure, and it has been suggested that it was a corruption of Hind. pichch'hāri, 'the rear,' because these cottages were in rear of the barracks. But we think it most likely that the word was brought, with many other terms peculiar to the British soldier in India, from Madras, and is identical with a term in use there, parcherry or patcherry, which represents the Tam. pachch'ēri, paraippēri, 'a Pariah village,' or rather the quarter or outskirts of a town or village where the Pariahs reside. Mr. Whitworth (s.v. Patcherry) says that "in some native regiments the term denotes the married sepoys' quarters, possibly because Pariah sepoys had their families with them, while the higher castes left them at home." He does not say whether Bombay or Madras sepoys are in question. But in any case what he states confirms the origin ascribed to the Bengal Presidency term Patcharēe.

1781.—"Leurs maisons (c.-à.-d. des Pariás) sont des cabanes où un homme peut à peine entrer, et elles forment de petits villages qu'on appelle Paretcheris."—Sonnerat, ed. 1782, i. 98.

 PATCH, s. "Thin pieces of cloth at Madras" (Indian Vocabulary, 1788). Wilson gives patch as a vulgar abbreviation for Telug. pachch'hadamu, 'a particular kind of cotton cloth, generally 24 cubits long and 2 broad; two cloths joined together.'

1788.—"During the greater portion of the year extra working gangs of scavengers were kept for the sole purpose of going from Parcherry to Parcherry and cleaning them."—Report of Madras Municipality, p. 24.

1789.—"Experience obtained in Madras some years ago with reconstructed parcheries, and their effect on health, might be imitated possibly with advantage in Calcutta."—Report by Army Sanitary Commission.

PATCHOULI, PATCH-LEAF; also PUTCHE and PUTCHA-LEAF, s. In Beng. pachapāt; Deccani Hind.
The latter are trade names of the dried leaves of a labiate plant allied to mint (Pogostemon patchouly, Pelletier). It is supposed to be a cultivated variety of Pogostemon Heyneanus, Bentham, a native of the Deccan. It is grown in native gardens throughout India, Ceylon, and the Malay Islands, and the dried flowering spikes and leaves of the plant, which are used, are sold in every bazar in Hindustan. The pachá-pát is used as an ingredient in tobacco for smoking, as hair-scent by women, and especially for stuffing mattresses and laying among clothes as we use lavender. In a fluid form patchouli was introduced into England in 1844, and soon became very fashionable as a perfume.

The origin of the word is a difficulty. The name is alleged in Drury, and in Forbes Watson's Nomenclature to be Bengáli. Littré says the word patchouli is patchey-elly, 'feuille de patchey'; in what language we know not; perhaps it is from Tamil pachela, 'green,' and ēlā, ēlam, an aromatic perfume for the hair. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tamil paçčilā, paçčai, 'green,' ēlā, 'leaf.'—1673.—"Note, that if the following Goods from Acheen hold out the following Rates, the Factor employed is no further responsible."

Patch Leaf, 1 Bahar Mounds 7 20 sar."—Pryer, 209.

PATECA, s. This word is used by the Portuguese in India for a water-melon (Citrus vulgaris, Schrad; Cucurbita Citrullus, L.). It is from the Ar. al-battikh or al-biṭṭāk. F. Johnson gives this 'a melon,' musk-melon. A pumpkin; a cucurbitaceous plant. We presume that this is not merely the too common dictionary looseness, for the chaos of cucurbitaceous nomenclature, both vulgar and scientific, is universal (see A. de Candolle, Origine des Plantes cultivées). In Lane's Modern Egyptians (ed. 1837, i. 200) the word butteekh is rendered explicitly 'water-melon,' We have also in Spanish albañaca, which is given by Dozy and Eng. as 'espèce de melon'; and we have French pâteque, which we believe always means a water-melon. De Candolle seems to have no doubt that the water-melon was cultivated in ancient Egypt, and believes it to have been introduced into the Graeco-Roman world about the beginning of our era; whilst Hehn carries it to Persia from India, 'whether at the time of the Arabian or of the Mongol domination, (and then) to Greece, through the medium of the Turks, and to Russia, through that of the Tartar States of Astrakan and Kazan.'

The name pateca, looking to the existence of the same word in Spanish, we should have supposed to have been Portuguese long before the Portuguese establishment in India; yet the whole of what is said by Garcia de Orta is inconsistent with this. In his Colloquios XXXVI. the gist of the dialogue is that his visitor from Europe, Ruano, tells how he had seen what seemed a most beautiful melon, and how Garcia's housekeeper recommended it, but on trying it, it tasted only of mud instead of melon! Garcia then tells him that at Diu, and in the Bālaghāt, &c., he would find excellent melons with the flavour of the melons of Portugal but "those others which the Portuguese here in India call patecas are quite another thing—huge round or oval fruits, with black seeds—not sweet (dooe) like the Portugal melons, but bland (suave), most juicy and cooling, excellent in bilious fevers, and congestions of the liver and kidneys, &c." Both name and thing are represented as novelties to Ruano. Garcia tells him also that the Arabs and Persians call it batiee indè, i.e. melon of India (F. Johnson gives 'bītīkẖ-i-hindi, the citrul'; whilst in Persian hindwāna is also a word for water-melon) but that the real Indian country name was (calangari Mahr. kālingar, [perhaps that known in the N.W.P. as kalīndā, 'a water-melon']). Ruano then refers to the budícce of Castille of which he had heard, and queries if these were not the same as these Indian patecas, but Garcia says they are quite different. All this is curious as implying that the water-melon was strange to the Portuguese at that time (1563; see Colloquios, f. 141 v. seqq.). [A friend who has Burnell's copy of Garcia De Orta tells me that he finds a note in the writing of the former on bateca: "i.e. the Arabic term. As this is used all over India, water-melons must have been imported by the Mahommedans." I believe it to be a mistake that the word is in use all over India. I do not think the word is ever used in Upper India, nor is it (in that sense) in either Shakespear or Fallon. [Platts gives: A. bititkh, s.m. The melon (kharbasa); the water-melon, Cucurbita citrullus.] The most common word in the N.W.P. for a water-melon is Pers. tarbuz, whilst the musk-melon is Pers. kharbasa. And these words are so rendered from the AIN respectively by Blochmann (see his E.T. i. 66, "melons... water-melons," and the original i. 67, "kharbusa... tarbuz"). But with the usual chaos already alluded to, we find both these words interpreted in F. Johnson as "water-melon."

And according to Hehn the latter is called in the Slav tongues arbus and in Mod. Greek καρπόβατα, the first as well as the last probably from the Turkish karpuz, which has the same meaning, for this hard k is constantly dropped in modern pronunciation.—H. Y.] We append a valuable note on this from Prof. Robertson-Smith:

"(1) The classical form of the Ar. word is bititkh. Buttik is a widely-spread vulgarism, indeed now, I fancy, universal, for I don't think I ever heard the first syllable pronounced with an i.

"(2) The term, according to the law-books, includes all kinds of melons (Lane); but practically it is applied (certainly at least in Syria and Egypt) almost exclusively to the water-melon, unless it has a limiting adjective. Thus "the wild buttik" is the colo-cynth, and with other adjectives it may be used of various curcurbitaceous fruits (see examples in Dozy's Suppl.).

"(6) The biblical form is ā斗志kh (e.g. Numbers xi. 5, where the E.V. has 'melons'). But this is only the 'water-melon'; for in the Mishna it is distinguished from the sweet melon, the latter being named by a mere transcription in Hebrew letters of the Greek μήλουπτων. Löw justly concludes that the Palestinians (and the Syrians, for their name only differs slightly) got the sweet melon from the Greeks, whilst for the water-melon they have an old and probably true Semitic word. For bititkh Syriac has patīkh, indicating that in literary Arabic the a has been changed to i, only to agree with rules of grammar. Thus popular pronunciation seems always to have kept the old form, as popular usage seems always to have used the word mainly in its old specific meaning. The Bible and the Mishna suffice to refute Hehn's view (of the introduction of the water-melon from India). Old Kimhi, in his Mekhol, illustrates the Hebrew word by the Spanish budiceas."

1598.—"... ther is an other sort like Melons, called Patecas or Angyrias, or Melons of India, which are outwardlie of a darke greene colour; inwardly white with blacke kernels; they are verie waterish and hard to byte, and so moyst, that as a man eate them his mouth is full of water, but yet verie sweet and verie cold and fresh meat, wherefore manie of them are eaten after dinner to coole men."—Linschoten, 97 ; [Hak. Soc. ii. 35].

c. 1610.—"Toute la campagne est couverte d'arbres fruitiers... et d'arbres de coton, de quantité de melons et de pateques, qui sont espèce de citrouilles de prodigieuse grosseur..."—Pyrrard de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 286 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 399, and see i. 33].

A few pages later the word is written Pasteques.—Ibid. 301 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 417].

[1693.—"Pateques, or water-melons, are in great abundance nearly the whole year round: but those of Delhi are soft, without colour or sweetness. If this fruit be ever found good, it is among the wealthy people, who import the seed and cultivate it with much care and expense."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 250].

1673.—"'From hence (Elephanta) we sailed to the Pateques, a Garden of Melons (Putacho being a Melon) were there not wild Rats that hinder their growth, and so to Bombaim.'"—Fryer, 76.

PATEL, POTAIL, s. The headman of a village, having general control of village affairs, and forming the medium of communication with the officers of Government. In Mahr. patil, Hind. patel. The most probable etym. seems to be from pat, Mahr. 'a roll or register,' Skt.—Hind. paṭa. The title is more particularly current in territories that are or have been subject to the Mahrattas, "and appears to be an essentially Marathi word, being used as a respectful title in addressing one of that nation, or a Sūdra in general" (Wilson). The office is hereditary, and is often held under a Government grant. The title is not used in the Gangetic Provinces, but besides its use in Central and W. India it has been commonly employed in S. India, probably as a Hindustani word, though Monigar (see MONEGAR) PATNA. n.p. The chief city of Bahar; and the representative of the Palibothra (Pataliputra) of the Greeks. Hind. Pattana, "the city." [See quotation from D'Anville under ALLAHABAD.]

1586. — "From Bannaras I went to Pataanaw down the river of Ganesis. . . . Patenaw is a very long and a great town. In times past it was a kingdom, but now it is vnder Zelabdim Echebar, the great Mogor. . . . In this town there is a trade of cotton, and cloth of cotton, much sugar, which they carry from hence to Bengal and India, very much Opium, and other commodities." — R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 388.

1616. — "Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful Province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large Provinces within it, Purb (see POORUB) and Patan, the one lying on the east, and the other on the west side of the River Ganages." — Terry, ed. 1605, p. 387.

[1650. — "Pataa is one of the largest towns in India, on the margin of the Ganges, on its western side, and it is not less than two or three in length." — Tawerter, ed. Boll. i. 121 seq.].

1673. — "Sir William Langham . . . is Superintendent over all the Factories on the coast of Coromandel, as far as the Bay of Bengala, and up Hugly River . . . viz. Fort St. George, alias Maderas, Pattupole, Mechlapatam, Gundore, Medapolon, Balasore, Bengal, Hugly, Castle Bizzar, Pattanaw." — Fryer, 38.

1726. — "If you go higher up the Ganges to the N. W. you come to the great and famous trading city of Pattana, capital of the Kingdom of Bahar, and the residence of the Vice-roy." — Valen'tijn, v. 164.

1727. — "Pattana is the next Town frequented by Europeans . . . for Saltpetre and raw Silk. It produces also so much Opium, that it serves all the Countries in India with that commodity." — A. Hamilton, ii. 21; [ed. 1744].

PATOLA. s. Canarese and Malayal. pattula, 'a silk-cloth.' In the fourth quotation it is rather misapplied to the Ceylon dress (see COMBOY).

1516. — "Coloured cottons and silks which the Indians call patola." — Barbossa, 184.

1522. — " . . . Patolos of silk, which are cloths made at Cambaya that are highly prized at Malaca." — Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, 714.

1545. — " . . . homens . . . enchadados com patolas de seda." — Pinto, ch. clx. (Cogan, p. 219).

1552. — "They go naked from the waist upwards, and below it they are clothed with silk and cotton which they call patolas." — Castanheda, ii. 78.

PATTAMAR, PATIMAR, &c.

This word has two senses:

a. A foot-runner, a courier. In this use the word occurs only in the older writers, especially Portuguese.

b. A kind of lateen-rigged ship, with one, two, or three masts, common on the west coast. This sense seems to be comparatively modern. In both senses the word is perhaps the Konkani path-mät, 'a courier.' C. F. Brown, however, says that patta-mar, applied to a vessel, is Malayal. signifying "goose-wing." Molesworth's "Mahr. Dict." gives both patemärk and phatemärk for "a sort of swift-sailing vessel, a pattymarn," with the etym. "tidings-bringer." Patta is 'tidings;' but the second part of the word so derived is not clear. Sir J. M. Campbell, who is very accurate, in the Bo. Gazetteer writes of the vessel as pätimär, though identifying, as we have done, both uses with pathmär, 'courier.' The Moslem, he says, write phatemärk quasi fath-märk, 'snake of victory' (?). [The Madras Gloss. gives Mal. patta-mär, Tam. pätimär, from patär, Hind. 'tidings' (not in Platts), mär, Mahr. 'carrier.'] According to a note in "Notes and Extracts, No. 1 (Madras, 1871), p. 27, under a Ft. St. Geo. Consultation of July 4, 1673, Pattamar is therein used "for a native vessel on the Coromandel Coast, though now confined to the Western Coast." We suspect a misapprehension. For in the following entry we have no doubt that the parenthetical gloss is wrong, and that couriers are meant:

1552.—". . . But Lorenzo de Brito, seeing things come to such a pass that certain Captains of the King (of Cananor) with troops chased him to the gates, he wrote to the Viceroy of the position in which he was by Patamares, who are men that make great journeys by land."—"De Barros, II. i. 3.

The word occurs repeatedly in Correa, Lendas, e.g. III. i. 108, 149, &c.

1593.—". . . There are others that are called Patamares, which serve only for Messengers or Posts, to carry letters from place to place by land in winter-time when men cannot traveile by sea."—"Linschoten, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 260, and see ii. 165.]

1606.—"The sight and twentieth, a Patemar told that the Governor was a friend to us only in shew, wishing the Portuguese in our room; for we did no good in the Country, but brought Wares which they were forced to buy. . . ."—Roger Haves, in "Parchots," i. 605.

[1610.—"The Patamar (for so in this country they call poor footmen that are letter-bearers). . . ."—"Foster, Letters, iv. 227.]

1666.—"Tranquebar, which is elogne de Saint Thome de cinq journées d'un Courier à pie, qu'on appelle Patamar."—Thevenot, v. 275.

1673.—"After a month's Stay here a Patamar (a Foot Post) from Fort St. George made us sensible of the Dutch being gone from thence to Ceylon."—Fryer, 36.

[1684.—"The Pattamars that went to Codaloor by reason of the deepness of the Rivers were forced to Return. . . ."—Pringle, Diary of St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 133.]

1689.—"A Pattamar, i.e. a Foot Messenger, is generally employ'd to carry them (letters) to the remotest Bounds of the Empire."—"Ovington, 251.

1705.—"Un Patemare qui est un homme du Pais; c'est ce que nous appelons un expresse . . ."—"Lutillier, 43.

1758.—"Yesterday returned a Pattamar or express to our Jew merchant from Aleppo, by the way of the Desert. . . ."—"Ives, 267.

C. 1760.—"Between Bombay and Surat there is a constant intercourse preserved, not only by sea . . . but by Pattamars, or foot-messengers overland."—"Gros, 119. This is the last instance we have met of the word in this sense, which is now quite unknown to Englishmen.

b.—

1600.—". . . Escrevia que hum barco pequeno, dos que chamam patamates, se meteria. . . ."—"Lucena, Vida do P. P. Xavier, 153.

[1822.—"About 12 o'clock on the same night they embarked in paddinars for Cochin."—"Wallace, Fifty Years, 206.]

1891.—A description of the Patamars, with a plate, is given in Mr. John Edye's paper on Indian coasting vessels, in vol. i. of the "Rs. As. Soc. Journal.

1890.—"Among the vessels at anchor lie the dows (see DHOV) of the Arabs, the patameras of Malabar, and the dhneys (see DONEY) of Coromandel."—"Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 103.

PATTELLO, PATELLEE. s. A large flat-bottomed boat on the Ganges; Hind. patael. [Mr. Grierson gives among the Behar boats "the patele or pataul, also called in Saran katra, on which the boards forming the sides overlap and are not joined edge to edge," with an illustration (Bihar Peasant Life, 43).]
1680.—"The Patella; the boats that come down from Pattana with Saltpeeter or other goods, built of an Exceeding Strength and are very flat and burthensome."—Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 15.

1685.—"We came to a great Godowne, where... this Nabob's Son has laid in a vast quantity of Salt, here we found divers great Patellons taking in their lading for Pattana."—Ibid. Jan 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 175].

1860.—"The Putelee (or Koutorn), or Baggage-boat of Hindostan, is a very large, flat-bottomed, clinker-built, unwieldy-looking piece of rustickity of probably... about 35 tons burthen; but occasionally they may be met with double this size."—Colesworthy Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, p. 6.

PAULIST, n.p. The Jesuits were commonly so called in India because their houses in that country were formerly always dedicated to St. Paul, the great Missionary to the Heathen. They have given up this practice since their modern re-establishment in India. They are still called Paolotti in Italy, especially by those who don't like them.

c. 1567.—"... e vi sono assai Chiese dei padri di San Paolo i quali fanno in quei luoghi gran profitto in convertire quei popoli."—Federici, in Romusio, iii. 390.

1623.—"I then went to the College of the Jesuit Fathers, the Church of which, like that at Damon, at Bassaim, and at almost all the other cities of the Portuguese in India, is called San Paolo; whence it happens that in India the said Fathers are known more commonly by the name of Paolisti than by that of Jesuits."—P. della Valle, April 27; [iii. 135].

c. 1650.—"The Jesuits at Goa are known by the name of Paulists; by reason that their great Church is dedicated to St. Paul. Nor do they wear Hats, or Corner-Caps, as in Europe, but only a certain Bonnet, resembling the Skull of a Hat without the Brims."—Tavernier, E.T. 77; [ed. Ball, i. 197].

1672.—"There was found in the fortress of Cranganor a handsome convent, and Church of the Paulists, or disciples and followers of Ignatius Loyola. ..."—Balaeanus, Germ., p. 110. In another passage this author says they were called Paulists because they were first sent to India by Pope Paul III. But this is not the correct reason.

1673.—"St. Paul's was the first Monastery of the Jesuits in Goa, from whence they receive the name Paulista."—Fryer, 150.

[1710.—See quotation under COBRA DE CAPELLO.]

1760.—"The Jesuits, who are better known in India by the appellation of Paulists, from their head church and convent of St. Paul's in Goa."—Grose, i. 50.

PAUNCHWAY, s. A light kind of boat used on the rivers of Bengal; like a large dingy (q.v.), with a tilted roof of matting or thatch, a mast and four oars. Beng. pansi, and punsoi. [Mr. Grierson (Peasant Life, 43) describes the punsoi as a boat with a round bottom, but which goes in shallow water, and gives an illustration.]

[1757.—"He was then beckoning to his servant that stood in a Ponas above the Gait."—A. Grant, Account of the Loss of Calcutta, ed. by Col. Temple, p. 7.]

c. 1760.—"Ponsways, Guard-boats."—Grose (Glossary).

1780.—"The Paunchways are nearly of the same general construction (as budge-rows), with this difference, that the greatest breadth is somewhat further aft, and the stern lower."—Hedges, 39-40.

1790.—"Mr. Bridgewater was driven out to sea in a common paunchway, and when every hope forsook him the boat floated into the harbour of Masulipatam."—Calcutta Monthly Review, i. 40.

1823.—"... A paunchway, or passage-boat... was a very characteristic and interesting vessel, large and broad, shaped like a snuffer-dish; a deck fore-and-aft, and the middle covered with a roof of palm-branches..."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 21.

1860.—"... You may suppose that I engage neither pinnace nor bujra (see BUDGEROW), but that comfort and economy are sufficiently obtained by hiring a small bhoutiya (see BOLIAH) that is more likely at a fine weather season like this, a small native punsooee, which, with a double set of hands, or four cars, is a lighter and much quicker boat."—C. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 10 [with an illustration].

PAWL, s. Hind. pâl, [Skt. pâlal, 'a root']. A small tent with two light poles, and steep sloping sides; no walls, or ridge-pole. I believe the statement 'no ridge-pole,' is erroneous. It is difficult to derive from memory an exact definition of tents, and especially of the difference between pawl and shooldarry. A reference to India failed in getting a reply. The shooldarry is not essentially different from the pawl, but is trimmer, tauter, better closed, and sometimes has two flies. [The names of tents are used in various senses in different parts. The Madras Gloss. defines a pawl as "a small tent with two light poles, a ridge-bar, and steep sloping sides; the walls, if any, are very short, often not more than 6 inches high. Sometimes a second ridge above carries a second roof over the first; this makes a common shooting tent." Mr. G. R. Dampier writes: "These terms are, I think, used rather loosely in the N.W.P. Sholdarī generally means a servant's tent, a sort of tente d'abri, with very low sides: the sides are generally not more than a foot high; there are no doors only flaps at one end. Pāl is generally used to denote a sleeping tent for Europeans; the roof slopes on both sides from a longitudinal ridge-pole; the sides are much higher than in the sholdarī, and there is a door at one end; the fly is almost invariably single. The Raoti (see ROWTEE) is incorrectly used in some places to denote a sleeping pāl; it is, properly speaking, I believe, a larger tent, of the same kind, but with doors in the side, not at the end. In some parts I have found they use the word pāl as equivalent to sholdarī and biltan (! bell-tent)."

1785.—"Where is the great quantity of baggage belonging to you, seeing that you have nothing besides tents, pawsis, and other such necessary articles?"—Tippoo's Letters, p. 49.

1793.—"There were not, I believe, more than two small Pauls, or tents, among the whole of the deputation that escorted us from Patna."—Kirkpatrick's Nepaul, p. 118.

[1809.—"The shops which compose the Bazaars, are mostly formed of blankets or course cloth stretched over a bamboo, or some other stick for a ridge-pole, supported at either end by a forked stick fixed in the ground. These habitations are called pauls."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 20.]

1827.—"It would perhaps be worth while to record the material and personnel of my camp equipment; an humble captain and single man travelling on the most economical principles. One double-poled tent, one routee (see ROWTEE), or small tent, a pāl or servants' tent, 2 elephants, 6 camels, 4 horses, a pony, a baggage, and 24 servants, besides maubohs, servans or camel-drivers, and tent pitchers."—Mundy, Journal of a Tour in India, [3rd ed., p. 8]. We may note that this is an absurd exaggeration of any equipment that, even seventy-five years since would have characterised the march of a 'humble captain travelling on economical principles,' or any one under the position of a highly-placed civilian. Captain Mundy must have been enormously extravagant.

[1849.—"we breakfasted merrily under a paul (a tent without walls, just like two cards leaning against each other)."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 141.]

PAWN, s. The betel-leaf (q.v.) Hind. pānī, from Skt. parma, 'a leaf.'

It is a North Indian term, and is generally used for the combination of betel, areca-nut, lime, &c., which is politely offered (along with otto of roses) to visitors, and which intimates the termination of the visit. This is more fully termed pawn-sooparī (supārī, [Skt. supriya, 'pleasant,'] is Hind. for areca). "These leaves are not used to be eaten alone, but because of their bitternes they are eaten with a certain kind of fruit; which the Malabar's and Portuagals call Areeca, the Gusuvarates and Decavrijs Supariys . . ." (In Purchas, ii. 1781).

1616.—"The King giving mee many good words, and two pieces of his Pawn out of his Dish, to cate of the same he was eating. . . ."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 576; [Hak. Soc. ii. 453.]

1673.—". . . it is the only Indian entertainment, commonly called Pawn."—Fryer, p. 140.

1809.—"On our departure pawn and roses were presented, but we were spared the attar, which is every way detestable."—Ld. Valentin, i. 101.

PAWNEE, s. Hind. pānī, 'water.' The word is used extensively in Anglo-Indian compound names, such as bilayutee pawnee, 'soda-water,' brandy-pawnee, Khush-bo pawnee (for European scents), &c., &c. An old friend, Gen. J. T. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal), contributes from memory the following Hindī words to Water, on the Pindaric theme ἄρρων μὲν ὑδρόν, or the Thaletic one ἄρχῃ δὲ τῶν πάντων ὑδρόν!

"Pānī kīā, pānī tāl; Pānī ātā, pānī dāl; Pānī bāgh, pānī ramnā; Pānī Gangā, pānī Jumnā; Pānī haštā, pānī rotā; Pānī jagtā, pānī sotā; Pānī bāp, pānī mā; Barā nām Pānī kā!"

Thus rudely done into English:

"Thou, Water, stor'st our Wells and Tanks, Thou fillest Gunga's, Jumna's banks; Thou Water, sendest daily food, And fruit and flowers and needful wood; Thou, Water, laugh'st, thou, Water, weepest; Thou, Water, wak'st, thou, Water, sleepest;—Father, Mother, in thee blest,—Hail, O glorious element!"
PAWNEE, KALLA. s. Hind. kālā pānī, i.e. 'Black Water'; the name of dread by which natives of the interior of India designate the Sea, with especial reference to a voyage across it, and to transportation to penal settlements beyond it. "Hindu servants and sepoys used to object to cross the Indus, and called that the kālā pānī. I think they used to assert that they lost caste by crossing it, which might have induced them to call it by the same name as the ocean,—or possibly they believed it to be part of the river that flows round the world, or the country beyond it to be outside the limits of Aryavartta." (Note by Lt.-Col. J. M. Trotter).

1823.—"An agent of mine, who was for some days with Cheetoo" (a famous Pindārī leader), "told me he raved continually about Kala Panee, and that one of his followers assured him when the Pindarry chief slept, he used in his dreams to repeat these dreaded words aloud."—Sir J. Malcolm, Central India (2nd ed.), i. 446.

1833.—"Kala Pany, dark water, in allusion to the Ocean, is the term used by the Natives to express transportation. Those in the interior picture the place to be an island of a very dreadful description, and full of malevolent beings, and covered with snakes and other vile and dangerous nondescript animals."—Macintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Ramoosies, 44.

PAYEN-GHAUT, n.p. The country on the coast below the Ghauts or passes leading up to the table-land of the Deccan. It was applied usually on the west coast, but the expression Carnatic Payen-ghait is also pretty frequent, as applied to the low country of Madras on the east side of the Peninsula, from Hind. and Mahr. ghat, combined with Pers. pānī, 'below.'

[It is generally used as equivalent to Talaghât, "but some Musalmans seem to draw the distinction that the Payin-ghait is nearer to the foot of the Ghâts than the Talaghât" (Le Fann, Man. of Salem, ii. 338)].

1629-30.—"But ('Azam Khân) found that the enemy having placed their elephants and baggage in the fort of Dhrârâr, had the design of descending the Payin-ghât."—Abdul Hamid Lahori, in Elliot, vii. 17.

1784.—"There is friendship... between the said Company and the Nabob Tippo Sultan Bahauder, and their friends and allies, particularly including therein the Rajahs of Tanjore and Travancore, who are friends and allies to the English and the Carnatic Payen Ghait."—Treaty of Mangalore in Munro's Narr, 252.

1785.—"You write that the European taken prisoner in the Payen-ghait... being skilled in the mortar practice, you propose converting him to the faith... It is known (or understood)."—Letters of Tippoo, p. 12.

PAZEND, s. See for meaning of this term s.v. Pahlavi, in connection with Zend. (See also quotation from Mu'ūṣādī under latter.)

PECUL, PIKOL, s. Malay and Javanese pikul, 'a man's load.' It is applied as the Malay name of the Chinese weight of 100 katis (see CATTY), called by the Chinese themselves shâk, and =133½ lb. avoird. Another authority states that the shâk is =412 kân or katis, whilst the 100 kân weight is called in Chinese tan.

1554.—"In China 1 tael weighs 7½ tanga larins of silver, and 16 taels = 1 catâ (see CATTY); 100 catâs = 1 pico = 45 tangas of silver weigh 1 mark, and therefore 1 pico = 133½ arratels (see ROTTLE)."—A. Nunes, 41.

And in China anything is sold and bought by cates and picos and tael, provisions as well as all other things."—Ib. 42.

[1616.—"The wood we have sold at divers prices from 24 to 28 mas per Picoll."—Foder, Letters, iv. 259.]

PEDIR, n.p. The name of a port and State of the north coast of Sumatra. Barros says that, before the establishment of Malacca, Pedir was the greatest and most famous of the States on that island. It is now a place of no consequence.

1498.—It is named as Pater in the Routério de Vasco da Gama, but with very incorrect information. See p. 113.

1510.—"We took a junk and went towards Sumatra, to a city called Pider. In this coast there grows a great quantity of pepper, and of long pepper which is called Molaga... in this port there are laden with it every year 18 or 20 ships, all of which go to Cathai."—Varthema, 233.

1511.—"And having anchored before the said Pedir, the Captain General (Albuquerque) sent for me, and told me that I should go ashore to learn the disposition of the people... and so I went ashore in the evening, the General thus sending me into a country of enemies,—people too whose vessels and goods we had seized, whose fathers, sons, and brothers we had killed;—into a country where even among themselves there is little justice, and treachery in plenty, still more so as regards strangers; truly he acted as caring little what became of me! . . . The answer given me was this: that I should tell the Captain Major General that the city of Pedir had been for a long time noble and great in trade . . . that its port was always free for every man to come and go in security . . . that they were men and not women, and that they could hold for no friend one who seized the ships visiting their harbours; and that if the General desired the King's friendship let him give back what he had seized, and then his people might come ashore to buy and sell."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 54.

1516.—"The Moors live in the seaports, and the Gentiles in the interior (of Sumatra). The principal kingdom of the Moors is called Pedir. Much very good pepper grows in it, which is not so strong or so fine as that of Malabar. Much silk is also grown there, but not so good as the silk of China."—Barbosa, 196.

1538.—"Furthermore I told him what course was usually held for the fishing of seed-pearl between Pullo Tepnos and Pullo Qenivm, which in time past were carried by the Batalos to Paezem (see PASEI) and Pedir, and exchanged with the Turks of the Straight of Messa, and the Ships of Judaa (see JUDEA) for such Merchandise as they brought from Grand Cairo."—Pinto (in Cogan), 25.

1553.—"After the foundation of Malaca, and especially after our entrance to the Indies, the Kingdom of Paezem began to increase, and that of Pedir to wane. And its neighbouring of Achem, which was then insignificant, is now the greatest of all, so vast are the vicissitudes in States of which men make so great account."—Barros, iii. v. 1.

1615.—"Articles exhibited against John Oxwicke. That since his being in Peedere 'he did not entreate' anything for Priaman and Tecco, but only an answer to King James's letter . . ."—Sainsbury, i. 411.

"Peedere."—Ibid. p. 415.

PEEADA. See under PEON.

PEENUS, s. Hind. pinnus; a corruption of Eng. pinnace. A name applied to a class of budgerow rigged like a brig or brigantine, on the rivers of Bengal, for European use. Roebeck gives as the marine Hind, for pinnace, p'heez, [The word has been adopted by natives in N. India as the name for a sort of palakim, such as that used by a bride.]
learned scholar. The tree is peculiarly destructive to buildings, as birds drop the seeds in the joints of the masonry, which becomes thus penetrated by the spreading roots of the tree. This is alluded to in a quotation below. "I remember noticing among many Hindus, and especially among Hinduized Sikhs, that they often say Pipal ko jatva hinh (I am going to the Peepul Tree), to express 'I am going to say my prayers.'" (Lt.-Col. John Trotter.) (See BO-TREE.)

c. 1550.—"His soul quivered like a pipal leaf."—Rámâyana of Tulsí Dás, by Groisse (1878), ii. 25.

[c. 1590.—"In this place an arrow struck Sri Kishn and buried itself in a pipal tree on the banks of the Sarasút."—Ain, ed. Jarred, ii. 246.]

1506.—"Au sortir du village un pipal élève sa tête majestueuse. . . . Sa nombreuse couronne l'entoure au loin sur la plaine, telle qu'une armée de géants qui entrelacent fraternellement leurs bras informes."—Haafner, i. 149. This writer seems to mean a banyan. The peepul does not drop roots in that fashion.

1817.—"In the second ordeal, an excavation in the ground . . . is filled with a fire of pipal wood, into which the party must walk barefoot, provoking his guilt if he is burned; his innocence, if he escapes unhurt."—M'Ille (quoting from Halhed), ed. 1830, i. 280.

1826.—"A little while after this he arose, and went to a Peepul-tree, a short way off, where he appeared busy about something, I could not well make out what."—Pandurang Hari, 26; [ed. 1873, i. 36, reading Peepal].

1836.—"It is not proper to allow the English, after they have made made war, and peace has been settled, to remain in the city. They are accustomed to act like the Peepul tree. Let not Younger Brother therefore allow the English to remain in his country."

—Letter from Court of China to Court of Ava. See Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 265.

1844.—"Je ne puis passer sous silence ces beaux arbres . . . ce sont le peuplier d'Inde à larges feuilles, arbre réputé sacré. . . ."—Puléogía, Siam, i. 140.

1861.—". . . Yonder crown of umbrage hoar Shall shield her well; the Peepul whisper a dirge And Caryota drop her tearlike store Of beads; whilst over all slim Casuarine Points upwards, with her branchlets ever green, To that remaining Rest where Night and Tears are o'er."—Barrackpore Park, 18th Nov. 1861.

PEER, s. Pers. pír, a Mahomedan Saint or Beatus. But the word is used elliptically for the tombs of such personages, the circumstance pertaining to them which chiefly creates notoriety or fame of sanctity; and it may be remarked that wali (or Wely as it is often written), Īmámzādah, Sháikh, and Marabout (see ADJUTANT), are often used in the same elliptical way in Syria, Persia, Egypt, and Barbary respectively. We may add that Nabi (Prophet) is used in the same fashion.

[1609.—See under NUGGURCOTE.

[1623.—"Within the Mosquée (see MOSQUE) . . . is a kind of little Pyramid of Marble, and this they call Pir, that is Old, which they say is equivalent to Holy; I imagine it the Sepulchre of some one of their Sect accounted such."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 69.]

1665.—"On the other side was the Garden and the chambers of the Mullahs, who, with great convenience and delight spend their lives there under the shadow of the miraculous Sanctity of this Piper, which they are not wanting to celebrate: But as I am always very unhappy on such occasions, he did no Miracle that day upon any of the sick."—Borner, 133; [ed. Constable, 415].

1673.—"I hard by this is a Peer, or Burying place of one of the Prophets, being a goodly monument."—Fryer, 240.

1889.—"Certaines pirs sont tellement renommés, qu'aussi qu'on le verra plus loin, le peuple a donné leurs noms aux mois lunaires où se trouvent placées les fêtes qu'on célèbre en leur honneur."—Garcín de Tassy, Rel. Musulm. p. 18.

The following examples are of the parallel use of the words named:

Wali:

1841.—"The highest part (of Hermon) crowned by the Wely, is towards the western end."—Robinson, Biblical Researches, iii. 173.

"In many of the villages of Syria the Traveller will observe small domed-covered buildings, with grated windows and surmounted by the crescent. These are the so-called Wells, mausolea of saints, or tombs of sheikhs."—Baedeker's Egypt, Eng. ed. Pt. i. 150.

Īmámzādah:

1864.—"We rode on for three farsaks, or fourteen miles, more to another Īmámzādah, called Kafsh-gūrî . . ."—Eastwick, Three Years' Residence in Persia, ii. 46.

1883.—"The few villages . . . have numerous walled gardens, with rows of poplar and willow-trees and stunted mulberries, and the inevitable Īmamzadehs."—Col. Beresford Lovett's Itinerary Notes of Route Surveys in N. Persia in 1881 and 1882, Proc. R.G.S. (N.S.) v. 73.
Shaikh:
1817.—"Near the ford (on Jordan), half a mile to the south, is a tomb called 'Sheikh Daoud,' standing on an apparent round hill like a barrow."—Ibby and Mangles, Travels in Egypt, &c., 304.

Nabi:
1586. — "Of all the points of interest about Jerusalem, none perhaps gains so much from an actual visit to Palestine as the lofty-peaked eminence which fills up the north-west corner of the table-land. . . . At present it bears the name of Nebi-Samuel, which is derived from the Mussulman tradition—now perpetuated by a mosque and tomb—that here lies buried the prophet Samuel."—Stanley's Palestine, 165.

So also Nabi-Yânus at Nineveh; and see Nebi-Mousa in De Saulley, ii. 73.

PEGU. n.p. The name which we give to the Kingdom which formerly existed in the Delta of the Irawadi, to the city which was its capital, and to the British province which occupies its place. The Burmese name is Bagô. This name belongs to the Talaing language, and is popularly alleged to mean 'conquered by stratagem,' to explain which a legend is given; but no doubt this is mere fancy. The form Pegù, as in many other cases of our geographical nomenclature, appears to come through the Malays, who call it Paígû. The first European mention that we know of is in Conti's narrative (c. 1440) where Poggio has Latinized it as Pâuco-nia; but Fra Mauro, who probably derived this name, with much other new knowledge, from Conti, has in his great map (c. 1459) the exact Malay form Paigu. Nikitin (c. 1475) has, if we may depend on his translator into English, Pegu, as has Hieronimo di S. Stefano (1499). The Roteiro of Vasco da Gama (1498) has Pegão, and describes the land as Christian, a mistake arising no doubt from the use of the ambiguous term Kâtir by his Mahomedan informants (see under CAFFER). Varthema (1510) has Pego, and Giov. da Empoli (1514) Pegù; Barbosa (1516) again Paigu; but Pegu is the usual Portuguese form, as in Barros, and so passed to us.

1514.—"Then there is Pecù, which is a populous and noble city, abounding in men and in horses, where are the true mines of linoni ('di linoni e perfetti rubini,' perhaps should be 'di buoni e perfetti') and perfect rubies, and these in great plenty; and they are fine men, tall and well limbed and stout; as of a race of giants. . . ."—Empoli, 80.

[1516.—"Peigu." (See under BURMA.)] 1542.—"Bagou." (See under PEGUON.)

1568.—"Concluido che non è in terra Re di possa ìà maggiore del Re di Pegù, per che sah è sotto di so venti Re di corona."—Ces. Federici, in Rannusio, iii. 394.

1572.—"Olha o reino Arracão, olha o assento De Pegù, que já monstros povoaarem, Monstros filhos do feo ajuntamento D'uma mulher e hum cão, que sos se acharam." Camões, x. 122.

By Burton:
"Arracan-realm behold, behold the seat of Pegù peopled by a monster-breed; monsters that gendered meeting most unmeet of whelp and woman in the lonely wood. . . ."

1597.—". . . I recommend you to be very watchful not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegû nor yet from that of Achin (do Dachem); and with this view you should give orders that this be the subject of treatment with the King of Dachem since he shows so great a desire for our friendship, and is treating in that sense."—Despatch from the King to Gow, 5th Feb. In Archiv. Port. Orient. Fisc. iii.

PEGU PONIES. These are in Madras sometimes termed elliptically Pegus, as Arab horses are universally termed Arabs. The ponies were much valued, and before the annexation of Pegu generally imported into India; less commonly since, for the local demand absorbs them.
PEKING. 694

1880.—"For sale... also Bubble and Sneak, bay Pegues."—Madras Mail, Feb. 19.

[1890.—"Ponies, sometimes very good ones, were reared in a few districts in Upper Burma, but, even in Burmese times, the supply was from the Shan States. The so-called Pegu Pony, of which a good deal is heard, is, in fact, not a Pegu pony at all, for the justly celebrated animals called by that name were imported from the Shan States."—Report of Capt. Evans, in Times, Oct. 17.]

PEKING, n.p. This name means 'North-Court,' and in its present application dates from the early reigns of the Ming Dynasty in China. When they dethroned the Mongol descendants of Chinghiz and Kublai (1368) they removed the capital from Taitu or Khanbaligh (Cambahie of Polo) to the great city on the Yangtze which has since been known as Nan-King or 'South-Court.' But before many years the Mongol capital was rehabilitated as the imperial residence, and became Pe-King accordingly. Its preparation for reoccupation began in 1409. The first English mention that we have met with is that quoted by Sainsbury, in which we have the subjects of more than one allusion in Milton.

1520.—'Thomé Pires, quitting this pass, arrived at the Province of Nanquij, at its chief city called by the same name, where the King dwelt, and spent in coming thither a great many years, four months: where he may take note how vast a matter is the empire of this gentle prince. He sent word to Thomé Pires that he was to wait for him at Pequij, where he would despach his affair. This city is in another province so called, much further north, in which the King used to dwell for the most part, because it was on the frontier of the Tartars..."—Barros, III. vi. 1.

1541.—'This City of Pequin... is so prodigious, and the things therein so remarkable, as I do almost repent me for undertaking to discourse of it. For one must not imagine it to be, either as the City of Rome, or Constantinople, or Venice, or Paris, or London, or Seville, or Lisbon. Nay I will say further, that one must not think it to be like Grand Cairo in Egypt, Tevrit in Persia, Amadaba (Ama- dadab, Avadava) in Cambay, Isinagot in Bengal, Ava in Chalen, Timpan in Calamuchita, Martaban (Martavao) and Bagou in Pegu, Gwimpel and Tinlau in Sihamon, Odisia in the Island of Soronan, Passuwan and Denu in the Island of Java, Pangor in the Country of the Lequins (no Le quoi) Usangea (Uzainé) in the Grand Cuachin, Lanceama (Lacame) in Tartary, and Mexico (Moico) in Jappon... for I dare well affirm that all those same are not to be compared to the least part of the wonderfull City of Pequin..."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 136 (orig. cap. evii.).

[c. 1586.—"The King maketh always his abode in the great city Pachin, as much as to say in our language... the town of the kingdom."—Reports of China, in Hakl. ii. 546.]

1614. — "Richard Cocks writing from Ferando understands there are great cities in the country of Corea, and between that and the sea mighty bogs, so that no man can travel there; but great waggons have been invented to go upon broad flat wheels, under sail as ships do, in which they transport their goods... the deceased Emperor of Japan did pretend to have conveyed a great army in these sailing waggons, to assault the Emperor of China in his City of Paquin."—In Sainsbury, i. 348.

166*.—"from the destined walls... Of Cambalu, seat of Cathaiana Can, And Samarchand by Oxus, Temer's throne... To Paquin of Sinaen Kings..."—Paradise Lost, xi. 387-390.

PELICAN. s. This word, in its proper application to the Pelicanus onocrotalus, L., is in no respect peculiar to Anglo-India, though we may here observe that the bird is called in Hindi by the poetical name gagan-bheri, i.e. 'Sheep of the Sky,' which we have heard natives with their strong propensity to metaphor convert into the equally appropriate Ganga-bheri or 'Sheep of the Ganges.' The name may be illustrated by the old term 'Cape-sheep' applied to the albatross.* But Pelican is habitually misapplied by the British soldier in India to the bird usually called Adjutant (q.v.). We may remember how Prof. Max Müller, in his Lectures on Language, tells us that the Tahitians show respect to their sovereign by ceasing to employ in common language those words which form part or the whole of his name, and invent new terms to supply their place. "The object was clearly to guard against the name of the sovereign being ever used, even by accident, in ordinary conversation." 2nd ser. 1864, p. 35, [Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 421 seqq.]. Now, by an analogous process, it is possible that

* "... great diversion is found... in firing balls at birds, particularly the albatross, a large species of the swan, commonly seen within two or three hundred miles round the Cape of Good Hope, and which the French call Montons (Montons) du Cap."—Munro's Narrative, 13. The confusion of genera here equals that mentioned in our articles above.
PENGUIN.

Some martinet, holding the office of adjutant, at an early date in the Anglo-Indian history, may have resented the ludicrously appropriate employment of the usual name of the bird, and so may have introduced the entirely inappropriate name of pelican in its place. It is in the recollection of one of the present writers that a worthy northern matron, who with her husband had risen from the ranks in the —th Light Dragoons, on being challenged for speaking of "the pelicans in the barrack-yard," maintained her correctness, conceding only that "some ca'd them paylicans, some ca'd them audijants."

1829.—"This officer . . . on going round the yard (of the military prison) . . . discovered a large beef-bone recently dropped. The sergeant was called to account for this ominous appearance. This sergeant was a shrewd fellow, and he immediately said,—'Oh Sir, the pelicans have dropped it.' This was very plausible, for these birds will carry enormous bones; and frequently when fighting for them they drop them, so that this might very probably have been the case. The moment the dinner-trumpet sounds, whole flocks of these birds are in attendance at the barrack-doors, waiting for bones, or anything that the soldiers may be pleased to throw to them."—Mem. of John Skipp, ii. 25.

PENANG, n.p. This is the proper name of the Island adjoining the Peninsula of Malacca (Pulo, properly Pulau, Pinang), which on its cession to the English (1786) was named 'Prince of Wales's Island.' But this official style has again given way to the old name. Pinang in Malay signifies an areca-nut or areca-tree, and, according to Crawford, the name was given on account of the island's resemblance in form to the fruit of the tree (vulgo, 'the betel-nut').

1599.—"Now the winter coming upon us with much contagious weather, we directed our course from hence with the Islands of Pulo Pinanou (where by the way is to be noted that Pulo in the Malayan tongue signifies an Island) . . . where we came to an anker in a very good harborage between three Islands. . . . This place is in 8 degrees and a half to the Northward, and some fine leagues from the main between Malacca and Pegu."—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 589-590.

PENANG LAWYER, s. The popular name of a handsome and hard (but sometimes brittle) walking-stick, exported from Penang and Singapore. It is the stem of a miniature palm (Licuala acutifida, Griffith). The sticks are prepared by scraping the young stem with glass, so as to remove the epidermis and no more. The sticks are then straightened by fire and polished (Balfour). The name is popularly thought to have originated in a jocular supposition that law-suits in Penang were decided by the lex baculina. But there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of some native term, and pinang layor, 'wild areca' [or pinang layor, 'fire-dried areca,' which is suggested in N.E.D.], may almost be assumed to be the real name. [Dennys (Descri. Dict. s.v.) says from "Layor, a species of cane furnishing the sticks so named." But this is almost certainly wrong.]

1883.—(But the book—an excellent one—is without date—more shame to the Religious Tract Society which publishes it). "Next morning, taking my 'Penang lawyer' to defend myself from dogs. . . ." The following note is added: 'A Penang lawyer is a heavy walking-stick, supposed to be so called from its usefulness in settling disputes in Penang."—Gilmour, Among the Mongols, 14.

PENGUIN, s. Popular name of several species of birds belonging to the genera Aptenodytes and Spheniscus. We have not been able to ascertain the etymology of this name. It may be from the Port. pingue, 'fat.' See Littré. He quotes Clausinus as picturing it, who says they were called a pinguedine. It is surely not that given by Sir Thomas Herbert in proof of the truth of the legend of Madoc's settlement in America; and which is indeed implied 60 years before by the narrator of Drake's voyage; though probably borrowed by Herbert direct from Selden.

1578.—"In these Islands we found great relief and plenty of good victuals, for infinite were the number of fowl which the Welsh men named Penguin, and Magilanus termed them geese. . . ."—Drake's Voyage, by F. Fletcher, Hak. Soc. p. 72.

1598.—"The pengwin described."—Hawkins, V. to S. Sea, p. 111, Hak. Soc.

1606.—"The Pengwines bee as bigge as our greatest Capons we have in England, they have no wings nor cannot flye . . . they bee exceeding fatte, but their flesh is very ranke. . . ."—Middleton, t. B. 4.

1609.—"Nous trouvâmes beaucoup de Chës de Mer, et Oyeaux qu'on appelle Penguins, dont l'Escueil en estait quasi couvert."—Houtman, p. 4.
In ... le ... d'une quantité d'Oiseaux nommés pinguy, qui font là leurs œufs et leurs petits, et il y en a une quantité si prodigieuse qu'on ne saurait mettre ... le pied en quelque endroit que ce soit sans toucher." —Pyrrard de Laval, i. 73; [Hak. Soc. i. 97, also see i. 16].

1612.—"About the year ClO. C.LXX. Madoc brother to David ap Owen, prince of Wales, made this sea voyage (to Florida); and by probability these names of Capo de Brion in Norsmey, and Pengwin An part of the Northern America, for a white rock, and a white-headed bird, according to the British, were relics of this discovery."—Selden, Notes on Drayton's Polyboli'nn, in Works (ed. 1726), iii. col. 1802.

1616.—"The Island called Pen-guin Island, probably so named by some Welshman, in whose Language Pen-guine signifies a white head; and there are many great lazy fowls upon, and about, this Island, with great cole-black bodies, and very white heads, called Penguins."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 334.

1638.—"... that this people (of the Mexican traditions) were Welsh rather than Spaniards or others, the Records of this Voyage writ by many Bardhs and Genealogists confirm it ... made more orthodoxall by Welsh names given there to birds, rivers, rocks, beasts, &c., as ... Pengwym refer'd by them to a bird that has a white head. ..."—Herbert, Some Yeares Travels, &c., p. 360.

Unfortunately for this etymology the head is precisely that part which seems in all species of the bird to be black! But M. Roulin, quoted by Littré, maintains the Welsh (or Breton) etymology, thinking the name was first given to some short-winged sea-bird with a white head, and then transferred to the penguin. And Terry, if to be depended on, supports this view. So Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict., s.v.): "In that case, it must first have been given to another bird, such as the auk (the puffin is common in Anglesey), since the penguin's head is black."

1674.—"So Horses they affirm to be Mere Engines made by Geometry, And were invented first from Engins, As Indian Britons were from Penguins." Hudibras, Pt. I. Canto ii. 57.

1809.—In Lombok ducks "are very cheap and are largely consumed by the crews of the rice ships, by whom they are called Baly-soldiers, but are more generally known elsewhere as penguin-ducks."—Wallace, Malay Archip., ed. 1890, p. 135.

PEON. s. This is a Portuguese word peão (Span. peón); from pé, 'foot,' and meaning a 'footman' (also a pawn at chess), and is not therefore a corruption, as has been alleged, of Hind. pëydda, meaning the same; though the words are, of course ultimately akin in root. It was originally used in the sense of 'a foot-soldier'; thence as 'orderly' or messenger. The word Sepoy was used within our recollection, and perhaps is still, in the same sense in the city of Bombay. The transition of meaning comes out plainly in the quotation from Ives. In the sense of 'orderly,' peon is the word usual in S. India, whilst chupprassy (q.v.) is more common in N. India, though peon is also used there. The word is likewise very generally employed for men on police service (see BURKUNDAUZU). [Mr. Skeat notes that Pygyn is used in the Malay States, and Tambi or Tamby at Singapore]. The word had probably become unusual in Portugal by 1600; for Manoel Correa, an early commentator on the Lusiads (d. 1612), thinks it necessary to explain pôdes by 'gente de pé.'

1503.—"The Cazorny ordered the soldier (pião) to take the letter away, and strictly forbade him to say anything about his having seen it."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 421.

1510.—"So the Sabayo, putting much trust in this (Rumi), made him captain within the city (Goa), and outside of it put under him a captain (of his with two thousand soldiers (piães) from the Balagate...."

—Ibid. II. i. 51.

1563.—"The pawn (pião) they call Piado, which is as much as to say a man who travels on foot."—García, f. 37.

1575.—"O Rey de Badajos era alto Mouro Con quatro mil cavalos furiosos, Innumeros pôes, darmas e de ouro, Guarnecidos, guerreiros, e lustrosos." Camões, iii. 66.

By Burton:

"The King of Badajos was a Muselm bold, with horse four thousand, fierce and furious knights, and countess Peons, armed and dight with gold, whose polished surface glanceheth lustrous light."

1609.—"The first of February the Capitaine departed with fiftie Peons. ..."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 421.

c. 1610.—"Les Pions marchent après le prisonnier, lié avec des cordes qu'ils tientennent."—Pyrrard de Laval, ii. 11; [Hak. Soc. ii. 17; also i. 428, 440; ii. 16].

[1616.—"This Shawbunder (see SHA-BUNDER) imperiously by a couple of Pyons commanded him from me."—Foster, Letters, iv. 351.]

c. 1630.—"The first of December, with some Pe-unes (or black Foot-boys, who can prattle some English) we rode (from Swally) to Surat."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1683, p. 35.
PEON.

PEPPER.

[For "black" the ed. of 1677 reads "olive-coloured," p. 42.]

1666.—"... siete cientos y treinta y tres mil peones."—Faria y Sousa, i. 195.

1673.—"The Town is walled with Mud, and Bulwarks for Watch-Places for the English peons."—Fryer, 29.

1687.—"... Peons or servants to wait on us."—Bilb. 26.

1687.—"Ordered that ten peons be sent along the coast to Pulicat ... and enquire all the way for goods driven ashore."—In Wheeler, i. 179.

1669.—"At this Moors Town, they got a Peon to be their guide to the Mogull's nearest Camp. ... These Peons are some of the Gentons or Rashbouts (see RAJPOOT), who in all places along the Coast, especially in Seaport Towns, make it their business to hire themselves to wait upon Strangers."—Dampier, i. 508.

1705.—"... pions qui sont ce que nous appelons ici des Gardes."—Leviller, 218.

1745.—"Dès le lendemain je fis assem¬bler dans la Porteresse où je demeurois in qualité d'Aumonier, le Chef des Pions, chez qui s'étaient fait les deux marriages."—Norbert, Mém, iii. 129.

1746.—"As the Nabob's behaviour when Madras was attacked by De la Bourdon¬nais, had caused the English to suspect his assurances of assistance, they had 2,000 Peons in the defence of Cuddalore."—Orme, i. 81.

1760.—"Peon. One who waits about the house to run on messages; and he commonly carries under his arm a sword, or in his sash a kres, and in his hand a ratan, to keep the rest of the servants in subjection. He also walks before your palanquin, carries chits (q.v.) or notes, and is your body¬guard."—Ives, 50.

1763.—"Europeans distinguish these undisciplined troops by the general name of Peons."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 80.

1772.—Hadley, writing in Bengal, spells the word puna; but this is evidently phonetic.

1785.—"... Peons, a name for the infantry of the Deckan."—Carraccioli's Life of Clive, iv. 565.

1750-90.—"I sent off annually from Sylvan from 150 to 200 (elephants) divided into 4 distinct flocks. ... They were put under charge of the common peon. These people were often absent 18 months. On one occasion my servant Manoo ... after a twelve-months' absence returned ... in appearance most miserable; he unfolded his girdle, and produced a scrap of paper of small dimensions, which proved to be a banker's bill amounting to 3 or 4,000 pounds,—his own pay was 90 shillings a month. ... When I left India Manoo was still absent on one of these excursions, but he delivered to my agents as faithful an account of the produce as he would have done to myself."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 77.

1842.—"... he was put under arrest for striking, and throwing into the Indus, an inoffensive Peon, who gave him no provocation, but who was obeying the orders he received from Captain ... The Major General has heard it said that the supremacy of the British over the native must be maintained in India, and he entirely concurs in that opinion, but it must be maintained by justice."—Gen. Orders, &c., of Sir Oh. Napier, p. 72.

1873.—"Pandurang is by turns a servant to a shopkeeper, a peon, or orderly, a groom to an English officer ... and eventually a pleader before an English Judge in a populous city."—Saturday Review, May 31, p. 728.

PEPPER, s. The original of this word, Skt. pippāti, means not the ordinary pepper of commerce ('black pepper') but long pepper, and the Sanskrit name is still so applied in Bengal, where one of the long-pepper plants, which have been classed sometimes in a different genus (Chavica) from the black pepper, was at one time much cultivated. There is still indeed a considerable export of long pepper from Calcutta; and a kindred species grows in the Archipelago. Long pepper is mentioned by Pliny, as well as white and black pepper; the three varieties still known in trade, though with the kind of error that has persisted on such subjects till quite recently, he mis¬apprehends their relation. The proportion of their ancient prices will be found in a quotation below.

The name must have been transferred by foreign traders to black pepper, the staple of export, at an early date, as will be seen from the quotations. Pippalimula, the root of long pepper, still a stimulant medicine in the native pharmacopoeia, is probably the πεπροσ μία of the ancients (Royle, p. 86).

We may say here that Black pepper is the fruit of a perennial climbing shrub, Piper nigrum, L., indigenous in the forests of Malabar and Travancore, and thence introduced into the Malay countries, particularly Sumatra.

White pepper is prepared from the black by removing the dark outer layer of pericarp, thereby depriving it of a part of its pungency. It comes chiefly viā Singapore from the Dutch settlement of Rhio, but a small quancity of fine quality comes from Telli-cherry in Malabar.

Long pepper is derived from two shrubby plants, Piper officinarum, C.D.C., a native of the Archipelago, and Piper longum, L., indigenous in Malabar, Ceylon, E. Bengal, Timor, and the Philippines. Long pepper is the fruit—spike gathered and dried when not quite ripe (Handbury and Flückiger, Pharmacographia). All these kinds of pepper were, as has been said, known to the ancients.

c. 70 A.D. — "The cornes or grains . . .
lie in certaine little huskes or pods. . . .
If that be plucked from the tree before they gape and open of themselves, they make that spice which is called Long pepper; but if as they do ripen, they cleave and chawne by little and little, they shew within the white pepper: which afterwards being parched in the Sunne, chaungeth colour and weight blacke, and therewith rivelled also . . . Long pepper is soone sophisticated, with the servie or mustard seed of Alexandria: and a pound of it is worth fifteen Roman deniers. The white costeth seven deniers a pound, and the black is sold after four deniers by the pound."—Pliny, tr.
by Phil. Holland, Bk. xii. ch. 7.

c. 80—90.— "And there come to these marts great ships, on account of the bulk and quantity of pepper and malabathrum . . .
The pepper is brought (to market) here, being produced largely only in one district near these marts, that which is called Kot-tonarikē."—Periplus, § 56.

c. A.D. 100.— "The Pepper-tree (πιπέρ δέντρον) is related to grow in India; it is short, and the fruit as it first puts it forth is long, resembling pods; and this long pepper has within it (grains) like small millet, which are what grow to be the perfect (black) pepper. At the proper season it opens and puts forth a cluster bearing the berries such as we know them. But those that are like unripe grapes, which constitute the white pepper, serve the best for eye-remedies, and for antidotes, and for theriacal potencies."—Dioscorides, Mat. Med. ii. 188.

c. 545.— "This is the pepper-tree" (there is a drawing). "Every plant of it is twined round some lofty forest tree, for it is weak and slim like the slender stems of the vine.
And every bunch of fruit has a double leaf as a shield; and it is very green, like the green of rue."—Cosmas, Book xi.

c. 870.— "The mariners say every bunch of pepper has over it a leaf that shelters it from the rain. When the rain ceases the leaf turns aside; if rain recommences the leaf again covers the fruit."— Ibn Khurdādche, in 1166.— "The trees which bear this fruit are planted in the fields which surround the towns, and every one owns his plantation. The trees are small, and the pepper is originally white, when but they collect it they put it into boxes and pour hot water upon it; it is then exposed to the heat of the sun, and dried . . . in the course of which process it becomes of a black colour."—Rabb Benjamin, in Wright, p. 144.

c. 1330.— "L’albore che fa il pepe è fatto come l’elerca che nasce su per gli muri.
Questo pepe sale su per gli arbore che l’umini piantano a modo de l’elerca, e sale sopra tutti li arbore più alti. Questo pepe fa rami a modo dell’ uve ; . . . e maturo si lo vendemiano a modo de l’uve e poi pongono il pepe al sole a seccare come uve passe, e nulla altra cosa si fa del pepe."—Odoric, in Cathay, App. xlvii.

PERGUNNAHS, s. Hind. pargana [Skts. pargana, ‘to reckon up’], a subdivision of a ‘District’ (see ZILLAH).

c. 1500.— "The divisions into sāhas (see SOUBA) and parganas, which are maintained to the present day in the province of Tatta, were made by these people" (the Samma Dynasty).—Tārikh-i-Tāhirī, in Elliot,
i. 273.

1535.— "Item, from the three praguanas, viz., Anzor, Cairena, Panchana 133,260 fedeas."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 139.

[1614. — "I wrote him to stay in the Pregonas near Agra."—Foster, Letters, ii. 106.]

[1617.— "For that Muckshud had also newly answered he had mist his prigany."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 425.]

1753.— "Masulipatnām . . . est capitale de ce qu’on appelle dans l’Inde un Scercar (see SIRCAR), qui comprend plusieurs Ferganes, ou districts particuliers."— D’Anville, 132.

1812.— "A certain number of villages with a society thus organised, formed a pergunnah."—Fifth Report, 16.

PERGUNNAHS, THE TWENTY-FOUR, n.p. The official name of the District immediately adjoining and including, though not administratively including, Calcutta. The name is one of a character very ancient in India and the East. It was the original ‘Zemindary of Calcutta’ granted to the English Company by a ‘Subadar’s Perwana’ in 1757-58. This grant was subsequently confirmed by the Great Mogul as an unconditional and rent-free jagheer (q.v.). The quotation from Sir Richard Phillips’ Million of Facts, illustrates the development of ‘facts’ out of the moral consciousness. The book contains many of equal value. An approximate parallel to this statement would be that London is divided into Seven Dials.

1765.— "The lands of the twenty-four Purgunannahs, ceded to the Company by the treaty of 1757, which subsequently became Colonel Olive's jaggir, were rated on the King's books at 2 lac and 22,000 rupees."

1812.—"The number of convicts confined at the six stations of this division (independent of Zillah) Twenty-four pergunnus, is about 4,000. Of them probably nintenths are dacouts."—Fifth Report, 559.

PERI, s. This Persian word for a class of imaginary sprites, rendered familiar in the verses of Moore and Southey, has no blood-relationship with the English Fairy, notwithstanding the exact compliance with Grimm's Law in the change of initial consonant.
The Persian word is peri, from 'par, 'a feather, or wing'; therefore 'the winged one'; [so F. Johnson, Pers.
Dict.; but the derivation is very doubtful] whilst the genealogy of fairy is apparently Ital. fata, French fée, whence féerie ('fay-dom') and thence fairy.

[c. 1500?—"I am the only daughter of a Jinn chief of noblest strain and my name is Peri-Banu."—Arab. Nights, Burton, x. 264.]

1800.—
"From cluster'd henna, and from orange groves,
That with such perfumes fill the breeze
As Peris to their Sister Bear,
When from the summit of some lofty tree
She hangs encaged, the captive of the Dives."
—Thalaba, xi. 24.

1817.—
"But nothng can charm the luckless Peri;
Her soul is sad—her wings are weary."
Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

PERPET, PERPETUANO, s. The name of a cloth often mentioned in the 17th and first part of the 18th centuries, as an export from England to the East. It appears to have been a light and glossy twisted stuff of wool, [which like another stuff of the same kind called 'Lasting,' took its name from its durability. (See Draper's Dict.
s. v.)]. In France it was called perput-anne or sempiterne, in Ital. perpetana.

[1609.—"Karsies, Perpetuanos and other woollen Commodities."—Birdwood, Letter-Book, 288.]

[1617.—"Perpetuan, 1 bale."—Cocks's
Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 298.]

[1830.—"... Devonshire kersies or perpetuities ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 4.]

[1680.—"Perpetuanes."—Ibid. ii. 401.]

1711.—"Goods usually imported (to China) from Europe are Bullion Cloths, Clothtrash Perpetuanos, and Camblets of Scarlet, black, blow, sad and violet Colours, which are of late so lightly set by; that to bear the Dutys, and bring the prime Cost, is as much as can reasonably be hoped for."— Lockyer, 147.

[1717.—"... a Pavilion lined with Im-boss's Perpet."—In Yule, Hedges's Diary.
Hak. Soc. ii. ccclx.]

1754.—"Being requested by the Trustees of the Charity Stock of this place to make an humble application to you for an order that the children upon the Foundation to the number of 12 or 14 may be supplied at the expense of the Honourable Company with a coat of blue Perpet or some ordiinary cloth."

1757.—Among the presents sent to the King of Ava with the mission of Ensign Robert Lester, we find:
"2 Pieces of ordinary Red Broad Cloth, 3 Do. of Perpetuanoes Popingay."
In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 203.

PERSAIM, n.p. This is an old form of the name of Bassin (q.v.) in Pegu.
It occurs (e.g.) in Milburn, ii. 281.

1759.—"The Country for 20 miles round Persaim is represented as capable of producing Rice, sufficient to supply the Coast of Choromandel from Pondicherry to Musulpatam."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i.
110. Also in a Chart by Capt. G. Baker, 1754.

1795.—"Having ordered presents of a trivial nature to be presented, in return for those brought from Negrais, he referred the deputy ... to the Birman Governor of Persaim for a ratification and final adjustment of the treaty."—Symes, p. 40. But this author also uses Bassien (e.g., 32), and "Persain or Bassien" (39), which alternatives are also in the chart by Ensign Wood.

PERSIMMON, s. This American name is applied to a fruit common in China and Japan, which in a dried state is imported largely from China into Tibet. The tree is the Diospyros kaki, L. fil., a species of the same genus which produces ebony. The word is properly the name of an American fruit and tree of the same genus
(D. virginiana), also called date-plum, and, according to the Dictionary of Worcester, belonged to the Indian language of Virginia. [The word became familiar in 1896 as the name of the winner of the Derby.]
PERUMBAUCUM. n.p. A town 14 m. N.W. of Conjevaram, in the district of Madras [Chingleput]. The name is perhaps perum-pakkam, Tam., 'big village.'

PESCARIA, n.p. The coast of Tinnevelly was so called by the Portuguese, from the great pearl 'fishery' there.

[c. 1566.—See under BAZAAR.]

1600.—"There are in the Seas of the East three principal mines where they fish pearls.

... The third is between the Isle of Celion and Cape Comory, and on this account the Coast which runs from the said Cape to the shoals of Ramananconor and Manar is called, in part, Pescaria. ..."—Lucena, 80.

[1616.—"Pesqueria." See under CHILAW.]

1615.—"Iam nonnulli de orâ Piscariâ dicamus quae iam inde a promontorio Comorini in Orientem ad usque brevium Ramananconoris extenditur, quod haud procul inde celeberrimus, maximus, et copiosissimus toto Oriente Marginarum piscatus instituitur. ..."—Javari, Thes. i. 445.

1710.—"The Coast of the Pescaria of the mother of pearl which runs from the Cape of Camorim to the Isle of Manar, for the space of seventy leagues, with a breadth of six inland, was the first debarkation of this second conquest.'"—Sousa, Orient. Conquist. i. 122.

PESHAWUR, n.p. Peshawar. This name of what is now the frontier city and garrison of India towards Kâbul, is sometimes alleged to have been given by Akbar. But in substance the name is of great antiquity, and all that can be alleged as to Akbar is that he is said to have modified the old name, and that since his time the present form has been in use. A notice of the change is quoted below from Gen. Cunningham; we cannot give the authority on which the statement rests. Peshâwar could hardly be called a frontier town in the time of Akbar, standing as it did according to the administrative division of the Āin, about the middle of the Sûha of Kâbul, which included Kashmir and all west of it. We do not find that the modern form occurs in the text of the Āin as published by Prof. Blochmann. In the translation of the Tabaksâ-l-Akbarî of Nizâmû-d-din Ahmad (died 1594-95), in Elliot, we find the name transliter-ated variously as Peshâwar (v. 448), Parshâwar (293), Parshor (423), Pershor (424). We cannot doubt that the Chinese form Folausha in Fâh-hian already expresses the name Parasha-war, or Parshâwar.

c. 400.—"From Gandhâra, going south 4 days' journey, we arrive at the country of Fo-lau-sha. In old times Buddhâ, in company with all his disciples, travelled through this country."—Fâh-hian, by Beal, p. 34.

c. 630.—"The Kingdom of Kien-to-lo (Gandhâra) extends about 1000 li from E. to W. and 800 li from S. to N. On the East it adjoins the river Sin (Indus). The capital of this country is called Pu-lu-sha-pu-lo (Parshapura). ... The towns and villages are almost deserted. ... There are about a thousand convents, ruined and abandoned; full of wild plants, and presenting only a melancholy solitude."—Huen Tsoang, Pil. Boud. ii. 104-105.

[c. 1001.—"On his (Mahmûd's) reaching Peshwar, he pitched his tent outside the city. There he received intelligence of the bold resolve of Jaipâl, the enemy of God, and the King of Hind, to offer opposition."—Al-Utbi, in Elliot, ii. 25.]

c. 1020.—"The aggregate of these waters forms a large river opposite the city of Parshâwar."—Al-Birûnist, in Elliot, i. 47. See also 68.

1069.—"The Amir ordered a letter to be despatched to the minister, telling him 'I have determined to go to Hindustân, and pass the winter in Wâlîhind, and Marîmânâr, and Bâshâr. ...'—Baihaki, in Elliot, ii. 150.

[c. 1220.—"Parshâbûr. The vulgar pronunciation is Barshâwâr. A large tract between Ghazna and Lahor, famous in the history of the Musliman conquest."—Yâqût, in Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, 418.]

1519.—"We held a consultation, in which it was resolved to plunder the country of the Aferîdî Afghanâs, as had been proposed by Sultan Bayezîd, to fit up the fort of Peshâwar for the reception of their effects and corn, and to leave a garrison in it."—Baber, 276.

1555.—"We came to the city of Purshâwar, and having thus fortunately passed the Kotal we reached the town of Joshâya. On the Kotal we saw rhinoceroses, the size of a small elephant."—Siidî 'Atî, in J. As. Ser. i. tom. ix. 201.

1590.—"Tumân Bagrâm, which they call Purshâwar; the spring here is a source of delight. There is in this place a great place of worship which they call Gorkhatri, to which people, especially Jogis, resort from great distances."—Alâ'uddin (orig.), i. 592; [ed. Jarrett], ii. 404. In iii. 69, Purshâwar.

1754.—"On the news that Peishor was taken, and that Nadir Shah was preparing to pass the Indus, the Moghul's court, already in great disorder, was struck with terror."—H. of Nadir Shah, in Hawway, ii. 363.
1783.—"The heat of Peshour seemed to me more intense, than that of any country I have visited in the upper parts of India. Other places may be warm; hot winds blowing over tracts of sand may drive us under the shelter of a wetted skreen; but at Peshour, the atmosphere, in the summer solstice, becomes almost inflammable."—G. Forster, ed. 1856, ii. 57.

1868.—"Its present name we owe to Akbar, whose fondness for innovation led him to change the ancient Parasháwara, of which he did not know the meaning, to Pesháwar, or the 'frontier town.' Abul Fazl gives both names."—Cunningham, Arch. Reports, ii. 87. Gladwin does in his translation give both names; but see above.

PESH-CUBZ. s. A form of dagger, the blade of which has a straight thick back, while the edge curves inwardly from a broad base to a very sharp point. Pers. pesh-kabz, 'fore-grip.' The handle is usually made of shir-wáthi, 'the white bone (tooth?) of a large cetacean'; probably mors-tooth, which is repeatedly mentioned in the early English trade with Persia as an article much in demand (e.g. see Sibbald's Persia; ii. 65, 159, 204, 305; iii. 89, 162, 268, 287, &c.). [The pesh-kubz appears several times in Mr. Egerton's Catalogue of Indian Arms, and one is illustrated, Pl. xv. No. 760.]

"Received for sundry jewels, &c. . . . (Rs.) 7326 0 0 Ditto for knife, or peshcubz (mis-printed peshoald). . . . 3500 0 0"

PESH-CUSH, s. Pers. pesh-kash. Wilson interprets this literally as 'first-fruits.' It is used as an offering or tribute, but with many specific and technical senses which will be found in Wilson, e.g. a fine on appointment, renewal, or investiture; a quit-rent, a payment executed on lands formerly rent-free, or in substitution for service no longer exacted; sometimes a present to a great man, or (loosely) for the ordinary Government demand on land. Peshcush, in the old English records, is most generally used in the sense of a present to a great man.

1653.—"Pesket est vn presant en Turq."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 553.

1657.—"As to the Piscash for the King of Goleundah, if it be not already done, we do hope with it you may obtayn our liberty to coynce silver Rapes and copper Pice at the Fort, which would be a great accommodation to our Trade. But in this and all other Piscashes be as sparing as you can."—Letter of Court to Ft. St. Geo., in Notes and Exts., No. i. p. 7.

1673.—"Sometimes sending Piscashes of considerable value."—Pryer, 166.

1675.—"Being informed that Mr. Mohun had sent a Piscash of Persian Wine, Cases of Stronge Water, &c. to ye Great Governour of this Country, that is 2d. or 3d. psion in ye kingdome, I went to his house to speake abt. it, when he kept me to dine with him."—Puckle's Diary, MS. in India Office.

1863.—"Piscash." (See under FIR-MÁUN.)

1869.—"But the Piscashes or Presents expected by the Nabobs and Omurkhs retarded our Inlargement for some time notwithstanding."—Ovington, 415.

1754.—"After I have refreshed my army at Delhie, and received the subsidy (Note. —'This is called a Peischcush, or present from an inferior to a superior. The sum agreed for was 20 crores') which must be paid, I will leave you in possession of his dominion."—Hist. of Nadir Shab, in Hau- way, i. 371.

1761.—"I have obtained a promise from his Majesty of his royal confirmation of all your possessions and privileges, provided you pay him a proper pishcush . . ."—Major Carnac to the Governor and Council, in Van Sittert, i. 119.

1811.—"By the fixed or regulated sum . . . the Sultan . . . means the Peischcush, or tribute, which he was bound by former treaties to pay to the Government of Poonah; but which he does not think proper to . . . designate by any term denotive of inferiority, which the word Pishcush certainly is."—Kirkpatrick, Note on Tippoo's Letters, p. 9.

PESH-KHÁNA, PESH-KHID-MAT, ss. Pers. 'Fore-service.' The tents and accompanying retinue sent on over-night, during a march, to the new camping ground, to receive the master on his arrival. A great personage among the natives, or among ourselves, has a complete double establishment, one portion of which goes thus every night in advance. [Another term used is peshkhaima. Pers. 'advance tents;' as below.]

1665.—"When the King is in the field, he hath usually two Camps . . . to the end that when he breaketh up and leaveth one, the other may have passed before by a day and be found ready when he arriveth at the place design'd to encamp at; & 'tis therefore that they are called Peische-kanes, as if You should say, Houses going before. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 115; [ed. Constable, 359].

1738.—"Peish-khanna is the term given to the royal tents and their appendages in India."—Hawvay, iv. 156.
PHOOLKAREE. 702

[1862.—"The result of all this uproarious bustle has been the erection of the Sardar's peeshkhaïma, or advanced tent."—Bellere, Journal of Mission, 409.]

PESHWÂ, s. from Pers. 'a leader, a guide.' The chief minister of the Mahratta power, who afterwards, supplanting his master, the descendant of Sivaji, became practically the prince of an independent State and chief of the Mahrattas. The Peshwa's power expired with the surrender to Sir John Malcolm of the last Peshwa, Baji Rao, in 1817. He lived in wealthy exile, and with a jâgîr under his own jurisdiction, at Bhittur, near Cawnpoor, till January 1851. His adopted son, and the claimant of his honours and allowances, was the infamous Nana Sahib.

Mr C. P. Brown gives a feminine peshvîn: "The princess Gangâ Bâi was Peshvin of Purandâh." (MS. notes).

1673.—"He answered, it is well, and referred our Business to Moro Pandit his Peshvúa, or Chancellor, to examine our Articles, and give an account of what they were."—Fryer, 79.

1803.—"But how is it with the Peshwa? He has no minister; no person has influence over him, and he is only guided by his own caprices."—Wellington Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 177.

In the following passage (quando-quidem dormitans) the Great Duke had forgotten that things were changed since he left India, whilst the editor perhaps did not know:

1841.—"If you should draw more troops from the Establishment of Fort St. George, you will have to place under arms the subsidiary force of the Nizam, the Peishwah, and the force in Mysore, and the districts ceded by the Nizam in 1800-1801."

—Letter from the D. of Wellington, in Ind. Adm. of Lord Ellenborough, 1874, (Dec. 29). The Duke was oblivious when he spoke of the Peshwa's Subsidiary Force in 1841.

PETERSILLY, s. This is the name by which 'parsley' is generally called in N. India. We have heard it quoted there as an instance of the absurd corruption of English words in the mouths of natives. But this case at least might more justly be quoted as an example of accurate transfer. The word is simply the Dutch term for 'parsley,' viz. petersilie, from the Lat. petroselinum, of which parsley is itself a double corruption through the French persil. In the Arabic of Avicienna the name is given as ftrasiliân.

PETTAH, s. Tam. pettāi. The extramural suburb of a fortress, or the town attached and adjacent to a fortress. The petta is itself often separately fortified; the fortress is then its citadel. The Mahratta pettha is used in like manner; [it is Skt. petaka, and the word possibly came to the Tamil through the Mahr.]. The word constantly occurs in the histories of war in Southern India.

1630.—"Azam Khan, having ascended the Pass of Anjan-dâdh, encamped 3 kos from Dharâr. He then directed Multafit Khan... to make an attack upon... Dharâr and its petta, where once a week people from all parts, far and near, were accustomed to meet for buying and selling."—Abdul Hamid, in Elliot, vii. 26.

1763.—"The pagoda served as a citadel to a large petta, by which name the people on the Coast of Coromandel call every town contiguous to a fortress."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 147.

1791.—"... The petta or town (at Bangalore) of great extent to the north of the fort, was surrounded by an indifferent rampart and excellent ditch, with an intermediate berm... planted with impene- trable and well-grown thorns. ... Neither the fort nor the petta had drawbridges."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, ill. 123.

1803.—"The petta wall was very lofty, and defended by towers, and had no rampart."—Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 193.

1809.—"I passed through a country little cultivated... to Kingeri, which has a small mud-fort in good repair, and a petta apparently well filled with inhabitants."—Lit. Valentin, i. 412.

1839.—"The English ladies told me this Petta was 'a horrid place—quite native!' and advised me never to go into it; so I went next day, of course, and found it most curious—really quite native."—Letters from Madras, 289.

PHANSEEGAR, s. See under THUG.

[PHOOLKAREE, s. Hind. phâl-kârī, 'flowered embroidery.' The term applied in N. India to the cotton sheets embroidered in silk by village women, particularly Jats. Each girl is supposed to embroider one of these for her marriage. In recent years a considerable demand has arisen for specimens of this kind of needlework among English ladies, who use them for screens and other decorative purposes. Hence a considerable manufacture has sprung up of which an account will be found in a note by Mrs. F. A. Steel, appended to Mr.
PHOORZA.

H. C. Cookson's Monograph on the Silk Industry of the Punjab (1886-7), and in the Journal of Indian Art, ii. 71 seqq.

[1857.—"They (native school girls) were collected in a small inner court, which was hung with the pretty phulcarries they make here (Rawal Pindi), and which ... looked very Oriental and gay."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 336.]

7 [PHOORZA, s. A custom-house; Gujarāṭī phūrdā, from Ar. furqa 'a notch,' then 'a bight,' 'river-mouth,' 'harbour;' hence 'a tax' or 'custom-duty.'

[1791.—The East India Calendar (p. 131) has "John Church, Phoorza-Master, Surat.

[1737.—"And the Mogul's Furza or custom-house is at this place (Hughly)."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 19.

[1772.—"But as they still insisted on their people sitting at the gates on the Phoorzer Coosky ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 386, and see 392. "Phoorze Master." Coosky=P.—Mahr. Khoshekh, 'inland transit-duities.'

[1813.—"... idols ... were annually imported to a considerable number at the Baroche Phoorza, when I was customs-master at that settlement."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 394.]

PIAL, s. A raised platform on which people sit, usually under the verandah, or on either side of the door of the house. It is a purely S. Indian word, and partially corresponds to the N. Indian chabātra (see CHABOTRA). Wilson conjectures the word to be Telugu, but it is in fact a form of the Portuguese poyō and poyal (Span. poyo), 'a seat or bench.' This is again, according to Diez (i. 326), from the Lat. pediwm, 'a projecting base, a balcony.' Bluteau explains poyal as 'steps for mounting on horseback' (Scottic, 'a looming-up stone') [see Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 68]. The quotation from Mr. Gover describes the S. Indian thing in full.

1553.—"... paying him his courtesy in Moorish fashion, which was seating himself along with him on a poyal."—Castanheda, vi. 3.

1578.—"In the public square at Goa, as it was running furiously along, an infirm man came in its way, and could not escape; but the elephant took him up in its trunk, and without doing him any hurt deposited him on a poyal."—Acoasta, Fructuolo, 432.

1602.—"The natives of this region who are called laos, are men so arrogant that they think no others their superiors ... insomuch that if a lao in passing along the street becomes aware that any one of another nation is on a poyal, or any place above him, if the person does not immediately come down, ... until he is gone by, he will kill him."—Conte, iv. III. [For numerous instances of this superstition, see Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 360 seqq.]

1873.—"Built against the front wall of every Hindu house in southern India ... is a bench 3 feet high and as many broad. It extends along the whole frontage, except where the house-door stands. ... The posts of the veranda or pandal are fixed in the ground a few feet in front of the bench, enclosing a sort of platform; for the base- ment of the house is generally 2 or 3 feet above the street level. The raised bench is called the Fyal, and is the lounging-place by day, and also serves him good out as a couch for the night. ... There the visitor is received; there the bargaining is done; there the beggar plies his trade, and the Yogi (see JOGEE) sounds his conch; there also the members of the household clean their teeth, amusing themselves the while with belches and other frightful noises. ..."—Pyal Schools in Madras, by E. C. Gover, in Ind. Antiq. ii. 52.

6 [PICAR, s. Hind. paikār, [which again is a corruption of Pers. pādē-kār, pāde, 'a foot'] a retail-dealer, an intermediate dealer or broker.

1680.—"Picar." See under DUSTOOR.

1683.—"Ye said Naylor has always corresponded with Mr. Charnock, having been always his intimate friend; and without question either provides him goods out of the Hon. Comp.'s Warehouse, or connives at the Weavers and Piccas doing of it."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 133.

[1772.—"Pykārs (Dellos (see DELOLL) and Gomastahs) are a chain of agents through whose hands the articles of merchandise pass from the loom of the manufacturer, or the store-house of the cultivator, to the public merchant, or exporter."—Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss. s.v.

PICE, s. Hind. paīsa, a small copper coin, which under the Anglo-Indian system of currency is ¼ of an anna, ¼ of a rupee, and somewhat less than ¾ of a farthing. Pice is used slanguishly for money in general. By Act XXIII. of 1870 (cl. 8) the following copper coins are current:—1. Double Pice or Half-anna, 2. Pice or ¼ anna. 3. Half-pice or ½ anna. 4. Pιc or 1/16 anna. No. 2 is the only one in very common use. As with most other coins, weights, and measures, there used to be pucka pice, and cutcha pice. The distinction was sometimes between the regularly minted copper of the Government and certain amorphous pieces of copper which did duty for small change (e.g. in the N.W. Provinces within memory), or between single and double pice, i.e. ¼ anna-piece and ½ anna-pieces. [Also see PIE.]

c. 1590.—"The dám . . . is the fortieth part of the rupee. At first this coin was called Paisah."—Ali, ed. Blockmann, i. 31.

[1614.—"Another coin there is of copper, called a Pice, wherein you have commonly 94 in the mamudo."—Foster, Letters, iii. II.]

1615.—"Pice, which is a Copper Coyne; twelve Drammes make one Pice. The English Shilling, if weight, will yeild thirte three Pice and a halfe."—W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

1616.—"Brasse money, which they call Pices, whereof three or thereabouts counter-vail a Peny."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

1648.—". . . de Peyser zijn kooper gelt. . . ."—Van Twist, 62.

1653.—"Peca est vne monnoye du Mogol de la valeur de 6 deniers."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 553.

1673.—"Pice, a sort of Copper Money current among the Poorer sort of People . . . the Company's Accounts are kept in Book-rate Pice, viz. 32 to the Mam. [i.e. Mamouede, see GoSBECK], and 80 Pice to the Rupee."—Fryer, 203.

1676.—"The Indians have also a sort of small Copper-money; which is called Pecaha . . . In my last Travels, a Rowly went at Surat for nine and forty Pecha's."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 22; [ed. Bail, i. 27].

1689.—"Lower than these (pice), bitter-Almonds here (at Surat) pass for Money, about Sixty of which make a Pice."—Ovington, 219.

1726.—"A mana makes ½ styvers or 2 peyas."—Valentijn, v. 179. [Also see under MOHUR GOLD.]

1768.—"Shall I risk my cavalry, which cost 1000 rupees each horse, against your cannon balls that cost two pice?—No. I will march your troops until their legs become the size of their bodies."—Hyder Ali, Letter to Col. Wood, in Forbes, Ot. Mem. iii. 287; [2nd ed. ii. 300].

C. 1816.—"'Here,' said he, 'is four pucker-pice for Mary to spend in the bazaar; but I will thank you, Mrs. Browne, not to let her have any fruit. . . .'—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 16, ed. 1893.

PICOTA, s. An additional allowance or percentage, added as a handicap to the weight of goods, which varied with every description, and which the editor of the Subsidios supposes to have lead to the varieties of bahar (q.v.). Thus at Ormuz the bahar was of 20 farazolas (see FRAZALA), to which was added, as picota, for cloves and mace 3 maunds (of Ormuz), or about 1/5 additional; for cinnamon 1/2 additional; for benzoin 1/2 additional, &c. See the Peas, &c. of A. Nunes (1564) passim. We have not been able to trace the origin of this term, nor any modern use.

[1554.—"Picota." (See under BRAZIL-WOOD, DOOCAUN.)]

PICOTAH, s. This is the term applied in S. India to that ancient machine for raising water, which consists of a long lever or yard, pivotted on an upright post, weighted on the short arm and bearing a line and bucket on the long arm. It is the dhenuki of Upper India, the shadaf of the Nile, and the old English sweep, swape, or sway-pole. The machine is we believe still used in the Terra Incognita of market-gardens S.E. of London. The name is Portuguese, picota, a marine term now applied to the handle of a ship's pump and post in which it works—a 'pump-brake.' The picota at sea was also used as a pilly, whence the employment of the word as quoted from Correa. The word is given in the Glossary attached to the "Fifth Report" (1812), but with no indication of its source. Fryer (1673, pub. 1698) describes the thing without giving it a name. In the following the word is used in the marine sense:

1524.—"He (V. da Gama) ordered notice to be given that no seaman should wear a cloak, except on Sunday . . . and if he did, that it should be taken from him by the constables (the serra tomada polos meirinhos), and the man put in the picota in disgrace, for one day. He found great fault with men of military service wearing cloaks, for in that guise they did not look like soldiers."—Correis, Lendas, ii. ii. 922.

1782.—"Pour cet effet (arroser les terres) on emploie une machine appelée Picota. C'est une bascule dressée sur le bord d'un puits ou d'un réservoir d'eaux pluviales, pour en tirer l'eau, et la conduire ensuite où l'on veut."—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 188.

C. 1790.—"Partout les pakoties, ou puits à bascule, étoient en mouvement pour fournir l'eau nécessaire aux plantes, et partout on entendait les jardiniers égayer leurs travaux par des chansons."—Hautefuer, ii. 217.

1807.—"In one place I saw people employed in watering a rice-field with the Yatam, or Pacota, as it is called by the English."—Buchanan, Journey through Mysore, &c., i. 15. [Here Yatam, is Can. yata Tel. attam, Mal. attam.]

1871.—"Aye, e'en picota-work would gain By using such bamboo."—Cover, Folk Songs of S. India, 184.]
PIE-Goods.

This, which is now the technical term for Manchester cottons imported into India, was originally applied in trade to the Indian cottons exported to England, a trade which appears to have been deliberately killed by the heavy duties which Lancashire procured to be imposed in its own interest, as in its own interest it has recently procured the abolition of the small import duty on English piece-goods in India. * [In 1898 a duty at the rate of 3 per cent. on cotton goods was reimposed.]

* It is an easy assumption that this export trade from India was killed by the development of machinery in England. We can hardly doubt that this cause would have killed it in time. But it was not left to any such lingering and natural death. Much time would be required to trace the whole of this episode of "ancient history." But it is certain that this Indian trade was not killed by natural causes: it was killed by prohibitory duties! The duties were imposed in 1758 on them they were declared to operate as a premium on smuggling, and they were reduced to 18 per cent. ad valorem. In the year 1790-97 the value of piece-goods from India imported into England was £2,776,682, or one-third of the whole value of the imports from India, which was £5,232,509. And in the sixteen years between 1783-84 and 1800-01 (inclusive) the imports of Indian piece-goods amounted in value to £26,171,126.

In 1799 the duties were raised. I need not give details, but will come down to 1814, just before the close of the war, when they, I believe, at a maximum. The duties then, on "plain white calicoes," were:-

Total 67 10 0 per cent.

There was an Excise duty upon British manufactured and printed goods of 3d. per square yard, and one that related to foreign (Indian) calico and muslin printed in Great Britain, and the whole of both duty and excise upon such goods was recoverable as drawback upon re-exportation. But on the exportation of Indian white goods there was no drawback recoverable; and stuffs printed in India were at this time, so far as we can discern, not admitted through the English Custom-house at all until 1826, when they were admitted on a duty of 3d. per square yard.

Lists of the various kinds of Indian piece-goods will be found in Milburn (i. 44, 45, 46, and ii. 90, 221), and we assemble them below. It is not in our power to explain their peculiarities, except in very few cases, found under their proper heading. In the present edition these lists have been arranged in alphabetical order. The figures before each indicate that they fall into the following classes: 1. Piece-goods formerly exported from Bombay and Surat; 2. Piece-goods exported from Madras and the Coast; 3. Piece-goods: the kinds imported into Great Britain from Bengal. Some notes and quotations have been added. But it must be understood that the classes of goods now known under these names may or may not exactly represent those made at the time when these lists were prepared. The names printed in capitals are discussed in separate articles.

1665.—"I have sometimes stood amazed at the vast quantity of Cotton-Clotl of all sorts, fine and others, tinged and white, (See in the Statutes, 43 Geo. III. cwp. 68, 69, 70; 54 Geo. III. cwp. 36; 6 Geo. IV. cwp. 3; also Macpherson's Annals of Commerce, iv. 55.)

In Sir A. Arthuboth's publication of Sir T. Munro's Minutes (Memoir, p. cxxix.) he quotes a letter of Munro's to a friend in Scotland, written about 1825, which shows him surprisingly before his age in the matter of Free Trade, speaking with reference to certain measures of Mr. Huskisson's. The passage ends thus: "India is the country that has been worst used in the new arrangements. All her products are now subject to duties and drawbacks which are much more severe than in any other country in Europe. I believe, however, that we shall soon be able to send freely into England, upon paying the same duties, and no more, which English duties? [manufactures] pay in India. When I see what is done in Parliament against India, I think that I am reading about Edward III. and the Flemings."

Sir A. Arthuboth adds very appropriately a passage from a note by the late Prof. H. H. Wilson in his continuation of James M'Intosh's History of India (1845, vol. 1, pp. 538-539), a passage which we also gladly insert here:

"It was stated in evidence (in 1813) that the cotton and silk goods of India, up to this period, could be sold for a profit in the British market at a price from 50 to 60 per cent. lower than those fabricated in England. It consequently became necessary to protect the latter by duties of 70 or 80 per cent. on their value, or by prohibitive prohibition. Had this not been the case, had not such prohibitory duties and decrees existed, the mills of Paisley and of Manchester would have been stopped in their course, and could hardly have been again set in motion, even by the powers of steam. They were created by the sacrifice of the Indian manufacturers. Had India been independent, she would have retaliated: would have imposed protective duties upon British goods, and would thus have preserved her own productive industry from annihilation. This act of self-defence was not permitted her; she was at the mercy of the stranger. British goods were forced upon her without paying any duty; and the foreign manufacturer employed the arm of political injustice to keep down and ultimately strangle a competitor with whom he could not contend on equal terms." which the Hollanders alone draw from thence and transport into many places, especially into Japan and Europe; not to mention what the English, Portugal and Indian merchants carry away from these parts."—Bennier, E.T. 141; [ed. Constable, 439].

1785.—(Res., of Court of Directors of the E.I.C., 8th October) "...that the Captains and Officers of all ships that shall sail from any part of India, after receiving notice hereof, shall be allowed to bring 8000 pieces of piece-goods and no more... that 5000 pieces and no more, may consist of white Muslins and Callicoes, stitched or plain, or either of them, of which 5000 pieces only 2000 may consist of any of the following sorts, viz., Alleiballies, Alrochs (?), Cosasues, Doreas, Jamodiaries, Mulums, Nainsooks, Neckcloths, Tanjeels, and Terrindaams, and that 3000 pieces and no more, may consist of coloured piece-goods..." &c., &c.—In Seton-Karr, i. 83.

[Abrawan. P. ãw-i-rawân, 'flowing water'; a very fine kind of Dacca muslin. 'Woven air' is the name applied in the Arabian Nights to the Patna gauzes, a term originally used for the produce of the Coan looms (Burton, x. 247.) "The Hindoes amuse us with two stories, as instances of the fineness of this muslin. One, that the Emperor Aurungzebe was angry with his daughter for exposing her skin through her clothes; whereupon the young princess remonstrated in her justification that she had seven jamahs (see JAMMA) or suits on; and another, in the Nabob Allaverdy Khowan's time, a woman was chastised and turned out of the city for her neglect, in not preventing his cow from eating up a piece of abrocan, which he had spread and carelessly left on the grass."—Bolt, Considerations on Affairs of India, 206.

3. ADATIS. 2. ALLEJAS.

3. Alleiballies. — "Alaballee (signifying according to the weavers' interpretation of the word 'very fine') is a muslin of fine texture."—(J. Taylor, Account of the Cotton Manufacture at Dacca, 45). According to this the word is perhaps from Ar. 'alâ, 'superior,' H. 'alâ, 'good.'

3. Allibanees.—Perhaps from 'alâ, 'superior,' bânâ, 'woof.'

1. Annabatchies.

3. Arrahs.—Perhaps from the place of that name in Shahabad, where, according to Buck, in his Haddilton (Western India, i. 548) there was a large cloth industry.

3. Aubrahs.

2. Annaketchies.

3. BAFTAS.

3. BANDANNAS.

1. Bejutapauts. — H. be-jâtâ, 'without join,' пят, 'a piece.'

3. BÉTEILAS.

3. Blue cloth.

1. Bombay Stuffs.

1. Brawl.—The N.E.D. describes Brawl as a 'blue and white striped cloth manufactured in India.' In a letter of 1616 (Foster, iv. 306) we have "Loiwee champell and Burral." The editor suggests H. bïra, 'open in texture, fine.' But Roquefort (s.v.) gives: "Bure, Burel, grosse étoffe en laine de couleur rousse ou grisière, dont s'habillent ordinairement les ramoneurs; cette étoffe est faite de brebis noire et brune, sans aucune autre teinture." And see N.E.D. s.v. Borrel.

3. Byrampauts. (See BEIRAMEE.)

3. Callawapores.

3. Callipatties.—H. Kâlā, 'black,' patti, 'strip.'

3. CAMBAYS.

3. Cambries.

3. Carpets.

3. Carridaries.

2. Cattataketchies.

1. Chalies. (See under SHALEEL.)

3. Charonæns.—H. châr-khâna, 'chequered.' "The charâkâna, or chequered muslin, is, as regards manufacture, very similar to the Doreen (see DOREAS below). They differ in the breadth of the stripes, their closeness to each other, and the size of the stripes." (Forbes Watson, Textile Man. 78). The same name is now applied to a silk cloth. "The word charâkâna simply means 'a check,' but the term is applied to certain silks or mixed fabrics containing small checks, usually about 8 or 10 checks in a line to an inch." (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 98. Also see Journ. Ind. Art. iii. 6.)

1683.—"20 yards of charkonnis."—In Yale, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

3. Chavonis.

1. Chelloes. (See SHALEEL.)

3. Chinechuras.—Probably cloth from Chimsura.

1. CHINTZ, of sorts.

3. Chittabullies.

3. Chowtars.—This is almost certainly not identical with Chudder. In a list of cotton cloths in the Ain (i. 94) we have chautâr, which may mean 'made with four threads or wires.' Chautâth, 'four-fold,' is a kind of cloth used in the Punjab for counterpanes (Francis, Man. Cotton, 7). This cloth is frequently mentioned in the early letters.

1610.—"Chautarees are white and well requested."—Dawners, Letters, i. 75.

1614.—"The Chautares of Agra and fine bftas yill not here vend."—Foster, Letters, ii. 45.

1615.—"Four pieces fine white Cowter."—Ibid. iv. 51.

3. Chulaeas.—This may be H. chaklâ, chakrî, which Platts defines as 'a kind of cloth made of silk and cotton.'

3. Chunderbanniès.—This is perhaps H. chandra, 'the moon,' bânâ, 'woof.'

3. Chundraconæas.—Forbes Watson has: "Chunnderkara, second quality muslin for handkerchiefs". Plain white bleached muslin called Chunderkara. The word is probably chandrakhâna, 'moon checks.'

3. Clouts, common coarse cloth, for which see N.E.D.

3. Coopoulos. — This is perhaps H. kawpin, kopin, 'the small lungooty worn by Fakirs.'

3. Coorhäs.—H. kord, 'plain, unbleached, undried. What is now known as Kora silk is woven in pieces for waist cloths (see Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 76).

3. Cossaeas.—This perhaps represents Ar. khāṣa ‘special’. In the Ain we have khāṣah in the list of cotton cloths (i. 94). Mr. Taylor describes it as a muslin of a close fine texture, and identifies it with the fine muslin which, according to the Ain (ii. 124), was produced at Sonargion. The finest kind he says is ‘‘jungle-khusa.” (Taylor, op. cit. 45.)

3. Cusitaeas.—These perhaps take their name from Kushtia, a place of considerable trade in the Nadia District.

3. Cuttanees. (See COTTON.)

1. Dhooties. (See DHOTY.)

3. Diapers.

3. Dimities.

3. Doreas.—H. doriya, ‘striped cloth,’ dor, ‘thread.’ In the list in the Ain (i. 96), Doriyah appears among cotton stuffs. It is now also made in silk: ‘‘The simplest pattern is the stripe; when the stripes are longitudinal the fabric is a doriya. . . . The doriya was originally a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, tussar, and other combinations.” (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 57, 94.)

1653. — “3 pieces Dooreas.” — Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

3. DOSOOTIES.

3. DUNGAREES.

3. Dysucksoys.

3. Eliatches.—Platte gives H. ḍāchā, ‘a kind of cloth woven of silk and thread so as to present the appearance of cardamons (ṭākki). But it is almost certainly identical with alleja. It was probably introduced to Agra, where now alone it is made, by the Moghuls. It differs from doriya (see DOREAS above) in having a substantial texture, whereas the doriya is generally flimsy. (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 95.)

3. Emmerties.—This is H. amṛati, i mrati, ‘sweet as nectar.’

2. GINGHAMS.

2. Gudeloc (dimities).—There is a place of the same in the Neilgherry District, but it does not seem to have any cloth manufacture.

1. GUINEA STUFFS.

3. Gurallas. —This is probably the H. gārāh: “unbleached fabrics which under names varying in different localities, constitute a large proportion of the clothing of the poor. They are used also for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead, for which last purpose a large quantity is employed both by Hindus and Mahomedans. These fabrics in Bengal pass under the name of garrha and guze.” (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 83.)

3. Habassies.—Probably P. ‘alabārī, used of cloths dyed in a sort of magenta colour. The recipe is given by Hadi, Mon. on Dyeing in the Ain (i. 94, W. V. p. 16).

3. Herba Tafties. — These are cloths made of Grass-cloth.

3. Humhams. — From Ar. hamūm, ‘a Turkish bath’ ‘(apparently so named from its having been originally used at the bath), is a cloth of a thick stout texture, and generally worn as a wrapper in the cold season.” (Taylor, op. cit. 63.)

2. Izarees.—P. ḍar, ‘drawers, trousers.’ Watson (op. cit. 57) note says that in some places it is peculiar to men, the women’s drawers beingTurwar. Herklots (Quowar-e-Islam, App. xiv.) gives ḍar as equivalent to shulwaur, like the pyjamma, but not so wide.

3. Jamdannies. —P.-H. jumīr, which is said to be properly jumūddān, ‘a box for holding a suit.’ The jumūddān is a loom-figured muslin, which Taylor (op. cit. 48) calls “the most expensive productions of the Daeaca looms.”

3. Jamwars. —H. jumāwar, ‘sufficient for a dress.’ It is not easy to say what stuff is intended by this name. In the Ain (ii. 240) we have jumāwār, mentioned among Guzerat stuffs worked in gold thread, and again (i. 95) jumāwār Parmawār among woollen stuffs. Forbes Watson gives among Kashmir shawls ‘jumāwar, striped shawl pieces’; in the Punjab they are of a striped pattern made both in pashm and wool (Johnstone, Mon. on Wool, 9), and Mr. Kipling says, “the stripes are broad, of alternate colours, red and blue, &c.” (Mukhariji, Art Manufactures of India, 374.)

3. Laccowries.

3. Lemnannees.

3. LONG CLOTHES.

3. LOONGHEES, HERBA. (See GRASS-CLOTH.)

1. LOONGHEE, MAGHRUB. Ar. maghrīb, maghrab, ‘the west.’

3. Mamoodoatīs.

3. Mammoodies. Platte gives Maḥmūdī, ‘praised, fine muslin.’ The Ain (i. 94) classes the Maḥmūdī among cotton cloths, and at a low price. A cloth under this name is made at Shāhābād in the Hardoi District. (Oudh Gazetteer, ii. 25.)

3. Monepore cloths. (See MUNNPORE.)

3. Moorees.—“Moories are blue cloths, principally manufactured in the districts of Noilore and at Canatur in the Chingleput collectorate of Madras. . . . They are largely exported to the streets of Malacca.” (Bel- four, Cyc. ii. 982.)

1684.—“Moories superfine, 1000 pieces.”—Pringle, Diary Fl. Sl. Geo. iv. 41.

3. Munggadooties. (See MOOnga.)

3. MULMULS.

3. Mushruces.—P. mashrā, ‘lawful.’ It is usually applied to a kind of silk or satin with a cotton back. “Pure silk is not allowed to men, but women may wear the most sumptuous silk fabrics” (Tawfik Ali, op. cit. 90, sq.). “All Mushroos wash well, especially the finer kinds, used for bodices, petticoats, and trousers of both sexes.” (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 97.)

1832.—“. . . Mussheroo (striped washing silks manufactured at Bonares) . . .” —Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 106.

1. MUSTERS.

3. Naibabies.
PIECE-GOODS.

3. Nainsooks.—H. nainsukh, 'pleasure of the eye.' A sort of fine white calico. Forbes Watson (op. cit. 76) says it is used for neckerchiefs, and Taylor (op. cit. 46) defines it as "a thick muslin, apparently identical with the "tussuk (tammûth, Blockman, i. 94) of the Ayyen." A cloth is made of the same name in silk, imitated from the cotton fabric. (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 95.)

1. Neganeapuats.
2. Niccannees.—Quoting from a paper of 1683, Orme (Fragments, 287) has "6000 Nicanneers, 13 yards long."
3. Nillae.—Some kind of blue cloth, H. nilā, 'blue.'
1. Nunsarees.—There is a place called Nunsāri in the Bhandāra District (Central Provinces Gazetteer, 346).
2. Onigal (cloths). Probably take their name from the once famous city of Warangal in Hyderabad.
3. PALAMPORES.
3. Peniascoes.—In a paper quoted by Forbes Watson (Report on Old Records, 40) we have Peniascoe, which he says are made of pine-apple fibre.
2. 3. Percaulas.—H. parkālā, 'a spark, a piece of glass.' These were probably some kind of spangled robe, set with pieces of glass, as some of the modern Phoolkaris are. In the Madras Diaries of 1854-5 we have "Percolaeas, and "percolies, fine" (Pringle, i. 53, iii. 118, iv. 41.)
1. In a letter of 1615 we have "Lunges (see LOONGHEE) and Footaes of all sorts." (Foster, Letters, iv. 306), where the editor suggests H. phākā, 'variegated.' But in the Aīn we find "Foutaah (loin-bands)" (i. 93), and this is from the connection the word probably meant.
3. Pulecat handkerchiefs. (See MADRAS handkerchiefs and BANDANNA.)
2. Punjam.—The Madras Gloss, gives Tel. puñjam, Tam. puñjam, lit. 'a collection.' "In Tel. a collection of 60 threads and in Tam. of 120 threads skinned, ready for the formation of the warp for weaving. A cloth is named denomi, 10, 12, 14, up to 40 puñjam, according to the number of times 60, or else 120, is contained in the total number of threads in the warp. Puñjam thus also came to mean a cloth of the length of one puñjam as usually skinned; this usual length is 36 cubits, or 18 yards, and the width from 38 to 44 inches, 14 lbs. being the common weight; pieces of half length were formerly exported as Salempoory." Writing in 1814, Heyne (Tracts, 347) says: "Here (in Salem) two punjums are designated by 'first call,' so that twelve punjums of cloth is called 'six call,' and so on."

3. Raings.—"Rang is a muslin which resembles jhuna in its transparent gauze or net-like texture. It is made by passing a single thread of the warp through each division of the reed" (Taylor, op. cit. 44.).
1. Rahlins.—Gudges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.
1. Saloopauts. (See SHALEE.)
3. Sannoes.
2. Sassergates.—Some kind of cloth called 'that of the 1000 knots,' H. saasara granthi. "Sasserganitas" (Birdwood, Rep. on Old Records, 65.)
2. Sastrancundees.—These cloths seem to take their name from a place called Sastracundees, 'Pool of the Law.' This is probably the place named in the Aīn (ed. Jarrett, ii. 124): "In the township of Kinya Sar Dar is a large reservoir which gives a peculiar whiteness to the cloths washed in it." Gladwin reads the name Catarasshoonda, or Catarasoonder (see Taylor, op. cit. 91).
3. Seerbands, Seerbetties.—These are names for turbans, H. sirband, sirbati. (Taylor, op. cit. 47) names them as Dacca muslins under the names of surbind and surbutee.
3. Seershauds.—This is perhaps P. sir-shâdl, 'head-delighting,' some kind of turban or veil.
3. Seersuckers.—Perhaps, sîr, 'head,' sukh, 'pleasure.'
3. Shalbaft. — P. shalbâft, 'shawl-weaving.' (See SHAWL.)
3. Sicktenias. — SOOSIES.
3. Subnoms, Subloms.—"Shubnam is a thin pellicud muslin to which the Persian figurative name of 'evening dew' (shabnam) is given, the fabric being, when spread over the bleeding-field, scarcely distinguishable from the dew on the grass." (Taylor, op. cit. 45.)
3. Sublooms. (See SUCLAT.)
3. Taffaties. — SOOSIES of sorts. "A name applied to plain woven silks, in more recent times signifying a light thin stuff with a considerable lustre or gloss" (Drapers' Dict. s.v.). The word comes from P. tfäftä, 'to twist, spin.' The Aīn (i. 94) has tfäftä in the list of silks.
3. Tainsooks.—H. taneubh, 'taking ease.' (See above under NAINSOOKS.)
2. Tanjees. — P. tanzeh, 'body adorning.' — "A tolerably fine muslin" (Taylor, op. cit. 46; Forbes Watson, op. cit. 76). "The silk tanzel seems to have gone out of fashion, but that in cotton is very commonly used for the chicken work in Lucknow." (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 96.)
1. Tapsails. (See under ALLEJA.) In the Aīn (i. 94) we have: "Tapsiazh (a stuff from Mecca)."
1. 1670.—"So that in your house are only left of Tapsia and cotton yarn."—In Yule, Hand Book Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxxxvi. Birdwood in Report on Old Records, 38, has Topsails.
2. Tarnatannes.—"There are various kinds of muslims brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengal, betelles (see BETTEELA) tarna as . . ." (Chambers' Cyc. of 1778, quoted in 3rd ser. N. & Q.
PIG-STICKING.

This is Anglo-Indian hog-hunting, or what would be called among a people delighting more in lofty expression, ‘the chase of the Wild Boar.’ When, very many years since, one of the present writers, destined for the Bengal Presidency, first made acquaintance with an Indian mess-table, it was that of a Bombay regiment at Aden—in fact of that gallant corps which is now known as the 103rd Foot, or Royal Bombay Fusiliers. Hospitable as they were, the opportunity of enlightening an aspirant Bengalee on the short-comings of his Presidency could not be foregone. The chief counts of indictment were three: 1st. The inferiority of the Bengal Horse Artillery system; 2nd. That the Bengalees were guilty of the base effeminacy of drinking beer out of champagne glasses; 3rd. That in pig-sticking they threw the spear at the boar. The two last charges were evidently ancient traditions, maintaining their ground as facts down to 1840 therefore; and showed how little communication practically existed between the Presidencies as late as that year. Both the allegations had long ceased to be true, but probably the second had been true in the 18th century, as the third certainly had been. This may be seen from the quotation from R. Lindsay, and by the text and illustrations of Williamson’s Oriental Field Sports (1807), [and much later (see below)]. There is, or perhaps we should say more diffidently there was, still a difference between the Bengal practice in pig-sticking, and that of Bombay. The Bengal spear is about 6\frac{1}{2} feet long, loaded with lead at the butt so that it can be grasped almost quite at the end and carried with the point down, inclining only slightly to the front; the boar’s charge is received on the right flank, when the point, raised to 45° or 50° of inclination, if rightly guided, pierces him in the shoulder. The Bombay spear is a longer weapon, and is carried under the armpit like a dragoon’s lance. Judging from Elphinstone’s statement below we should suppose that the Bombay as well as the Bengal practice originally was to throw the spear, but that both independently discarded this, the Qui-his adopting the short overhand spear, the Ducks the long lance.

1679.—“In the morning we went a hunting of wild Hogs with Kisna Reddy, the chief man of the Islands” (at mouth of the Kistna) "and about 100 other men of the island (Die) with lances and Three score dogs, with whom we killed eight Hoggs great and small, one being a Bore very large and fatt, of greate weight."—Consil. of Agent and Council of Fort St. Geo. on Tour. In Notes and Extz. No. II.

The party consisted of Streynsham Master "Agent of the Coast and Bay," with "Mr. Timothy Willes and Mr. Richard Mohun of the Councell, the Minister, the Chyrurgeon, the Schoolmaster, the Secretary, and two Writers, an Ensign, 6 mounted soldiers and a Trumpeter," in all 17 Persons in the Company's Service, and "Four Freemen, who went with the Agent's Company for their own pleasure, and at their own charges." It was a Tour of Visitation of the Factories.

1773.—The Hon. R. Lindsay does speak of the "Wild-boar chase"; but he wrote after 35 years in England, and rather eschews Anglo-Indianisms:

"Our woods consisted only of a short heavy sparrow, three feet in length, and well poised; the boar being found and un-kennelled by the spaniels, runs with great speed across the plain, is pursued on horseback, and the first rider who approaches him throws the javelin..."—Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 161.

1807.—"When (the hog) begins to slacken, the attack should be commenced by the horseman who may be nearest pushing on to his left side; into which the spear should be thrown, so as to lodge behind the shoulder blade, and about six inches from the backbone."—Williamsos, Oriental Field Sports, p. 9. (Left must mean hog's right.) This author says that the bamboo shafts were 8 or 9 feet long, but that very short ones had formerly been in use; thus confirming Lindsay.

1816.—"We hog-hunt till two, then tiff, and hawk or course till dusk... we do not throw our spears in the old way, but poke with spears longer than the common ones, and never part with them."—Elphinston's Life, i. 311.

1828.—"... the boar who had made good the next cane with only a slight scratch from a spear thrown as he was charging the hedge."—Orient. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, i. 116.]

1848.—"Swankey of the Body-Guard himself, that dangerous youth, and the greatest buck of all the Indian army now on leave, was one day discovered by Major Dobbin, tete-a-tete with Amelia, and describing the sport of pigsticking to her with great humour and eloquence."—Vanity Fair, ii. 285.

1866.—"I may be a young pig-sticker, but I am too old a sportsman to make such a mistake as that."—Treeleyha, The Duck Bungalore, in Fraser, lxxiii. 387.

1873.—"Pigsticking may be very good fun..."—A True Reformer, ch. i.

1876.—"You would perhaps like tiger-hunting or pig-sticking; I saw some of that for a season or two in the East. Everything here is poor stuff after that."—Daniel Defoe, ii. ch. xi.

1878.—"In the meantime there was a 'pig-sticking' meet in the neighbouring district."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 140.

PIG-TAIL, s. This term is often applied to the Chinaman's long plait of hair, by transfer from the queue of our grandfathers, to which the name was much more appropriate. Though now universal among the Chinese, this fashion was only introduced by their Manchu conquerors in the 17th century, and was "long resisted by the natives of the Amoy and Swatow districts, who, when finally compelled to adopt the distasteful fashion, concealed the badge of slavery beneath cotton turbans, the use of which has survived to the present day" (Giles, Glossary of Reference, 32). Previously the Chinese wore their unshaven back hair gathered in a net, or knotted in a chignon. De Rhodes (Rome, 1615, p. 5) says of the people of Tongking, that "like the Chinese they have the custom of gathering the hair in fine nets under the hat."

1879.—"One sees a single Sikh driving four or five Chinamen in front of him, having knotted their pig-tails together for reins."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 283.

PILAU, PILOU, PILÁF, &c., s. Pers. puldu, or pilde, Skt. pulaka, 'a ball of boiled rice.' A dish, in origin purely Mahommedan, consisting of meat, or fowl, boiled along with rice and spices. Recipes are given by Herklots, ed. 1863, App. xxix.; and in the Ain-i-Akbari (ed. Blochmann, i. 60), we have one for kima puldo (kima= 'hash') with several others to which the name is not given. The name is almost as familiar in England as curry, but not the thing. It was an odd circumstance, some 45 years ago, that the two surgeons of a dragoon regiment in India were called Currie and Pileau.

1616.—"Sometimes they boil pieces of flesh or hens, or other fowl, cut in pieces in their rice, which dish they call pillow. As they order it they make it a very excellent and a very well tasted food."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

c. 1630.—"The feast begins: it was compounded of a hundred sorts of pelo and candied dried meats."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1688, p. 138, [and for varieties, p. 310].
PINANG. 711 PINDARRY.

—Bernier, ed. Constable, 121.]

1673.—"The most admired Dainty where-with they stuff themselves is Pullow, whereof they will fill themselves to the Throat and receive no hurt, it being so well prepared for the Stomach."—Fryer, 399. See also p. 98. At p. 404 he gives a recipe.

562.—"They eat their pilaw and other spoo-ne-meate withoute spoone, taking up, their pottage in the hollow of their fingers."—Evelyn, Diary, June 19.

1687.—"They took up their Mess with their Fingers, as the Moors do their Pilaw, using no Spoons."—Dampier, i. 430.

1689.—"Pelau, that is Rice boil'd... with Spices intermixt, and a boil'd Fowl in the middle, is the most common Indian Dish."—Ovington, 397.

1711.—"They cannot go to the Price of a Pilloe, or boil'd Fowl and Rice; but the better sort make that their principal Dish."—Lockyer, 231.

1738.—"On a certain day... all the Musulman officers belonging to your department shall be entertained at the charge of the Sircar, with a public repast, to consist of Pullao of the first sort."—Select Letters of Tippoo S., App. xlii.

1820.—"And nearer as they came, a genial savour Of certain stews, and roast-meats, and pilau, Things which in hungry mortals' eyes find favour."—Don Juan, v. 47.

1848.—""There's a pilau, Joseph, just as you love it, and Papa has brought home the best turbot in Billingsgate."—Vanity Fair, i. 20.

PINANG, s. This is the Malay word for Areca, and it is almost always used by the Dutch to indicate that article, and after them by some Continental writers of other nations. The Chinese word for the same product—pin-lang—is probably, as Bretschneider says, a corruption of the Malay word. (See PENANG.)

[1603.—"They (the Javans) are very great eaters—and they have a certaine heare called betaile (see BETEL) which they usually have carried with them wheresoever they goe, in boxes, or wrapped vp in a cloath like a sugar loafe: and also a nut called Pinange, which are both in operation very hott, and they eate them continually to warme them within, and keepe them from the fluxe. They do likewise take much tabacco, and also opium."—E. Scott, An Exact Discourse, &c., of the East Indies, 1606, Sig. N. 2.]

authorities: 4. that the term was taken from the Beder race; 5. from Pindaré, Pind, 'a lump of food,' ār, 'bringer,' a plunderer. As to the fourth suggestion, he remarks that there was a Beder race dwelling in Mysore, Belary and the Nizam's territories. But the objection to this etymology is that as far back as 1749 both words, Beder and Pindaré, are used by the native historian, Rám Singh Munshi, side by side, but applied to different bodies of men. Mr. Irvine's suggestion is that the word Pindaré, or more strictly Pandhar, comes from a place or region called Pandhār or Pandhár. This place is referred to by native historians, and seems to have been situated between Burhānpūr and Handiya on the Nerbudda. There is good evidence to prove that large numbers of Pindarás were settled in this part of the country. Mr. Irvine sums up by saying: "If it were not for a passage in Grant Duff (H. of the Maharattas, Bombay reprint, 157), I should have been ready to maintain that I had proved my case. My argument requires two things to make it irrefutable: (1) a very early connection between Pandhār and the Pindhāris; (2) that the Pindhāris had no early home or settlement outside Pandhār. As to the first point, the recorded evidence seems to go no farther back than 1794, when Senthiah granted them lands in Nimār; whereas before that time the name had become fixed, and had even crept into Anglo-Indian vocabularies. As to the second point, Grant Duff says, and he if anybody must have known, that "there were a number of Pindhāris about the borders of Mahārāṣṭra and the Carnatic. . . ." Unless these men emigrated from Khandesh about 1736 (that is a hundred years before 1826, the date of Grant Duff's book), their presence in the South with the same name tends to disprove any special connection between their name, Pindhār, and a place, Pindhār, several hundred miles from their country. On the other hand, it is a very singular coincidence that men known as Pindhāris should have been newly settled about 1794 in a country which had been known as Pandhār at least ninety years before they thus occupied it. Such a mere fortuitous connection between Pandhār and the Pindhāris is so extraordinary that we may call it an impossibility. A fair inference is that the region Pandhār was the original home of the Pindhāris, that they took their name from it, and that grants of land between Burhānpūr and Handiya were made to them in what had always been their home-country, namely Pandhār.)"

The Pindāris seem to have grown up in the wars of the late Mahommedan dynasties in the Deccan, and in the latter part of the 17th century attached themselves to the Mahrattas in their revolt against Aurangzib; the first mention which we have seen of the name occurs at this time. For some particulars regarding them we refer to the extract from Prinsep below. During and after the Mahratta wars of Lord Wellesley's time many of the Pindāris leaders obtained grants of land in Central India from Sindia and Holkar, and in the chaos which reigned at that time outside the British territory their raids in all directions, attended by the most savage atrocities, became more and more intolerable; these outrages extended from Bundelkhand on the N.E., Káda on the S., and Orissa on the S.E., to Guzerat on the W., and at last repeatedly violated British territory. In a raid made upon the coast extending from Masulipatam northward, the Pindāris in ten days plundered 339 villages, burning many, killing and wounding 682 persons, torturing 3600, and carrying off or destroying property to the amount of £250,000. It was not, however, till 1817 that the Governor-General, the Marquis of Hastings, found himself armed with permission from home, and in a position to strike at them effectually, and with the most extensive strategic combinations ever brought into action in India. The Pindāris were completely crushed, and those of the native princes who supported them compelled to submit, whilst the British power for the first time was rendered truly paramount throughout India.

1706-7. — "Zoolfear Khan, after the rains pursued Dhunnah, who fled to the Beejapore country, and the Khan followed him to the banks of the Kistnah. The Pinderrehs took Velore, which however was soon retaken. . . . A great caravan, coming from Aurungabad, was totally plundered and everything carried off, by a body of Mahrattas, at only 12 coss distance from the imperial camp."—Narrative of a Bondaela soldier, app. to Scott's Tr. of Firishta's H. of Deccan, ii. 122. [On this see Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 426. Mr. Irvine in the paper quoted above shows that it is doubtful if the author really used the word.
"By a strange coincidence the very copy used by J. Scott is now in the British Museum. On turning to the passage I find 'Pedâ Badar,' a well-known man of the period, and not Pindârî or Pinderreh at all."]

1702.—"Siwae Madhowo Rao . . . began to collect troops, stores, and heavy artiillery, so that he at length assembled near 100,000 horse, 60,000 Pindarehs, and 50,000 matchlock foot . . . In reference to the Pindarehs, it is not unknown that they are a low tribe of robbers entertained by some of the princes of the Dakhan, to plunder and lay waste the territories of their enemies, and to serve for guides."—H. of Hyde-ter Naiz, by Meer Hassan Ali Khan, 149. [Mr.
Irvine suspects that this may be based on a mixed up passage in the former quotation.
The earliest undoubted mention of the name in native historians is by Râm Singh (1748).
There is a doubtful reference in the Târikhi-Muhammadî (1722-23).]

1784.—"Bindarass, who receive no pay, but give a certain monthly sum to the commander-in-chief for permission to maraud, or plunder, under sanction of his banners."
—Indian Vocabulary, s.v.

1803.—"Depend upon it that no Pindar-ries or struggling horse will venture to your rear, so long as you can keep the enemy in check, and your detachment well in advance."—Wellington, ii. 219.

1828.—"On asking an intelligent old Pindarry, who came to me on the part of Kurrem Khan, the reason of this absence of high character, he gave me a short and shrewd answer: 'Our occupation' (said he) 'was incompatible with the fine virtues and qualities you state; and I suppose if any of our people ever had them, the first effect of such good feeling would be to make him leave our community.'—Sir John Malcolm, Central India,
i. 496.

1825.—"The name of Pindara is coeval with the earliest invasion of Hindoostan by the Mahrrattas . . . The designation was appointed to a sort of sorry cavalry that accompanied the Peshwa's armies in their expeditions, rendering them the same service as the Cossacks perform for the armies of Russia . . . The several leaders went over with their bands from one chief to another, as best suited their private interests, or those of their followers. . . .
The rivers generally became fordable by the close of the Dussra. The horses then were shot, and a leader of tried courage and conduct having been chosen as Luhkuree, all that were inclined set forth on a foray or Luhkner, as it was called in the Pindaree nomenclature; all were mounted, though not equally well. Out of a thousand, the proportion of good cavalry might be 400;
the favourite weapon was a bamboo spear . . .
but . . . it was a rule that every 15th or 20th man of the fighting Pindarees should be armed with a matchlock. Of the remaining 600, 400 were usually common looters (see LOOTY), indifferently mounted, and armed with every variety of weapon, and the rest, slaves, attendants, and camp-followers, mounted on tattoos, or wild ponies, and keeping up with the lubhur in the best manner they could."—Prinsep, Hist. of Pol. and Mil. Transactions (1813-1823),
i. 37, note.

1829.—"The person of whom she asked this question said 'Brinjaree' (see ERIN-

Pindaree, and the name was quite sufficient.
She jumped out of the palanquin and ran towards home, screaming, 'Pindarees, Pindarees.'"—Mem. of John Shipk, ii. 281.

1861.—"So I took to the hills of Malwa, and the free Pindaree life."—Sir A. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

PINE-APPLE. (See ANANAS.)
[The word has been corrupted by native weavers into pinaphal or minaphal, as the name of a silk fabric, so called because of the pine-apple pattern on it.
(See Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 99.)]

PINJRAPOLE, s. A hospital for animals, existing perhaps only in Guzerat, is so called. G uz. pinlrapor or pinrapol, [properly a cage (pinjra) for the sacred bull (yola) released in the name of Siva]. See Heber, ed. 1844, ii.
120, and Ortington, 300-301; [P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 67, 70. Forbes (Or.
Mem. 2nd ed. i. 156) describes "the Baniian hospital" at Surat; but they do not use this word, which Molesworth says is quite modern in Mahr.] 1808.—"Every marriage and mercantile

PINTADO. From the Port.

a. A 'painted' (or 'spotted') cloth, i.e. chintz (v.r.). Though the word was applied, we believe, to all printed goods, some of the finer Indian chintzes were, at least in part, finished by hand-painting.

Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc 143.

1602.—"... some fine pintadoes."—
Birdwood, First Letter Book, 34.]
1602—"... about their loynes a fine Pintadoes."—Soott's Discourse of Iaua, in Purchas, i. 164.

1606—"Heare the Generall delivered a Letter from the KINGS MAILESTIE of ENGLAND, with a fayre standing Cuppe, and a cover double gilt, with divers of the choicest Pintadoes, which hee kindely accepted of."—Middleett's Voyage, E. 3.

[1610.—]"Pintadoes of divers sorts will sell... The names are Sarassa, Berumpury, large Chaudes, Selematt Cambitas, Selematt white and black, Cheat Betime and divers others."—Dawers, Letters, i. 75.

c. 1630.—"Also they stain Linnen cloth, which we call pantadoes."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 304.]

1665.—"To Woodcott... where was a roome hung with Pintado, full of figures greate and small, prettily representing sundry trades and occupations of the Indians."—Evelyn's Diary, Dec. 30.

c. 1759.—"The chinta and other fine painted goods, will, if the market is not overstocked, find immediate vent, and sell for 100 p. cent."—Letter from Pegu, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 120.

b. A name (not Anglo-Indian) for the Guinea-fowl. This may have been given from the resemblance of the speckled feathers to a chintz. But in fact pintá in Portuguese is 'a spot,' or fleck, so that probably it only means speckled. This is the explanation of Blount; [The word is more commonly applied to the cape Pigeon. See Mr. Gray's note on Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 21, who quotes from Fryer, p. 12.]

PISACHEE, Skt. piśāči, a shed-demon, m. piśācha. In S. India some of the demons worshipped by the ancient tribes are so called. The spirits of the dead, and particularly of those who have met with violent deaths, are especially so entitled. They are called in Tamil pey. Sir Walter Elliot considers that the Piśāchā were (as in the case of Rākshasas) a branch of the aboriginal inhabitants. In a note he says: 'The Piśāchā dialect appears to have been a distinct Dravidian dialect, still to be recognised in the speech of the Paraiya, who cannot pronounce distinctly some of the pure Tamil letters.' There is, however, in the Hindu drama a Piśāchā bhasā, a gibberish or corruption of Sanskrit, introduced. [This at the present day has been applied to English.] The term piśāči is also applied to the small circular storms commonly by Europeans called devils (q.v.). We do not know where Archdeacon Hare (see below) found the Piśāchā to be a white demon.

1610.—"The fifth (mode of Hindu marriage) is the Piśāchā-vivāha, when the lover, without obtaining the sanction of the girl's parents, takes her home by means of talismans, incantations, and such like magical practices, and then marries her. Piśach, in Sanskrit, is the name of a demon, which takes whatever person it fixes on, and as the above marriage takes place after the same manner, it has been called by this name."—The Inbuddān, ii. 72; [See Mann, iii. 34].

c. 1780.—"Que demandez-vous? leur criait-je d'un ton de voix rude. 'Pourquoi restez-vous là à m'attendre? et d'où vient que ces autres femmes se sont enfuies, comme si j'étois un Péchaseh (esprit malin), ou une bête sauvage qui vouloit vous devourer?'"—Haufler, ii. 257.

1801.—"They believe that such men as die accidental deaths become Pysāchā, or evil spirits, and are exceedingly troublesome by making extraordinary noises, in families, and occasioning fits and other diseases, especially in women."—F. Buchanan's Mysore, iii. 37.

1816.—"Whirlwinds... at the end of March, and beginning of April, carry dust and light things along with them, and are called by the natives peshashes or devils."—Asiatic Journal, ii. 367.

1819.—"These demons or peshashes are the usual attendants of Shiva."—Erskine on Elephants, in Bo. Lit. Soc. Trans. i. 219.

1827.—"As a little girl was playing round me one day with her white frock over her head, I laughingly called her Pisahsee, the name which the Indians give to their white devil. The child was delighted with the fine name, and ran about the house crying out to every one she met. I am the Pisahashe, I am the Pishasse. Would she have done so, had she been wapt in black, and called witch or devil instead? No; for, as usual, the reality was nothing, the sound and colour everything."—J. C. Hare, in Guesses at Truth, by Two Brothers, 1st Series, ed. 1838, p. 7.

PISANG, s. This is the Malay word for plantain or banana (q.v.q.v.). It is never used by English people, but is the usual word among the Dutch, and common also among the Germans, [Norwegians and Swedes, who probably got it through the Dutch.]

1651.—"Les Coutevants vendent des fruits, come du Pisang, &c."—A. Roger, La Parle Outerte, p. 11.

c. 1785.—"Nous arrivâmes au grand village de Colla, où nous vinmes de belles allées de bananiers ou pisang..."—Haufler, ii. 65.
[1875. — "Of the pisang or plantain ... there are over thirty kinds, of which, the Pisang-mas, or golden plantain, so named from its colour, though one of the smallest, is nevertheless most deservedly prized." — Thomson, The Straits of Malacca, 8.]

PISHPASH. s. Apparently a facetious Anglo-Indian word, applied to a slop of rice-soup with small pieces of meat in it, much used in the Anglo-Indian nursery. [It is apparently P. pash-pash, 'shivered or broken in pieces'; from Pers. pashidan.]

1834.—"They found the Secretary disengaged, that is to say, if surrounded with huge volumes of Financial Reports on one side, and a small silver tray holding a mess of pishpash on the other, can be called disengaged."—The Baboo, &c. i. 85.

PITARRAH, s. A coffer or box used in travelling by palankin, to carry the traveller's clothes, two such being slung to a banghy (q.v.). Hind. pitarah, petarai, Skt. pitaka, 'a basket.' The thing was properly a basket made of cane; but in later practice of tin sheet, with a light wooden frame.

[1833.—"... he sat in the palanquin, which was filled with water up to his neck, whilst everything he had in his batarah (or 'trunk') was soaked with wet ..."—Travels of Dr. Wolf, ii. 198.]

1849.—"The attention of the staff was called to the necessity of putting their pitarrahs and property in the Bungalow, as thieves abounded. 'My dear Sir,' was the reply, 'we are quite safe; we have nothing.'"—Delhi Gazette, Nov. 7.

1853.—"It was very soon settled that Oakfield was to send to the dak bungalow for his petarahas, and stay with Staunton for about three weeks."—W. D. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 228.

PLANTAIN. s. This is the name by which the Musa sapientum is universally known to Anglo-India. Books distinguish between the Musa sapientum or plantain, and the Musa paradisiaca or banana; but it is hard to understand where the line is supposed to be drawn. Variation is gradual and infinite.

The botanical name Musa represents the Ar. mauz, and that again is from the Skt. nocha. The specific name sapientum arises out of a misunderstanding of a passage in Pliny, which we have explained under the head Jack. The specific paradisiaca is derived from the old belief of Oriental Christians (entertained also, if not originated by the Mahommedans) that this was the tree from whose leaves Adam and Eve made themselves aprons. A further mystical interest attached also to the fruit, which some believed to be the forbidden apple of Eden. For in the pattern formed by the core or seeds, when the fruit was cut across, our forefathers discerned an image of the Cross, or even of the Crucifix. Medieval travellers generally call the fruit either Musa or 'Fig of Paradise,' or sometimes 'Fig of India,' and to this day in the W. Indies the common small plantains are called 'figs.' The Portuguese also habitually called it 'Indian Fig.' And this perhaps originated some confusion in Milton's mind, leading him to make the Banyan (Ficus Indica of Pliny, as of modern botanists) the Tree of the aprons, and greatly to exaggerate the size of the leaves of that ficus.

The name banana is never employed by the English in India, though it is the name universal in the London fruit-shops, where this fruit is now to be had at almost all seasons, and often of excellent quality, imported chiefly, we believe, from Madeira, and more recently from Jamaica. Mr. Skeat adds that in the Strait Settlements the name plantain seems to be reserved for those varieties which are only eatable when cooked, but the word banana is used indifferently with plantain, the latter being on the whole perhaps the rarer word.

The name plantain is no more originally Indian than is banana. It, or rather platano, appears to have been the name under which the fruit was first carried to the W. Indies, according to Oviedo, in 1516; the first edition of his book was published in 1526. That author is careful to explain that the plant was improperly so called, as it was quite another thing from the platannus described by Pliny. Bluteau says the word is Spanish. We do not know how it came to be applied to the Musa. [Mr. Guppy (8 ser. Notes & Queries, viii. 87) suggests that the Spaniards have obtained platano from the Carib and Galibi words for banana, viz., balatama and palatana, by the process followed by the Australian colonists when they converted a native name for the casuarina trees into 'she-oak'; and that we can thus explain how platano came in Spanish. to signify both the plane-tree and the banana."—Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) derives plantain from Lat. planta, 'a plant'; properly 'a spreading sucker or shoot'; and says that the plantain took its name from its spreading leaf. The rapid spread of the plantain or banana in the West, whence both names were carried back to India, is a counterpart to the rapid diffusion of the ananas in the Old World of Asia. It would seem from the translation of Mendoça that in his time (1585) the Spaniards had come to use the form plantano, which our Englishmen took up as plantain and plantain. But even in the 1736 edition of Bailey's Dict. the only explanation of plantain given is as the equivalent of the Latin plantago, the field-weed known by the former name. Platano and Plantano are used in the Philippine Islands by the Spanish population.

1336.—"Sunt in Syriâ et Aegypso poma oblonga qua Paradisi nuncupantur optimi saporis, mollia, in ore cito dissolvüli; per transversum quotiescumque inspicatur ipsa incideris invenies Cruicecum; diu non durant, unde per mare ad nostras partes duci non possunt incorrupta."—Oul. de Boldenses.

c. 1350.—"Sunt enim in orto illo Aadae de Seyllano primo musa, quas incolae ficus vocant . . . et istud vidimus oculis nostris quod ubicunque inciditur per transversum, in utrâque parte incisurae videtur ymago hominis crucifixi . . . et de istic foliis ficta Adam et Evi fecerunt sibi perizomata . . ."—John de Marignolli, in Cathay, &c. p. 352.

1384.—"And there is again a fruit which many people assert to be that regarding which our first father Adam sinned, and this fruit they call musa . . . in this fruit you see a very great miracle, for when you divide it anyway, whether lengthways or across, or cut it as you will, you shall see inside, as it were, the image of the Crucifix; and of this we comrades many times made proof."—Viaggio di Simone Sigoli (Firenze, 1862, p. 160).

1526 (tr. 1577).—"There are also certaine plantes whiche the Christians call Platani. In the myndeset of the plant, in the highest part thereof, there groweth a cluster with fourtie or fiftie platanos about it. . . . This cluster ought to be taken from the plant, when any one of the platanos begins to appeare yellowe, at which time they take it, and hang it in their houses, where all the cluster waxeth rype, with all his platanos."—Oviedo, transl. in Eden's Hist. of Travayle, f. 208.

1552 (tr. 1582).—"Morover the Ilande (of Mombas) is verye pleasant, having many orchards, wherein are planted and are groweing . . . Figgis of the Indies . . ."—Castanheda, by N. L., f. 22.

1579.—". . . a fruit which they call Figo (Magollane calls it a figge of a man long, but it is no other than that which the Spaniards and Portingalls have named Plantanes).—Drake's Voyage, Hak. Soc. p. 142.

1585 (tr. 1588).—"There are mountaines very thicke of orange trees, siders [i.e. cedras, citrons], limes, plantanos, and palmas."—Mendoça, by R. Parke, Hak. Soc. ii. 330.

1588.—"Our Generall made their wines to fetch vs Plantans, Lymmons, and Oranges, Pine-apples, and other fruits."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candish, in Purchas, i. 64.

1588 (tr. 1604).—". . . the first that shall be needefulle to treate of is the Plantain (Platano), or Plantano, as the vulgar call it . . . The reason why the Spaniards call it platano for the Indians had no such name, was, as in other trees for that they have found some resemblance of the one with the other, even as they called some fruits prunes, pines, and cucumbers, being far different from those which are called by those names in Castile. The thing wherein was most resemblance, in my opinion, between the plantas at the Indies and those which the ancients did celebrate, is the greatnes of the leaves. . . . But, in truth, there is no more comparison nor resemblance of the one with the other than there is, as the Proverb saith, betwixt an eggge and a chesnut."—Joseph de Acosta, transl. by E. G., Hak. Soc. i. 241.

1593. The plantae is a tree found in most parts of Africa and America of which two leaves are sufficient to cover a man from top to toe."—Hawkins, Voyage into the South Sea, Hak. Soc. 49.

1610.—". . . and every day failed not to send each man, being one and fiftie in number, two cakes of white bread, and a quantitie of Dates and Plantanas . . ."—Sir H. Middelon, in Purchas, i. 254.

c. 1610.—"Cee Gentils ayant pitee de moy, il y eut vne femme qui me mit . . . vne sereuette de feuilles de plantane accommo- dées ensemble au de des espines, puis me letta dessus du rys cuit auce vne certeaine sauce qu'ils appellet caril (see CURRY)."—Moquet, Voyages, 292.

[i.].—"They (elephants) require . . . besides leaves of trees, chiefly of the Indian fig, which we call Bananos and the Turks platanes."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 345.

1616.—"They have to these another fruit—we English there call a Planten, of which many of them grow in clusters together—very yellow when they are Ripe, and then they taste like unto a Norwich Pear, but much better."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 300.

c. 1635.—". . . with candy Plantains and the juicy Pine, On choiceest Melons and sweet Grapes they dine, And with Potatoes fay their wanton Swine."—Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.

PLASSEY, n.p. The village Paldsì, which gives its name to Lord Clive's famous battle (June 23, 1757). It is said to take its name from the pālās (or dhowk) tree.

1748.—"... that they have great reason to complain of Ensign English's conduct in not waiting at Placy... and that if he had stayed another day at Placy, as Fullerooy Cunn was marching with a large force towards Cutway, they presume the Mahattas would have retreated inland on their approach and left him an open passage..."—Letter from Council at Cossim-buazar, in Long, p. 2.

[1757.—Clive's original report of the battle is dated on the "plain of Placies."—Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 57.]

1764,—"Wake, Wake Quevera! Our soft rest must cease, And fly together with our country's peace. No more must we sleep under plantain shade, Which neither heat could pierce nor cold invade; Where bounteous Nature never feels decay, And opening buds drive falling fruits away."—Cowley, Of Plants, Bk. v.

1664.—"Fragments, of this famous battle is brought, to the plain of Placies, 1748. Their complaint is due, and the officers of the English army were suffered to remain in the field and receive the discharge of the English troops, which was not the case in this battle. —Ovington, Bk. iv.

1673.—"Lower than these, but with a Leaf far broader, stands the curious Plantan, loading its tender Body with a Fruit, whose clusters emulate the Grapes of Canaan, which burlathed two men's shoulders."—Fryer, 19.

1686.—"The Plantain I take to be King of all Fruit, not except the Coco itself."—Dampier, i. 311.

1689.—"... and now in the Governour's Garden (at St. Helena) and some others of the Island are quantities of Plantins, Bonanoses, and other delightful Fruits brought from the East. ..."—Ovington, 100.

1764.—"But round the upland huts, bananas plant; A wholesome nutrient bananas yield, And sunburnt labour loses its breezy shade. Their graceful screen let kindred plantanes join, And with their broad vans shiver in the breeze."—Greaving, Bk. iv.

1805.—"The plantain, in some of its kinds, supplies the place of bread."—Orme, Fragments, 479.

1829.—"It's true the people call me, I know not why, the pugley."—Mem. John Shipp, ii. 255.

1856.—"I was foolish enough to pay these budshashes beforehand, and they have thrown me over. I must have been a paugul to do it."—Trevlyn, The Duck Bangalore, 385.

[1857.—"He told me that the native name for a regular picnic is a 'Poggle-POISON-NUT, s. Strzychnos nux vomica, L.

POLEA, n.p. Mal. pulayam, [from Tam. pulam, 'a field,' because in Malabar they are occupied in rice cultivation]. A person of a low or impure tribe, who causes pollution (pula) to those of higher caste, if he approaches within a certain distance.

[The rules which regulate their meeting with other people are given by Mr. Logan (Malabar, i. 118.) From pula the Portuguese formed also the verbs empolear-se, 'to become polluted by the touch of a low-caste person,' and desempolear-se, 'to purify oneself after such pollution' (Gouvea, f. 97, and Synod. f. 52v), superstitions which Menezes found prevailing among the Christians of Malabar. (See HIRAVA.)

1510.—"The fifth class are called Poliar, who collect pepper, wine, and nuts... the Poliar may not approach either the Naeri (see NAIR) or the Brahmins within 50 paces, unless they have been called by them..."—Varthema, 142.

1516.—"There is another lower sort of gentiles called puler... They do not speak to the naers except for a long way off, as far as they can be heard speaking with a loud voice... And whatever man or woman should touch them, their relations immediately kill them like a contaminated thing..."—Barbosa, 143.

1572.—"A ley, da gente toda, ricca o pobre, De fabulas composta se imagina: Andão nus, e somente hum pano cobre As partes que a cubrir natura ensina. Dous modos ha de gente; porque a nobre Nayrs chamados são, e a menos dina Poleas tem por nome, a quem obriga A ley não misturar a casta antiga."—Camões, vii. 37.

By Burton:

"The Law that holds the people high and low, is fraught with false phantastick tales long past; they go unclothed, but a wrap they throw for decent purpose round the loins and waist; Two modes of men are known: the nobles know the name of Nayrs, who call the lower caste Poleas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain..."

1598.—"When the Portuguese came first into India, and made league and composition with the King of Cochin, the Nayros desired that men should give them place, and turne out of the Way, when they mette in the Streets, as the Polyan..." (used to do).—Lynchoten, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 281; also see i. 279].

1606.—"... he said by way of insult that he would order him to touch a Poleea, which is one of the lowest castes of Malabar."—Gouvea, f. 76.

1626.—"These Puler are Theeves and Sorcerers."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

[1727.—"Poulia." (See under MUCA.)

[1766.—... "Poolighees, a cast hardly suffered to breathe the common air, being driven into the forrests and mountains out of the commerce of mankind...."—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 161 seq.]

1770.—"Their degradation is still more complete on the Malabar coast, which has not been subdued by the Mogul, and where they (the pariahs) are called Poulia"—Raynal, E.T. 1798, i. 6.

1865.—... "Further south in India we find polyantrdel among... Poleres of Malabar."—McLeannan, Primitive Marriage, 179.

POLIGAR, s. This term is peculiar to the Madras Presidency. The persons so called were properly subordinate feudal chiefs, occupying tracts more or less wild, and generally of predatory habits in former days; they are now much the same as Zemindars in the highest use of that term (q.v.). The word is Tam. palaivakkaran, 'the holder of a palaivam,' or feudal estate; Tel. palaivada; and thence Mahr. pala-gar; the English form being no doubt taken from one of the two latter. The southern Polgars gave much trouble about 100 years ago, and the "Poligar wars" were somewhat serious affairs. In various assaults on Pānja-lamkurichi, one of their forts in Tinnevelly, between 1799 and 1801 there fell 15 British officers. Much regarding the Poligars of the south will be found in Nelson's Madura, and in Bishop Caldwell's very interesting History of Tinnevelly. Most of the quotations apply to those southern districts. But the term was used north to the Mahratta boundary.

1861.—... "They pulled down the Polegar's houses, who being conscious of his guilt, had fled and hid himself."—Wheeler, i. 118.

1701.—"Le lendemain je me rendis à Tailur, c'est une petite ville qui appartient à un autre Paleagaren."—Let. Édij. x. 269.

1745.—"J'espère que Votre Eminence agréera l'établissement d'une nouvelle Mission près des Montagnes appellées vul-gaiement des Palleagares, où aucun Missionnaire n'avait paru jusqu'à présent. Cette contrée est soumise à divers petits Rois appelés également Palleagars, qui sont indépendans du Grand Mogul quoique placés presque au milieu de son Empire."—Norbert, Mem. ii. 406-7.

1754. — "A Polygar . . . undertook to conduct them through defiles and passes known to very few except himself."—Orme, i. 570.

1750. — "He (Hyder) now moved towards the pass of Changama, and encamped upon his side of it, and sent ten thousand poligars to clear away the pass, and make a road sufficient to enable his artillery and stores to pass through."—Hon. James Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 223.

'... "The matchlock men are generally accompanied by poligars, a set of fellows that are almost savage, and make use of no other weapon than a pointed bamboo spear, 18 or 20 feet long."—Munro's Narrative, 131.

1753.—"To Mahomet Ali they twice sold the Kingdom of Tanjore. To the same Mahomet Ali they sold at least twelve sovereign Princes called the Polygars."—Burke's Speech on Fox's India Bill, in Works, iii. 457.

1800. — "I think Pournaya's mode of dealing with these rajahs . . . is excellent. He sets them up in palankins, elephants, &c., and a great sowarry, and makes them attend to his person. They are treated with great respect, which they like, but can do no mischief in the country. Old Hyde adopted this plan, and his operations were seldom impeded by polygar wars."—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Arbuthnot's Mem. xxii.

1801.—"The southern Poligars, a race of rude warriors habituated to arms of independence, had been but lately subdued."—Welsh, i. 57.

1806.—"Tondiman is an hereditary title. His subjects are Polygars, and since the late war . . . he is become the chief of those tribes, among whom the singular law exists of the female inheriting the sovereignty in preference to the male."—Ed. Valentin, i. 364.

1808.—"There are 72 bastions to the fort of Madura; and each of them was now formally placed in charge of a particular chief, who was bound for himself and his heirs to keep his post at all times, and under all circumstances. He was also bound to pay a fixed annual tribute; to supply and keep in readiness a quota of troops for the Governor's armies; to keep the Governor's peace over a particular tract of country . . . A grant was made to him of a tract of a country . . . together with the title of Pálayya Kárán (Polygar). . . ."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. iii. p. 99.

'... "Some of the Poligars were placed in authority over others, and in time of war were answerable for the good conduct of their subordinates. Thus the Sethupati was chief of them all; and the Polygar of Dindigul is constantly spoken of as being the chief of eighteen Poligars . . . when the levying of troops was required the Delavary (see DALAWAY) sent requisitions to such and such Poligars to furnish so many armed men within a certain time. . . ."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. iii. p. 157.

The word got transferred in English parlance to the people under such Chiefs (see quotations above, 1780-1809); and especially, it would seem, to those whose habits were predatory:

1869.—"There is a third well-defined race mixed with the general population, to which a common origin may probably be assigned, I mean the predatory classes. In the south they are called Poligars, and consist of the tribes of Marawars, Kallars (see COLLERY), Badars (see BYDE), Ramuses (see RAMOOSY): and in the North are represented by the Kolis (see COOLY) of Guzerat, and the Gujarists (see GOOJUR) of the N.W. Provinces."—Sir Walter Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc. L., N.S. i. 112.

[POLIGAR DOG, s. A large breed of dogs found in S. India. "The Polygar dog is large and powerful, and is peculiar in being without hair." (Balfour, Cyc. i. 568.)]

[1853.—"It was evident that the original breed had been crossed with the bull-dog, or the large Polygar dog of India."—Campbell, Old Forest Ranger, 3rd ed. p. 12.]

POLLAM, s. Tam. pālaiyam; Tel. pālemu; (see under POLIGAR).

1783.—"The principal reason which they assigned against the extirpation of the poligars (see POLIGAR) was that the weavers were protected in their fortresses. They might have added, that the Company itself which stung them to death, had been warned in the bosom of these unfortunate princes; for on the taking of Madras by the French, it was in their hospitable pollams that most of the inhabitants found refuge and protection."—Burke's Speech on Fox's E. I. Bill, in Works, iii. 488.

1795.—"Having submitted the general remarks on the Pollams I shall proceed to observe that in general the conduct of the Poligars is much better than could be expected from a race of men, who have hitherto been excluded from those advantages, which almost always attend conquered countries, an intercourse with their conquerors. With the exception of a very few, when I arrived they had never seen a European. . . ."—Report on Dindigul, by Mr. Wynch, quoted in Nelson's Madura, Pt. iv. p. 15.

POLO, s. The game of hockey on horseback, introduced of late years into England, under this name, which comes from Balti; polo being properly in the language of that region the ball used in the game. The game thus lately revived was once known and practised (though in various forms) from Provence to the borders of China [see CHICANE]. It had continued to exist down to our own day, it would seem, only near the extreme East and the extreme West of the Himalaya, viz. at Manipur in the East (between Cachar and Burma), and on the West in the high valley of the Indus (in Ladak, Balti, Astor and Gilgit, and extending into Chitral). From the former it was first adopted by our countrymen at Calcutta, and a little later (about 1864) it was introduced into the Punjab, almost simultaneously from the Lower Provinces and from Kashmir, where the summer visitors had taken it up. It was first played in England, it would seem at Aldershot, in July 1871, and in August of the same year at Dublin in the Phoenix Park. The next year it was played in many places.* But the first mention we can find in the Times is a notice of a match at Lillie-Bridge, July 11, 1874, in the next day's paper. There is mention of the game in the Illustrated London News of July 20, 1872, where it is treated as a new invention by British officers in India. [According to the author of the Badminton Library treatise on the game, it was adopted by Lieut. Sherer in 1854, and a club was formed in 1859. The same writer fixes its introduction into the Punjab and N.W.P. in 1861-62. See also an article in Bailey's Magazine on "The Early History of Polo" (June 1890).] The Central Asian form is described, under the name of Baiga or Kok-bura, "grey wolf," by Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 268 seqq.) and that in Dardistan by Biddulph (Tribes of the Hindoo Koosh, 84 seqq.). In Ladak it is not indigenous, but an introduction from Baltistan. See a careful and interesting account of the game of those parts in Mr. F. Drew's excellent book, The Jummo and Kashmir Territories, 1875, pp. 380-392.

We learn from Professor Tylor that the game exists still in Japan, and a very curious circumstance is that the polo racket, just as that described by Jo. Cinnamus in the extract under CHICANE has survived there. [See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 333 seqq.]

1835.—"The ponies of Muneepoor hold a very conspicuous rank in the estimation of the inhabitants. . . . The national game of Hockey, which is played by every male of the country capable of sitting a horse, renders them all expert equestrians; and it was by men and horses so trained, that the princes of Muneepoor were able for many years not only to repel the aggressions of the Burmans, but to save the whole country . . . and plant their banners on the banks of the Irrawattee."—Pemberton's Report on the E. Frontier of Br. India, 31-32.

1838.—"At Shighur I first saw the game of the Chaughan, which was played the day after our arrival on the Mydan or plain laid out expressly for the purpose. . . . It is in fact hockey on horseback. The ball, which is larger than a cricket ball, is only a globe made of a kind of willow-wood, and is called in Tibet 'Pulu.' . . . I can conceive that the Chaughan requires only to be seen to be played. It is the fit sport of an equestrian nation. . . . The game is played at almost every valley in Little Tibet and the adjoining countries . . . Ladak, Yessen, Chitral, &c.; and I should recommend it to be tried on the Hippodrome at Bayswater. . . ."—Vigne, Travels in Kashmir, Ladak, Iskard, &c. (1842), ii. 289-392.

1848.—"An assembly of all the principal inhabitants took place at Iskardo, on some occasion of ceremony or festivity. . . . I was thus fortunate enough to be a witness of the chaughan, which is derived from Persia, and has been described by Mr. Vigne as hockey on horseback. . . . Large quadrangular enclosed meadows for this game may be seen in all the larger villages of Balti, often surrounded by rows of beautiful willow and poplar trees."—Dr. T. Thomson, Himalaya and Tibet, 260-261.

1875.—"Polo. Tent-pegging, Hurlingham, the Rink, I leave all these delights."—Browning, Inn Album, 23.

POLLOCK-SAUG, s. Hind. pâlak, pâlak-ság; a poor vegetable, called also 'country spinach' (Beta vulgaris, or B. Bengalensis, Roxb.). [Riddell (Domest. Econ. 579) calls it 'Bengal Beet.']

POLONGA, TIC-POLONGA. s. A very poisonous snake, so called in Ceylon (Bungarus? or Daboia elegans?); Singh. polongārā. [The Madras Gloss. identifies it with the Daboia elegans, and calls it 'Chain viper, 'Necklace snake,' 'Russell's viper,' or cobra manilla. The Singh. name is said to be titpolanga, tit, 'spotted,' polangā,' viper.']

1681.1 "There is another venomous snake called Polongo, the most venomous of all, that kills cattel. Two sorts of them I have seen, the one green, the other of reddish gray, full of white rings along the sides, and about five or six feet long."—Knox, 29.

1827.1 "There are only four snakes ascertained to be poisonous; the cobra de capello is the most common, but its bite is not so certainly fatal as that of the tic polonga, which destroys life in a few minutes."—Mrs. Heber, in H.'s Journal, ed. 1844, ii. 167.

POMFRET, POMPHRET, s. A genus of sea-fish of broad compressed form, embracing several species, of good repute for the table on all the Indian coasts. According to Day they are all reducible to Stromateus dinen- sis, 'the white Pomfret,' Str. cinereus, which is, when immature, 'the silver Pomfret,' and when mature, 'the gray Pomfret,' and Str. niger, 'the black P.'

The French of Pondicherry call the fish pample. We cannot connect it with the τουμάνης of Aelian (xv. 23) and Athenaeus (Lib. VII. cap. xviii. seqq.) which is identified with a very different fish, the 'pilot-fish' (Nav- crates dactor of Day). The name is probably from the Portuguese, and a corruption of pampano, 'a vine-leaf,' from supposed resemblance; this is the Portuguese name of a fish which occurs just where the pomfret should be mentioned. Thus:

1598.1 "The best fish is called Mordexim, Pampano, and Tatilino."—Linckhoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 111.

1613.1 "The fishes of this Mediterranean (the Malayan sea) are very savoury sables, and seer fish (serus) and pampanos, and rays. . . ."—Godinio de Eredia, f. 33v.

1703.1 "Albacores, Dauphins, Paumphelets."—In Yate, 'Hedges' Diary,' Hak. Soc. ii. ccxxxiv.

1727.1 "Between Cunnaooa and Ballaxore Rivers . . . a very delicious Fish called the Pampee, come in Sholes, and are sold for two Pence per Hundred. Two of them are sufficient to dine a moderate Man."—J. Hamilton, i. 396; [ed. 1741].

1810.1 "Another face look'd broad and bland
Like pamplet floundering on the sand;
Whene'er she turned her piercing stare,
She seemed alert to spring in air."—Malay verses, rendered by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, 201.

1813.1 "The pomfret is not unlike a small turbot, but of a more delicate flavour; and epicures esteem the black pomfret a great dainty."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 52-53; [2nd ed. i. 36].

1822.1 ". . . the lad was brought up to catch pamphlets and bombaloos. . . ."—Wallace, 'Fifteen Years in India,' 106.

1874.1 "The greatest pleasure in Bombay was eating a fish called 'pomfret.'"—Sat. Rev., 30th May, 690.

1896.1 "Another account of this sort of seine fishing, for catching pomfret fish, is given by Mr. Gueritz."—Ling Roth, 'Natives of Sarawak,' i. 455.

POMMELO, PAMPLEMOUSE, &c., s. Citrus decumana, L, the largest of the orange-tribe. It is the same fruit as the shaddock of the West Indies; but to the larger varieties some form of the name Pommelo seems also to be applied in the West. A small variety, with a fine skin, is sold in London shops as "the Forbidden fruit." The fruit, though grown in gardens over a great part of India, really comes to perfection only near the Equator, and especially in Java, whence it was probably brought to the continent. For it is called in Bengal Batavir nimbah (i.e. Citrus Bato- viana). It probably did not come to India till the 17th century; it is not mentioned in the Ain. According to Bretschneider the Pommelo is mentioned in the ancient Chinese Book of the Shu-King. Its Chinese name is Yu.

The form of the name which we have put first is that now general in Anglo-Indian use. But it is probably only a modern result of 'striving after meaning' (quasi Pomo-melone?). Among older authors the name goes through many strange shapes. Tavernier calls it pompone (Voy. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24; [ed. Ball, ii. 360]), but the usual French name is pample-mousse. Dampier has Pumplenose (ii. 125); Lockyer, Pumplemouse (51); Forrest, Pummel-nose (32); Ives, 'pimple-noses, called in the West Indies Chadocks' [19]. Maria Graham uses the French spelling (22). Pompoleon is a form unknown to us, but given in the Eng. Cyclopaedia. Molesworth's 'Marathi Dict.' gives "pappanas, papanas, or papanis (a word of S. America)." We are unable to give the true etymology, though Littre says boldly "Tamoul, bambahitmas." Ainslie (Mat. Medica, 1813) gives Poomilmas as the Tamil, whilst Balfour (Cycl. of India) gives Pumplimais and Bambulimais as Tamil, PONDICHERRY, n.p. This name of what is now the chief French settlement in India, is Pudu-chéchéri, or Puthuappi, ‘New Town,’ more correctly Pudu-vai, Puthuvai, meaning ‘New Place.’ C. P. Brown, however, says it is Pudi-chéri, ‘New Tank.’ The natives sometimes write it Phulcheri. [Mr. Garstin (Man. S. Arcot, 422) says that Hindus call it Puthuvai or Puthuappi, while Musulmans call it Pulcheri, or as the Madras Gloss. writes the word, Pulcheri.]

[1683.—‘... Interlopers intend to settle att Verapattam, a place near Pullicherry ...’—Pringle, Diary Et. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 41. In iv. 113 (1685) we have Pondicherry.]

1711.—‘The French and Danes likewise hire them (Portuguese) at Pont de Chere and Trincombar.’—Lockyer, 286.

1718.—‘The Fifth Day: we reached Budulsheri, a French Town, and the chief Seat of their Missionaries in India.’—Prop. of the Gospel, p. 42.

1726.—‘Poodecherry,’ in Valentijn, Choro. 11.

1727.—‘Punticherry is the next Place of Note on this Coast, a colony settled by the French.’—A. Hamilton, i. 356; [ed. 1744].

1753.—‘L’établissement des Français à Pondicheri remonte jusqu’en l’année 1674 ; mais par de si folles commencements, qu’on n’auroit eu de la peine à imaginer, que les suites en fussent aussi considérables.’—D’Anville, p. 121.

1780.—‘An English officer of rank, General Coote, who was unequaled among his compeers in ability and experience in war, and who had frequently fought with the French of Phoolcheri in the Karnatic and... had as often gained the victory over them...’—H. of Hyder Naik, 413.

PONGOL, s. A festival of S. India, observed early in January. Tam. pongoL, ‘boiling;’ i.e. of the rice, because the first act in the feast is the boiling of the new rice. It is a kind of harvest-home. There is an interesting account of it by the late Mr. C. E. Gover (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 91), but the connection which he traces with the old Vedic religion is hardly to be admitted. [See the meaning of the rite discussed by Dr. Fraser, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 305 seq.]

1651.—‘... nous parlerons maintenant du Pongol, qui se celebre le 9 de Janvier en l’honneur du Soleil... Ils cuisent du ris avec du lait... Ce ris se cuit hors la maison, afin que le Soleil puisse huer dessus... et quand ils voyent, qu’il semble le vouloir retirer, ils crient d’une voix intel- ligible, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol...’—Abr. Roger, Fr. Tr. 1670, pp. 237-3.

1871.—‘Nor does the gentle and kindly influence of the time cease here. The files of the Munsif’s Court will have been examined with cases from litigious enemies or greedy money lenders. But as Pongol comes round many of them disappear. The creditor thinks of his debtor, the debtor of the creditor. The one relents, the other is ashamed, and both parties are saved by a compromise. Often it happens that a process is postponed ‘till after Pongol!’’—Gover, as above, p. 96.

POOJA, s. Properly applied to the Hindu ceremonies in idol-worship; Skt. pūjā; and colloquially to any kind of rite. Thus ḣhandā ḱī pūjā, or ‘Pooja of the flag,’ is the sepyo term for what in St. James’s Park is called ‘Trooping of the colours.’ [Used in the plural, as in the quotation of 1900, it means the holidays of the Durgā Pūjā or Dussera.]

[1779.—‘... the occupation of the Brahmī should be... to cause the performance of the poojen, i.e. the worship to Devtah. . . ."—Halhed, Code, ed. 1781, Pref. xcix.

[1813.—" . . . the Pandits in attendance commenced the pooja, or sacrifice, by pouring milk and curds upon the branches, and smearing over the leaves with wetted rice."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 214.]

1826.—"The person whose steps I had been watching now approached the sacred tree, and having performed puja to a stone deity at its foot, proceeded to unmuffle himself from his shawls. . . ."—Pandurang Hari, 26; [ed. 1873, i. 34].

1874.—"The mass of the ryots who form the population of the village are too poor to have a family deity. They are forced to be content with . . . the annual pujahs performed . . . on behalf of the village community."—Col. Rev. No. exvii. 195.

1879.—"Among the curiosities of these lower galleries are little models of costumes and country scenes, among them a grand pooja under a tree."— Sat. Rev. No. 1251, p. 477.

[1900.—"Calcutta has been in the throes of the Pujahs since yesterday."—Pioneer Mail, 5 Oct.]

POOJAREE, s. Hind. _pujārī_. An officiating priest in an idol temple.

1702.—"L'office de _poujari_ ou de Prêtresse de la Reine mère était incompatible avec le titre de servante du Seigneur."— Lett. Edij, xl. 111.

[1891.—"Then the Pujari, or priest, takes the Bhuta sword and bell in his hands. . . ."—Monier-Williams, Brahmanism and Hinduism, 4th ed. 249.]

POOL, s. P.—H. pul, 'a bridge.' Used in two of the quotations under the next article for 'embankment.'

[1812.—"The bridge is thrown over the river . . . it is called the Pool Khan . . ."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 124.]

POOLBUNDY, s. P.—H. pulbandi, 'Securing of bridges or embankments.' A name formerly given in Bengal to a civil department in charge of the embankments. Also sometimes used improperly for the embankment itself.

[1785.—"Deduct Poolbundy advanced for repairs of dykes, roads, &c."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 213.

[c. 1781.—"Pay your constant devoirs to Mariam Alloprey, or sell yourself soul and body to Poolbundy."—Ext. from Hicky's Gazette, in Busted, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. 178. This refers to Impey, who was called by this name in allusion to a lucrative contract given to his relative, a Mr. Fraser.]

1786.—"That the Superintendent of Poolbundy Repairs, after an accurate and diligent survey of the bunds and pools, and the provincial Council of Burdwan . . . had delivered it as their opinion . . ."— Articles of Charge against Warren Hastings, in Burke, vii. 93.

1802.—"The Collector of Midnapore has directed his attention to the subject of poolbundy, and in a very ample report to the Board of Revenue, has described certain abuses and oppressions, consisting chiefly of pressing ryots to work on the pools, which call aloud for a remedy."— Fifth Report, App. p. 558.

1810.—" . . . the whole is obliged to be preserved from inundation by an embankment called the poolbundy, maintained at a very great and regular expense."— Williamson, V. M., ii. 365.

POON, PEON, &c., s. Can. powne, [Mal. punna, Skt. punada]. A timber tree (Calophyllum inophyllum, L.) which grows in the forests of Canara, &c., and which was formerly used for masts, whence also called mast-wood. [Linschoten refers to this tree, but not by name (Hak. Soc. i. 67.).]

[1776.—" . . . Pohoon-masts, chiefly from the Malabar coast."—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 109.]

[1773.—"Poon tree . . . the wood light but tolerably strong; it is frequently used for masts, but unless great care be taken to keep the wet from the ends of it, it soon rots."— Ives, 480.]

1885.—"Fen, or Puna . . . the largest sort is of a light, bright colour, and may be had at Mangalore, from the forests of Coromuel in Canara, where it grows to a length of 150 feet. At Mangalore I procured a tree of this sort that would have made a foremast for the Leander, 60-gun ship, in one piece, for 1300 Rupees."— Edge, in J. R. As. Soc. ii. 354.

POONAMALEE, n.p. A town, and formerly a military station, in the Chingleput Dist. of Madras Presidency, 13 miles west of Madras. The name is given in the Imp. Gazetteer as Punamally (?), and Ponda malāi, whilst Col. Branfill gives it as Pāṇṭha malla for Pāvīrṇṭamalla, without further explanation. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam. Pundamallī, ‘town of the jasmine-creeping,’ which is largely grown there for the supply of the Madras markets.

[1876.—"The dog, a small piebald cur, with a short tail, not unlike the ‘Poonamalee terrier,’ which the British soldier is wont to manufacture from Pariah dogs for ‘Griffins’, with sporting proclivities, POONGEE, PHOONGY, s. The name most commonly given to the Buddhist religieux in British Burma. The word phun-ghi signifies 'great glory.'

1782.—"...leurs Prêtres ... sont moins instruits que les Brames, et portent le nom de Ponguis."—Sonnerat, ii. 301.

1795.—"From the many convents in the neighbourhood of Rangoon, the number of Brahans and Phongis must be very considerable; I was told it exceeded 1500."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, 210.

1834.—"The Talapoins are called by the Burmese Phonghis, which term means great glory, or Brahans, which means perfect."—Bp. Bigandet, in J. Ind. Archip. iv. 222-3.

[1836. — "Every Burman has for some time during his life to be a Pohngee, or monk."—Lady Dufferin, Viceroyal Life, 177.]

POORÁNA, s. Skt. purána, 'old,' hence 'legendary,' and thus applied as a common name to 18 books which contain the legendary mythology of the Brahmans.

1612.—"... These books are divided into bodies, members, and joints (cortos, membros, e articulos) ... six which they call Xastra (see SHASTER), which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Puraná, which are the members; twenty-eight called Agamon, which are the joints."—Couto, Dec. V. liv. vi. cap. 8.

1651. — "As their Poranas, i.e. old histories, relate."—Rogers, 153.

[1667. — "When they have acquired a knowledge of Sanscrit ... they generally study the Purana, which is an abridgement and interpretation of the Béths" (see VEDAS).—Berner, ed. Constable, p. 335.]

C. 1760.—"Le puran comprend dix-huit livres qui renferment l'histoire sacrée, qui contiennent les dogmes de la religion des Brahmins."—Encyclopédie, xxvii. 807.

1806. — "Ceux-ci, calculent tout haut de mémoire, tandis que d'autres, plus avancés, lisissent, d'un ton chantant, leurs Pourans."—Haafner, i. 130.

POORUB, and POORBEEA, ss. Hind. pítrub, pírb, 'the East,' from Skt. pírva or pírbo, 'in front of,' as páschá (Hind. pachham) means 'behind' or 'westerly' and dákshina, 'right-hand' or southerly. In Upper India the term means usually Oudh, the Benares division, and Behar. - Hence Poorbeea (púrbíya), a man of those countries, was, in the days of the old Bengal army, often used for a sepoy, the majority being recruited in those provinces.

1553.—"Oomaun (Humâyûn) Patxiâh ... resolved to follow Xerchan (Sher Khan) and try his fortunes against him ... and they met close to the river Ganges before it unites with the river Jamuna, where on the West bank of the river there is a city called Canose (Canauji), one of the chief of the kingdom of Dely. Xerchan was beyond the river in the tract which the natives call Purba. ..."—Barros, IV. ix. 9.

[1611. — "Pierb is 400 cose long."—Jourdain, quoted in Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.]

1616. — "Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large provinces within it, Purb and Patan, the one lying on the east, the other on the west side of the river."—Terry, ed. 1655, p. 357.

1666.—"La Province de Halabas s'appelloit autrefois Eupor. ..."—Thevenot, v. 197.

[1775. — "Instead of marching with the great army he had raised into the Purbunean country ... we were informed he had turned his arms against us. ..."—Ives, 91.]

1881. —

... My lands were taken away,
And the Company gave me a pension of just eight annas a day;
And the Poorbeahs swaggered about our streets as if they had done it all ...

Attar Singh loquace, by 'Sonar,' Sir M. Durand in an Indian paper, the name and date lost.

POOTLY NAUTCH, s. Properly Hind. kâth-pulli-nâch, 'wooden-puppet-dance.' A puppet show.

c. 1817.—"The day after tomorrow will be my lad James Dawson's birthday, and we are to have a puttully-nauth in the evening."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 291.

POPPER-CAKE, in Bombay, and in Madras popadam, ss. These are apparently the same word and thing, though to the former is attributed a Hind. and Mahr. origin pápar, Skt. pápa, and to the latter a Tamil one, pappadam, as an abbreviation of parippu-adam, 'lentil cake.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tel. appadam, Tam. appalam (see HOPPER), and Mal. pappatam, from parippu, dhall, atta, 'cake.'] It is a kind of thin scone or wafer, made of any kind of pulse or lentil flour, seasoned with asafetida, &c., fried in oil, and in W. India baked crisp, and often eaten at European tables as an accompaniment to curry. It is not bad, even to a novice.
1814.—"They are very fond of a thin cake, or wafer, called popper, made from the flour of oord or mash... highly seasoned with assa-foetida; a salt called popper-khor; and a very hot mustard (see Mussalla), compounded of turmeric, black pepper, ginger, garlic, several kinds of warm seeds, and a quantity of the hottest Chili pepper."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 50; [2nd ed. i. 347].

1820.—"Papadoms (fine cakes made of gram-flour and a fine species of alkali, which gives them an agreeable salt taste, and serves the purpose of yeast, making them rise, and become very crisp when fried..."
—As. Researches, xxii. 315.

"Paper, the flour of oored (see OORD), salt, assa-foetida, and various spices, made into a paste, rolled as thin as a wafer, and dried in the sun, and when wanted for the table baked crisp..."—T. Coates, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 194.

PORCA, n.p. In Imp. Gazetteer Porakâd, also called Piraca; properly Porakâdâ, [or according to the Madras Gloss. Porakâtû, Mal. pura, 'outside,' katu, 'jungle']. A town on the coast of Travancore, formerly a separate State. The Portuguese had a fort here, and the Dutch, in the 17th century, a factory. Fra Paolina (1796) speaks of it as a very populous city full of merchants, Mahomedan, Christian, and Hindu. It is now insignificant. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 338.]

[1663.4.—"Your factories of Carwarr and Porquatt are continued but to very little purpose to you."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 18.]

PORCELAIN, s. The history of this word for China-ware appears to be as follows. The family of univalve mollusks called Cypreaeidae, or Cowries, (q.v.) were in medieval Italy called porcellana and porcelleta, almost certainly from their strong resemblance to the body and back of a pig, and not from a grosser analogy suggested by Mahn (see in Littre sub voce). That this is so is strongly corroborated by the circumstance noted by Dr. J. E. Gray (see Eng. Cyc. Nat. Hist. s.v. Cypreaeidae) that Pig is the common name of shells of this family on the English coast; whilst Sow also seems to be a name of one or more kinds. The enamel of this shell seems to have been used in the Middle Ages to form a coating for ornamental pottery, &c., whence the early application of the term porcellana to the fine ware brought from the far East. Both applications of the term, viz. to cowries and to China-ware, occur in Marco Polo (see below). The quasi-analogous application of pig in Scotland to earthen-ware, noticed in an imaginary quotation below, is probably quite an accident, for there appears to be a Gaelic pigge, 'an earthen jar,' &c. (see Skeat, s.v. piggin). We should not fail to recall Dr. Johnson's etymology of porcelaine from "pour cent annees," because it was believed by Europeans that the materials were matured under ground 100 years! (see quotations below from Barbosa, and from Sir Thomas Brown).

c. 1250.—Capmany has the following passage in the work cited. Though the same writer published the Laws of the Consulado del Mar in 1791, he has changed the whole of the chapters, and this, which he has quoted, is omitted altogether!

"In the XLIVth chap. of the maritime laws of Barcelona, which are undoubtedly not later than the middle of the 13th century, there are regulations for the return cargoes of the ships trading with Alexandria. ... In this are enumerated among articles brought from Egypt... cotton in bales and spun wool de capells (for hats!), porcelanias, alum, elephants' teeth. ..."—Memorias, Hist. de Barcelona, t. Pt. ii. p. 44.

"Et encore voz di qe en cesto provence, en une cite qe es appelé Tinugui, se font escuelle de porcellaine grant et pitet les plus belles qe l'en peut deviser."—Ibid. 180.

c. 1328.—"Audivi quod ducentas civitates habet sub se imperator ille (Magnus Tarlarus) majores quam Thomola; et ego certè credo quod plures habebant homines. ... Allà non sunt quæ ego sciam in isto imperio digna relatione, nisi vasa pulcherrima, et nobilissima, atque virtuosa porseleta."—Jordani Mirabilia, p. 59.

In the next passage it seems probable that the shells, and not China dishes, are intended.

c. 1343.—"... ghomerabica, vernice, armarnico, zaffiere, coloquinti, porcellane, mirra, mirabolani ... si vendono a Vinegia a cento di peso sortile (i.e. by the cutcha hundredweight).—Pegolotti, Pratica della Mercatura, p. 134.

c. 1440.—"... this Cim and Macinn that I have before named arr ì verìe great provinces, thinhabitants whereof arr idolaters, and there make them vessels and dishes of Porcellana."—Giosua Barbaro, Hak. Soc. 75.
In the next the shells are clearly intended:

1442.—"Gabelle di Firenze Porcelaine marine, la libra ... soldi ... donari i."—Uzzano, Prat. della Mercatura, p. 29.

1461.—"Porcellane pezzi 20, cioè 7 piattine, 5 scodelle, 4 grandi e una piccada, una piccola, una carciola, 3 scodelle, una biava, e due bianche."—List of Presents sent by the Soldan of Egypt to the Doge Pasquale Malepiero. In Muratorì, Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, xxii. col. 1170.

1475.—"The seaports of Cheen and Machin are also large. Porcelain is made there, and sold by the weight and at a low price."—Nikitin, in India in the XVth Cent., 21.

1487.—"... le mando l’inventario del presente del Soldano dato a Lorenzo ... vasi grandi di Porcellana mai più veduti si che non meglio lavorati."—Letter of P. da Bibbiena to Clar. de Medici, in Roscoe's Lorenzo, ed. 1825, ii. 371.

1502.—"In questo tempo abbrusiero xxii nave sopra il porto di Calechut; et de epse hebbe fette drogarie e specieari che carichio le dicte sei nave. Praterea me ha mandato sei vasi di porcellana excellissimis et gradi; quatro bochali de argento grandi co certi altri vasi al modo loro per credentia."—Letter of K. Emanuel, 13.

1516.—"They make in this country a great quantity of porcelains of different sorts, very fine and good, which form for them a great article of trade for all parts, and they make them in this way. They take the shells of sea-anails (caraclidi), and eggshells, and pound them, and with other ingredients make a paste, which they put underground to refine for the space of 80 or 100 years, and this mass of paste they leave as a fortune to their children. ..."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. 320v.

1553.—"In China" The service of their meals is the most elegant that can be, everything being of very fine procelana (although they also make use of silver and gold plate), and they eat everything with a fork made after their fashion, never putting a hand into their food, much or little."—Barros, III. ii. 7.

1554.—"(After a suggestion of the identity of the vasa murhina of the ancients): "Ce nom de Porcelaine est donné à plusieurs coquilles de mer. Et pour ce que beau Vaisseau d'une coquille de mer ne se pourroit rendre mieux à propos suyuyâ le nom antique, que de l'appeller de Porcelaine l'ay pensé que les coquilles polies et luyoisses, semblants à Nacre de perles, ont quelque affinité avec la matière des vases de Porcelaine antiques: ioinct aussi que le peuple Frinciò nomme les pastenostres faciées de gros vignols, pateenostres de Porcelaine. Les susdits vases de Porcelaine sont transparents, et constent bien cher au Caire, et disent mesmement qu'ils les asportent des Indes. Mais cela ne me semble vraiessemblable; car on n'en voirroit pas si grande quantité, ne de si grâdes pieces, s'il foillaot apporter de si long. Vne esguiere, vn pot, ou vn autre vaisseau pour petit qu'elle soit, couste vn ducat: si c'est quelque grâde vase, il coustera d'avanantage."—P. Belon, Observations, f. 194.

c. 1560.—"And because there are many opinions among the Portugals which have not bene in China, about where this Porcelane is made, and touching the substance whereof it is made, some saying, that it is of ostrerty shells, others of dung rotten of a long time, because they were not enform of the truth, I thought it convenient to tell here the substance. ..."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purches, iii. 177.

1612.—"Balanced one part with sandal wood, Porcelaine and pepper."—Dawers, Letters, i. 197.

1615.—"If we had in England beds of porcelain such as they have in China,—which porcelain is a kind of plaster buried in the earth, and by length of time congealed and glazed into that substance; this were an artificial thing, and part of that substance. ..."—Bacon, Argument on Impeachment of Waste; Works, by Spedding, &c., 1859, v. 528.

1630.—"The Bannyans all along the sea-shore pitch their Booths ... for there they sell Callicos, China-satten, Porcellaineware, scrutories or Cabinets. ..."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 45.

1650.—"We are not thoroughly resolved concerning Porcellane or China dishes, that according to common belief they are made of earth, which lieth in preparation about an hundred years underground; for the relations thereof are not only divers but contrary; and Authors agree not herein, ..."—Sir Thomas Browne, Vulgar Errors, ii. 5.

1659.—"Invited by Lady Gerrard I went to London, where we had a great supper; all the vessels, which were innumerable, were of Porcelain, she having the most ample and richest collection of that curiositie in England."—Evelyn, Diary, March 19.

1726.—In a list of the treasures left by Akbar, which is given by Valentijn, we find:

"In Porcelyn, &c., Ropias 2507747."—iv. (Surrette), 217.

1800.—"... Vasella quidem delicatiora et caerula et venusta, quibus inhaeret nesium quid elegantiae, porcellana vocantur, quasi (sed nesium quare) a porcelis. In partibus autem Britanniae quae septem- trionem spectant, vocaulce forsane analogo, vanis grossera et fusca pips appellant bar- bari, quasi (sed quare iterum nesium) a porcia."—Narrisschen und Weitgeholt, Etymol. Universale, s. v. Blue China."—Motto to An Ode in Brown Pig, St. James's Gazette, July 17.

PORGO, s. We know this word only from its occurrence in the passage

quoted; and most probably the explanation suggested by the editor of the Notes is correct, viz. that it represents Port. peragua. This word is perhaps the same as pirogue, used by the French for a canoe or 'dug-out'; a term said by Littré to be (piroga) Carib. On the passage from T. B. quoted below Sir H. Yule has the following note: "J. (i.e. T.) B., the author, gives a rough drawing. It represents the Pargoe as a somewhat high-sterned lighter, not very large, with five oar-pins on a side. I cannot identify it exactly with any kind of modern boat of which I have found a representation. It is perhaps most like the palwân. I think it must be an Orissa word, but I have not been able to trace it in any dictionary, Uriya or Bengali." On this Col. Temple says: "The modern Indian palwân (Malay palwa) is a skiff, and would not answer the description." Anderson (loc. cit.) mentions that in 1685 several "well-laden Pargoes" and boats had put in for shelter at Rameswaram to the northward of Madapollam, i.e. on the Coromandel Coast. There seems to be no such word known there now. I think, however, that the term Pargoe is probably an obsolete Anglo-Indian corruption of an Indian corruption of the Port. term barco, barca, a term used for any kind of sailing boat by the early Portuguese visitors to the East (e.g. D'Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 230; Vasco da Gama, Hak. Soc. 77, 240.)

[1669-70.—"A Pargoe: These Vse for the most part between Hugley and Pylo and Ballasore: with these boats they carry goods into ye Roads on board English and Dutch, &c. Ships, they will live a longe time in ye Sea, being brought to anchor by ye Sterne, as therse Vusal way is."—MS. by T. B.[ateman], quoted by Anderson, English Intercourse with Siam, p. 286.]

1685.—"In Hoogly letter to Port St. George, dated February 6 Porgo occurs coupled with 'born' (Hind. borough, 'a lighter')."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 155.

PORTIA, s. In S. India the common name of the Thespesia populnea, Lam. (N.O. Malvaceae), a favourite ornamental tree, thriving best near the sea. The word is a corruption of Tamil Puvarrasu, 'Flower-king; [puvarasu, from pu, 'flower,' arasu, 'peepul tree']. In Ceylon it is called Suria gansuri, and also the Tulip-tree.

1742.—"Le bois sur lequel on les met (les toiles), et celui qu'on employe pour les bateaux, sont ordinairement de tamarinier, ou d'un autre arbre nommé porchi."—Lett. Edif. xiv. 122.

1860.—"Another useful tree, very common in Ceylon, is the Suria, with flowers so like those of a tulip that Europeans know it as the tulip tree. It loves the sea air and saline soils. It is planted all along the avenues and streets in the towns near the coast, where it is equally valued for its shade and the beauty of its yellow flowers, whilst its tough wood is used for carriage- and gun-shocks."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 117.

1861.—"It is usual to plant large branches of the portia and banyan trees in such a slovenly manner that there is little probability of the trees thriving or being ornamental."—Cleghorn, Forests and Gardens of S. India, 197.

PORTO NOVO, n.p. A town on the coast of South Arcot, 32 m. S. of Pondicherry. The first mention of it that we have found is in Bocarro, Decada, p. 42 (c. 1613). The name was perhaps intended to mean 'New Oporto,' rather than 'New Haven,' but we have not found any history of the name. [The Tamil name is Parangipettai, 'European town,' and it is called by Mahommedans Mahommed Bendar.]

1718.—"At Night we came to a Town called Porto Nova, and in Malabarish Pirinjet Potei (Parangipettai)."—Propagation of the Gospel, &c., Pt. ii. 41.

1726.—"The name of this city (Porto Novo) signifies in Portuguese New Haven, but the Moors call it Mohummed Bendar ... and the Gentoes Perrongezente."—Valentijn, Charomandel, 8.

PORTO PIQUENO. PORTO GRANDE, nn. pp. 'The Little Haven and the Great Haven'; names by which the Bengal ports of Satigam (q.v.) and Chatigam (see CHITTAGONG) respectively were commonly known to the Portuguese in the 16th century.

1554.—"Porto Pequeno de Bengala ... Cowries are current in the country; 80 cowries make 1 pone (see PUN); of these ponies 48 are equal to 1 larin more or less."—A. Nunes, 37.
1583.—"Ibid."

1596.—"And so he wrote me that the Commerce of Porto Grande of Bengal is flourishing, and that the King of the Country had remitted to the Portuguese 3 per cent. of the duties that they used to pay."—Ibid. p. 580.

1598.—"When you think you are at the point de Gualle, to be assured thereof, make towards the land, to know it. . . . where commonlie all the shippes know the land, such I say as we sayle to Bengalen, or to any of the Hauens thereof, as Porto Pequeno or Porto Grande, that is the small, or the great Haven, where the Porlingalles doe traffique. . . ."—Linschoten, Book III. p. 324.

[c. 1617.—"Port Grande, Port Pequina," in Sir T. Roe's List, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.]

POSTEEN, s. An Afghan leathern pelisse, generally of sheep-skin with the fleece on. Pers. postin, from post, 'a hide.'

1080.—"Khwája Ahmad came on some Government business to Ghanzin, and it was reported to him that some merchants were going to Turkistán, who were returning to Ghanzin in the beginning of winter. The Khwája remembered that he required a certain number of postins (great coats) every year for himself and sons. . . ."—Nizám-ul-Mulk, in Elliot, ii. 497.

1442.—"His Majesty the Fortunate Khákán had sent for the Prince of Kálikút, horses, pelisses (postin) and robes woven of gold. . . ."—Abduszzak, in Not. et Extr. xiv. Pk. i. 437.

[c. 1590.—"In the winter season there is no need of postins (fur-lined coats). . . ."—Ata, ed. Jarrett, ii. 337.]

1862.—"Otter skins from the Hills and Kashmir, worn as Postins by the Yarkandis."—Punjab Trade Report, p. 65.

POTTAH, s. Hind. and other vernaculars, patta, &c. A document specifying the conditions on which lands are held; a lease or other document securing rights in land or house property.

1778.—"I am therefore hopeful you will be kindly pleased to excuse me the five lacs now demanded, and that nothing may be demanded of me beyond the amount expressed in the potthah."—The Rajah of Benares to Hastings, in Articles of Charge against H., Burke, vi. 591.

[1860.—"By the Zumeendar, then, or his under tenant, as the case may be, the land is farmed out to the Ryuts by potthahs, or agreements. . . ."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 67.]

PRA, PHRA, PRAW, s. This is a term constantly used in Burmah, familiar to all who have been in that country, in its constant application as a style of respect, addressed or applied to persons and things of especial sanctity or dignity. Thus it is addressed at Court to the King; it is the habitual designation of the Buddha and his images and dagobas; of superior ecclesiastics and sacred books; corresponding on the whole in use, pretty closely to the Skt. Śrī. In Burmese the word is written bhūrā, but pronounced (in Arakan) ph'hrā, and in modern Burma Proper, with the usual slurring of the r, Phyā or Pyā. The use of the term is not confined to Burmah; it is used in quite a similar way in Siam, as may be seen in the quotation below from Alabaster; the word is used in the same form Phra among the Shans; and in the form Prea, it would seem, in Camboja. Thus Garnier speaks of Indra and Vishnu under their Cambojan epithets as Prea En and Prea Noreai (Nārāyana); of the figure of Buddha entering nirvānā, as Prea Nippan; of the King who built the great temple of Angkor Wat as Prea Kot Mea, of the King reigning at the time of the expedition as Prea Ang Reachea Vodey, of various sites of temples as Preacon, Preacon, Prea Pithu, &c. (Voyage d'Exploration, i. 26, 49, 388, 77, 85, 72.)

The word pH'hrā appears in composition in various names of Burmese kings, as of the famous Alomp'hrā (1753-60), founder of the late dynasty, and of his son Bodoah-p'hrā (1781-1819). In the former instance the name is, according to Sir A. Phavre, Alaung-phrá, i.e. the embryo Buddha, or Bodisatva. A familiar Siamese example of use is in the Phrá Bát, or sacred foot-mark of Buddha, a term which represents the Śrī Pada of Ceylon.

The late Prof. H. H. Wilson, as will be seen, supposed the word to be a corruption of Skt. prabhū (see PARVOE). But Mr. Alabaster points, under the guidance of the Siamese spelling, rather to Skt. vara, 'pre-eminent, excellent.' This is in Pali vara, 'excellent, best, precious, noble' (Childers). A curious point is that, from the prevalence of the term phrá in all the Indo-Chinese kingdoms, we must conclude that it was, at the time of the introduction of Buddhism into those countries, in predominant use among the Indian or Ceylonese propagators of the new religion. Yet we do not find any evidence of such a use of either prabhū or vara. The former would in Pali be pabho. In a short paper in the Bijdragen of the Royal Institute of the Hague (Dl. X. 4de Stuk, 1885), Prof. Kern indicates that this term was also in use in Java, in the forms Bra and pra, with the sense of 'splendid' and the like; and he cites as an example Bra-Wijaya (the style of several of the medieval kings of Java), where Brā is exactly the representative of Skt. Śrī.

1885.—"I know that in the country of Laos the Dignities of Pa-ya and Meang, and the honourable Epithets of Pra are in use; it may be also that the other terms of Dignity are common to both Nations, as well as the Laws."—De la Louhère, Siam, E.T. 79.

"The Pra-Clang, or by a corruption of the Portuguese, the Barcalon, is the officer, who has the appointment of the Commerce, as well within as without the Kingdom. . . . His name is composed of the Balie word Pra, which I have so often criticised of, and of the word Clang, which signifies Magazine."—Ibid. 93.

"Then Sommou-Celum (see GAUTAMA) they call Pra-Boute-Tchao, which verbatin signifies the Great and Excellent Lord."—Ibid. 134.

1786.—"At noon we reached Meeaday, the personal estate of the Magwoon of Pagne, who is oftenener called, from this place, Meeaday Praw, or Lord of Meeaday."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, 242.

"The epithet Phra, which occupies so prominent a place in the ceremonial and religious vocabulary of the Siamese and Burmese, has been the subject of a good deal of nonsense. It is unfortunate that our Burmese scholars have never (I believe) been Sanskrit scholars, nor vice versa, so that the Pali terms used in Burma have had little elucidation. On the word in question, Professor H. H. Wilson has kindly favoured me with a note: 'Phra is no doubt a corruption of the Sanskrit Prabhū, a Lord or Master; theḥ of the aspirate ṣ is often retained alone, leaving Prabhū which becomes Phrá or Phra.'—Sir H. Yule, Mission to Ava, 61.

1855.—"All these readings (of documents at the Court) were intoned in a high recitative, strongly resembling that used in the English cathedral service. And the long-drawn Phya-ā-ā-ā! (My Lord), which terminated each reading, added to the resemblance, as it came in exactly like the Amen of the Liturgy."—Ibid. 88.

1859.—"The word Phra, which so frequently occurs in this work, here appears for the first time; I have to premise that it is probably derived from, or of common origin with, the Pharaoh of antiquity. It is given in the Siamese dictionaries as synonymous with God, ruler, priest, and teacher. It is in fact the word by which sovereignty and sanctity are associated in the popular mind."—Boering, Kingdom and People of Siam, [i. 55].

1863.—"The title of the First King (of Siam) is Phra-Chom-Khao-Ya-Hua and spoken as Phra Phnutchi-Khao-Ya-Hua. . . . His Majesty's nose is styled in the Pali form Phra-Nāsa. . . . The Siamese term the (Catholic) missionaries, the Preachers of the Phra-Chao Phu-Sang, i.e. of God the Creator, or the Divine Lord Builder. . . . The Catholic missionaries express 'God' by Phra-Phnutchi-Chao . . . and they explain the Eucharist as Phra-Phnutchi-Koṃa (Koṃa—Body')."—Bastian, Reise, iii. 109, and 114-115.

1870.—"The most excellent Parā, brilliant in his glory, free from all ignorance, beholding Nibbāna the end of the migration of the soul, lighted the lamp of the law of the Word."—Rogers, Buddhagosha's Parables, tr. from the Burmese, p. 1.

1871.—"Phra is a Siamese word applied to all that is worthy of the highest respect, that is, everything connected with religion and royalty. It may be translated as 'holy.' The Siamese letters p-h-r commonly represent the Sanskrit v-r. I therefore presume the word to be derived from the Sanskrit prapi—to choose, or to be chosen, and vara—better, best, excellent,' the root of ár̥svar. . . . Alabaster, The Wheel of the Law, 164.

PRAAG, sometimes PIAGG, n.p. Properly Prayāga, 'the place of sacrifice, the old Hindu name of Allahabad, and especially of the river confluence, since remote ages a place of pilgrimage. c. A.D. 688.—"Le royaume de Polu-ye-kia (Prayāga) a environ 5000 li de tour. La PRAKRIT. s. A term applied to the older vernacular dialects of India, such as were derived from, or kindred to, Sanskrit. Dialects of this nature are used by ladies, and by inferior characters, in the Sanskrit dramas. These dialects, and the modern vernaculars springing from them, bear the same relation to Sanskrit that the "Romance" languages of Europe bear to Latin, an analogy which is found in many particulars to hold with most surprising exactness. The most completely preserved of old Prakrits is that which was used in Magadha, and which has come down in the Buddhist books of Ceylon under the name of Pali (q.v.). The first European analysis of this language bears the title "Institutiones Linguae Pracriticæ. Scripsit Christianus Lassen, Bonnæ ad Rhenum, 1837." The term itself is Skt. prakrita, 'natural, unreefined, vulgar,' &c.

1901.—"Sanacrita is the speech of the Celestials, framed in grammatical institutes, as a provincial dialect, and otherwise." Sanskrit Treatise, quoted by Colebrooke, in As. Res. vii. 199.

PRAYA, s. This is in Hong-Kong the name given to what in most foreign settlements in China is called the Bund; i.e. the promenade or drive along the sea. It is Port. Praia, 'the shore.'

[1598. — "Another towne towards the North, called Villa do Praya (for Praya is as much as to say, as strand)." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 278.]

PRESIDENCY (and PRESIDENT), s. The title 'President,' as applied to the Chief of a principal Factory, was in early popular use, though in the charters of the E.I.C. its first occurrence is in 1661 (see Letters Patent, below). In Sainsbury's Calendar we find letters headed "to Capt. Jourdain, president of the English at Bantam" in 1614 (i. 297-8); but it is to be doubted whether this wording is in the original. A little later we find a "proposal by Mr. Middleton concerning the appointment of two especial factors, at Surat and Bantam, to have authority over all other factors; Jourdain named." And later again he is styled "John Jourdain, Captain of the house" (at Bantam; see pp. 303, 325), and "Chief Merchant at Bantam" (p. 343).

1623.—"Speaking of the Dutch Commander, as well as of the English President, who often in this fashion came to take me for an airing, I should not omit to say that both of them in Surat live in great style, and like the grandees of the land. They go about with a great train, sometimes with people of their own mounted, but particularly with a great crowd of Indian servants on foot and armed, according to custom, with sword, target, bow and arrows." —P. della Valle, ii. 517.

"Our boat going ashore, the President of the English Merchants, who usually resides in Surat, and is chief of all their business in the E. Indies, Persia, and other places dependent thereon, and who is called Sign. Thomas Rastell * . . . came aboard in our said boat, with a minister of theirs (so they term those who do the priest's office among them)." —Ibid. ii. 501-2; [Hak. Soc. i. 19].

1638.—"As soon as the Commanders heard that the (English) President was come to Suhaly, they went ashore. . . . The two daysies following were spent in feasting, at which the Commanders of the two Ships treated the President, who afterwards returned to Suratta. . . . During my abode at Suratta, I wanted for no divertisement; for I . . . found company at the Dutch President's, who had his Farms there . . .

* Thomas Rastall or Rastell went out apparently in 1615, in 1616 is mentioned as a "chief merchant of the fleet at Swally Road," and often later as chief at Surat (see Sainsbury, i. 476, and III. passim).
PRICKLY-HEAT.

But.

"A mon retour à Surattia je trouvay dans la loge des Anglois plus de cinquante marchands, que le President avoit fait venir de tous les autres Bureaux, pour rendre compte de leur administration, et pour estre presens à ce changement de Gouvernement."—Ibid. 188.

1661.—"And in case any Person or Persons, being convicted and sentenced by the President and Council of the said Governor and Company, in the said East Indies, their Factors or Agents there, for any Offence by them done, shall appeal from the same, that then, and in every such case, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said President and Council, Factor or Agent, to seize upon him or them, and to carry him or them home Prisoners to England."—Letters Patent to the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading with the E. Indies, 3d April.

1670.—The Court, in a letter to Fort St. George, fix the amount of tonnage to be allowed to their officers (for their private investments) on their return to Europe:

"Presidents and Agents, at Surat, Fort St. George, and Bantam . 5 tons.
Chiefes, at Persia, the Bay (q.v.), Musulpatam, and Macassar ; Deputy at Bombay, and Seconds at Surat, Fort St. George, and Bantam . 3 tons."

In Notes and Explts., No. 1. p. 8.

1702.—"Tuesday 7th April. . . . In the morning a Council . . . afterwards having some Discourse arising among us whether the charge of hiring Cashes, &c., upon Invitations given us from the Shabander or any others to go to their Country Houses or upon any other Occasion of diverting our Selves abroad for health, should be charged to our Honourable Masters account or not, the President and Mr. Loyd were of opinion to charge the same. . . . But Mr. Rouse, Mr. Ridges, and Mr. Master were of opinion that Batavia being a place of extraordinary charge and Expense in all things, the said Calash hire, &c., ought not to be charged to the Honourable Company's Account."—MS. Records in India Office.

The book containing this is a collation of fragmentary MS. diaries. But this passage pertains apparently to the proceedings of President Allen Catchpole and his council, belonging to the Factory of Chusan, from which they were expelled by the Chinese in 1701-2; they stayed some time at Batavia on their way home. Mr. Catchpole (or Ketchpole) was soon afterwards chief of an English settlement made upon Pulo Condore, off the Cambojan coast. In 1704-5, we read that he reported favourably on the prospects of the settlement, requesting a supply of young writers, to learn the Chinese language, anticipating that the island would soon become an important station for Chinese trade. But Catchpole was himself, about the end of 1705, murdered by certain people of Macassar, who thought he had broken faith with them, and with him all the English but two (see Bruce's Annals, 483-4, 580, 606, and A. Hamilton, ii. 205 [ed. 1744]). The Pulo Condore enterprise thus came to an end.

1727.—"About the year 1674, President Aungier, a gentleman well qualified for governing, came to the Chair, and leaving Surat to the Management of Deputies, came to Bombay, and rectified many things."—A. Hamilton, i. 188.

PRICKLY-HEAT, s. A troublesome cutaneous rash (Lichen tropicus) in the form of small red pimples, which itch intolerably. It affects many Europeans in the hot weather. Fryer (pub. 1698) alludes to these "fiery pimples," but gives the disease no specific name. Natives sometimes suffer from it, and (in the south) use a paste of sandal-wood to alleviate it. Sir Charles Napier in Sind used to suffer much from it, and we have heard him described as standing, when giving an interview during the hot weather, with his back against the edge of an open door, for the convenience of occasional friction against it. [See RED-DOG.]

1665.—"The Sun is but just now rising, yet he is intolerable; there is not a Cloud in the Sky, not a breath of Wind; my horses are spent, they have not seen a green Herb since we came out of Lahor; my Indians, for all their black, dry, and hard skin, sink under it. My face, hands and feet are peeled off, and my body is covered all over with pimples that prick me, as so many needles."—Bernier, F.T. 125; [ed. Constable, 389].
PRICKLY-PEAR, s. The popular name, in both E. and W. Indies, of the Opuntia Dillenii, Haworth (Cactus Indica, Roxb.), a plant spread all over India, and to which Roxburgh gave the latter name, apparently in the belief of its being indigenous in that country. Undoubtedly, however, it came from America, wide as has been its spread over Southern Europe and Asia. On some parts of the Mediterranean shores (e.g. in Sicily) it has become so characteristic that it is hard to realize the fact that the plant had no existence there before the 16th century. Indeed at Palermo we have heard this scouted, and evidence quoted in the supposed circumstance that among the mosaics of the splendid Duomo of Monreale (12th century) the fig-leaf garments of Adam and Eve are represented as of this uncompromising material. The mosaic was examined by one of the present writers, with the impression that the belief has no good foundation. [See 8th ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 254.] The cactus fruit, yellow, purple, and red, which may be said to form an important article of diet in the Mediterranean, and which is now sometimes seen in London shops, is not, as far as we know, anywhere used in India, except in times of famine. No cactus is named in Drury’s Useful Plants of India. And whether the Mediterranean plants form a different species, or varieties merely, as compared with the Indian Opuntia, is a matter for inquiry. The fruit of the Indian plant is smaller and less succulent. There is a good description of the plant and fruit in Oviedo, with a good cut (see Ranusio’s Ital. version, bk. viii., ch. xxv.). That author gives an amusing story of his first making acquaintance with the fruit in S. Domingo, in the year 1515.

Some of the names by which the Opuntia is known in the Punjab seem to belong properly to species of Euphorbia. Thus the Euphorbia Roylea, Bois., is called tsñi, chá, &c.; and the Opuntia is called Kebuli tsñi, Gungi sho, Kanghi chá, &c. Gungi chá is also the name of an Euphorbia sp. which Dr. Stewart takes to be the E. Nerifolia, L. (Punjab Plants, pp. 101 and 194-5). [The common name in Upper India for the prickly pear is naghpani, ‘snake-hood,’ from its shape.] This is curious; for although certain cactuses are very like certain Euphorbias, there is no Euphorbia resembling the Opuntia in form.

The Zakim mentioned in the Āin (Gladwin, 1800, ii. 68; [Jarrett, ii. 293; Sidi Ali, ed. Vambery, p. 31] as used for hedges in Guzerat, is doubtless Euphorbia also. The Opuntia is very common as a hedge plant in cottages, &c., and it was much used by Tippoo as an obstruction round his fortifications. Both the E. Royleana and the Opuntia are used for fences in parts of the Punjab. For the latter is objectionable, from harbouring dirt and reptiles; but it spreads rapidly both from birds eating the fruit, and from the facility with which the joints take root.

1685. — “The Prickly-Pear, Bush, or Shrub, of about 4 or 5 foot high ... the Fruit at first is green, like the Leaf. ... It is very pleasant in taste, cooling and refreshing; but if a Man eats 15 or 20 of them they will colour his water, making it look like Blood.” — Dampier, i. 228 (in W. Indies).

1764. — “On this lay cuttings of the prickly pear; They soon a formidable fence will shoot.” — Grainger, Bk. 1.

[1829. — “The castle of Bunai ... is covered with the cactus, or prickly pear, so abundant on the east side of the Aravali.” —Ed. Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 826.]

1831. — “The use of the prickly pear” (for hedges) “I strongly deprecate; although impenetrable and inexpensive, it conveys an idea of sterility, and is rapidly becoming a nuisance in this country.” — Cleghorn, Forests and Gardens, 285.

PRIME, n.p. An important place in Pegu above the Delta. The name is Talaing, properly Brun. The Burmese call it Pye or (in the Aracanese form in which the r is pronounced) Pré and Pré-myo ('city').

1545.—"When he (the K. of Brahmao) was arrived at the young King's palace, he caused himself to be crowned King of From, and during the Ceremony ... made that poor Prince, whom he had deprived of his Kingdom, to continue kneeling before him, with his hands held up. ... This done he went into a Balcone, which looked on a great Market-place, whither he commanded all the dead children that lay up and down the streets, to be brought, and then causing them to be hacked very small, he gave them, mingled with Bran, Rice, and Horns, to his Elephants to eat."—Pinto, E.T. 211-212 (orig. div.).

c. 1609.—"... this quarrel was hardly ended when a great rumour of arms was heard from a quarter where the Portuguese were still fighting. The cause of this was the arrival of 12,000 men, whom the King of Pren sent in pursuit of the King of Arracan, knowing that he had fled that way. Our people hastening up had a stiff and well fought combat with them; for although they were fatigued with the fight which had been hardly ended, those of Pren were so disheartened at seeing the Portuguese, whose steel they had already felt, that they were fain to retire."—Boeçarro, 142. This author has From (p. 132) and Porao (p. 149). [Also see under AVA.]

1755.—"Prone ... has the ruins of an old brick wall round it, and immediately without that, another with Teak Timber."—Capt. G. Baker, in Dalrymple, i. 173.

1795.—"In the evening, my boat being ahead, I reached the city of Peaye-mere, or Prome, ... renounced in Birman history."—Symes, pp. 238-9.

PROW, PARAO, &c., s. This word seems to have a double origin in European use; the Malayal. pāry, 'a boat,' and the Island word (common to Malay, Javanese, and most languages of the Archipelago) prāṭa or prātu. This is often specifically applied to a peculiar kind of galley, "Malay Prow," but Crawford defines it as "a general term for any vessel, but generally for small craft." It is hard to distinguish between the words, as adopted in the earlier books, except by considering date and locality.

1499.—"The King despatched to them a large boat, which they call parao, well manned, on board which he sent a Naire of his with an errand to the Captains. ..."—Correa, Lendas, i. 115.

1510.—"The other Persian said: 'O Sir, what shall we do?' I replied: 'Let us go along this shore till we find a parao, that is, a small bark.'"—Ibid. 269.

1518.—"Item; that any one possessing a zamburco (see SAMBOOK) or a parao of his own and desiring to go in it may do so with all that belongs to him, first giving notice two days before to the Captain of the City."—Livro dos Privilegios da Cidade de Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fascic. v. p. 7.

1523.—"When Dom Sancho (Dom Sancho Anriquez; see Correa, ii. 770) went into Muar to fight with the fleet of the King of Bintam which was inside the River, there arose a squall which upset all our paraos and lancharas at the bar mouth. ..."—Lembrança, de Coisas de India, p. 5.

1582.—"Next day after the Capitaine General with all his men being a land, working upon the ship called Berrio, there came in two little Paraos."—Costacondo (tr. by N. L.Jh, p. 32c).

1586.—"The fifth and last festival, which is called St. Pedro Donon, is one in which the King (of Pegu) is embarked in the most beautiful paro, or boat. ..."—G. Balbi, f. 122.

1606.—Gonvea (f. 27r) uses paró.

"An howre after this comming a board of the hollanders came a prave or a canow from Bantam."—Middleton's Voyage, c. 3 (e).

[1611.—"The Portuguese call their own galiots Navires (navios) and those of the Malabars, Pairaous. Most of these vessels were Cheftis (see CHETTY), that is to say merchantmen. Immediately on arrival the Malabars draw up their Pados or galliots on the beach."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 345.

[1623.—"In the Morning we discern'd four ships of Malabar Rovers near the shore (they called them Faroes and they goe with Ours like our Galleys or Pinta.)"—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 201.]

1666.—"Con secreto previno Lope de Soares veinte bateles, y gobernándolo y entrando por un rio, hallaron el peligro de cinco naves y ochenta paraos con mucha gente resuelta y de valor."—Pavia y Sousa, Asia, i. 66.

1673.—"They are owners of several small Prooves, of the same make, and Canooses, cut out of one entire Piece of Wood."—Fryer, 20. Elsewhere (e.g. 57, 59) he has Proes.

1727.—"The Andemaneers had a yearly Custom to come to the Nicobar Islands, with a great number of small Praws, and kill or take Prisoners as many of the poor Nicobarens as they could overtake."—A. Hamilton, ii. 65 [ed. 1744].

1816.—"... Prahu, a term under which the Malays include every description of vessel."—Raffles, in As. Revs. xii. 132.

1817.—"The Chinese also have many brigs ... as well as native-built prahu."—Raffles, Java, i. 203.
PUCKA. 734

PUCKA, adj. Hind. pakka, 'ripe, mature, cooked'; and hence substantial, permanent, with many specific applications, of which examples have been given under the habitually contrasted term cutcha (q.v.). One of the most common uses in which the word has become specific is that of a building of brick and mortar, in contradistinction to one of inferior material, as of mud, matting, or timber. Thus:

[1756.—"... adjacent houses; all of them of the strongest Pecca work, and all most proof against our Mettal on ye Bastions." Capt. Grant, Report on Siege of Calcutta, ed. by Col. Temple, Ind. Ant., 1890, p. 7.]

1781. — "The House, Cook-room, bottle-connah, godown, &c, are all pucka-built." — In Seton-Karr, i. 41.

1824. — "A little above this beautiful stream, some miserable pucka sheds point out the Company’s warehouses." — Heber, ed. 1844, i. 259·60.

1842. — "I observe that there are in the town (Dehi) many buildings pucka-built, as is called in India." — Wellington to Lt. Ellesborough, in Indian Adm. of Ld. E., p. 306.

1857. — "Your Lahore men have done nobly. I should like to embrace them; Donald, Roberts, Mac, and Dick are, all of them, pucka trumpets."—Lord Lawrence, in Life, ii. 11.

1869. — "... there is no surer test by which to measure the prosperity of the people than the number of pucka houses that are being built." — Report of a Sub-Committee on Proposed Indian Census.

This application has given rise to a substantive pucka, for work of brick and mortar, or for the composition used as cement and plaster.

1727. — "Fort William was built on an irregular Tetragon of Brick and Mortar, called Puckah, which is a Composition of Brick-dust, Lime, Molasses, and cut Hemp, and when it comes to be dry, it is as hard and tougher than firm Stone or Brick." — A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [ed. 1744, ii. 7].

The word was also sometimes used substantively for "pucka pice" (see CUTCHA).

c. 1817. — "I am sure I strive, and strive, and yet last month I could only lay by eight rupees and four puckers."—Mrs. Sherwood’s Stories, 66.

In (Stockdale’s) Indian Vocabulary of 1788 we find another substantive use, but it was perhaps even then inaccurate.

1788. — "Pucka. A putrid fever, generally fatal in 24 hours."

Another habitual application of pucka and cutcha distinguishes between two classes of weights and measures. The existence of twofold weight, the pucka ser and the cutcha, used to be very general in India. It was equally common in Medieval Europe. Almost every city in Italy had its libra grossa and libra sottile (e.g. see Pegolotti, 4, 34, 153, 228, &c.), and we ourselves still have them, under the names of pound avoid DUPOT and pound Troy.

1673. — "The Maund Pucka at Agra is double as much (as the Surat Maund)."—Fryer, 205.

1760. — "Les paccos... repondent à une liene de l’Isle de France."—Let. Edij. xv. 189.

1803. — "If the rice should be sent to Coraygaun, it should be in sufficient quantities to give 72 pucka seers for each load." — Wellington, Desp. (ed. 1837), ii. 43.

In the next quotation the terms apply to the temporary or permanent character of the appointments held.

1866. — "Susan. Well, Miss, I don’t wonder you’re so fond of him. He is such a sweet young man, though he is cutcha. Thank goodness, my young man is pucka, though he is only a subordinate Government Salt Chowkee."—Freelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, 222.

The remaining quotations are examples of miscellaneous use:

1853. — "Well, Jenkyns, any news? 'Nothing pucka that I know of.'"—Oakfield, ii. 57.

1869. — "I cannot endure a swell, even though his whiskers are pucka."—Freelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 229.

The word has spread to China:

"Dis pucka sing-song makee show How smart man make mistake, galow."—Leland, Pidgin English Sing-Song, 54.

13 PUCKAULY, s.; also PUCKAUL. Hind. pokhali, ‘a water-carrier.’ In N. India the pokhál [Skt. pāya, ‘water,’ khal, ‘skin’] is a large water-skin (an entire ox-hide) of some 20 gallons content, of which a pair are carried by a bullock, and the pokhál is the man who fills the skins, and supplies the water thus. In the Madras Drill Regulations for 1785 (33), ten puckalies are allowed to a battalion. (See also Williamson’s V. M. (1810), i. 229.)
PUGGRY, PUGGERIE.

[1538.—Referring to the preparations for the siege of Diu, "which they brought from all the wells on the island by all the bullocks they could collect with their water-skins, which they call pacalis (Pacalis),"—Conto, Dec. V. Bk. ii. ch. 2.]

1750.—"There is another very necessary establishment to the European corps, which is two buckalies to each company; these are two large leathern bags for holding water, slung upon the back of a bullock. . . ."—Munro's Narrative, 188.

1803.—"It (water) is brought by means of bullocks in leathern bags, called here puckally bags, a certain number of which is attached to every regiment and garrison in India. Black fellows called Puckauly-boys are employed to fill the bags, and drive the bullocks to the quarters of the different Europeans."—Perceval's Ceylon, 102.

1804.—"It would be a much better arrangement to give the adjutants of corps an allowance of 26 rupees per mensam, to supply two puckalies men, and two bullocks with bags, for each company."—Wellington, iii. 509.

1813.—"In cities, in the armies, and with Europeans on country excursions, the water for drinking is usually carried in large leather bags called pacalies, formed by the entire skin of an ox."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 140; [2nd ed. i. 415].

1842.—"I lost no time in confidentially communicating with Capt. Oliver on the subject of trying some experiments as to the possibility of conveying empty 'puckalis' and 'massucks' by sea to Suez."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ellenborough's Ind. Admin. 219.

PUCKEROW, v. This is properly the imperative of the Hind. verb pakrānī, 'to cause to be seized,' pakrānī, 'cause him to be seized'; or perhaps more correctly of a compound verb pakarān, 'seize and come,' or in our idiom, 'Go and seize.' But puckrow belongs essentially to the dialect of the European soldier, and in that becomes of itself a verb 'to puckrow'; i.e. to lay hold of (generally of a recalcitrant native). The conversion of the Hind. imperative into an Anglo-Indian verb infinitive, is not uncommon; compare bunow, dumb cow, gubbrow, lugow, &c.

1866.—"Fanny, I am cutcha no longer. Surely you will allow a lover who is pucka to puckrow."—Trevelyan, The Duck Bangalo, 390.

PUDIPATAN, n.p. The name of a very old seaport of Malabar, which has now ceased to have a place in the Maps. It lay between Cannanore and Calicut, and must have been near the Waddakarō of K. Johnston's Royal Atlas. [It appears in the map in Logan's Malabar as Putappatanam or Putappanam.] The name is Tamil, Pudupattana, 'New City.' Compare true form of Pondicherry.

c. 545.—"The most notable places of trade are these . . . and then five marts of Malé from which pepper is exported, to wit, Parti, Mangaruth (see MANGALORE) Salopatana, Nanopatana, Pudopatana . . .

—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. (see in Cathay, &c. p. cixviii.).

c. 1342.—"Buddfattan, which is a considerable city, situated upon a great estuary. . . . The haven of this city is one of the finest; the water is good, the betel-nut is abundant, and is exported thence to India and China."—Hin Battuta, iv. 87.

c. 1420.—"A quā rūsus se diebus viginti terrestri viae contulit ad urbem portumque maritimum nomine Pudifetanaem."—Conî, in Poggio, de Var. Fort.

1516.—". . . And passing those places you come to a river called Pudripatan, in which there is a good place having many Moorish merchants who possess a multitude of ships, and here begins the Kingdom of Calicut."—Barbour, in Runavasco, i. f. 31v. See also in Stanley's Barbosa Pudopatana, and in Tohfat-ul-Mujahideen, by Rowlandson, pp. 71, 157, where the name (Budfattan) is misread Budufun.

【PUG, s. Hind. pug, Skt. padaka, 'a foot'; in Anglo-Indian use the footmarks of an animal, such as a tiger.

[1831.—". . . sanguine we were sometimes on the report of a burā pug from the shikaree."—Orient. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, ii. 178.

[1882.—"Presently the large square 'pug' of the tiger we were in search of appeared."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 30.]

PUGGRY, PUGGERIE, s. Hind. pugṛī, 'a turban.' The term being often used in colloquial for a scarf of cotton or silk wound round the hat in turban-form, to protect the head from the sun, both the thing and name have of late years made their way to England, and may be seen in London shop-windows.

c. 1200.—"Prithirāja . . . wore a pagari ornamented with jewels, with a splendid toro. In his ears he wore pearls; on his neck a pearl necklace."—Chand Bardai E.T. by Beamis, Ind. Ant. i. 282.

[1627.—"I find it is the common mode of the Eastern People to shave the head all save a long lock which superstitiouslythey leave at the very top, such especially as wear Turbans, Mandils, Dupatta's, and Puggarees."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 140.)

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the consignification they claim with Mahast, as a Sind is akin to that Imputation, and therefore only assumes to himself a Green Vest and Puckery (or Turbat). . . ."—Fryer, 93; [comp. 113].

1689.—"... with a Puggaree or Turbant upon their Heads."—Ovington, 341.

1781. — "They (the Negro Police in Demarara) used frequently to be turned out to parade in George Town streets, dressed in a neat uniform, with white puggaries framing in their ebony faces."—Jenkins, The Cookee.

PUHUR, PORE, PYRE, &c., s. Hind. pahar, pahr, from Skt. prahara. 'A fourth part of the day and of the night, a watch' or space of 8 ghuris (see GHURRY).

c. 1526. — "The natives of Hindostan divide the night and day into 60 parts, each of which they denominate a Gheri; they likewise divide the night into 4 parts, and the day into the same number, each of which they call a Pahar or watch, which the Persians call a Pār."—Baber, 331.

[c. 1590.—"The Hindu philosophers divide the day and night into four parts, each of which they call a pahur."—Ain, ed. Jervett, iii. 15.]

1683.—"Par." See under GHURRY.

1673.—"Pore." See under GONG.

1803.—"I have some Jasooses selected by Col. C's Brahmin for their stupidity, that they might not pry into state secrets, who go to Sindia's camp, remain there a phaur in fear."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 62.

PULÁ. s. In Tamil pillaí, Malayāl. pilla, 'child'; the title of a superior class of (so-called) Sādral, [especially curnums]. In Cochin and Travancore it corresponds with Nāyar (see NAIR). It is granted by the sovereign, and carries exemption from customary manuel labour.

1553.—"... pulas, who are the gentleman (fidalges).—Costaehida, iv. 2.

1726.—"O Saguate que o Commandor tinhá remetido como gristnav anim e a Pularahos chamou ca recibid."—Ratification, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 13.

PULICAT, n.p. A town on the Madras coast, which was long the seat of a Dutch factory. Bp., Caldwell's native friend Seshagiri Sāstri gives the proper name as pula-Velkădu, 'old Velkădu or Verkădu', the last a place-name mentioned in the Tamil Sivaita Tevdrum (see also Valentijn below). [The Madras Gloss. gives Pazzhaverk-kădu, 'old acacia forest', which is corroborated by Dr. Hultzsch (Epigraphia Indica, i. 398.).]

1519.—"And because he had it much in charge to obtain all the lac (alacre) that he could, the Governor learning from merchants that much of it was brought to the Coast of Choromandell by the vessels of Pogu and Martaban which visited that coast to procure painted cloths and other coloured goods, such as are made in Paleacate, which is on the coast of Choromandel, whence the traders with whom the Governor spoke brought it to Cochin; he, having got good information on the whole matter, sent a certain Froolente (see, froolentum) called Paulo Escoreo, whom he knew, and who was good at trade, to be factor on the coast of Choromandel. . . ."—Correa, ii. 567.

1553. — "The said Armenian, having already been at the city of Paleacate, which is in the Province of Choromandel and the Kingdom of Binsaga, when on his way to Bengal, and having information of the place where the body of S. Thomas was said to be, and when they arrived at the port of Paleacate they divide the wind against their going on. . . ."—Barros, III. vii. 11.

1611.—"The Dutch had settled a factory at Pellacata."—Downers, Letters, i. 133; in Foster, ii. 83, Folkap.] 1726.—"Then we came to Paleacate Wadim Caddoe, called by us for shortness Paleacatta, which means in Malabar 'The old Fortress,' though most commonly we call it Castle Guldriæ."—Valentijn, Chorom. 13.

"The route I took was along the strip of country between Porto Novo and Paleacatta. This long journey I travelled on foot; and preached in more than a hundred places. . . ."—Letter of the Missionary Schultze, July 19, in Notices of Madras, &c., p. 20.

1727.—"Folikat is the next Place of Note to the City and Colony of Fort St. George.
... It is strengthened with two Forts, one contains a few Dutch soldiers for a Garrison, the other is commanded by an Officer belonging to the Mogul."—A. Hamilton, i. 372, [ed. 1744].

[1813. — "Pulecat handkerchiefs." See under PIECE-GOODS.]

PULTUN, s. Hind. paltun, a corruption of Battalion, possibly with some confusion of platoon or peloton. The S. India form is pataulum, patalam. It is the usual native word for a regiment of native infantry; it is never applied to one of Europeans.

1800.—"All I can say is that I am ready primed, and that if all matters suit I shall go off with a dreadful explosion, and shall probably destroy some campos and pultons which have been indiscreetly pushed across the Kistna."—A. Wellesley to T. Minto, in Mem. of Minto, by Arbuthnot, lix.

[1855.—"I know lots of Sahibs in a pul-toon at Bareilly."—Mrs Croker, Village Tales and Jungle Tragedies, 60.]

[4] PULWAH, PULWAR, s. One of the native boats used on the rivers of Bengal, carrying some 12 to 15 tons. Hind. pulwar. [For a drawing see Grierson, Bihar Village Life, p. 42.]

1735.—"... We observed a boat which had come out of Stamboo river, making for Pataa; the commandant detached two light pulwaars after her. ..."—Hotwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 69.

[1767.—"... a Peon came twice to Noon-golah, to apply for pulwar..."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 197.]

1780.—"Besides this boat, a gentleman is generally attended by two others; a pul-wah for the accommodation of the kitchen, and a smaller boat, a paunchway" (q.v.).—Hodges, p. 99.

1782.—"To be sold, Three New Dacca Pulwars, 60 feet long, with Houses in the middle of each."—India Gazette, Aug. 31.

1824.—"The ghat offered a scene of bustle and vivacity which I by no means expected. There were so many budgerows and pul-wars, that we had considerable difficulty to find a mooring place."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 131.

1860.—"The Pulwar is a smaller description of native travelling boat, of neater build, and less rusticity of character, sometimes used by a single traveller of humble means, and at others serves as cook-boat and accommodation for servants accompanying one of the large kind of boats."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, p. 7, with an illustration.

PULWAUN, s. P.—H. pahlwán, [which properly means 'a native of ancient Persia'] (see PAHLAVI). Mr. Skewt notes that in Malay the word becomes pahlwán, probably from a confusion with Malay dwán, 'to fight'. A champion; a professed wrestler or man of strength.

[1758. — "... the fourth, and least numerous of these bodies, were choice men of the Pehlevans. ..."—Hawway, iii. 104.]

[1813. — "When his body has by these means imbibed an additional portion of vigour, he is dignified by the appellation of Puhlwan."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 165.]

1828.—"I added a pehliván or prize-fighter, a negro whose teeth were filed into saws, of a temper as ferocious as his aspect, who could throw any man of his weight to the ground, carry a jackass, devour a sheep whole, eat fire, and make a fountain of his inside, so as to act as a spout."—Hají Baha in England, i. 15.

PUN, s. A certain number of cowries, generally 80; Hind. pañá. (See under COWRY). The Skt. pañá is 'a stake played for a price, a sum,' and hence both a coin (whence fanam, q.v.) and a certain amount of cowries.

1554. — "Pone." (See under PORTO PIQUENO.)

1688.—"I was this day advised that Mr. Charnock put off Mr. Ellis's Cowries at 34 pund to ye Rupee in payment of all ye Peons and Servants of the Factory, whereas 38 puns are really bought by him for a Rupee..."—Hodges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 122].

1760.—"We now take into consideration the relief of the menial servants of this Settlement, respecting the exorbitant price of labor exacted from them by tailors, washermen, and barbers, which appear in near a quadruple (proportion compared with the prices paid in 1755. Agreed, that after the 1st of April they be regulated as follows:

"No tailor to demand for making:
1 Jamma, more than 3 annas.
1 pair of drawers, 7 pun of cowries.
No washerman:
1 corge of pieces, 7 pun of cowries.
No barber for shaving a single person, more than 7 gundas" (see COWRY).—Ft. William Consns., March 27, in Long, 209.

PUNCH, s. This beverage, according to the received etymology, was named from the Pers. pān, or Hind. and Mahr. pānch, both meaning 'five'; because composed of five ingredients, viz. arrack, sugar, lime-juice, spice, and water. Fryer may be considered to give something like historical evidence of its origin; but there is also something of Indian idiom in the suggestion. Thus a famous horse-medicine in Upper India is known as battis, because it is supposed to contain 32 ("battis") ingredients. Schiller, in his Punschblatt, sacrificing truth to trope, omits the spice and makes the ingredients only 4: "Vier Elemente Innem gesellt, Bilden das Leben, Bauen die Welt."

The Greeks also had a "Punch," pep>^X5vwa, as is shown in the quotation from Athenaeus. Their mixture does not sound inviting. Littré gives the etymology correctly from the Pers. punj, but the 5 elements à la française, as tea, sugar, spirit, cinnamon, and lemon-peel,—no water therefore!

Some such compound appears to have been in use at the beginning of the 17th century under the name of Larkin (q.v.). Both Dutch and French travellers in the East during that century celebrate the beverage under a variety of names which amalgamate the drink curiously with the vessel in which it was brewed. And this combination in the form of Bole-ponjis was adopted as the title of a Miscelnary published in 1851, by H. Meredith Parker, a Bengal civilian, of local repute for his literary and dramatic tastes. He had lost sight of the original authorities for the term, and his quotation is far astray. We give them correctly below.

c. 210.—"On the feast of the Scirrha at Athens he (Aristodemus on Pindar) says a race was run by the young men. They ran this race carrying each a vine-branch laden with grapes, such as is called ócchus; and they ran from the temple of Dionysus to that of Athena Sciras. And he says the winner receives a cup such as is called 'Five-fold,' and of this he partakes joyously with the band of his comrades. But the cup is called pep>^X5vwa because it contains wine and honey and cheese and flour, and a little oil."—Athenaeus, XI. xci.

1638.—"This voyage (Gombrloon to Surat)
... we accomplished in 19 days. ... We drank English beer, Spanish sack, French wine, Indian spirit, and good English water, and made good Palepunzen."—Mandelslo, (Dutch ed. 1658), p. 24. The word Palepunzen seems to have puzzled the English translator (John Davis, 2nd ed. 1669), who has "excellent good sack, English beer, French wines, Arab, and other refreshments."
(p. 10).

1653.—"Bolleponge est vn mot Anglois, qui signifie vue boisson dont les Anglois vsent aux Indes faite de sucre, suc de diiton, eau de vie, fleur de muscade, et 1682.—"Some (of the Chinese in Batavia) also sell Sugar-beer, as well as cooked dishes and Sury [see SURA], arak or Indian brandy; wherefrom they make Muscad and Pollepons, as the Englishmen call it."—Nieuhoff, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 217.

1683.—"... Our owne people and mariners who are now very numerous, and insolent among us, and (by reason of Punch) every day give disturbance."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 123].

1688.—"... the soldiers as merry as Punch could make them."—In Wheeler, i. 187.

1689.—"Bengal (Arak) is much stronger spirit than that of Goa, tho' both are made use of by the Europeans in making Punch."—Ovington, 237-8.

1694.—"If any man comes into a Victualling house to drink punch, he may demand one quart good Goa arak, half a pound of sugar, and half a pint of good line water, and make his own punch..."—Order Book of Bombay Govt., quoted by Anderson, p. 281.

1705.—"Un bon repas chez les Anglais ne se fait point sans bonne ponse qu'on sert dans un grand vase."—Neur Laullier, Voy. aux Grandes Indes, 29.

1771.—"Hence every one (at Madras) has it in his Power to eat well, tho' he can afford no other Liquor at Meals than Punch, which is the common Drink among Europeans, and here made in the greatest Perfection."—Lockyer, 22.

1724.—"Next to Drans, no Liquor deserves more to be stigmatised and banished from the Repasts of the Tender, Valetudinary, and Studious, than Punch."—T. Cheyne, An Essay on Health and Longevity, p. 58.

1791.—"Des que l'Anglais eut cesse de manger, le Paris... fit un signe à sa femme, qui apporta... une grande calebasse pleine de punch, qu'elle avait préparé, pendant le souper, avec de l'eau, et du jus de citron, et du jus de canne de sucre. ..."—B. de St. Pierre, Chassures Indienes, 56.

PUNCH-HOUSE, s. An Inn or Tavern; now the term is chiefly used by natives (sometimes in the hybrid form Punch-ghar, [which in Upper India is now transferred to the meeting-place of a Municipal Board]) at the Presidency towns, and applied to houses frequented by seamen. Formerly the word was in general Anglo-Indian use. [In the Straits the Malay Panchauns is, according to Mr. Skeat, still in use, though obsolescent.]

[1861.—"... the Commandore visiting us, wee delivering him another examination of a Persee (Parsee), who kept a Punch house, where the murder was committed. ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 189.]

1671-2.—"It is likewise ordered and declared hereby that no Victuallar, Punch-house, or other house of Entertainment shall be permitted to make stoppage at the pay day of their wages. ..."—Rules, in Wheeler, iii. 423.

1676.—Major Puckle's "Proposals to the Agent about the young men at Methclepatam."

"That some pecuniary mulct or fine be imposed... for misdemeanours.

"6. Going to Punch or Rack-houses without leave or warrantable occasion.

"Drubbing any of the Company's Peons or servants."

1688.—"... at his return to Achen he constantly frequented an English Punch-house, spending his Gold very freely."—Dampier, ii. 134.

"Mrs. Francis, wife to the late Lieutenant Francis killed at Hoogly by the Moors, made it her petition that she might keep a Punch-house for her maintenance."—In Wheeler, i. 184.

1697.—"Monday, 1st April. Mr. Cheesley having in a Punch-house, upon a quarrel of words, drawn his Sword... and being taxed therewith, he both doth own and justify the drawing of the sword... it thereupon ordered not to wear a sword while here."—In Wheeler, 230.

1727.—"... Of late no small Pains and Charge have been bestowed on its Buildings (of the Fort at Tellichery); but for what Reason I know not... unless it be for small Vessels... or to protect the Company's Ware-house, and a small Punch-house that stands on the Sea-shore..."—A. Hamilton, i. 299 [ed. 1744].

1789.—"Many... are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses."—Munro's Narrative, 22.

1810.—"The best house of that description which admits boarders, and which are commonly called Punch-houses."—Williamson, V.M. i. 135.

PUNCHAYET, s. Hind, punchayat, from pandeh, 'five.' A council (properly of 5 persons) assembled as a Court of Arbiters or Jury; or as a committee of the people of a village, of the members of a Caste, or whatnot, to decide on questions interesting the body generally.

1778.—"The Honourable William Hornby, Esq., President and Governor of His Majesty's Castle and Island of Bombay, &c."

"The humble Petition of the Managers of the Panchayet of Paris at Bombay, ..."—Dossambat Framji, II. of the Parsis, 1884, ii. 219.

1810.—"The Parsees... are governed by their own panchait or village Council.
The word panchayet literally means a Council of five, but that of the Guebres in Bombay consists of thirteen of the principal merchants of the sect."—Maria Graham, 41.

1813.—"The carpet of justice was spread in the large open hall of the durbar, where the arbitrators assembled: there I always attended, and agreeably to ancient custom, referred the decision to a panchayet or jury of five persons."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 359; [in 2nd ed. (ii. 2) Panchaut].

1819.—"The panchayet itself, although in all but village causes it has the defects before ascribed to it, possesses many advantages. The intimate acquaintance of the members with the subject in dispute, and in many cases with the characters of the parties, must have made their decisions frequently correct, and ... the judges being drawn from the body of the people, could act on no principles that were not generally understood."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 89.

1821.—"I kept up panchayet because I found them ... I still think that the panchayet should on no account be dropped, that it is an excellent institution for dispensing justice, and in keeping up the principles of justice, which are less likely to be observed among a people to whom the administration of it is not at all intrusted."—Ibid. 124.

1826.—"... when he returns assemble a panchayet, and give this cause patient attention, seeing that Hybatty has justice."—Pandurang Hari, 31; [ed. 1873, i. 42].

1829.—Bengal Regn. VI. of this year allows the judge of the Sessions Court to call in the alternative aid of a panchayet, in lieu of assessors, and so to dispense with the futwa. See Law-Officer.

1853.—"From the death of Ranjeet Singh to the battle of Sobraon, the Sikh Army was governed by Punchayets or Panches—committees of the soldiery. These bodies sold the Government to the Sikh chief who paid the highest, letting him command until murdered by some one who paid higher."—Sir C. Napier, Defects of Indian Government, 69.

1873.—"The Council of an Indian Village Community most commonly consists of five persons ... the panchayet familiar to all who have the smallest knowledge of India."—Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, 221.

PUNDIT. s. Skt. pudita, 'a learned man.' Properly a man learned in Sanskrit lore. The Pundit of the Supreme Court was a Hindu Law-Officer, whose duty it was to advise the English Judges when needful on questions of Hindu Law. The office became extinct on the constitution of the 'High Court,' superseding the Supreme Court and Sudder Court, under the Queen's Letters Patent of May 14, 1862.

In the Mahratta and Telegu countries, the word Pundit is usually pronounced Pant (in English colloquial Pund); but in this form it has, as with many other Indian words in like case, lost its original significance, and become a mere personal title, familiar in Mahratta history, e.g. the Nana Dhundopant of evil fame.

Within the last 30 or 35 years the term has acquired in India a peculiar application to the natives trained in the use of instruments, who have been employed beyond the British Indian frontier in surveying regions inaccessible to Europeans. This application originated in the fact that two of the earliest men to be so employed, the explorations by one of whom acquired great celebrity, were masters of village schools in our Himalayan provinces. And the title Pundit is popularly employed there much as Dominie used to be in Scotland. The Pundit who brought so much fame on the title was the late Nain Singh, C.S.I. [See Markham, Memoir of Indian Surveys, 2nd ed. 148 seqq.]

1574.—"I hereby give notice that ... I hold it good, and it is my pleasure, and therefore I enjoin on all the pandits (pan- ditos) and Gentoo physicians (physicien gentio) that they ride not through this City (of Goa) or the suburbs thereof on horseback, nor in andors, or palanquins, on pain of paying, on the first offence 10 cruzados, and on the second 20, pero o sapal, with the forfeiture of such horses, andors, or palanquins, and that the third they shall become the galley-slaves of the King my Lord...."—Procl. of the Governor Antonio Moris. Barreto, in Archiv. Port. Orient., Fascic. 5, p. 899.

1604.—"... I amando tâbien en su compañía los Póditos, le presentaron al Naubao..."—Guererro, Relacion, 70.

* Pero o *sapal, i.e. 'for the marsh.' We cannot be certain of the meaning of this; but we may note that in 1543 the King, as a favour to the city of Goa, and for the commodity of its shipping and the landing of goods, &c., makes a grant of the marsh inundated with sea-water (do sapal alagado dagoa salgada) which extends along the river-side from the houses of Antonio Correa to the houses of Afonso Pique, which grant is to be perpetual ... to serve for a landing-place and quay for the merchants to moor and repair their ships, and to erect their bankshalls (banyasses), and never to be turned away to any other purpose." Possibly the lines went into a fund for the drainage of this sapal and formation of landing-places. See Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 2, pp. 180-181.
1683.—"A Pendet Brachman or Heathen Doctor whom I had put to serve my Agah... would needs make him Panegyriker... and at last concluded seriously with this: When you put your Foot into the Stirrup, My Lord, and when you march on Horseback in the front of the Cavalry, the Earth trembleth under your Feet, the eight Elephants that hold it up upon their Heads not being able to support it."—Bernier, E.T., 86; [ed. Constable, 264].

1688.—"Je feignis donc d'être malade, et d'avoir la fève on fit venir aussitôt un Pandite ou médecin Gentil."—Delton, Rel. de l'Ind. de Goa, 214.

1785.—"I can no longer bear to be at the mercy of our pundita, who deal out Hindu law as they please; and make it at reasonable rates, when they cannot find it ready made."—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Mem. by Ed. Teignmouth, 1807, ii. 67.

1791.—"Il était au moment de s'embrasser pour l'Angleterre, plein de perplexité et d'ennui, lorsque les brames de Beyaner lui apprirent que le brame supérieur de la fameuse pagode de Jagrenat... était seul capable de resoudre toutes les questions de la Société royale de Londres. C'était en effet le plus fameux pandect, ou docteur, dont on eût jamais oui parler."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaumièr Indienne. The preceding exquisite passage shows that the blunder which drew forth Macaulay's flaming wrath, in the quotation lower down, was not a new one.

1798.—"... the most learned of the Pandits or Bramin lawyers, were called up from different parts of Bengal."—Raynal, Hist. i. 42.

1856.—"Besides... being a Pandit of learning, he (Sir David Brewster) is a bundle of talents of various kinds."—Life and Letters of Sydney Dobell, ii. 14.

1860.—"Mr. Vizetelly next makes us say that the principle of limitation is found amongst the Pandicts of the Benares. These lawyers he probably supposes to be some Oriental nation. What he supposes their Pandicts to be I shall not presume to guess. ... If Mr. Vizetelly had consulted the Unitarian Report, he would have seen that I spoke of the Pandits of Benares, and he might without any very long and costly research have learned where Benares is and what a Pandit is."—Macaulay, Preface to his Speeches.

1877.—"Colonel Y... Since Nain Singh's absence from this country precludes my having the pleasure of handing to him in person, this, the Victoria or Patron's Medal, which has been awarded to him, ... I beg to place it in your charge for transmission to the Pandit."—Address by Sir R. Aitken, Prestr. R. Geog. Soc., May 28.

1877.—"Colonel Y... in reply, said:... Though I do not know Nain Singh personally, I know his work... He is not a topographical automaton, or merely one of a great multitude of native employees with an average qualification. His observations have added a larger amount of important knowledge to the map of Asia than those of any other living man, and his journals form an exceedingly interesting book of travels. It will afford me great pleasure to take steps for the transmission of the Medal through an official channel to the Pandit."—Reply to the President, same date.

PUNJAUB, n.p. The name of the country between the Indus and the Sutlej. The modern Anglo-Indian province so-called, now extends on one side up beyond the Indus, including Peshâwar, the Derajat, &c., and on the other side up to the Jumna, including Delhi. [In 1901 the Frontier Districts were placed under separate administration.] The name is Pers. Panj-âb, 'Five Rivers.' These rivers, as reckoned, sometimes include the Indus, in which case the five are (1) Indus, (2) Jelam (see JELUM) or Behat, the ancient Vidasa which the Greeks made Tâdès (Strabo) and Bâdès (Pol.), (3) Chenâb, ancient Chandrabâgha and Asiknâ. Ptolemy preserves a corruption of the former Sanskrit name in Sakâbâda, but it was rejected by the older Greeks because it was of ill omen, i.e. probably because Greeceized it would be Sakâpâroppingos, 'the devourer of Alexander.' The alternative Asiknâ they rendered 'Aksesins.' (4) Râvi, the ancient Aïranvâtî, Târâvâs (Strabo), Târâvâs (Arrian), 'Arrós or 'Pânâdès (Pol.). (5) Bias, ancient Vijâisâ, Têfas (Arrian), Bîdâsos (Pol.). This excluded the Sutlej, Satadrâ, Hesydrus of Pliny, Zaráâdor or Zâddârâs (Pol.), as Timur excludes it below. We may take in the Sutlej and exclude the Indus, but we hardly can exclude the Chenâb as Wassif does below.

No corresponding term is used by the Greek geographers. "Putandum est nomen Panchanadas Graecos aut omnino latinesse, aut casu quodam non ad nostra usque tempora pervenisse, quod in tantâ monumentorum ruina facile accidere potuit" (Lassen, Pentapotamia, 3). Lassen however has termed the country Pentapotamia in a learned Latin dissertation on its ancient geography. Though the actual word Panjâb is Persian, and dates from Mahommedan times, the corresponding Skt. Panchanada is ancient and genuine, occurring in the Mahâbhârata and Râmâyana. The name Panjâb in older Mahommedan writers is applied to the Indus river, after receiving the rivers of the country which we call Punjaub. In that sense Panj-nad, of equivalent meaning, is still occasionally used. [In S. India the term is sometimes applied to the country watered by the Tumbbadra, Wardha, Malprabha, Gatprabha and Kistna (Wilks, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 405.)]

We remember in the newspapers, after the second Sikh war, the report of a speech by a clergyman in England, who spoke of the deposition of “the bloody Punjaub of Lahore.”

b.c. 2.—“Having explored the land of the Pahlavi and the country adjoining, there had then to be searched Panchanada in every part; the monkeys then explore the region of Kashmir with its woods of acacias.”—Ittânâmâyâ, Bk. iv. ch. 43.

c. 940.—Masê'did details (with no correctness) the five rivers that form the Mihran or Indus. He proceeds: “When the Five Rivers which we have named have past the House of Gold which is Mihrân, they unite at a place three days distant from that city, between it and Marsûra at a place called Doshâb.”—i. 377-8.

c. 1020.—“They all (Sind, Jhâlam, Irâwa, Biah) combine with the Satlader (Sutloj) below Mihrân, at a place called Panjâd, or ‘the junction of the five rivers.’ They form a very wide stream.”—Al-Birûnî, in Elliot, i. 48.

c. 1300.—“After crossing the Panjâb, or five rivers, namely Sind, Jelam, the river of Lohâwar (i.e. of Lahore, viz. the Râvî), Satlûd, and Bîyân.”—Wassêf, in Elliot, iii. 36.

c. 1333.—“By the grace of God our caravans arrived safe and sound at Banjâb, i.e. at the River of the Sind. Banjâ (panj) signifies ‘five,’ and ðâ, ‘water’; so that the name signifies ‘the Five Waters.’ They flow into this great river, and water the country.”—Ibn Batuta, iii. 91.

c. 1400.—“All these (united) rivers (Jelam, Chenâf, Râvî, Bîyân, Sind) are called the Sind or Panjâb, and this river falls into the Persian Gulf near Thatta.”—The Emp. Timur, in Elliot, iii. 476.

[c. 1630.—“He also takes a Survey of Pang-ob . . .”—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 63. He gives a list of the rivers in p. 70.]

1648.—“. . . Pang-ab, the chief city of which is Lahore, is an excellent and fruitful province, for it is watered by the five rivers of which we have formerly spoken.”—Van Tweefel, 3.

““The River of the ancient Indus, is by the Persians and Magols called Pang-ab, i.e. the Five Waters.””—Ibid. i.

1710.—“He found this ancient and famous city (Lahore) in the Province Panschaap, by the side of the broad and fish-abounding river Rari (for Ravî).”—Valentijn, iv. (Su-ratte), 282.

1790.—“Investigations of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Hindoos, written in the Carnatic, and in the Punjaub, would in many cases widely differ.”—Forster, Preface to Journey.

1780.—The Province, of which Lahore is the capital, is often named Panjâb than Lahore.”—Rennell’s Memoir, 3rd ed. 52.

1804.—“I rather think . . . that he (Holker) will go off to the Punjaub. And what gives me stronger reason to think so is, that on the seal of his letter to me he calls himself ‘the Slave of Shah Mahmud, the King of Kings.’ Shah Mahmoud is the brother of Zeman Shah. He seized the musnad and government of Caubul, after having defeated Zeman Shah two or three years ago, and put out his eyes.”—Wellington, Deep. under March 17.

1815.—“He (Subagtageen) . . . overran the fine province of the Punjaub, in his first expedition.”—Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, i. 316.

PUNKAH, s. Hind. pankhâ.
a. In its original sense a portable fan, generally made from the leaf of the palmýra (Borassus flabelliformis, or ‘fan-shaped’), the natural type and origin of the fan. Such pankhás in India are not however formed, as Chinese fans are, like those of our ladies; they are generally, whether large or small, of a bean-shape, with a part of the dried leaf-stalk adhering, which forms the handle.
b. But the specific application in Anglo-Indian colloquial is to the large fixed and swinging fan, formed of cloth stretched on a rectangular frame, and suspended from the ceiling, which is used to agitate the air in hot weather. The date of the introduction of this machine into India is not known to us. The quotation from Linschoten shows that some such apparatus was known in the 16th century, though this comes out clearly in the French version alone; the original Dutch, and the old English translation are here unintelligible, and indicate that Linschoten (who apparently never was at Ormuz) was describing, from hearsay, something that he did not understand. More remarkable passages are those which we take from Dozy, and from El-Fakhri, which show that the true Anglo-Indian pânka was known to the Arabs as early as the 8th century.

1710.—“Aloft in a Gallery the King sits in his chaire of State, accompanied with his Children and chiefe Vizier . . . no other than the two Punkaws to gather wind."—
W. Flinch, in Purchas, i. 439. The word seems here to be used improperly for the men who plied the fans. We find also in the same writer a verb to punkaw:

"... behind one punkawing, another holding his sword."—Ibid. 493.

Terry does not use the word:

1616.—"... the people of better quality, lying or sitting on their Carpets or Pallats, have servants standing about them, who continually beat the air upon them with Flabella's, or Fans, of stifferned leather, which keep off the flies from annoying them, and cool them as they lye."—Ed. 1665, p. 405.

1663.—"On such occasions they desire nothing but . . . to lie down in some cool and shady place all along, having a servant or two to fan one by turns, with their great Punkans, or Fans,"—Berrier, E.T., p. 76; [ed. Constable, 241].

1757.—"Over her head was held a punken."—Sir C. Mullet, in Parl. Papers, 1821, "Hindo Widow's.

1809.—He . . . presented me . . . two punkahs.—Lord Valentia, i. 428.

1881.—"The chair of state, the selia gestatoria, in which the Pope is borne aloft, is the ancient palanquin of the Roman nobles, and, of course, of the Roman Princes . . . the fans which go behind are the punkahs of the Eastern Emperors, borrowed from the Court of Persia."—Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 207.

b.—
c. 1150-60.—"Sous le nom de Khaich on entend des étoffes de mauvais toile de lin qui servent à différents usages. Dans ce passéage de Rahnès (c. A.D. 900) ce sont des ventilateurs faits de cet étoffe. Ceci se pratique de cette manière : on en prend un morceau de la grandeur d'un tapis, un peu plus grand ou un peu plus petit selon les dimensions de la chambre, et on le rembourre avec des objets qui out de la consistance et qui ne plient pas facilement, par exemple avec du vapa. L'ayant ensuite suspendu au milieu de la chambre, on le fait tirer et lacher doucement et continuellement par un homme placé dans le haut de l'appartement. De cette manière il fait beaucoup de vent et refraichiit l'air. Quelquesfois on le trempe dans de l'eau de rose, et alors il parfume l'air en même temps qu'il le refraichiit."—Glossaire sur le Manicou, quoted in Dozy et Engelmann, p. 342. See also Dozy, Supp. aux Dict. Arabes, s.v. Khaich.

1166.—"He (Ibn Hamdon the Kithi) once recited to me the following piece of his composition, containing an enigmatical description of a linen fan: (1)

"'Fast and loose, it cannot touch what it tries to reach; though tied up it moves swiftly, and though a prisoner it is free. Fixed in its place it drives before it the gentle breeze; though its path lie closed up it moves on in its nocturnal journey.'"—Quoted by Ibn Khallikan, E.T. iii. 91.

"(1) The linen fan (Mirwaka-t al Khaish) is a large piece of linen, stretched on a frame, and suspended from the ceiling of the room. They make use of it in Irak. See de Sacy’s Horâri, p. 474."—Note by MacGuckin de Slane, ibid. p. 92.

c. 1300.—"One of the innovations of the Caliph Mansur (A.D. 755-774) was the Khaish of linen in summer, a thing which was not known before his time. But the Sassanian Kings used in summer to have an apartment freshly plastered (with clay) every day, which they inhabited, and on the morrow another apartment was plastered for them."—El-Fakhri, ed. Ahtwardt, p. 188.

1596.—"And (they use) instruments like swings with fans, to rock the people in, and to make wind for cooling, which they call cattaventos."—Literal Transl. from Linsoehen, ch. 6.

1598.—"And they use certain instruments like Waggins, with bellows, to bear all the people in, and to gather windes to cool themselves with all, which they call Cattaventos."—Old English Translation, by W. P., p. 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 52].

The French version is really a brief description of the punka:

1610.—"Ils ont aussi du Cattaventos qui sont certains instruments pendus en l'air es quels se faisant donner le bransle ils font du vent qui les refraichiit."—Ed. 1638, p. 17.

The next also perhaps refers to a suspended punka:

1662.—". . . furnished also with good Ceiliars with great Flaps to stir the Air, for reposing in the fresh Air from 12 till 4 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of these Ceiliars begins to be hot and stuffing."—Berrier, p. 79; [ed. Constable, 247].

1807.—"As one small concern succeeds another, the punkah vibrates gently over my eyes."—Lord Minto in India, 27.

1810.—"Were it not for the punka (a large frame of wood covered with cloth) which is suspended over every table, and kept swinging, in order to freshen the air, it would be scarcely possible to sit out the melancholy ceremony of an Indian dinner."—Maria Graham, 90.

Williamson mentions that punkahs "were suspended in most dining halls."—Vade Mecum, i. 281.

1823.—"Punkas, large frames of light wood covered with white cotton, and looking not unlike enormous fire-boards, hung from the ceilings of the principal apartments."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 28.

1852.—"Holy stones with scrubs and slaps (Our Christmas waits !) prelude the day; For holy and festoons of bay Swing feeble punkas,—or perhaps A windsail dangles in collapse."—Christmas on board a P. and O., near the Equator.
1875.—"The punkah flapped to and fro lazily overhead."—Cheaney, The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

Mr. Busteed observes: "It is curious that in none of the lists of servants and their duties which are scattered through the old records in the last century (18th), is there any mention of the punka, nor in any narratives referring to domestic life in India then, that have come under our notice, do we remember any allusion to its use. . . . The swinging punka, as we see it to-day, was, as every one knows, an innovation of a later period. . . . This dates from an early year in the present century."—Echoes of Old Calcutta, p. 115. He does not seem, however, to have found any positive evidence of the date of its introduction.

["Hanging punkahs are said by one authority to have originated in Calcutta by accident towards the close of the last (18th) century. It is reported that a clerk in a Government office suspended the leaf of a table, which was accidentally waved to and fro by a visitor. A breath of cool air followed the movement, and suggested the idea which was worked out and resulted in the present machine" (Carey, Good Old Days of John Company, i. 81). Mr. Douglas says that punkahs were little used by Europeans in Bombay till 1810. They were not in use at Nuncomar's trial in Calcutta (1775), Bombay and W. India, ii. 253.]

PUNSAReE, s. A native drug-seller; Hind. pansaṛī. We place the word here partly because C. P. Brown says "it is certainly a foreign word," and assigns it to a corruption of dispenserium; which is much to be doubted. [The word is really derived from Skt. panyāśāla, 'a market, warehouse.]

[1830.—"Beside this, I purchased from a pansaree some application for relieving the pain of a bruise."—Frazer, The Persian Adventurer, iii. 23.]

PURDAH, s. Hind. from Pers. parda, 'a curtain'; a portière; and especially a curtain screening women from the sight of men; whence a woman of position who observes such rules of seclusion is termed pardanshin, 'one who sits behind a curtain.' (See GOSHA.)

1809.—"On the fourth (side) a purdah was stretched across."—Ed. Valéria, i. 100.

1810.—"If the disorder be obstinate, the doctor is permitted to approach the purdah (i.e. curtain, or screen) and to put the hand through a small aperture . . . in order to feel the patient's pulse."—Williamson, V. M. i. 130.

[1813.—"My travelling palankeen formed my bed, its purdoo or chintz covering my curtains."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 108.]

1878.—"Native ladies look upon the confinement behind the purdah as a badge of rank, and also as a sign of chastity, and are exceedingly proud of it."—Life in the Moghul, i. 113.

[1900.—"Charitable aid is needed for the purdah women."—Pioneer Mail, Jan. 21.]

PURDEESE, s. Hind. paradešī usually written pardešī, 'one from a foreign country.' In the Bombay army the term is universally applied to a sepy from N. India. [In the N.W.P. the name is applied to a wandering tribe of swindlers and coiners.]

PURWANNA, PERWAUNA, s. Hind. from Pers. purwīna, 'an order; a grant or letter under royal seal; a letter of authority from an official to his subordinate; a license or pass.'

1682.—". . . we being obliged at the end of two months to pay Custom for the said goods, if in that time we did not procure a Pherwanna for the Dwan of Decca to excuse us from it."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 34].

1693.—". . . Egmore and Pursewaukum were lately granted us by the Nabob's purwannas."—Wheeler, i. 281.

1759.—"Perwanna, under the Coochuck (or the small seal) of the Nabob Vizier Ulma Maleck, Nizam ul Muluck Bahadour, to Mr. John Spenser."—In Cambridge's Act. of the War, 280. (See also quotation under HOSBOLHOOKUM.)

1774.—"As the peace has been so lately concluded, it would be a satisfaction to the Rajah to receive your parwanna to this purpose before the departure of the caravan."

—Bogle's Diary, in Markham's Tibet, p. 50. But Mr. Markham changes the spelling of his originals.

PUTCHOCK, s. This is the trade-name for a fragrant root, a product of the Himalaya in the vicinity of Kashmīr, and forming an article of export from both Bombay and Calcutta to the Malay countries and to China, where it is used as a chief ingredient of the Chinese pastille-rods commonly called jestick. This root was recognised by the famous García de Orta as the Costus of the ancients. The latter took their word from the Skt. kushta, by a modification of which name—kut—it is still known and used as a medicine in Upper India. De Orta speaks of the plant as growing about Mandu and Chitore, whence it was brought for sale to Ahmadabad; but his informants misled him. The true source was traced in situ by two other illustrious men, Royle and Falconer, to a plant belonging to the N. O. Compositae, Saussurea Xappe, Clarke, for which Dr. Falconer, not recognising the genus, had proposed the name of Aucklandia Costus verus, in honour of the then Governor-General. The Costus is a gregarious plant, occupying open, sloping sides of the mountains, at an elevation of 8000 to 9000 feet. See article by Falconer in Trans. Linn. Soc. xix. 23-31.

The trade-name is, according to Wilson, the Telugu pāch'chādku, 'green leaf', but one does not see how this applies. (Is there, perhaps, some confusion with Patch? see PATCHOUli). De Orta speaks as if the word, which he writes puchko, were Malay. Though neither Crawfurd nor Favve gives the word, in this sense, it is in Marsden's earlier Malay Dict.: "Puchok, a plant, the aromatic leaves of which are an article of trade; said by some to be Costus indicus, and by others the Melissa, or Laurus." [On this Mr. Skeat writes: "Puchok is the Malay word for a young sprout, or the growing shoot of a plant. Puchok in the special sense here used is also a Malay word, but it may be separate from the other. Klinkert gives puchok as a sprout or shoot and also as a radish-like root (indigenous in China (sic), used in medicine for fumigation, &c.). Apparently it is always the root and not the leaves of the plant that are used, in which case Marsden may have confused the two senses of the word."]

In the year 1837-38 about 250 tons of this article, valued at £10,000, were exported from Calcutta alone. The annual import into China at a later date, according to Wells Williams, was 2,000 piculs or 120 tons (Middle Kingdom, ed. 1857, ii. 308). In 1865-66, the last year for which the details of such minor exports are found in print, the quantity exported from Calcutta was only 492½ cwt., or 24½ tons. In 1875 the value of the imports at Hankow and Chefoo was £6,421. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. ii. p. 482, Bombay Gazetteer, xi. 470.]

1520. "We have prohibited the export of pepper to China . . . and now we prohibit the export of pepper and other spices from these parts of India to China."—Capitul de hum Regimento del Rey a Diogo Ayres, Feitor da China, in Arch. Port. Orient., Fasc. v. 49.

1525. "Pucho of Cambaya worth 35 tangas a mannd."—Lembranças, 50.

[1527. Mr. Whiteway notes that in a letter of Diogo Calvo to the King, dated Jan. 17, pucho is mentioned as one of the imports to China.—India Office MS. Corpo Chronologico, vol. i.]

1554. "The bear (see BAHAR) of pucho contains 20 fārāqol (see FRAZALA), and an additional 4 of picota (q.v.), in all 24 fārāqol. . . ."—A. Nunes, 11.

1563. "I say that costus in Arabic is called cost or cast; in Guzerate it is called uplot (upaleta); and in Malay, for that region there is a great trade and consumption thereof, it is called pucho. I tell you the name in Arabic, because it is called by the same name by the Latins and Greeks, and I tell it you in Guzerati, because that is the land to which it is chiefly carried from its birth-place; and I tell you the Malay name because the greatest quantity is consumed there, or taken thence to China."—Garcia, f. 72.

C. 1563. "... Opium, Assa Fetida, Puchio, with many other sortes of Drugges."—Caesar Frederike, in Hakt. ii. 345.

1609. "Costus of 2 sorts, one called pokermore, the other called Uplotte (see Garcia, above)."—Dunners, Letters, i. 30.

1617. "5 hampers pochok . . ."—Cocks, Diary, i. 294.

1726. "Patajaak (a leaf of Azijen (Acheen?) that is pounded to powder, and used in incense). . . ."—Valentijn, Choro, 31.

1727. "The Wood Lignum dulcis grows only in this country (Sind). It is rather a Weed than a Wood, and nothing of it is useful but the Root, called Putchock, or Radix dulcis. . . . There are great quantities exported from Surat, and from thence to China, where it generally bears a good Price. . . ."—A. Hamilton, i. 126; [ed. 1744, i. 127].

1808. "Elles emploient ordinairement . . . une racine aromatique appelée pisch-tok, qu'on coupe par petits morceaux, et fait bouillir dans de l’huile de noix de coco. C’est avec cette huile que les danseuses se grissent..."—Haafner, ii. 117.

1862.—"Koot is sent down country in large quantities, and is exported to China, where it is used as incense. It is in Calcutta known under the name of ‘Patchuk.’"—

PUTTAM, n.p. A town in Ceylon on the coast of the bay or estuary of Calpentyn; properly Putțalama; a Tamil name, said by Mr. Ferguson to be puthu-(pudu')alam, ‘New Sal-pants.’ Ten miles inland are the ruins of Tammana Newera, the original Tam-bapani (or Taprobane), where Vijaya, the first Hindu immigrant, established his kingdom. And Putlam is supposed to be the place where he landed.

1298.—"The pearl-fishers... go post to a place called Betelar, and (then) go 60 miles into the gulf."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 16.

c. 1345.—"The natives went to their King and told him my reply. He sent for me, and I proceeded to his presence in the town of Bățăla, which was his capital, a pretty little place, surrounded by a timber wall and towers."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 166.

1672.—"Putelaon..."—Baldaeous (Germ.), 373.

1726.—"Portalam or Putelan."—Valentijn, Ceylon, 21.

PUTNEE, PUTNEY, s.

a. Hind. and Beng. pattnă, or patnī, from v. pat-nā, ‘to be agreed or closed’ (i.e. a bargain). Goods commissioned or manufactured to order.

1755.—"A letter from Cossimbar mentions they had directed Mr. Warren Hastings to propose the Putney aurung (q.v.) in order to purchase putney on our Honble.
Masters’ account, and to make all necessary enquiries."—Fort William Cons., Nov. 10.
In Long, 61.

b. A kind of sub-tenure existing in the Lower Provinces of Bengal, the patnidar, or occupant of which "holds of a Zemindar a portion of the Zemindari in perpetuity, with the right of hereditary succession, and of selling or letting the whole or part, so long as a stipulated amount of rent is paid to the Zemindar, who retains the power of sale for arrears, and is entitled to a regulated fee or fine upon transfer" (Wilson, q.v.). Probably both a and b are etymologically the same, and connected with pattă (see POTTAH).

[1860.—"A perpetual lease of land held under a Zumeendar is called a putnee,—and the holder is called a putneedar, who not only pays an advanced rent to the Zumeendar, but a handsome price for the same."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 64.]

Pathan. A name commonly applied to Afghans, and especially to people in India of Afghan descent. The derivation is obscure. Elphinstone derives it from Pushtăn and Pukht̲h̲ân, pl. Pukht̲h̲t̲āna, the name the Afghans give to their own race, with which Dr.
Trumpp (and Dr. Bellow (Races of Afghanistan, 25) agree. This again has been connected with the Pakt̲y̲ć̲a of Herodotus (iii. 102, iv. 44).] The Afghans have for the name one of the usual fantastic etymologies which is quoted below (see quotation, c. 1611).
The Mahommedians in India are sometimes divided into four classes, viz.
Pathans; Mughals (see MOGUL), i.e.
those of Turki origin; Shāikhs, claiming Arab descent; and Sauvyid̲s, claiming also to be descendants of Mahommed.

1553.—"This State belonged to a people called Patanę, who were lords of that hill-country. And as those who dwell on the skirts of the Pyrenees, on this side and on that, are masters of the passes by which we cross from Spain to France, or vice versa, so these Patan people are the masters of the two entrances to India, by which those who go thither from the landward must pass. . . ."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

1563.—". . . This first King was a Patane of certain mountains that march with Bengal."—García, Coll. t. 34.

1572.—
"Mas agora de nomes, e de usanza, Novos, e varios sao os habitantes.
Os Delhi, os Patanę, que em possanza De terra, e gente sao mais abundantes."
Camões, vii. 20.

[By Aubertin:
"But now inhabitants of other name.
And customs new and various there are found,
The Delhihs and Patans, who in the fame
Of land and people do the most abound."]

1610.—"A Patan, a man of good stature."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 220.

c. 1611.—". . . the mightiest of the Afghan people was Kais. . . . The Prophet gave Kais the name of Abd Utrasheed . . . and . . . predicted that God would make his issue so numerous that they, with respect to the establishment of the Faith, would outlive all other people; the angel Gabriel having revealed to him that their attachment to the Faith would, in strength, be like the wood upon which they lay the keel when constructing a ship, which wood the seamen call Pathan: on this account he conferred upon Abd Ultrasheed the title of Pathan* also."—Hist. of the Afghans, E.T., by Dorn, i. 38.

[1638.—"... Ozmahan a Puttanian ..."]—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 76.)

1648.—"In general the Moors are a haughty and arrogant and proud people, and among them the Patans stand out superior to the others in dress and manners."—Van Twist, 58.

1666.—"Martin Affonso and the other Portuguese delivered them from the war that the Patans were making on them."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Portuguesa, i. 343.

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the Consanginity they claim with Mahomet; as a Siad is a kin to that Imposture. ... A Shiek is a Cousin too, at a distance, into which Relation they admit all new made Proselytes. Meer is somewhat allied also. ... The rest are adopted under the Name of the Province ... as Mogul, the Race of the Tartars ... Patan, Ducan."—Fryer, 93.

1681.—"En estas regiones ay vna cuyas gentes se dizoen los Patanes."—Martinez de la Puente, Compendio, 21.

1726.—"... The Patans (Patandras) are very different in garb, and surpass in valour and stout-heartedness in war."—Valentijn, Choor, 109.

1757.—"The Colonel (Clive) complained bitterly of so many insults put upon him, and reminded the Soubahdar how different his own conduct was, when called upon to assist him against the Pytas."—Ires, 149.

1763.—"The northern nations of India, although idolaters ... were easily induced to embrace Mahomedanism, and are at this day the Affghans or Pitans."—Orme, i. 24, ed. 1803.

1789.—"Moormen are, for the most part, soldiers by profession, particularly in the cavalry, as are also ... Pitans."—Monro, Narr. 49.

1798.—"... Afghans, or as they are called in India, Patans."—G. Forster, Travels, ii. 47.

PUTTEE, PUTTY, s. Hind. pattī.

a. A piece or strip of cloth, bandage; especially used in the sense of a ligature round the lower part of the leg used in lieu of a gaiter, originally introduced from the Himalaya, and now commonly used by sportsmen and soldiers. A special kind of cloth appears in the old trade-lists under the name of puteahs (see PIECE GOODS).

* We do not know what word is intended, unless it be a special use of Ar. batan, 'the interior or middle of a thing.' Dorn refers to a note, which does not exist in his book. Bellows gives the title conferred by the Prophet as "Pātān or Pāthān, a term which in the Syrian language signifies a rudder." Somebody else interputs it as 'a mast.

1875.—"Any one who may be bound for a long march will put on leggings of a peculiar sort, a bandage about 6 inches wide and four yards long, wound round from the ankle up to just below the knee, and then fastened by an equally long string, attached to the upper end, which is lightly wound many times round the calf of the leg. This, which is called patawa, is a much cherished piece of dress."—Brew, Jammu, 175.

1900.—"The Putte leggings are excellent for peace and war, or on foot or on horseback."—Times, Dec. 24.

b. In the N.W.P. "an original share in a joint or coparcenary village or estate comprising many villages; it is sometimes defined as the smaller subdivision of a mahal or estate" (Wilson). Hence Putteedar, partīdāri used for a tenure of this kind.

1852. — "Their names were forthwith scratched off the collector's books, and those of their eldest sons were entered, who became forthwith, in village and cutcherry parlance, lumberdars of the shares of their fathers, or in other words, of putte Shere Singh and putte Baz Singh."—Raikes, Notes on the N.W.P. 94.

c. In S. India, soldiers' pay.

1810.—"... hence in ordinary acceptation, the pay itself was called putte, a Canarese word which properly signifies a written statement of any kind."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 415.]

PUTTYWALLA, s. Hind. putṭāwild, patti-walā (see PUTTEE), 'one with a belt.' This is the usual Bombay term for a messenger or orderly attached to an officer, and bearing a belt and brass badge, called in Bengal chuprassiy or peon (qq.v.), in Madras usually by the latter name.

1878.—"Here and there a belted Government servant, called a Pattiwalā, or Pattawalā, because distinguished by a belt ... ."—Monier Williams, Modern India, 34.

PUTWA, s. Hind. patwā. The Hibiscus sabdariffa, L., from the succulent acid flowers of which very fair jelly is made in Anglo-Indian households. [It is also known as the Rozelle or Red Sorrel (Watt, Econ. Dict. iv. 243). Riddell (Domest. Econ. 337) calls it "Oseille or Roselle jam and jelly t.

PYE, s. A familiar designation among British soldiers and young officers for a Pariah-dog (q.v.); a contraction, no doubt, of the former word.

[1892.—"We English call him a pariah, but this word, belonging to a low, yet by no means degraded class of people in Madras, is never heard on native lips as applied to a dog, any more than our other word 'pie.'"
—L. Kipling, Beast and Man, 266.]

PYJAMMAS, s. Hind. paē-jāma (see JAMMA), lit. 'leg-clothing.' A pair of loose drawers or trowsers, tied round the waist. Such a garment is used by various persons in India, e.g. by women of various classes, by Sikh men, and by most Mahommedans of both sexes. It was adopted from the Mahommedans by Europeans as an article of dishabille and of night attire, and is synonymous with Long Drawers, Shulwāurs, and Mogul-breeches. [For some distinctions between these various articles of dress see Forbes-Watson, (Textile Manufactures, 57.)] It is probable that we English took the habit like a good many others from the Portuguese. Thus Pyrard (c. 1610) says, in speaking of Goa Hospital: "Ils ont force calsons sans quy no coucher iamais les Portugais des Indes" (ii. p. 11; [Hak. Soc. ii. 9]). The word is now used in London shops. A friend furnishes the following reminiscence: "The late Mr. B,— tailor in Jermyn Street, some 40 years ago, in reply to a question why pyjammas had feet sewn on to them (as was sometimes the case with those furnished by London outfitters) answered: 'I believe, Sir, it is because of the White Ants!'

[1828.—"His chief joy smoking a cigar in loose Paee-jams and native slippers."
Orient. Sport. Mag., reprint 1878, i. 64.]

1881.—"The rest of our attire consisted of that particularly light and airy white flannel garment, known throughout India as a pajama suit."—Haekel, Ceylon, 329.

PYKE, PAIK, s. Wilson gives only one original of the term so expressed in Anglo-Indian speech. He writes: "Pātik or Pāyik, corruptly Pyke, Hind. &c. (from S. padātika), Pātik or Pāyak, Mar. A footman, an armed attendant, an inferior police and revenue officer, a messenger, a courier, a village watchman; in Cuttack the Pāiks formerly constituted a local militia, holding land of the Zamindārs or Rājās by the tenure of military service," &c., quoting Bengal Regulations. [Platts also treats the two words as identical.] But it seems clear to us that there are here two terms rolled together:

a. Pers. Paık, a foot-runner or courier. We do not know whether this is an old Persian word or a Mongol introduction. According to Hammer Purgstall it was the term in use at the Court of the Mongol princes, as quoted below. Both the words occur in the Ain, but differently spelt, and that with which we now deal is spelt paik (with the fatha point).

c. 1590.—"The Jilundār (see under JULIEBADE) and the Paık (a runner). Their monthly pay varies from 1200 to 1200. (dāms), according to their speed and manner of service. Some of them will run from 50 to 100 kroh (Coss) per day."—Ain, E.T. by Blochmann, i. 198 (see orig. i. 144).

1673.—At the Court of Constantinople: "Les Peiks venoient ensuite, avec leurs bonnets d’argent doré ornés d’un petit plume de héron, un arc et un carquois chargé de flèches."—Journal d’A. Galland, i. 98.

1687.—"... the officers and servants called Agham-Oplians, who are designed to the manner uses of the Seraglio... most commonly the sons of Christians taken from their Parents at the age of 10 or 12 years. ... These are: 1, Porters, 2, Bastangies or Gardiners... 5, Paiks and Solacks...."—Sir Paul Rycaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, 19.

1761.—"Ahmad Sultán then commissioned Shish Pasund Khán... the harkūās (see HURCARRA) and the Paiks, to go and procure information as to the state and strength of the Mahratta army."—Muhammad Jásar Shámlú, in Elliot, viii. 151-2.

1840.—"The express riders (Eilbothen) accomplished 50 farsangs a-day, so that an express came in 4 days from Khorrassan to Tebris (Tabriz)."—The Foot-runners carrying letters (Peik), whose name at least is maintained to this day at both the Persian and Osmani Courts, accomplished 30 farsangs a-day.—Hammer Purgstall, Gesch. der Golden Horde, 243.

[1868.—"The Payeke is entrusted with the techlim (see CHILLUM) (pipe), which at court (Khiva) is made of gold or silver, and must be replenished with fresh water every time it is filled with tobacco."—Vamberg, Sketches, 89.]

b. Hind paák and pāyk (also Mahr.) from Skt. padātika, and padika, a "foot-soldier," with the other specific application given by Wilson, exclusive of "courier." In some narratives the word seems to answer exactly to peon.
In the first quotation, which is from the Ain, the word, it will be seen, is different from that quoted under (a) from the same source.

c. 1590.—"It was the custom in those times, for the palace (of the King of Bengal) to be guarded by several thousand pykes (pajis), who are a kind of infantry. An eunuch entered into a confederacy with these guards, who one night killed the King, Futfah Shah, when the Eunuch ascended the throne, under the title of Barbuck Shah."—Glauthin's Tr., ed. 1800, ii. 19 (orig. i. 413; [Jarrett (ii. 149) gives the word as Fayikes].

In the next quotation the word seems to be the same, though used for 'a seaman.' Compare uses of Lascar.

c. 1615.—"(His fleet) consisted of 20 beaked vessels, all well manned with the sailors whom they call paiques, as well as with Portuguese soldiers and topazes who were excellent musketeers; 50 hired jettus (GALLE-VAT) of like sort and his own (Sebastian Gonaves's) galliot (see GALLE-VAT), which was about the size of a patecno, with 14 demi-falcons on each broadside, two pieces of 18 to 20 lbs. calibre in the forecastle, and 60 Portuguese soldiers, with more than 40 topazes and Cafres (see Caffer)."
—Boauro, Decada, 452.

1722.—Among a detail of charges at this period in the Zemindarry of Rajahah appears:

"9. Paikan, or the pikes, guard of villages, everywhere necessary... 2,161 rupees."

The following quotation from an Indian Regulation of Ld. Cornwallis's time is a good example of the extraordinary multiplication of terms, even in one Province in India, denoting approximately the same thing:

1792.—"All Pykes, Chokeydars (see CHOKIDAR), Pashans, Dwaunda, Nigaban," Harces (see HARRY), and other descriptions of village watchmen are declared subject to the orders of the Darogah (see DAROGA)...
—Regna. for the Police... passed by the G.-G. in C., Dec. 7.

"The army of Assam was a militia organised as follows. The whole male population was bound to serve either as soldiers or labourers, and was accordingly divided into sets of four men each, called gotes, the individuals comprising the gotes being termed pykes."—Johnstone's Act. of Welb's Expedition to Assam, 1792-93-94 (comm. by Gen. Keatinge).

PYSE! Interjection. The use of this is illustrated in the quotations. Notwithstanding the writer's remark (below) it is really Hindustani, viz. pois, 'look out!' or 'make way!' apparently from Skt. pasya, 'look! see!' (see Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. p. 529, col. c; Fallon's Hind. Dict., p. 376, col. a; [Platts, 282b].

[QUAMOCLIT. s. The Ipomoea quamoclitidis, the name given by Linnaeus to the Red Jasmine. The word is a corruption of Skt. Kama-lata, 'the creeper of Kama, god of love.'

1834.—"This climber, the most beautiful and luxuriant imaginable, bears also the name of Kamalata 'Love's Creeper.' Some QUEDDA, n.p. A city, port, and small kingdom on the west coast of the Malay Peninsula, tributary to Siam. The name according to Crawford is Malay kedah, 'an elephant trap' (see KEDDAH). [Mr. Skeat writes: "I do not know what Crawford's authority may be, but kedah does not appear in Klinkert's Dict.

In any case the form taken by the name of the country is Kedah. The coralling of elephants is probably a Siamese custom, the method adopted on the E. coast, where the Malays are left to themselves, being to place a decoy female elephant near a powerful noise." ] It has been supposed sometimes that Kadath is the Kâ'ân or Kânâ's of Ptolemy's sea-route to China, and likewise the Kalâh of the early Arab voyagers, as in the Fourth Voyage of Sindbad the Seaman (see Procs. R. Geog. Soc. 1882, p. 655; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 386). It is possible that these old names however represent Kwâla, 'a river mouth,' a denomination of many small ports in Malay regions. Thus the port that we call Queeda is called by the Malays Kwâla Battrang.

1516.—"Having left this town of Tanassary, further along the coast towards Malaca, there is another seaport of the Kingdom of Ansiam, which is called Quedah, in which also there is much shipping, and great interchange of merchandise."—Barroso, 188-189.

1533.—"... The settlements from Tavay to Malaca are these: Tenassary, a notable city, Langur, Torrão, Queda, producing the best pepper on all that coast, Pedão, Perá, Solungor, and our City of Malaca. ..."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

Soc. i. 103].

1614.—"And so... Diogo de Mendonça on before, embarked in the jatinga (see GALLEVAT) of João Rodrigo de Paiva, and coming to Queda, and making an attack at daybreak, and finding them unprepared, he burnt the town, and carried off a quantity of provisions and some tin" (cited, see CALAY).—Bozaro, Decada, 187.

QUEMOY, n.p. An island at the east opening of the Harbour of Amoy. It is a corruption of Kin-muin, in Chang-chau dialect Kin-mui, meaning 'Golden-door.'

QUI-HI, s. The popular distinctive nickname of the Bengal Anglo-Indian, from the usual manner of calling servants in that Presidency, viz. 'Koi hai?' 'Is there any one there?' The Anglo-Indian of Madras was known as a Mull, and he of Bombay as a Duck (qq.v.).

1816.—"The Grand Master, or Adventures of Qui Hi in Hindostan, a Hudibrastic Poem; with Illustrations by Rowlandson." 1825.—"Most of the household servants are Parsees, the greater part of whom speak English. ... Instead of 'Keece hue,' Who's there! the way of calling a servant is 'boy,' a corruption, I believe, of bhu, brother."—Heber, ed. 1841, ii. 98. [But see under BOY.]

1830.—"J'ai vu dans vos gazettes de Calcutta les clameurs des quoîhadés (sobriquets des Européens Bengalis de ce côté) sur la chaleur."—Jacquesmont, Corresp., i. 308.

"QUILOA, n.p. i.e. Kilwa, in lat. 9° O'S., next in remoteness to Sofala, which for a long time was the ne plus ultra of Arab navigation on the East Coast of Africa, as Capt. Boyados was that of Portuguese navigation on the West Coast. Kilwa does not occur in the Geographies of Edrisi or Abulfeda, though Sofala is in both. It is mentioned in the Rôteiro, and in Barro's account of Da Gama's voyage. Barros had access to a native chronicle of Quiloa, and says it was founded about A.H. 400, and a little more than 70 years after Magadoxo and Brava, by a Persian Prince from Shiraz.

1220.—"Kilwa, a place in the country of Zenj, a city."—Yâbâlî, (orig.), iv. 302.

C. 1330.—"I embarked at the town of Mablashan (Magadoxo), making for the country of the Sawihil, and the town of Kulwā, in the country of the Zenj, . . .” — Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. [See under SÔFALÂ.]

1498. — “Here we learned that the island of which they told us in Mocobique as being peopled by Christians is an island on which the King of Mocobique himself, and that the half is of Moors, and the half of Christians, and in this island is much seed-pearl, and the name of the island is Quyłuee. . . .” — Roteiro da Viagem de Vasco da Gama, 48.

1506. — Del 1502 . . . mandò al viaggio name 21, Cristianio Don Vasco da Gamba, che fu quello che discooperò l'India . . . e nell’andar de li, del Cao de Bonn Speranza, zense in uno loco chiamato Ochilia; la qual terra e dentro uno rio. . . .” — Leonardo Cal’ Masser, 17.

1553. — “The Moor, in addition to his natural hatred, bore this increased resentment on account of the chastisement inflicted on him, and determined to bring the ships into port at the city of Quiloa, that being a populous place, where they might get the better of our ships by force of arms. To wreak this mischief with greater safety to himself he told Vasco da Gamba, as if wishing to gratify him, that in front of them was a city called Quiloa, half peopled by Christians of Abyssinia and of India, and that if he gave the order the ships should be steered thither.” — Barros, I. iv. 5.

1572. — “Esta ilha pequena, que habitamos, He em toda esta terra certa escala De todos os que as ondas navegamos De Quiloa, de Mombaça, a de Sofala.”

By Burton:

“This little island, where we now abide, of all this seaboard is the one sure place for ev’ry merchantman that stems the tide from Quiloa, or Sofala, or Mombas. . . .”

QUILON, n.p. A form which we have adopted from the Portuguese for the name of a town now belonging to Travancore; once a very famous and much frequented port of Malabar, and known to the Arabs as Kaulam. The proper name is Tamil, Kollam, of doubtful sense in this use. Bishop Caldwell thinks it may be best explained as ‘Palace’ or ‘royal residence,’ from Kolū, ‘the royal Presence,’ or Hall of Audience. [Mr. Logan says: ‘Kollam is only an abbreviated form of Kovilagam or Kovilagam, ‘King’s house’] (Malabar, i. 231, note.) For ages Kaulam was known as one of the greatest ports of Indian trade with Western Asia, especially trade in pepper and brazil-wood. It was possibly the Malé of Cosmas in the 6th century (see MALABAR), but the first mention of it by the present name is about three centuries later, in the Relation translated by Reinaud. The ‘Kollam era’ in general use in Malabar dates from a.d. 824; but it does not follow that the city had no earlier existence. In a Syriac extract (which is, however, modern) in Land’s Anecdota Syriaca (Latin, i. 125; Syriac, p. 27) it is stated that three Syrian missionaries came to Kaulam in a.d. 823, and got leave from King Shatkirbītī to build a church and city at Kaulam. It would seem that there is some connection between the date assigned to this event, and the ‘Kollam era’; but what it is we cannot say. Shatkirbītī is evidently a form of Chakravartī Rāja (see under CHUCKER-BUTTY). Quilon, as we now call it, is now the 3rd town of Travancore, pop. (in 1891) 23,380; there is little trade. It had a European garrison up to 1830, but now only one Sepoy regiment.

In ecclesiastical narratives of the Middle Ages the name occurs in the form Columbhum, and by this name it was constituted a See of the Roman Church in 1328, suffragan of the Archbishop of Sultaniva in Persia; but it is doubtful if it ever had more than one bishop, viz. Jordanus of Severac, author of the Mirabilia often quoted in this volume. Indeed we have no knowledge that he ever took up his bishopric, as his book was written, and his nomination occurred, both during a visit to Europe. The Latin Church however which he had founded, or obtained the use of, existed 20 years later, as we know from John de’ Marignolli, so it is probable that he had reached his See. The form Columbhum is accounted for by an inscription (see Ind. Antiq. ii. 360) which shows that the city was called Kolambu, [other forms being Kalambapatam or Kalambapattama] (Bombay Gazetteer, vol. i. pt. i. 183)]. The form Palumbum also occurs in most of the MSS. of Friar Odoric’s Journey; this is the more difficult to account for, unless it was a mere play (or a trick of memory) on the kindred meanings of columba.
and palumbes. A passage in a letter from the Nestorian Patriarch Yeshu-yab (c. 650-60) quoted in Assemarni (iii. pl. i. 131), appears at that date to mention Colun. But this is an arbitrary and erroneous rendering in Assemarni's Latin. The Syriac has Kalam, and probably therefore refers to the port of the Malay regions noticed under CALAY and QUEDDA.

851.—"De ce lieu (Mascate) les navires mettent la voile pour l'Inde, et se dirigent vers Kolam-Malay : la distance entre Mascate et Kolam-Malay est d'un mois de marche, avec un vent modéré."—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 15.

1106.—"Seven days from thence is Chulam, on the confines of the country of the sun-worshippers, who are descendants of Kush... and are all black. This nation is very trustworthy in matters of trade. Pepper grows in this country. Cinnamon, ginger, and many other kinds of spices also grow in this country."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Early Travels in Palestine, 114-115.

c. 1280-90. — "Royannes de Ma-pa-'rh. Parmi tous les royaumes étrangers d'au-delà des mers, il n'y eut que Ma-pa-'rh et Kiu-lan (Mabar and Quilon) sur lesquels on ait pu parvenir à établir une certaine soumission; mais surtout Kiu-lan. ... (Année 1252). Cette année ... Kiu-lan a envoyé un ambassadeur à la cour (mogole) pour prêter en tribut des marchandises précieuses et un singe noir."—Chinese Annals, quoted by Panthier, Marc Pol, ii. 603, 643.

1298.—"When you quit Maabar and go 500 miles towards the S.W. you come to the Kingdom of Colun. The people are idolators, but there are also some Christians and some Jews."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 22.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Kankan and Tana; beyond them the country of Malibar, which from the boundary of Karoha to Kolam, is 300 parangs in length. The people are all Samánîs, and worship idols. ..."—Rashâd ad-din, in Elliot, i. 65.

c. 1310.—"Ma'bar extends in length from Kulum to Nilawa (Nelore) nearly 300 parangs along the sea-coast."—Wassif, in Elliot, iii. 32.

c. 1322.—"... as I went by the sea... towards a certain city called Polumbum (where growth the pepper in great store). ..."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, p. 71.

c. 1322.—"Poi venni a Colonbio, ch'è la migliore terra d'India per mercantâlì. Quivi è il gengiovo in grande copia e del bueno del mondo. Quivi vano tutti ignudi salvo che portano un panno inanni alla vergogna... e legalosi di dietro."—Palatine MS. of Odoric, in Cathay, App., p. xlvii.

c. 1328.—"In India, whilst I was at Columbuam, were found two cats having wings like the wings of bats..."—Friar Jordanus, p. 29.

1330.—"Joannes, &c., nobili viro domino Nasareorum et universis sub eo Christianis Nasarensis de Columbu gratait in pracenti, quae du cat ad gloriam in futuro... quatenus venerabilem Fratem nostrum Jordanam Catalani episcopum Columbensem... quem nuper ad episcopalis dignitatis apicem auctoritate apostolica diximus promovendum..."—Letter of Pope John XXII. to the Christians of Colun, in Odorici Rotrandi Ann. Eccles. v. 495.

c. 1343.—"The 10th day (from Calicut) we arrived at the city of Kaulam, which is one of the finest of Malibar. Its markets are splendid, and its merchants are known under the name of Sâli (see CHÔOLIA). They are rich ; one of them will buy a ship with all its fittings and load it with goods from his own store."—În Bâcuta, iv. 10.

c. 1348.—"And sailing on the feast of St. Stephen, we navigated the Indian Sea until Palm Sunday, and then arrived at a very noble city of India called Columbium, where the whole world's pepper is produced. There is a church of St. George there, of the Latin communion, at which I dwelt. And I adorned it with fine paintings, and taught there the holy Law."—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., pp. 342-344.

c. 1430.—"... Coloun, civitatem nobilem venit, cusjt ambitus duodecim millia passuum ampletctitur. Gingiber qui colobi (colombi) dicitur, piper, verzinum, cannellea quae crassae appellantur, hae in provincia, quam vocant Melibamiam, leguntur."—Conti, in Poggias de Var. Fortunae.

c. 1468-9.—"In the year Bhuvati (644) of the Kolamba era, King Adityavarma the ruler of Vâchchi ... who has attained the sovereignty of Cherbaya Mandalam, hung up the bell in the hall. ..."—Inscr. in Tumexely, see Ind. Antiqui, ii. 360.

1510.—"... we departed... and went to another city called Colôn. ... The King of this city is a Pagán, and extremely powerful, and he has 20,000 horsemen, and many archers. This country has a good port near to the sea-coast. No grain grows here, but fruits as at Calicut, and pepper in great quantities."—Varthema, 182-3.

1516.—"Further on along the same coast towards the south is a great city and good sea-port which is named Coulam, in which dwell many Moors and Gentiles and Christians. They are great merchants and very rich, and own many ships with which they trade to Cholmendel, the Island of Ceylon, Bengal, Malaca, Samatara, and Pegu. ... There is also in this city much pepper."—Barlowa, 157-8.

1572.—"A hum Cochim, e a outro Cananor A qual Chalé, a qual a ilha da Pimenta, A qual Coulão, a qual a Cranganor E os maís, a quem o mais serve, o con- tenta."—Camões, vii. 35.
QUIRPELE.

By Burton:

"To this Cochim, to that falls Cananor, one hath Chalé, another th' Isle Piment, a third Coulam, a fourth takes Orangnanor, the rest is theirs with whom he rests content."—Fryer, 222.

1726.—"... Ceylang."—Valentijn, Choro, 115.

1727.—"Colloan is another small principality. It has the Benefit of a River, which is the southernmost Outlet of the Couchin Islands; and the Dutch have a small Fort, within a Mile of it on the Sea-shore. ... It keeps a Garrison of 30 Men, and its trade is inconsiderable."—A. Hamilton, i. 333 [ed. 1744].

QUIRPELE, s. This Tamil name of the mongoose (q.v.) occurs in the quotation which follows: properly Kirippiullai, ['little squeaker'].

1601.—"... bestiola quaedam Quil sive Quirple vocata, quae aspectu primo veraneae. ..."—De Bry, iv. 93.

RADAREE, s. P.—H. rath-dari, from rath-dar, 'road-keeper.' A transit duty; sometimes 'black-mail.' [Rathdar is very commonly employed in the sense of sending prisoners, &c., by escort from one police post to another, as along the Grand Trunk road].

1620.—"Fra Nicolo Ruigiola Francescano genoves, il quale, passaggiaro, che d'India andava in Italia, partito alcuni giorni prima da Ispahan ... poco di qua lontano era stato trattenuto dal rathdari, o custodi delle strade. ..."—P. della Valle, ii. 98.

1622.—"At the garden Pelengon we found a rathdar or guardian of the road, who was also the chief over certain other rathdari, who are usually posted in another place 2 leagues further on."—Ibid. ii. 285.

1623.—"For Rathdars, the Khan has given them a firman to free them, also firmans for a house. ..."—Stainsbury, iii. p. 163.

1667.—"... that the goods ... may not be stopped ... on pretence of taking Rathdaries, or other duties."—Phirman of Shaw Orung Zeed, in Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 213.]

1673.—"This great officer, or Farmer of the Emperor's Custom (the Shawbunder [see SHABUNDEH]), is obliged on the Roads to provide for the safe travelling for Merchants by a constant Watch ... for which Rhadorage, or high Imposts, are allowed by the Merchants, both at Landing and in their passage inland."—Fryer, 222.

1865.—"Here we were forced to compound with the Rattaree men, for ye Dutys on our goods."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 213. In i. 100, Rawdarrie].

c. 1731.—"Nizamul Mulik ... thus got rid of ... the rathdari from which latter impost great annoyance had fallen on travellers and traders."—Khat Khan, in Elliot, vii. 531.

1744.—"Passing the river Kizilazan we ascended the mountains by the Ruhdar (a Persian toll of Noglabar. ..."—Hawney, i. 226.

RAGGY, s. Raggi (the word seems to be Dec. Hindustani, [and is derived from Skt. rāga, 'red,' on account of the colour of the grain). A kind of grain, Eleusine Coracana, Gaertn.; Cynarurus Coracanus, Linn.; largely cultivated, as a staple of food, in Southern India.

1792.—"The season for sowing raggy, rice, and bajerra from the end of June to the end of August."—Life of T. Menro, iii. 92.

1793.—"The Maharatta supplies consisting chiefly of Raggy, a coarse grain, which grows in more abundance than any other in the Mysore Country; it became necessary to serve it out to the troops, giving rice only to the sick."—Dixon, 10.

[1800.—"The Deccan Mussulmans call it Ragi. In the Tamil language it is called Kevar (kēṭkārapu)."—Buchanan, Mysore, i. 100.]

RAINS, THE, s. The common Anglo-Indian colloquial for the Indian rainy season. The same idiom, aschwees, had been already in use by the Portuguese. (See WINTER).

c. 1666.—"Lastly, I have imagined that if in Delhi, for example, the Rains come from the East, it may yet be that the Seas which are Southerly to it are the origin of them, but that they are forced by reason of some Mountains ... to turn aside and discharge themselves another way. ..."—Bernier, E.T., 138; [ed. Constable, 438].

1707.—"We are heartily sorry that the Rains have been so very unhealthy with you."—Letter in Orme's Fragments.

1750.—"The Rains ... setting in with great violence, overflowed the whole country."—Orme, Hist., ed. 1803, i. 153.

1888.—"The place is pretty, and although it is 'the Rains,' there is scarcely any day when we cannot get out."—Bp. Mitman, in Memoir, p. 67.

[RAIS, s. Ar. ra'is, from ra's, 'the head,' in Ar. meaning 'the captain, or master, not the owner of a ship;'}
India it generally means 'a native gentleman of respectable position.'

1785.—". . . his chief (more worthless in truth than a horsekeeper)." In note—"In the original the word syse is introduced for the sake of a jingle with the word Ryse (a chief or leader)."—Tippoo's Letters, 18.

1870.—"Reaes." See under RYOT.

1900.—"The petition was signed by representative landlords, raisees."—Pioneer Mail, April 13.

RAJA, RAJAH, s. Skt. rāj, 'king.' The word is still used in this sense, but titles have a tendency to degenerate, and this one is applied to many humbler dignitaries, petty chiefs, or large Zemindars. It is also now a title of nobility conferred by the British Government, as it was by their Mahommedan predecessors, on Hindus, as Nawib is upon Moslem. Rāj, Rāo, Rānā, Rāwal, Rāya (in S. India), are other forms which the word has taken in vernacular dialects or particular applications. The word spread with Hindu civilisation to the eastward, and survives in the titles of Indo-Chinese sovereigns, and in those of Malay and Javanese chiefs and princes.

It is curious that the term Rājā cannot be traced, so far as we know, in any of the Greek or Latin references to India, unless the very questionable instance of Pliny's Rαχνιασ be an exception. In early Mahommedan writers the now less usual, but still Indian, forms Rāo and Rāi, are those which we find. (Ibn Batuta, it will be seen, regards the words for king in India and in Spain as identical, in which he is fundamentally right.) Among the English vulgarisms of the 18th century again we sometimes find the word barbarised into Roger.

C. 1385.—". . . Bahū-uddin fled to one of the heathen Kings called the Rāi Kanblah. The word Rāi among those people, just as among the people of Rām, signifies 'King.'"—Ibn Batuta, iii. 318. The traveller here refers, as appears by another passage, to the Spanish Rey.

[1609.—"Raiaw." See under GOONT.]

1612.—"In all this part of the East there are 4 castes. . . . The first caste is that of the Rayas, and this is a most noble race from which spring all the Kings of Canara. . . ."—Couto, V. vi. 4.

[1615.—"According to your direction I have sent per Orincay (see ORANKAY) Beeghe Roger's junk six pecculles (see PEGUL) of lead."—Poster, Letters, iv. 107.

[1623.—"A Ragia, that is an Indian Prince."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 84.]

1683.—"I went a hunting with ye Raga, who was attended with 2 or 300 men, armed with bows and arrows, swords and targets."—Hedges, Diary, March 1; [Hak. Soc. i. 66].

1786.—Tippoo with gross impropriety addresses Louis XVI, as "the Rajah of the French."—Select Letters, 339.

RAJAMUNDEY, n.p. A town, formerly head-place of a district, on the lower Godavery R. The name is in Telegu Rājamahendravaramu, 'King-chief's-Town,' [and takes its name from Mahendradaeva of the Orissa dynasty; see Morris, Godavery Man. 29].

RAJPOOT, s. Hind. Rājpūt, from Skt. Rājaputra, 'King's Son.' The name of a great race in India, the hereditary profession of which is that of arms. The name was probably only a honorific assumption; but no race in India has furnished so large a number of princely families. According to Chand, the great medieval bard of the Rājpūts, there were 36 clans of the race, issued from four Kshatriyas (Parihar, Pratmur, Solanki, and Chauhan) who sprang into existence from the sacred Agni-kunda or Firepit on the summit of Mount Abu. Later bards give five eponyms from the firepit, and 99 clans. The Rājpūts thus claim to be true Kshatriyas, or representatives of the second of the four fundamental castes, the Warriors; but the Brahmins do not acknowledge the claim, and deny that the true Kshatriya is extant. Possibly the story of the fireborn ancestry hides a consciousness that the claim is fictitious. "The Rajpoots," says Forbes, "use animal food and spirituous liquors, both unclean in the last degree to their puritanic neighbours, and are scrupulous in the observance of only two rules,—those which prohibit the slaughter of cows, and the remarriage of widows. The clans are not forbidden to eat together, or to intermarry, and cannot be said in these respects to form separate castes" (Rās-mālā, reprint 1878, p. 537). An odd illustration of the fact that to partake of animal food, and especially of the heroic repast of the flesh of the wild boar killed in the chase (see Terry's representation of this below), is a Râjpût characteristic, occurs to the memory of one of the present writers. In Lord Canning's time the young Râjpût Râja of Alwar had betaken himself to degrading courses, insomuch that the Viceroy felt constrained, in open durbar at Agra, to admonish him. A veteran political officer, who was present, inquired of the agent at the Alwar Court what had been the nature of the conduct thus rebuked. The reply was that the young prince had become the habitual associate of low and profligate Mahomedans, who had so influenced his conduct that among other indications, he would not eat wild pig. The old Political, hearing this, shook his head very gravely, saying, 'Would not eat Wild Pig! Dear! Dear! Dear!' It seemed the \textit{ne plus ultra} of Râjpût degradation! The older travellers give the name in the quaint form Rashbhoot, but this is not confined to Europeans, as the quotation from Sidi 'Ali shows; though the aspect in which the old English travellers regarded the tribe, as mainly a pack of banditti, might have made us think the name to be shaped by a certain sense of aptness. The Portuguese again frequently call them \textit{Reys Butos}, a form in which the true etymology, at least partially, emerges.

1516.—"There are three qualities of these Gentiles, that is to say, some are called Rashbutes, and they, in the time that their King was a Gentile, were Knights, the defenders of the Kingdom, and governors of the Country."—Barbosa, 50.

1553.—"Insomuch that whilst the battle went on, Saladim placed all his women in a large house, with all that he possessed, whilst below the house were combustibles for use in the fighting; and Saladim ordered them to be set fire to, whilst he was in it. Thus the house suddenly blew up with great explosion and loud cries from the unhappy women; whensoever all the people from within and without rushed to the spot, but the Resbutos fought in such a way that they drove the Guzarat troops out of the gates, and others in their hasty flight cast themselves from the walls and perished."—Correa, iii. 527.

"And with the stipulation that the 200 pardoos, which are paid as allowance to the lascars of the two small forts which stand between the lands of Baquim and the \textit{Reys buutos}, shall be paid out of the revenues of Baquim as they have been paid hitherto."—Treaty of \textit{Nuno da Cunha} with the K. of Cambaya, in Subsidiots, 187.

c. 1554.—"But if the caravan is attacked, and the Bâts (see BHAT) kill themselves, the Rashbuts, according to the law of the Bâts, are adjudged to have committed a crime worthy of death."—\textit{Sidi 'Ali Kapudan}, in J. As., Ser. i., tom. ix. 95.

c. 1614.—"The next day they embarked, leaving in the city, what of those killed in fight and those killed by fire, more than 500 persons, the most of them being Regibutos, Moors of great value; and of ours fell eighteen. . . ."—Bocarro, Decada, 210.

[1614.—"... in great danger of thieves called Rashbouts. . . ."—Foster, Letters, ii. 260.]

1616.—"... it were fitter he were in the Company of his brother . . . and his safetie more regarded, then in the hands of a Rashboute Gentile . . ."—Sir T. Roe, i. 553–4; [Hak. Soc. ii. 292].

"The Rashboutes eate Swines-flesh most hateful to the Mahometans."—Terry, in Purchas, i. 1479.

1638.—"These Rashbutes are a sort of Highway men, or Tories."—Mandelstã, Eng. by Davies, 1669, p. 19.

1648.—"These Resbouts (Resbotten) are held for the best soldiers of Gusuratta."—\textit{Van Twist}, 39.

[c. 1660.—"The word \textit{Ragipous} signifies Sons of Rajaus."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 39.]

1673.—"Next in esteem were the Rashbouts, Rashpoots, or Soulsidders."—Fryer, 27.

1689.—"The place where they went ashore was at a Town of the Moors, which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the Great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolaters \textit{Gentios} or Rashbouts."—Dampier, i. 507.

1791.—"... Quatre cipayes ou resipoutes montés sur des chevaux persans, pour l'escorter."—B. de St. Pierre, \textit{Chaussé Indienne}.

\textbf{RAMASAMMY}, s. This corruption of \textit{Ritmaswami} ("Lord Râma"), a common Hindu proper name in the South, is there used colloquially in two ways:

(a). As a generic name for Hindus, like 'Tommy Atkins' for a British soldier. Especially applied to Indian coolies in Ceylon, &c.

(b). For a twisted roving of cotton in a tube (often of wrought silver) used to furnish light for a cigar (see FULEETA). Madras use:

\textit{a}.—

RAMBOTHANG, s. Malay, rambatan (Filet, No. 6750, p. 256). The name of a fruit (Nephelium lappaceum, L.), common in the Straits, having a thin luminous pulp, closely adhering to a hard stone, and covered externally with bristles like those of the external envelope of a chestnut. From rambat, 'hair.'

1613.—"And other native fruits, such as bachees (perhaps banchang, the Mangifera foetida) rambotans, rambas, brasulcos, and pomegranates, and innumerable others.

1613.—"Goodeino de Erotiu, 16.

1726.—"... the ramboten-tree (the fruit of which the Portuguese call fregoeta caffaros or Caffer's fruit)."—Valentijn (v.) Siumatra, 3.

1727.—"The Rambostan is a Fruit about the Bigness of a Walnut, with a tough Skin, beest with Capillaments; within the Skin is a very savoury Pulp."—A. Hamilton, ii. 51; [ed. 1744, ii. 80].

1783.—"Mangustines, rambustines, &c."

1812.—"... mangustan, rambudan, and dorian..."—Heyne, Tracts, 411.

RAMDAM, s. Hind. from Ar. ramazdun (ramadjdun). The ninth Mahommnedan lunar month, viz. the month of the Fast.

1615.—"... at this time, being the preparation to the Ramdam or Lent."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537; [Hak. Soc. i. 21; also 55, 72, ii. 274].

1623.—"The 29th June: I think that (to-day?) the Moors have commenced their ramaddan, according to the rule by which I calculate."—P. della Valle, ii. 807; [Hak. Soc. i. 179].

1886.—"They are not... very curious or strict in observing any Days or Times of particular Devotions, except it be Ramdam time as we call it... In this time they fast all Day..."—Dampier, i. 343.

Ramoosy, n.p. The name of a very distinct caste in W. India, Mahr. Ramosy, [said to be from Mahr. ramavasi, 'jungle-dweller']; originally one of the thieving castes. Hence they came to be employed as hereditary watchmen in villages, paid by cash or by rent-free lands, and by various petty dues. They were supposed to be responsible for thefts till the criminals were caught; and were often themselves concerned. They appear to be still commonly employed as hired chokidars by Anglo-Indian households in the west. They come chiefly from the country between Poona and Kolhapur. The surviving traces of a Ramoosy dialect contain Telegu words, and have been used in more recent days as a secret slang. [See an early account of the tribe in: "An Account of the Origin and Present condition of the tribe of Ramoosies, including the Life of the Chief Oomiah Naik, by Capt. Alexander Mackintosh of the Twenty-seventh Regiment, Madras Army," Bombay 1833.]

1817.—"His Highness must long have been aware of Ramoosies near the Mahadeo pagoda."—Elphinston's Letter to Peacock, in Papers relating to E.I. Affairs, 23.

1833.—"There are instances of the Ramoosy Naiks, who are of a bold and daring spirit, having a great ascendency over the village Patells (Patel) and Kol-kurnates (Coolcurnee), but which the latter do not like to acknowledge openly... and it sometimes happens that the village officers participate in the profits which the Ramoosies derive from committing such irregularities."—Macintosh, Ann. of the Tribe of Ramoosies, p. 19.

1883.—"Till a late hour in the morning he (the chameleon) sleeps sounder than a ramoosey or a chowkeydar; nothing will wake him."—Tribes on My Frontier.

RAM - RAM! The commonest salutation between two Hindus meeting on the road; an invocation of the divinity.
1726.—"The wives of Bramines (when about to burn) first give away their jewels and ornaments, or perhaps a pinang, (q.v.), which is under such circumstances a great present, to this or that one of their male or female friends who stand by, and after taking leave of them, go and lie over the corpse, calling out only Ram, Ram."—Linschoten, p. 51.

[1828.—See under SUTTEE.]

1885.—Sir G. Birdwood writes: "In 1880-70 I saw a green parrot in the Crystal Palace aviary very doleful, dull, and miserable to behold. I called it 'pretty poll,' and coaxed it in every way, but no notice of me would it take. Then I bethought me of its being a Mahatta poppet, and hailed it Ram Ram! and spoke in Mahatto to it; when at once it roused up out of its lethargy, and hopped and swung about, and answered me back, and cuddled up close to me against the bars, and laid its head against my knobknees. And every day thereafter, when I visited it, it was always in an eager flurry to salute me as I drew near to it."—Valentijn, v. 51.

RANEE, s. A Hindu queen; rānī, fem. of rājā, from Skt. rājāni (= regina).

1673.—"Bedmore (Bednūr) . . . is the Capital City, the Residence of the Ranna, the Relief of Sham Shunker Naig."—Fryer, 162.

1809.—"The young Rannie may marry whomsoever she pleases."—Lord Valentia, i. 384.

1879.—"There were once a Raja and a Râné who had an only daughter."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 1.

RANGOON, n.p. Burm. Ram-gun, said to mean 'War-end'; the chief town and port of Pegu. The great Pagoda in its immediate neighbourhood had long been famous under the name of Dagon (q.v.), but there was no town in modern times till Rangoon was founded by Alampra during his conquest of Pegu, in 1755. The name probably had some kind of intentional assonance to Da-gun, whilst it "proclaimed his forecast of the immediate destruction of his enemies." Occupied by the British forces in May 1824, and again, taken by storm, in 1852, Rangoon has since the latter date been the capital, first of the British province of Pegu, and latterly of British Burma. It is now a flourishing port with a population of 134,176 (1881); [in 1891, 180,324].

RANJOW, s. A Malay term, ranjau. Sharp-pointed stakes of bamboo of varying lengths stuck in the ground to penetrate the naked feet or body of an enemy. See Maraden, H. of Swatmara, 2nd ed., 276. [The same thing on the Assam frontier is called a pock (Levin, Wild Races, 308), or panyē (Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 233).]
RAVINE DEER. The sportsman’s name, at least in Upper India, for the Indian gazelle (Gazella Benuettii, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 526 seqq.]).

RAZZIA, s. This is Algerine-French, not Anglo-Indian, meaning a sudden raid or destructive attack. It is in fact the Ar. ghāzīya, ‘an attack upon infidels,’ from ghāzī, ‘a hero.’

REAPER, s. The small laths, laid across the rafters of a sloping roof to bear the tiles, are so called in Anglo-Indian house-building. We find no such word in any Hind. Dictionary; but in the Maharati Dict. we find ḥīp in this sense.

[1734-5.—See under BANKSHALL.]

REAS, REES, s. Small money of account, formerly in use at Bombay, the 25th part of an anna, and 400th of a rupee. Port. real, pl. réis. Accounts were kept at Bombay in rupees, quarters, and reas, down at least to November 1834, as we have seen in accounts of that date at the India Office.

1673.—(In Goa) “The Vinteen . . . 15 Barrooks (see BUDGROOK), whereof 75 make a Tango (see TANGA), and 60 Rees make a Tango.”—Fryer, 297.

1727.—“Their Accounts (Bombay) are kept by Rayes and Rupies. 1 Rupee is . . . 400 Rayes.”—A. Hamilton, ii. App. 6; [ed. 1744, ii. 315].

RED CLIFFS, n.p. The nautical name of the steep coast below Quilon. This presents the only bluffs on the shore from Mt. Dely to Cape Comorin, and is thus identified, by character and name, with the ἱππὸς of the Periplus.

C. 80-90.—“Another village, Bakarē, lies by the mouth of the river, to which the ships about to depart descend from Nel-kynda. . . . From Bakarē extends the Red-Hill (πιππὸς ὄρος) and then a long stretch of country called Paralia.”—Periplus, §§ 55-58.

1727.—“I wonder why the English built their Fort in that place (Anjengo), when they might as well have built it near the Red Cliffs to the Northward, from whence they have their Water for drinking.”—A. Hamilton, i. 332; [ed. 1744, i. 334].

1813.—“Water is scarce and very indifferent; but at the red cliffs, a few miles to the north of Anjengo, it is said to be very good, but difficult to be shipped.”—Milburn, Or. Comm. i. 335. See also Dunn’s New Directory, 6th ed. 1780, p. 161.

1814.—“From thence (Quilone) to Anjengo the coast is hilly and romantic; especially about the red cliffs at Boccoli (qu. Barakph as above?); where the women of Anjengo daily repair for water, from a very fine spring.”—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 334; [2nd ed. i. 213].

1844.—“There is said to be fresh water at the Red Cliffs to the northward of Anjengo, but it cannot be got conveniently; a considerable surf generally prevailing on the coast, particularly to the southward, renders it unsafe for ships’ boats to land.”—Horsburgh’s Direc. ed. 1841, i. 515.

RED-DOG, s. An old name for Prickly-heat (q.v.).

C. 1752.—“The red-dog is a disease which affects almost all foreigners in hot countries, especially if they reside near the shore, at the time when it is hottest.”—Osbeck’s Voyage, i. 190.

REGULATION, s. A law passed by the Governor-General in Council, or by a Governor (of Madras or Bombay) in Council. This term became obsolete in 1833, when legislative authority was conferred by the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. cap. 85) on those authorities; and thenceforward the term used is Act. By 13 Geo. III. cap. 63, § xxxv., it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the G.-G. and Council of Fort William in Bengal to issue Rules or Decrees and Regulations for the good order and civil government of the Company’s settlements, &c. This was the same Charter Act that established the Supreme Court. But the authorised compilation of “Regulations of the Gort. of Fort William in force at the end of 1853,” begins only with the Regulations of 1793, and makes no allusion to the earlier Regulations. No more does Regulation XLI. of 1793, which prescribes the form, numbering, and codifying of the Regulations to be issued. The fact seems to be that prior to 1793, when the enactment of Regulations was systematized, and the Regulations began to be regularly numbered, those that were issued partook rather of the character of resolutions of Government and circular orders than of Laws.

1868.—"The new Commissioner ... could discover nothing prejudicial to me, except, perhaps, that the Regulations were not sufficiently observed. The sacred Regulations! How was it possible to fit them on such very irregular subjects as I had to deal with?"—Ll.-Col. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 376.

1880.—"The laws promulgated under this system were called Regulations, owing to a lawyer's doubts as to the competence of the Indian authorities to infringe on the legislative powers of the English Parliament, or to modify the 'laws and customs' by which it had been decreed that the various nationalities of India were to be governed."—Saty. Review, March 13, p. 395.

REGULATION PROVINCES. See this explained under NON-REGULATION.

REGUR, s. Dakh. Hind. regar, also legar. The peculiar black loamy soil, commonly called by English people in India 'black cotton soil.' The word may possibly be connected with H.—P. reg, 'sand'; but regada and regati is given by Wilson as Telugu. [Platts connects it with Skt. rekha, 'a furrow.'] This soil is not found in Bengal, with some restricted exception in the Rajmahal Hills. It is found everywhere on the plains of the Deccan trap-country, except near the coast. Tracts of it are scattered through the valley of the Krishna, and it occupies the flats of Coimbatore, Madura, Salem, Tanjore, Rammad, and Tinnevelly. It occurs north of the Nerbudda in Sauger, and occasionally on the plain of the eastern side of the Peninsula, and composes the great flat of Surat and Broach in Guzerat. It is also found in Pegu. The origin of regar has been much debated. We can only give the conclusion as stated in the Manual of the Geology of India, from which some preceding particulars are drawn: "Regur has been shown on fairly trustworthy evidence to result from the impregnation of certain argillaceous formations with organic matter, but ... the process which has taken place is imperfectly understood, and ... some peculiarities in distribution yet require explanation."—Op. cit. i. 434.

REH, s. [Hind. reh, Skt. rej, 'to shine, shake, quiver.'] A saline efflorescence which comes to the surface in extensive tracts of Upper India, rendering the soil sterile. The salts (chiefly sulphate of soda mixed with more or less of common salt and carbonate of soda) are superficial in the soil, for in the worst reh tracts sweet water is obtainable at depths below 60 or 80 feet. [Plains infested with these salts are very commonly known in N. India as Oosur Plains (Hind. ōsar, Skt. ṛhāra, 'impregnated with salt.')] The phenomenon seems due to the climate of Upper India, where the ground is rendered hard and impervious to water by the scorching sun, the parching winds, and the treeless character of the country, so that there is little or no water-circulation in the subsoil. The salts in question, which appear to be such of the substances resulting from the decomposition of rock, or of the detritus derived from rock, and from the formation of the soil, as are not assimilated by plants, accumulate under such circumstances, not being diluted and removed by the natural purifying process of percolation of the rain-water. This accumulation of salts is brought to the surface by capillary action after the rains, and evaporated, leaving the salts as an efflorescence on the surface. From time to time the process culminates on considerable tracts of land, which are thus rendered barren. The canal-irrigation of the Upper Provinces has led to some aggravation of the evil. The level of the canal-waters being generally high, they raise the level of the reh-polluted water in the soil, and produce in the lower tracts a great increase of the efflorescence. A partial remedy for this lies in the provision of drainage for the subsoil water, but this has only to a small extent been yet carried out. [See a full account in Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. i. 400 seqq.]

REINOL, s. A term formerly in use among the Portuguese at Goa, and applied apparently to 'Johnny New-comes' or Griffins (q.v.). It is from reino, 'the Kingdom' (viz. of Portugal). The word was also sometimes used to distinguish the European Portuguese from the country-born.

1598.—"... they take great pleasure and laugh at him, calling him Reynol, which is a name given in jest to such as newly come from Portugal, and know not how to behave themselves in such grave manner, and with such ceremonies as the Portingales use there in India."—Linschoten, ch. xxxi. [Hak. Soc. i. 208].

c. 1610.—"... quand ces soldats Portugais arrivent de nouveau aux Indes portans encore leurs habits du pays, ceux qui sont là de long tês quand ils voyent par les rues les apppellent Renol, chargez de poux, et mille autres inures et mocqueries."—Mocquet, 304.

[1727.—"The Reynolds or European fidalgos."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 251.]

At a later date the word seems to have been applied to Portuguese deserters who took service with the E.I. Co. Thus:

c. 1760.—"With respect to the military, the common men are chiefly such as the Company sends out in their ships, or deserters from the several nations settled in India, Dutch, French, or Portuguese, which last are commonly known by the name of Reynols."—Grose, i. 38.

RESHIRE, n.p. Rishirh. A place on the north coast of the Persian Gulf, some 5 or 6 miles east of the modern port of Bushire (q.v.). The present village is insignificant, but it is on the site of a very ancient city, which continued to be a port of some consequence down to the end of the 16th century. I do not doubt that this is the place intended by Reyzel in the quotation from A. Nunes under Dubber. The spelling Raxet in Barros below is no doubt a clerical error for Razel.

c. 1340.—"Rishirh... This city built by Lohrasp, was rebuilt by Shapur son of Ardeshir Babegân; it is of medium size, on the shore of the sea. The climate is very hot and unhealthy... The inhabitants generally devote themselves to sea-trade, but poor and feeble that they are, they live chiefly in dependence on the merchants of other countries. Dates and the cloths called Rishiziri are the chief productions."—Hamburgher Mann, quoted in Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse.

1514.—"And thereupon Pero Delboquerque sailed away... and entered through the straits of the Persian sea, and explored all the harbours, islands, and villages which are contained in it... and when he was as far advanced as Bârem, the winds being now westerly—he tackled about, and stood along in the tack for a day's voyage, and reached Razel, where he found Mirbuzaca, Captain of the Xeque Ismail, (Shiah Ismail Shâh, of Persia), who had captured 20 tarradas from a Captain of the King of Ormuz."—Alboquerque, Hak. Soc. iv. 114-115.

"On the Persian side (of the Gulf) is the Province of Razel, which contains many villages and fortresses along the sea, engaged in a flourishing trade."—Ibid. 186-7.

1534.—"... At this time insurrection was made by the King of Razel, (which is a city on the coast of Persia); who was a vassal of the King of Oermuz, and the latter King sought help from the Captain of the Castle, Antonio da Silveira. And he sent down Jorge de Crasto with a galliot and two foists and 100 men, all well equipt, and good musketeers; and bade him tell the King of Razel that he must give up the fleet which he kept at sea for the purpose of plundering, and must return to his allegiance to the K. of Ormuz."—Correa, iii. 557.

1553.—"... And Francisco de Gouveia arrived at the port of the city of Raxet, and having anchored, was forthwith visited by a Moor on the King's part, with refreshments and compliments, and a message that... he would make peace with us, and submit to the King of Ormuz."—Barros, IV. iv. 26.

1554.—"Reyzel." See under DUBBER, as above.

1856.—"48 hours sufficed to put the troops in motion northwards, the ships of war, led by the Admiral, advancing along the coast to their support. This was on the morning of the 9th, and by noon the enemy was observed to be in force in the village of Reshire. Here amidst the ruins of old houses, garden-walls, and steep ravines, they occupied a formidable position; but notwithstanding their firmness, wall after wall was surmounted, and finally they were driven from their last defence (the old fort of Reshrie) bordering on the cliffs at the margin of the sea."—Despatch in Lowe's H. of the Indian Navy, ii. 346.
RESPENTIA, s. An old trade technicality, thus explained: "Money which is borrowed, not upon the vessel as in bottomry, but upon the goods and merchandise contained in it, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage, in which case the borrower personally is bound to answer the contract." (Wharton's Law Lexicon, 6th ed., 1876; and see N.E.D. under Bottomry.) What is now a part of the Calcutta Course, along the bank of the Hoogly, was known down to the first quarter of the last century, as Respondentia Walk. We have heard this name explained by the supposition that it was a usual scene of proposals and contingent jawans (q.v.); but the name was no doubt, in reality, given because this walk by the river served as a sort of Change, where bargains in Respondentia and the like were made.

[1685.—"... Provided he gives his Bill to repay it in Syan... with 20 p. Ct. Respondentia on the Ship..."—Pringle, Diary of St. Geo., 1st ser. iv. 123.]

1720.—"I am concerned with Mr. Thomas Theobalds in a Respondentia Bond in the 'George' Brigantine."—Testament of Ch. Invers, Merchant. In Wheeler, ii. 340.

1727.—"There was one Captain Perrin Master of a Ship, who took up about 500 L. on Respondentia from Mr. Ralph Sheldon... payable at his Return to Bengal."—A. Hamilton, ii. 14; [ed. 1744, ii. 12].

..."... which they are enabled to do by the Money taken up here on Respondentia bonds..."—In Wheeler, ii. 427.

1776.—"I have desired my Calcutta Attorney to insure some Money lent on Respondentia on Ships in India... I have also subscribed £500 towards a China Voyage."—M.S. Letter of James Renwall, Feb. 20.

1794.—"I assure you, Sir, Europe articles, especially good wine, are not to be had for love, money, or Respondentia."—The Indian Observer, by Hugh Boyd, &c., p. 206.

—Davidson, Diary of Travels, ii. 206.]

RESSAIDAR, s. P.—H. Rasāidār. A native subaltern of irregular cavalry, under the Ressadair (q.v.). It is not clear what sense ṛāṣālī has in the formation of this title (which appears to be of modern devising). The meaning of that word is 'quickness of apprehension'; fitness, perfection.

RESSALA, s. Hind. from Ar. risāla. A troop in one of our regiments of native (so-called) Irregular Cavalry. The word was in India applied more loosely to a native corps of horse, apart from English regimental technicalities. The Arabic word properly means the charge or commission of a ṛāṣālī, i.e. of a civil officer employed to make arrests (Dozy), [and in the passage from the Āin, quoted under RESSAIDAR, the original text has Risalah]. The transition of meaning, as with many other words of Arabic origin, is very obscure.

1758.—"Presently after Shokum Sing and Harroon Cawn (formerly of Roy Duliub's Rissalla) came in and discovered to him the whole affair."—Letter of W. Hastings, in Ogle, i. 70.

[1781.—"The enemy's troops before the place are five Rosollars of infantry ... ."—Sir Eyre Coote, letter of July 6, in Progs. of Council, September 7, Forrest, Letters, vol. iii.]

RESSALDAR, Ar.—P.—H. Rissaldar (Rissala). Originally in Upper India the commander of a corps of Hindustani horse, though the second quotation shows it, in the south, applied to officers of infantry. Now applied to the native officer who commands a ressala in one of our regiments of "Irregular Horse." This title is applied honorifically to overseers of post-horses or stables. (See Panjab Notes & Queries, ii. 84.)

[c. 1590.—"Besides, there are several composers who write a good hand and a lucid style. They receive the yaddshik (memorandum) when completed, keep it with themselves, and make a proper abridgment of it. After signing it, they return this instead of the yaddshik, when the abridgment is signed and sealed by the Waz'Ah-nawis, and the Rissalidar (in orig. risalak). . . ."—Atm, i. 259.]

1773.—"The Nawab now gave orders to the Rissalidars of the regular and irregular infantry, to encircle the fort, and then commence the attack with their artillery and musketry."—H. of Hyder Naik, 327.

1803.—"The rissaldars finding so much money in their hands, began to quarrel about the division of it, while Perron crossed in the evening with the bodyguard."—Ml. Mem. of James Skinner, i. 274.

c. 1831.—"Le lieutenant de ma troupe a bonne chance d'être fait Capitaine (resseldar)."—Jacquemont, Correspond. ii. 8.

REST-HOUSE, s. Much the same as Dawk Bungalow (q.v.). Used in Ceylon only. [But the word is in common use in Northern India for the chokies along roads and canals.]

[1894.—"'Rest-Houses' or 'staging bungalows' are erected at intervals of twelve or fifteen miles along the roads."—G. W. MacGeorge, Ways and Works in India, p. 78.]

RESUM, s. Lascar's Hind. for ration (Roebuck).

RHINOCEROS, s. We introduce this word for the sake of the quotations, showing that even in the 16th century this animal was familiar not only in the Western Himalaya, but in the forests near Peshawar. It is probable that the nearest rhinoceros to be found at the present time would be not less than 800 miles, as the crow flies, from Peshawar. See also GANDA, [and for references to the animal in Greek accounts of India, McCrindle, Ancient India, its Invasion by Alexander, 186].

C. 1387.—"In the month of Zi-l Ka'da of the same year he (Prince Muhammad Khan) went to the mountains of Sirmor (W. of the Jumna), and spent two months hunting the rhinoceros and the elk."—Tahir-i-Mubarak-Shah, in Elliot, iv. 16.

1388.—(On the frontier of Kashmir). "Como il y avoit dans ces Pays un lieu qui par sa vaste étendue, et la grande quantité de gibiers, sembloit inviter les passans à chasser ... Timur s'en donna le divertissement ... ils présent une infinité de gibiers, et l'on tua plusieurs rhinoceros à coups de sabre et de lances, quoiquet cet animal ... a la peau si ferme, qu'on ne peut la percer que par des efforts extraordinaires."—Pebas de la Croix, H. de Timur-Bec, iii. 159.

1519.—"After sending on the army towards the river (Indus), I myself set off for Suvati, which they likewise call Karak-Khanen (kark-khana, 'therhinoceros-haunt'), to hunt the rhinoceros. We started many rhinoceros, but as the country abounds in brushwood, we could not get at them. A she rhinoceros, that had whelps, came out, and fled along the plain; many arrows were shot at her, but ... she gained cover. We set fire to the brushwood, but the rhinoceros was not to be found. We got sight of another, that, having been scorched in a fire, was lame and unable to run. We killed it, and every one cut off a bit as a trophy of the chase."—Baber, 253.

1554.—"Nous vinmes à la ville de Pourschever (Peshawur), et ayant heureusement passe le Kontel (Kotul), nous gagnâmes la ville de Djouschayeh. Sur le Kontel nousaperçûmes des rhinoceros, dont la grosseur approchait celle d'un elephante ... ."—Sididi Ali, in J. As., 1st ser. tom. ix. 201-202.

RHOTASS, n.p. This (Rohtās) is the name of two famous fortresses in India, viz. a. a very ancient rock-fort in the Shāhābād district of Behar, occupying part of a tabular hill which rises on the north bank of the Sūn river to a height of 1490 feet. It was an important stronghold of Sher Shāh, the successful rival of the Mogul Humāyūn: b. the ancient Rohtās. The ruins are very picturesque.

c. 1560.—"Sher Shāh was occupied night and day with the business of his kingdom, and never allowed himself to be idle... He kept money (bhāzāna) and revenue (fīrdōy) in all parts of his territories, so that, if necessity required, soldiers and money were ready. The chief treasury was in Rohtās under the care of Iktīyār Khān."—Wakīrat-i-Mushākā, in Elliot, iv. 551.

c. 1590.—"Rohtās is a stronghold on the summit of a lofty mountain, difficult of access. It has a circumference of 14 kos and the land is cultivated. It contains many springs, and whenever the soil is excavated to the depth of 3 or 4 yards, water is visible. In the rainy season many lakes are formed, and more than 200 waterfalls gladden the eye and ear."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 152 seq.

1665.—"... You must leave the great road to Patna, and bend to the South through Esberbourgh (!) [Akkarpur] and the famous Fortress of Rhodes."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 53; [ed. Bull, i. 121].

1764.—"From Shaw Mull, Kelladar of Rotus to Major Munro."—In Long, 359.

c. 1540.—"Sher Shāh... marched with all his forces and retinue through all the hills of Padmān and Garjkhā, in order that he might choose a fitting site, and build a fort there to keep down the Ghakkaras... Having selected Rohtās, he built there the fort which now exists."—Tārikh-i-Sher Shāh, in Elliot, iv. 390.

1809.—"Before we reached the Hydaspes we had a view of the famous fortress of Rotas; but it was at a great distance... Rotas we understood to be an extensive but strong fort on a low hill."—Elphinstone, Canbul, ed. 1839, i. 108.

RICE, s. The well-known cereal, Oryza sativa, L. There is a strong temptation to derive the Greek ὀργά, which is the source of our word through It. riso, Fr. riz, etc., from the Tamil arisi, 'rice deprived of husk,' ascribed to a root ar, 'to separate,' It is quite possible that Southern India was the original seat of rice cultivation. Roxburgh (Flora Indica, ii. 200) says that a wild rice, known as Neuvarea [Skt. nīvāra, Tel. nīvār] by the Telinga people, grows abundantly about the lakes in the Northern Circars, and he considers this to be the original plant.

It is possible that the Arabic al-ruzz (arruz) from which the Spaniards directly take their word arroz, may have been taken also directly from the Dravidian term. But it is hardly possible that ὀργά can have had that origin. The knowledge of rice apparently came to Greece from the expedition of Alexander, and the mention of ὀργά by Theophrastus, which appears to be the oldest, probably dates almost from the lifetime of Alexander (d. B.C. 323). Aristobulus, whose accurate account is quoted by Strabo (see below), was a companion of Alexander's expedition, but seems to have written later than Theophrastus. The term was probably acquired on the Oxus, or in the Punjab. And though no Skt. word for rice is nearer ὀργά than ὑήλι, the very common exchange of aspirant and sibilant might easily give a form like ὑήλι or ὑήλι, in the dialects west of India. Though no such exact form seems to have been produced from old Persian, we have further indications of it in the Pushtu, which Raverty writes, sing., 'a grain of rice' w'irīzn, pl. 'rice' w'irīzey, the former close to oryza. The same writer gives in Barakai (one of the uncultivated languages of the Kabul country, spoken by a 'Tajik' tribe settled in Logar, south of Kabul, and also at Kanigoram in the Waziri country) the word for rice as w'iriza, a very close approximation again to oryza. The same word is indeed given by Leech, in an earlier vocabulary, largely coincident with the former, as rīza. The modern Persian word for husked rice is birij, and the Armenian briz. A nasal form, deviating further from the hypothetical brīz or brīz, but still probably the same in origin, is found among other languages of the Hindū Kūsh tribes, e.g. Burishki (Khajuna of Leitner) broj; Shina (of Gilgit), brīz; Khowar of the Chitral Valley (Arniyah of Leitner), grīn (Biddulph, Tribes of Hindoo Koosh, App., pp. xxxiv, lix., cxxix.).

B.C. c. 320-300.—"Μιλλην δε σπελανοι το καλομενον δρυζουν, εξ ου το ἑfuscated το το δμαον τη ξεια, και πεπιπαθειν ονον χυνδρος, εντεπτον δε την δην πεφυκος of Madagascar (Urania speciosa), cooked to pass as a bird's quill. Mr. Sibree, in his excellent book on Madagascar (The Great African Island, 1880), noticed this, but pointed out that the object was more probably the immensely long midrib of the rooa palm (Seoos Raphia). Sir John Kirk, when in England in 1882, expressed entire confidence in this identification, and on his return to Zanzibar in 1883 sent four of these midribs to England. These must have been originally from 35 to 40 feet in length. The leaflets were all stript, but when entire the object must have strongly resembled a Broddingnagian feather. These roc's quills were shown at the Forestry Exhibition in Edinburgh, 1884. Sir John Kirk wrote:

"I send to-day per S.S. Arcot... four fronds of the Raphia palm, called here Moale. They are just as sold and shipped up and down the coast. No doubt they were sent in Marco Polo's time in exactly the same state — i.e., stripped of their leaflets and with the tip broken off. They are used for making stages and ladders, and last long if kept dry. They are also made into doors, by being cut into lengths, and pinned through."

Some other object has recently been shown at Zanzibar as part of the wings of a great bird. Sir John Kirk writes that this (which he does not describe particularly) was in the possession of the R. C. priests at Bagamoyo, to whom it had been given by natives of the interior, and they declared that they had brought it from Tanganyika, and that it was part of the wing of a gigantic bird. On another occasion they repeated this statement, alleging that this bird was known in the Udoo (?) country, near the coast. The priests were able to communicate directly with their informants, and certainly believed the story. Dr. Hildebrand also, a competent German naturalist, believed in it. But Sir John Kirk himself says that 'what the priests had to show was most undoubtedly the whalebone of a comparatively small whale' (see letter of the present writer in Athenaeum, March 22nd, 1884).

Müller and (very positively) Fabricius discard Bovrójóv for Boorójóv, which "no fellow understands." A. Hamilton (l. 136) mentions "Wheat, Pulce, and Butter" as exports from Mangaroul on this coast. He does not mention Boormor!
ROGUE'S RIVER. n.p. The name given by Europeans in the 17th and 18th centuries to one of the Sunder- band channels joining the Lower Hoogly R. from the eastward. It was so called from being frequented by the Arakan Rovers, sometimes Portuguese vagabonds, sometimes native Muggs, whose vessels lay in this creek watching their opportunity to plunder craft going up and down the Hoogly.

Mr. R. Barlow, who has partially annotated Hedges' Diary for the Hakluyt Society, identifies Rogue's River with Channel Creek, which is the channel between Saugor Island and the Delta. Mr. Barlow was, I believe, a member of the Bengal Pilot service, and this, therefore, must have been the application of the name in recent tradition. But I cannot reconcile this with the sailing directions in the English Pilot (1711), or the indications in Hamilton, quoted below.

The English Pilot has a sketch chart of the river, which shows, just opposite Buffalo Point, "R. Theesves," then, as we descend, the R. Rangafula, and, close below that, "Rogues" (without the word River), and still further below, Channel Creek or R. Jessore. Rangafula R. and Channel Creek we still have in the charts.
After a careful comparison of all the notices, and of the old and modern charts, I come to the conclusion that the R. of Rogues must have been either what is now called Chinari Khāl, entering immediately below Diamond Harbour, or Kulpī Creek, about 6 m. further down, but the preponderance of argument is in favour of Chinari Khāl. The position of this quite corresponds with the R. Theeves of the old English chart; it corresponds in distance from Saugar (the Gunga Saugar of those days, which forms the extreme S. of what is styled Saugar Island now) with that stated by Hamilton, and also in being close to the “first safe anchoring place in the River,” viz. Diamond Harbour. The Rogue’s River was apparently a little ‘above the head of the Grand Middle Ground’, or great shoals of the Hoogly, whose upper termination is now some 7½ m. below Chinari Khāl. One of the extracts from the English Pilot speaks of the “R. of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegom.” Now there is a town on the Chinari Khāl, a few miles from its entrance into the Hoogly, which is called in Rennell’s Map Oltogunge, and in the Atlas of India Sheet Huttoogum. Further, in the tracing of an old Dutch chart of the 17th century, in the India Office, I find in a position corresponding with Chinari Khāl, D’Roovers Spruit, which I take to be ‘Robber’s (or Rogue’s) River.’

1683.—“And so we parted for this night, before which time it was resolved by ye Councell that if I should not privail to go this way to Decca, I should attempt to do it with ye Sloopes by way of the River of Rogues, which goes through to the great River of Decca.”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 36.

1711. —“Directions to go up along the Western Shore. . . The nearer the Shore the better the Ground until past the River of Tygers.” You may begin to edge over towards the River of Rogues about the head of the Grand Middle Ground; and when the Buffalow Point bears from you ½ N. ½ of a Mile, steer directly over for the East Shore E.N.E.” —The English Pilot, Pt. iii. p. 54.

“Mr. Herring, the Pilot’s Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hooghly. . . From the lower point of the Narrows on the Starboard side . . . the Eastern Shore is to be kept close aboard; until past the said Creek, afterwards allowing only a small Birth for the Point off the River of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegom . . . From the River Rogues, the Starboard (qu. larboard !) shore with a great ship ought to be kept close aboard all along down to Channel Trees, for in the offing lies the Grand Middle Ground.”—Ibid. p. 57.

1727.—“The first safe anchoring Place in the River, is off the Mouth of a River about 12 Leagues above Saugar; commonly known by the Name of Rogues River, which had that Appellation from some Banditti Portuguese, who were ‘followers of Shah Sijah . . . for those Portuguese . . . after their Master’s Flight to the Kingdom of Aracan, betook themselves to Piracy among the Islands at the Mouth of the Ganges, and this River having communication with all the Channels from Xatipun (see CHITTAGONG) to the Westward, from this River they used to sally out.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 3 [ed. 1744].

1759.—“. . . On the receipt of your Honors’ orders per Dunnington, we sent for Capt. Pinson, the Master Attendant, and directed him to issue out fresh orders to the Pilots not to bring up any of your Honors’ Ships higher than Rogues River.”—Letter to Court, in Long, p. 82.

ROHILLA. n.p. A name by which Afghans, or more particularly Afghans settled in Hindustan, are sometimes known, and which gave a title to the province Rohilkand, and now, through that, to a Division of the N.W. Provinces embracing a large part of the old province. The word appears to be Pushtu, rõhelah or rõhélā, adj., formed from rõhu, ‘mountain,’ thus signifying ‘mountaineer of Afghanistan.’ But a large part of E. Afghani-stān specifically bore the name of Roh. Keene (Fall of the Mogul Monarchy, 41) puts the rise of the Rohillas of India in 1744, when ‘Ali Mahommed revolted, and made the territory since called Rohilkhand independent. A very comprehensive application is given to the term Roh in the quotation from Firishta. A friend (Major J. M. Trotter) notes here: “The word Rohilla is little, if at all, used now in Pushtu, but I remember a line of an ode in that language, ‘Sādēk Rohilai yam pa Hindudār gād,’ meaning, ‘I am a simple mountaineer, compelled to live in Hindustan;’ i.e. ‘an honest man among knaves.’”

* This is also points to the locality of Diamond Harbour, and the Chinari Khāl.

* This is shown by a 17th century Dutch chart in L.O. to be a creek on the west side, very little below Diamond Point. It is also shown in Tassin’s Maps of the E. Hoogly, 1835; not later.
c. 1542.—"The King . . . issued farmanās to the chiefs of the various Afghan Tribes. On receipt of the farmanās, the Afghans of Roh came as is their wont, like ants and locusts, to enter the King's service. . . . The King (Bahol Lodi) commanded his nobles, saying, 'Every Afghan who comes to Hind from the country of Roh to enter my service, bring him to me. I will give him a jāgir more than proportional to his deserts.'"—Tārīkh-i-Shir-Shāhī, in Elliot, iv. 307.

c. 1542.—"Actuated by the pride of power, he took no account of clanship, which is much considered among the Afghans, and especially among the Rohilla men."—Ibid. 428.

c. 1612.—"Roh is the name of a particular mountain [-country], which extends in length from Swád and Bajaur to the town of Swi belonging to Bákhar. In breadth it stretches from Hasan Abdúl to Káhni. Kandahár is situated in this territory."—Firishta's Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 568.

1763.—"After all the Rohillas are but the best of a race of men, in whose blood it would be difficult to find one or two single individuals endowed with good nature and with sentiments of equity; in a word they are Afghans."—Seir Mutagharin, iii. 240.

1786.—"That the said Warren Hastings . . . did in September, 1773, enter into a private engagement with the said Nabob of Oude . . . to furnish them, for a stipulated sum of money to be paid to the E. I. Company, with a body of troops for the declared purpose of 'thoroughly extirpating the nation of the Rohillas'; a nation from whom the Company had never received, or pretended to receive, or apprehend, any injury whatever."—Art. of Charge against Hastings, in Burke, vi. 568.

ROLONG, s. Used in S. India, and formerly in W. Indies, for fine flour; semolina; or what is called in Bengal soochee (q.v.). The word is a corruption of Port. rolão or rolão. But this is explained by Bluteau as farina secunda. It is, he says (in Portuguese), that substance which is extracted between the best flour and the bran.

1813.—"Some of the greatest delicacies in India are now made from the rolong flour, which is called the heart or kidney of the wheat."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47; [2nd ed. i. 32].

ROOKA, ROCCA, ROOKA, s.
a. Ar. ruk'ā. A letter, a written document; a note of hand.

[1875.—"The old native coins seem to have consisted of Varaghans, rookas and Doodoos. The Varaghan is what is now generally called a pagoda. . . . The rookas have now entirely disappeared, and have probably been melted into rupees. They varied in value from 1 to 2 Rupees. Though the coins have disappeared, the name still survives, and the ordinary name for silver money generally is rookalo."—Gribble, Man. of Oudhapol, 296 seq.]

ROOK, s. In chess the rook comes to us from Span. roque, and that from Ar. and Pers. rukh, which is properly the name of the famous gryphon, the rok of Marco Polo and the Arabian Nights. According to Marcel Devic it meant 'warrior.' It is however generally believed that this form was a mistake in transferring the Indian rath (see RUT) or 'chariot,' the name of the piece in India.

ROOM, n.p. 'Turkey' (Rām); ROOME, n.p. (Rāmā); 'an Ottoman Turk.' Properly 'a Roman.' In older Oriental books it is used for an European, and was probably the word which Marco Polo renders as 'a Latin'—represented in later times by firinghée (e.g. see quotation from Ibn Batuta under RAJA). But Rām, for the Roman Empire, continued to be applied to what had been part of the Roman Empire after it had fallen into the hands of the Turks, first to the Seljukian Kingdom in Anatolia, and afterwards to the Ottoman Empire seated at Constantinople. García de Orta and Jarric deny the name of Rümî, as used in India, to the Turks of Asia, but they are apparently wrong in their expressions. What they seem to mean is that Turks of the Ottoman Empire were called Rümî; whereas those others in Asia of Turkish race (whom we sometimes call Toorks), as of Persia and Turkestan, were excluded from the name.

c. 1508.—"Ad haec, trans euripum, seu fretum, quod insulam fecit, in orientali continenis plaga «oppidum condidit, receptaetulm advenis milibus, maximo Turecis; ut ab Diensiis freto divisi, rixandi cum tisi ... causas procul habentem. 1510.—"When we had sailed about 12 days we arrived at a city which is called Dvoudavulierum, that is 'Diù, the port of the Turks.' This city is subject to the Sultan of Coimba ... 400 Turkish merchants reside here constantly."—Var-themis, 91-92.

Bandar-i-Rümî is, as the traveller explains, the 'Port of the Turks.' Gogola, a suburb of Diù on the mainland, was known to the Portuguese some years later, as Villa dos Rumes (see GOGOLLA, and quotation from Maffei above). The quotation below from Damian a Goes alludes apparently to Gogola.

ROOMAUL, s. Hind. from Pers. rámul (lit. 'face-rubber') a towel, a handkerchief. ['In modern native use it may be carried in the hand by a high-born parda lady attached to her buitea or tiny silk handbag; and ornamented with all sorts of gold and silver trinkets; then it is a handkerchief in the true sense of the word. It may be carried by men, hanging on the left shoulder, and used to wipe the hands or face; then, too, it is a handkerchief. It may be as big as a towel, and thrown over both shoulders by men, the ends either hanging loose or tied in a knot in front; it then serves the purpose of a gulaband or muffler. In the case of children it is tied round the neck as a neckkerchief, or round the waist for mere show. It may be used by women much as the 16th century tucker was used in England in Addison's time' (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 79; for its use to mark a kind of shawl, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 123.) In ordinary Anglo-Indian Hind. it is the word for a 'pocket handkerchief.' In modern trade it is applied to thin silk piece-goods with handkerchief-patterns. We are not certain of its meaning in the old trade of piece-goods, e.g.:

ROSALGAT, CAPE, n.p. The most easterly point of the coast of Arabia; a corruption (originally Portuguese) of the Arabic name Râs-al-hâd, as explained by P. della Valle, with his usual acuteness and precision, below.

1553. — "From Curia Muria to Cape Rosalgate, which is in 22°, an extent of coast of 120 leagues, all the land is barren and desert. At this Cape commences the Kingdom of Ormus." — Barros, I. ix. 1.

ROSE-APPLE. See JAMBOO.

ROSELL, s. The Indian Hibiscus or Hib. sabdariffa, L. The fleshy calyx makes an excellent sub-acid jelly, and is used also for tarts; also called 'Red Sorrel.' The French call it 'Guinea Sorrel,' Oseille de Guinée, and Roselle is probably a corruption of Oseille. [See PUTWA.]

ROSE-MALLOWS, s. A semi-fluid resin, the product of the Liquidi-sambarg altinigia, which grows in Tenasserim; also known as Liquid Storax, and used for various medicinal purposes. (See Hanbury and Flückiger, Pharmacog. 271, Watt, Econ. Dict. V. 78 sqq.) The Burmese name of the tree is nan-ta-yoke (Mason, Burmah, 778). The word is a corruption of the Malay-Javanese rasamulla, Skt. rasa-mālā, 'Perfume garland,' the gum being used as incense (Encycl. Britann. 9th ed. t. 718).

1589.—"Rosamallia."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 150.

ROTTLE, RATTLE, s. Arab. ratl or rīl, the Arabian pound, becoming in S. Ital. rotolo; in Port. arratel; in Span. arrelde; supposed to be originally a transposition of the Greek ἀρραβάζα, which went all over the Semitic East. It is in Syriac as lītrā; and is also found as litron (pl.) in a Phenician inscription of Sardania, dating c. B.C. 180 (see Corpus Inscrip. Semitt. i. 188-189).

1809.—"At Judda the weights are: 15 Vakeens = 1 Rattle. 2 Rattles = 1 maund."—Mitburn, i. 88.

ROUND, s. This is used as a Hind. word, round, or corruptly rauq gasht, a transfer of the English, in the sense of patrolling, or 'going the rounds.' [And we find in the Madras Records the grade of 'Rounder,' or 'Gentlemen of the Round,' officers whose duty it was to visit the sentries.]

[1683.—"... it is order'd that 18 Souldiers, 1 Corporall & 1 Rounder go upon the Sloop Conimer for Hugly...."—Pringle, Diary Pl. St. Geo. 1st ser. ii. 33.]

ROUNDDEL, s. An obsolete word for an umbrella, formerly in use in Anglo-India. [In 1676 the use of the Roundell was prohibited, except in the case of "the Council and Chaplainne" (Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxii.).] In old English the name roundel is applied to a variety of circular objects, as a mat under a dish, a target, &c. And probably this is the origin of the present application, in spite of the circumstance that the word is sometimes found in the form arundel. In this form the word also seems to have been employed for the conical hand-guard on a lance, as we learn from Bluteau's great Port. Dictionary: "Arundela, or Arandella, is a guard for the right hand, in the form of a funnel. It is fixed to the thick part of the lance or mace borne by men at arms. The Licentiate Covarrubias, who piques himself on finding etymologies for every kind of word, derives Arandella from Arundel, a city (so he says) of the Kingdom of England." Cobarruvias (1611) gives the above explanation; adding that it also was applied to a kind of smooth collar worn by women, from its resemblance to the other thing. Unless historical proof of this last etymology can be traced, we should suppose that Arundel is, even in this sense, probably a corruption of roundel. [The N.E.D. gives arrondell, arundell as forms of hirondelle, 'a swallow.']

A young fellow of humour, upon this last order coming over, altered the form of his Umbrella from a round to a square, called it a Squared instead of a Roundel, and insisted that no order yet in force forbade him the use of it."—Ives, 21.

1785.—"He (Clive) enforced the Sumptuary laws by severe penalties, and gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to have a rundel-boy, whose business is to walk by his master, and defend him with his rundel or umbrella from the heat of the sun."—Carraccioli, i. 283. This ignoble writer has evidently copied from Ives, and applied the passage (untruly, no doubt) to Clive.

ROWANNAH, s. Hind. from Pers. rawanah, from rawd, 'going.' A pass or permit.

[1764.—"... that the English shall carry on their trade ... free from all duties ... excepting the article of salt, ... on which a duty is to be levied on the Rowana or Roughly market-price. ..."—Letter from Court, in Verold, View of Bengal, App. 127.]

ROWNEE, s. Hind. rauns, rovis, rauns. A Himālayan tree which supplies excellent straight and strong alpenstocks and walking-sticks, Cotonaster bacillaris, Wall., also C. acuminate (N.O. Rosaceae). [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 581.]

1838.—"We descended into the Khud, and I was amusing myself jumping from rock to rock, and thus passing up the centre of the brawling mountain stream, aided by my long palhari pole of rough wood."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 241; also i. 112.

ROWNEE, s.

a. A fausse-brayre, i.e. a subsidiary enceinte surrounding a fortified place on the outside of the proper wall and on the edge of the ditch; Hind. raunī. The word is not in Shakespeare, Wilson, Platts or Fallon. But it occurs often in the narratives of Anglo-Indian siege operations. The origin of the word is obscure. [Mr. Irvine suggests Hind. rāndhāna, 'to enclose as with a hedge,' and says: "Fallon evidently knew nothing of the word raunī, for in his E. H. Dict. he translates fausse-brayre by dhūs, mātī kā pūshṭah; which also shows that he had no definite idea of what a fausse-brayre was, dhūs meaning simply an earthen or mud fort." Dr. Grierson suggests Hind. ramanī, 'a park,' of which the fem., i.e. diminutive, would be ramanī or rāonī; or possibly the word may come from Hind. rev, Skt. reṇu, 'sand,' meaning "an entrenchment of sand."] 1799.—"On the 20th I ordered a mine to be carried under (the glacis) because the guns could not bear on the rownee."—Jas. Skinner's Ml. Memoirs, i. 172. J. B. Fraser, the editor of Skinner, parenthetically interprets rownee here as "counterscarp;" but that is nonsense, as well as incorrect.

[1803.—Writing of Hathras, "Renny wall, with a deep, broad, dry ditch behind it surrounds the fort."—W. Thorn, Mem. of the War in India, p. 400.]

1805.—In a work by Major L. F. Smith (Sketch of the Rise, etc., of the Regular Corps in the Service of the Native Princes of India) we find a plan of the attack of Aligarh, in which is marked "Lower Fort or Renny, well supplied with grape," and again, "Lower Fort, Renny or Faussebrayre."
[1819.—"... they saw the necessity of covering the foot of the wall from an enemy's fire, and formed a defence, similar to our fause-braye, which they call Rainee."—Fitzclarencce, Journal of a Route to England, p. 245; also see 110.]

b. This word also occurs as representative of the Burmese yo-vet-nyi, or (in Arakan pron.) ro-vet-nyi, "red-leaf", the technical name of the standard silver of the Burmese ingot currency, commonly rendered Flowered-silver.

1796.—"Rouni or fine silver, Ummerrapoora currency."—Notification in Seton-Karr, ii. 179.

1800.—"The quantity of alloy varies in the silver current in different parts of the empire; at Rangoon it is adulterated 25 per cent.; at Ummerrapoora, pure, or what is called flowered silver, is most common; in the latter all duties are paid. The modifications are as follows:

"Rouni, or pure silver.
Rownaka, 5 per cent. of alloy."

Synaes, 327.

ROWTEE, s. A kind of small tent with pyramidal roof, and no projection of fly, or eaves. Hind. rāoṭi.

[1813.—"... the military men, and others attached to the camp, generally possess a dwelling of somewhat more comfortable description, regularly made of two or three folds of cloth in thickness, closed at one end, and having a flap to keep out the wind and rain at the opposite one: these are dignified with the name of rootees, and come nearer (than the pawl) to our ideas of a tent."—Broughton, Letters, ed. Constable, p. 20.

[1875.—"For the servants I had a good rauti of thick lined cloth."—Wilson, Abode of Snor, 90.]

ROY, s. A common mode of writing the title rāi (see RAJA); which sometimes occurs also as a family name, as in that of the famous Hindu Theist Rammohun Roy.

ROZA, s. Ar. rauḍa, Hind. rauṣa. Properly a garden; among the Arabs especially the rauḍa of the great mosque at Medina. In India it is applied to such mausolea as the Taj (generally called by the natives the Tāj-rauṣa); and the mausoleum built by Aurungzeb near Aurungzibad.

1813.—"... the roza, a name for the mausoleum, but implying something saintly or sanctified."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 41; [2nd ed. ii. 413].

ROZYE, s. Hind. raḍāi and rajāi; a coverlet quilted with cotton. The etymology is very obscure. It is spelt in Hind. with the Ar. letter zwād; and F. Johnson gives a Persian word so spelt as meaning 'a cover for the head in winter.' The kindred meaning of mirzād is apt to suggest a connection between the two, but this may be accidental, or the latter word fictitious. We can see no likelihood in Shakespeare's suggestion that it is a corruption of an alleged Skt. rājīka, 'cloth.' [Platts gives the same explanation, adding "probably through Pers. raḍā'ī, from raḍādan, to dye."]

The most probable suggestion perhaps is that raḍāi was a word taken from the name of some person called Ražā, who may have invented some variety of the article; as in the case of Spencer, Wellingtons, &c. A somewhat obscure quotation from the Pers. Dict. called Bahār-i-Ajam, extracted by Vüllers (s.v.), seems to corroborate the suggestion of a personal origin of the word.

1784.—"I have this morning... received a letter from the Prince addressed to you, with a present of a resay and a shawl handkerchief."—Warren Hastings to his Wife, in Busteed, Echoes of Old Cutchta, 135.

1884.—"I arrived in a small open pavilion at the top of the building, in which there was a small Brahminy cow, clothed in a waddled resai, and lying upon a carpet."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 135.

1857.—(Imports into Kandahar, from Mashad and Khorasan) "Razazes from Yezd... ."—Punjab Trade Report, App. p. lxviii.

1867.—"I had brought with me a soft quilted resai to sleep on, and with a rug wrapped round me, and sword and pistol under my head, I lay and thought long and deeply upon my line of action on the morrow."—Lieut.-Col. Levis, A Fly on the Wheel, 301.

RUBBEE, s. Ar. rubi, 'the spring.' In India applied to the crops, or harvest of the crops, which are sown after the rains and reaped in the following spring or early summer. Such crops are wheat, barley, gram, linseed, tobacco, onions, carrots and turnips, &c. (See KHUREEF.)

[1765.—"... we have granted them the Dewanee (see DEWAUNY) of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, from the beginning of the Fussul Rubby of the Bengal year 1172... ."—Firmans of Shah Aulukum, in Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 167.]
RUBLE, s. Russ. The silver unit of Russian currency, when a coin (not paper) equivalent to 3s. 4½d.; [in 1901 about 2s. 1½d.]. It was originally a silver ingot; see first quotation and note below.

1559.—"Vix centum annos vt tantur moneta argentae, pradeserit apud illos cusa. Initiio cum argentum in provinciam inferbasur, fundebantur portiunculae oblomgae argenteae, sine imagine et scriptura, asestimatione vnus rubii, quamar nulla nunc appareat."—Herberstein, in Rerum Moscovit. Actores, Francof. 1600, p. 42.

1591.—"This penaltie or mullet is 20 dinges (see TANGA) or pence upon every rubble or mark, and so ten in the hundred. . . . Hee (the Emperor) hath besides for every name conteyned in the wrists that passe out of their courts, five alteen, an alteen 5 pence stering or thereabouts."—Treatise of the Russian Commonwealth, by Dr. Giles Fletcher, Hak. Soc. 51.

c. 1654-6.—"Dog dollars they (the Russians) are not acquainted with, these being attended with loss . . . their own dordas they call Roubles."—Macarius, E.T. by Balfour, i. 280.

RUFFUGUR, s. P.—H. rafifgar, Pers. rafagor, 'darning.' The modern rafifgar in Indian cities is a workman who repairs rents and holes in Kashmir shawls and other woollen fabrics. Such workmen were regularly employed in the cloth factories of the E.I. Co., to examine the manufactured cloths and remove petty defects in the weaving.

1750.—"On inspecting the Dacca goods, we found the Seerbetties (see PIECE-GOODS) very much frayed and very badly raff-gur'd or joined."—Bengal Letter to E.I. Co., Feb. 25, India Office MSS.

* These ingots were called saum. Ibn Batuta says: "At one day's journey from Ukak are the hills of the Rus, who are Christians; they have red hair and blue eyes, they are ugly in feature and crafty in character. They have silver mines, and they bring from their country saum, i.e. ingots of silver, with which they buy and sell in that country. The weight of each ingot is five ounces."—ib. 414. Pegolotti (c. 1340), speaking of the landroute to Cathay, says that on arriving at Casal (i.e. Kinsay of Marco Polo or Hang-chan-fu) "you can dispose of the sommi of silver that you have with you . . . and you may reckon the sommo to be worth 5 golden florins" (see in Cathay, &c., i. 288-9, 290). It would appear from Worsaf, quoted by Hammer (Geschichte der Goldenen Horde, 224), that gold ingots also were called sum or saum. The ruble is still called saum in Turkestan.

RUM, s. This is not an Indian word. The etymology is given by Wedgwood as from a slang word of the 16th century, 'rome for 'good'; 'rome-brière, 'good drink'; and so, rum. The English word has always with us a note of vulgarity, but we may note here that Gorresio in his Italian version of the Ramayana, whilst describing the Palace of Râvana, is bold enough to speak of its being pervaded by "an odoriferous breeze, perfumed with sandalwood, and bdellium, with rum and with sirop." (iii. 292). "Mr. N. Darnell Davis has put forth a derivation of the word rum, which gives the only probable history of it. It came from Barbados, where the planters first distilled it, somewhere between 1640 and 1645. A MS. 'Description of Barbados,' in Trinity College, Dublin, written about 1651, says: 'The chief fuddling they make in the Island is Rumballion, alias Kill-Divil, and this is made of sugar-canes distilled, a hot, hellish, and terrible liquor.' G. Warren's Description of Surinam, 1661, shows the word in its present short term; 'Rum is a spirit extracted from the juice of sugar-canes . . . called Kill-Divil in New England!' 'Rumballion' is a Devonshire word, meaning 'a great tumult,' and may have been adopted from some of the Devonshire settlers in Barbados; at any rate, little doubt can exist that it has given rise to our word rum, and the longer name rumbowling, which sailors give to their grog."—Academy, Sept. 5, 1885.

RUM-JOHNNY, s. Two distinct meanings are ascribed to this vulgar word, both, we believe, obsolete.

a. It was applied, according to Williamson, (V.M., i. 167) to a low class of native servants who plied on the wharves of Calcutta in order to obtain employment from new-comers. That author explains it as a corruption of Ramazdni, which he alleges to be one of the commonest of Mahomedan names. [The Merry-jhony Guilty, of Calcutta (Curey, Good Old Days, :
139) perhaps in the same way derived its name from one Mir Jân.] 1810.—"Generally speaking, the present bawains, who attach themselves to the captains of European ships, may without the least hazard of controversy, be considered as nothing more or less than Rum-johnnies of a larger growth."—Williamson, V.M., i. 191.

b. Among soldiers and sailors, 'a prostitute'; from Hind. râmjanî, Skt. rdâmâ-jaňã, 'a pleasing woman,' 'a dancing-girl.'

[1799—"... and the Râmjenîs (Hindu dancing women) have been all day dancing and singing before the idol."—Colebrooke, in Life, 153.] 1814.—"I lived near four years within a few miles of the solemn groves where those voluptuous devotees pass their lives with the râmjanâies or dancing-girls attached to the temples, in a sort of luxurious superstition and sanctified indifference unknown in colder climates."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 127].

[1816—"But we must except that class of females called ravjannees, or dancing-girls, who are attached to the temples."—Ariatic Journal, ii. 375, quoting Wathen, Tour to Madras and China.]

RUMNA, s. Hind. runâ, Skt. ruâna, 'causing pleasure,' a chase, or reserved hunting-ground.

1760.—"Abdal Châb Cawn murdered at the Runma in the month of March, 1760, by some of the Hercahahs..."—Van Sattur, i. 83.

1792.—"The Peshawa having invited me to a novel spectacle at his runna (read ruâna), or park, about four miles from Poonah..."—Sir C. Mullo, in Forbes, Or. Mem. [2nd ed. ii. 82]. (See also verses quoted under PAWNEE.)

RUNN (OF CUTC]H, n.p. Hind. ruñ. This name, applied to the singular extent of sand-flat and salt-waste, often covered by high tides, or by land-floods, which extends between the Peninsula of Cutch and the mainland, is a corruption of the Skt. irîña or irîna, 'a salt-wamp, a desert,' [of aranya, 'a wilderness']. The Runn is first mentioned in the Periplus, in which a true indication is given of this tract and its dangers.

c. A.D. 80-90.—"But after passing the Sinthus R. there is another gulph running to the north, not easily seen, which is called Irinon, and is distinguished into the Great and the Little. And there is an expanse of shallow water on both sides, and swift continal eddies extending far from the land."—Periplus, § 40.

c. 1370.—"The guides had maliciously misled them into a place called the Kûnchiran. In this place all the land is impregnated with salt, to a degree impossible to describe."—Shams-i-Sirâj-A'if, in Elliot, iii. 324.

1583.—"Muzaffar died, and crossed the Ran, which is an inlet of the sea, and took the road to Jessalmir. In some places the breadth of the water of the Ran is 10 kes and 20 kes. He went into the country which they call Kach, on the other side of the water."—Tabakât-i-Akbarî, Ibid. v. 440.

c. 1590.—"Between Chalwanah, Sircar Ahmedabad, Putten, and Surat, is a low tract of country, 90 coss in length, and in breadth from 7 to 30 coss, which is called Run. Before the commencement of the periodical rains, the sea swells and inundates this spot, and leaves by degrees after the rainy season."—Ayyen, ed. Gladwin, 1890, ii. 71; [ed. Jarret, ii. 249].

1849.—"On the morning of the 24th I embarked and landed about 6 p.m. in the Runn of Sindh."

"... a boggie syrtis, neither sea Nor good dry land..."

Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 14.

RUPEE, s. Hind. rûpîya, from Skt. rûpiya, 'wrought silver.' The standard coin of the Anglo-Indian monetary system, as it was of the Mahommedan Empire that preceded ours. It is commonly stated (as by Wilson, in his article on this word, which contains much valuable and condensed information) that the rupee was introduced by Sher Shaâ (in 1542). And this is, no doubt, formally true; but it is certain that a coin substantially identical with the rupee, i.e. approximating to a standard of 100 ratis (or 175 grains troy) of silver, an ancient Hindu standard, had been struck by the Mahommedan sovereigns of Delhi in the 13th and 14th centuries, and had formed an important part of their currency. In fact, the capital coins of Delhi, from the time of Iylatimish (a.d. 1211-1236) to the accession of Mahommed Tughlak (1325) were gold and silver pieces, respectively of the weight just mentioned. We gather from the statements of Ibn Batutta and his contemporaries that the gold coin, which the former generally calls tanga and sometimes gold dinâr, was worth 10 of the silver coin, which he calls dinâr, thus indicating that the relation of gold to silver value was, or had recently been, as 10:1. Mahommed Tughlak remodelled the currency, issuing gold pieces of 200 grs. and silver pieces of 140 grs.—an indication probably of a great "depreciation of gold" (to use our modern language) consequent on the enormous amount of gold bullion obtained from the plunder of Western and Southern India. Some years later (1230) Mahommed developed his notable scheme of a forced currency, consisting entirely of copper tokens. This threw everything into confusion, and it was not till six years later that any sustained issues of ordinary coin were recommenced. From about this time the old standard of 175 grs. was readopted for gold, and was maintained till the time of Sher Shâh. But it does not appear that the old standard was then resumed for silver. In the reign of Mahommed's successor Feruz Shâh, Mr. E. Thomas's examples show the gold coin of 175 grs. standard running parallel with continued issues of a silver (or professedly silver) coin of 140 grs.; and this, speaking briefly, continued to be the case to the end of the Lodi dynasty (i.e. 1526). The coinage seems to have sunk into a state of great irregularity, not remedied by Baber (who struck ashrafts (see ASHRAFEE) and dirhams, such as were used in Turkestan) or Humâyûn, but the reform of which was undertaken by Sher Shâh, as above mentioned.

His silver coin of 175-178 grs. was that which popularly obtained the name of râpiya, which has continued to our day. The weight, indeed, of the coins so styled, never very accurate in native times, varied in different States, and the purity varied still more. The former never went very far on either side of 170 grs., but the quantity of pure silver contained in it sunk in some cases as low as 140 grs., and even, in exceptional cases, to 100 grs. Variation however was not confined to native States. Rupees were struck in Bombay at a very early date of the British occupation. Of these there are four specimens in the Br. Mus. The first bears obv. 'THE RUPEE OF BOMBAY. 1677. BY AUTHORITY OF CHARLES THE SECOND; rev. KING OF GREAT BRITAIN. FRANCE. AND. IRELAND.' Wt. 167.8 gr. The fourth bears obv. 'HON. SOC. ANG. IND. ORI.' with a shield; rev. 'A. DEO. PAX. ET. INCREMENTUM:—MON. BOMBAY. ANGILIC. REGIM.' A° 76.' Weight 177.8 gr. Different Rupees minted by the British Government were current in the three Presidencies, and in the Bengal Presidency several were current; viz. the Sikka (see SICCA) Rupee, which latterly weighed 192 grs., and contained 176 grs. of pure silver; the Farrukhabad, which latterly weighed 180 grs.,* containing 165-215 of pure silver; the Benares Rupee (up to 1819), which weighed 174-76 grs., and contained 168-885 of pure silver. Besides these there was the Chulâni or 'current' rupee of account, in which the Company's accounts were kept, of which 116 were equal to 100 sikkas. [*The 'bharti or Company's Arcot rupee was coined at Calcutta, and was in value 3½ per cent. less than the Sikka rupee. (Beveridge, Bokerganj, 99.)] The Bombay Rupee was adopted from that of Surat, and from 1800 its weight was 178-32 grs.; its pure silver 164.94. The Rupee at Madras (where however the standard currency was of an entirely different character, see PAGODA) was originally that of the Nawâb of the Carnatic (or 'Nabob of Arcot') and was usually known as the Arcot Rupee. We find its issues varying from 171 to 177 grs. in weight, and from 160 to 170 of pure silver; whilst in 1811 there took place an abnormal coinage, from Spanish dollars, of rupees with a weight of 188 grs. and 169-20 of pure silver.

Also from some reason or other, perhaps from commerce between those places and the 'Coast,' the Chittagong and Dacca currency (i.e. in the extreme east of Bengal) "formerly consisted of Arcot rupees; and they were for some time coined expressly for those districts at the Calcutta and

* The term Sonaut rupees, which was of frequent occurrence down to the reformation and modification of the Indian coinage in 1833, is one very difficult to elucidate. The word is properly sanwât, pl. of Ar. sanat (t), a year. According to the old practice in Bengal, coins deteriorated in value, in comparison with the rupees of account, when they passed the third year of their currency, and these rupees were termed Sanwât or Sonaut. But in 1773, to put a stop to this inconvenience, Government determined that all rupees coined in future should bear the impression of the 19th san or year of Shâh 'Alam (the Mogul then reigning). And in all later uses of the term Sonaut it appears to be equivalent in value to the Farrukhabad rupee, or the modern "Company's Rupees" (which was of the same standard).
Dacca Mints." (1) (Prinsep, Useful Tables, ed. by E. Thomas, 24.)

These examples will give some idea of the confusion that prevailed (without any reference to the vast variety besides of native coinages), but the subject is far too complex to be dealt with minutely in the space we can afford to it in such a work as this. The first step to reform and assimilation took place under Regulation VII. of 1833, but this still maintained the exceptional Sicca in Bengal, though assimilating the rupees over the rest of India. The Sicca was abolished as a coin by Act XIII. of 1836; and the universal rupee of British territory has since been the "Company's Rupee," as it was long called, of 180 grs. weight and 165 pure silver, representing therefore in fact the Farrukhabad Rupee.

1610.—"This army consisted of 100,000 horse at the least, with infinite number of Camels and Elephants: so that with the whole baggage there could not be less than five or six hundred thousand persons, incomuch that the waters were not sufficient for them; a Mussocke (see Mussuck) of water being sold for a Rupia, and yet not enough to be had."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 427.

[1615.—"Roupies Jangers (Jakângir) of 100 pious, which goeth five for four ordinary roupies of 80 pious called Casumus (see Kuzzanna), and we value them at 2s. 6d. per piece: Coccus (see Sicca) of Amadavrs which goeth for 80 pious; Challenes of Agra, which goeth for 55 pious;—Foster, Letters, iii. 87.]

Roe, in Purchas, i. 548; [Hak. Soc. i. 239, with some differences of reading]."

"They call the pieces of money roopen, of which there are some of divers values, the meanest worth two shillings and thrreepence, and the best two shillings and ninenpence sterling."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471."

[This money, consisting of the two-shilling pieces of this country called Rooopen]—Foster, Letters, iv. 229.]

1648.—"Reducing the Ropie to four and twenty Holland Stuyvers."—Van Twist, 26.

1653.—"Roupie est une monoye des Indes de la valeur de 30s." (i.e. sous).—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 355.

c. 1666.—"And for a Rouppy (in Bengal) which is about half a Crown, you may have 20 good Pullets and more; sees and Ducks, in proportion."—Berner, Ex. T. p. 140; [ed. Compend., 438].

1673.—"The other was a Goldsmith, who had coined copper Rupees."—Fryer, 97.

1677.—"We do, by these Presents ... give and grant unto the said Governor and Company ... full and free Liberty, Power, and Authority ... to stamp and coin ... Monies, to be called and known by the Name or Names of Rupes, Pices, and Budgrooms, or by such other Name or Names ..."—Letters Patent of Charles II. In Charters of the E.I. Co., p. 111.

1771.—"We fear the worst however; that is, that the Government are about to interfere with the Company in the management of Affairs in India. Whenever that happens it will be high Time for us to decamp. I know the Temper of the King's Officers pretty well, and however they may decay our manner of acting they are ready enough to grasp at the Rupees whenever they fall within their Reach."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, March 31.

RUSSUD, s. Pers. rasad. The provisions of grain, forage, and other necessaries got ready by the local officers at the camping ground of a military force or official cortège. The vernacular word has some other technical meanings (see Wilson), but this is its meaning in an Anglo-Indian mouth.

[c. 1640-50.—Rasad. (See under TANA.)]

RUT, s. Hind. rath, 'a chariot.' Now applied to a native carriage drawn by a pony, or oxen, and used by women on a journey. Also applied to the car in which idols are carried forth on festival days. [See EBOOK.]

[1810-17.—"Tippoo's Aumil ... wanted iron, and determined to supply himself from the rut, (a temple of carved wood fixed on wheels, drawn in procession on public occasions, and requiring many thousand persons to effect its movement)."—Wilks, Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 281.]

[1813.—"In this camp hackeries and ruths, as they are called when they have four wheels, are always drawn by bullocks, and are used, almost exclusively, by the Baes, the Nacht girls, and the bankers."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 117.]

1829.—"This being the case I took the liberty of taking the rut and horse to camp as prize property."—Mem. of John Ship, ii. 183.

RUTTEE, RETTEE, s. Hind. rati, rati, Skt. raktika, from rakta, 'red.' The seed of a leguminous creeper (Astrus precatorius, L.) sometimes called country liquorice—a pretty scarlet pea with a black spot—used from time immemorial in India as a goldsmith's weight, and known in England as 'Crab's eyes.' Mr. Thomas has shown that the ancient ratti may be taken as equal to 1-75 grs. Troy (Numismata Orientalia, New ed., Pt. I. pp. 12-14). This work of Mr. Thomas's contains interesting information regarding the old Indian custom of basing standard weights upon the weight of seeds, and we borrow from his paper the following extract from Manu (viii. 132): "The very small mote which may be discerned in a sunbeam passing through a lattice is the first of quantities, and men call it a trasarenu. 133. Eight of these trasarenu are supposed equal in weight to one minute poppy-seed (likhya), three of those seeds are equal to one black mustard-seed (raja-sarshapa), and three of these last to a white mustard-seed (gaurasarshapa). 134. Six white mustard-seeds are equal to a middle-sized barley-corn (yava), three such barley-corns to one krishnula (or raktika), five krishnulas of gold are one masha, and sixteen such masha one swarna."—(ibid. p. 13).

In the Ain, Abul Fazl calls the ratti surkh, which is a translation (Pers. for 'red'). In Persia the seed is called chashm-i-krurús, 'Cock's eye' (see Blockmann's E.T., i. 16 n., and Jarrett, ii. 354). Further notices of the rahi used as a weight for precious stones will be found in Sir W. Elliot's Coins of Madras (p. 49). Sir Walter's experience is that the rahi of the gem-dealers is a double rahi, and an approximation to the manjádi (see MANGELIN). This accounts for Tavernier's valuation at 3½ grs. [Mr. Ball gives the weight at 2-66 Troy grs. (Tavernier, ii. 448).]

c. 1676.—"At the mine of Soumelpou in Bengala, they weigh by Rati's, and the Rati is seven eighths of a Carat, or three grains and a half."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 140; [ed. Ball, ii. 89].

RYOT, s. Ar. rāyiya, from rād, 'to pasture,' meaning originally, according to its etymology, 'a herd at pasture'; but then 'subjects' (collectively). It is by natives used for 'a subject' in India, but its specific Anglo-Indian application is to 'a tenant of the soil'; an individual occupying land as a farmer or cultivator. In Turkey the word, in the form raiya, is applied to the Christian subjects of the Porte, who are not liable to the conscription, but pay a poll-tax in lieu, the Khurāj, or Jezya (see JEZYA).

[1609.—"Riats or clowens." (See under DOAL.)]

1778. — "For some period after the creation of the world there was neither Magistrate nor Punishment ... and the Ryots were nourished with piety and morality."—Halked, Gentoo Code, 41.

1789.—"To him in a body the Ryots complain'd That their houses were burnt, and their cattle distrain'd."—The Letters of Simpkin the Second, &c. 11.

1790.—"A raiyot is rather a farmer than a husbandman."—Colebrooke, in Life, 42.

1808.—"The ryots were all at work in their fields."—Lord Valentia, ii. 127.

1813.—"And oft around the cavern fire On visionary schemes debate, To snatch the Rayahs from their fate."—Byron, Bride of Abydos.

1829.—"An acquaintance with the customs of the inhabitants, but particularly of the rayets, the various tenures ... the agreements usual among them regarding cultivation, and between them and soucars (see SOWCAR) respecting loans and advances ... is essential to a judge."—Sir T. Munro, in Life, ii. 17.

1870.—"Ryot is a word which is much ... misused. It is Arabic, but no doubt comes through the Persian. It means 'protected one,' 'subject,' 'a commoner,' as distinguished from 'Raees' or 'noble.' In a native mouth, to the present day, it is used in this sense, and not in that of tenant."—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 160.

The title of a newspaper, in English but of native editing, published for some years back in Calcutta, corresponds to what is here said; it is Raees and Raiyat.

1877.—"The great financial distinction between the followers of Islam ... and the rayahs or infidel subjects of the Sultan, was the payment of haracht or capitation tax."—Finlay, H. of Greece, v. 22 (ed. 1877).

1884.—"Using the rights of conquest after the fashion of the Normans in England, the Turks had everywhere, except in the Cyclades, ... seized on the greater part of the most fertile lands. Hence they formed the landlord class of Greece; whilst the Rayahs, as the Turks style their non-Muslim subjects, usually farmed the territories of their masters on the metayer system."—Murray's Handbook for Greece (by A. F. Yule), p. 54.
SABAIO, ÇABAIO, &c., n.p. The name generally given by the Portuguese writers to the Mahommedan prince who was in possession of Goa when they arrived in India, and who had lived much there. He was in fact that one of the captains of the Bâhmanâi kingdom of the Deccan who, in the division that took place on the decay of the dynasty towards the end of the 15th century, became the founder of the 'Adil Şâhi family which reigned in Bijapur from 1489 to the end of the following century (see IDALCAN). His real name was Abdul Muzaffar Yusuf, with the surname Sabâi or Savâi. There does not seem any ground for rejecting the intelligent statement of De Barros (II. v. 2) that he had this name from being a native of Savî in Persia [see Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 404]. Garcia de Orta does not seem to have been aware of this history, and he derives the name from Sâhib (see below), apparently a mere guess, though not an unnatural one. Mr. Birch's surmise (Alboquerque, ii. 82), with these two old and obvious sources of suggestion before him, that "the word may possibly be connected with sipâhî, Arabic, a soldier," is quite inadmissible (nor is sipâhî Arabic). [On this word Mr. Whiteway writes: 'In his explanation of this word Sir H. Yule has been misled by Barros. Couto (Dec. iv. Bk. 10 ch. 4) is conclusive, where he says: 'This Çuco extended the limits of his rule as far as he could till he went in person to conquer the island of Goa, which was a valuable possession for its income, and was in possession of a lord of Canara, called Savay, a vassal of the King of Canara, who then had his headquarters at what we call Old Goa. . . . As there was much jungle here, Savay, the lord of Goa, had certain houses where he stayed for hunting. . . . These houses still preserve the memory of the Hindu Savay, as they are called the Savayo's house, where for many years the Governors of India lived. As our João de Barros could not get true information of these things, he confounded the name of the Hindu Savay with that of Çuco (? Yusuf) Adîl Şâh, saying in the 5th Book of his 2nd Decade that when we went to India a Moor called Soay was lord of Goa, that we ordinarily called him Sabayo, and that he was a vassal of the King of the Deccan, a Persian, and native of the city of Savã. At this his sons laughed heartily when we read it to them, saying that their father was anything but a Turk, and his name anything but Çuco.' This passage makes it clear that the origin of the word is the Hindu title Sivâ, Hind. Savêt, 'having the excess of a fourth,' 'a quarter better than other people,' which is one of the titles of the Maharâjâ of Jaypur. To show that it was more or less well known, I may point to the little State of Sundã, which lay close to Goa on the S.E., of which the Raja was of the Vijayanagar family. This little State became independent after the destruction of Vijayanagar, and remained in existence till absorbed by Tippoo Sultan. In this State Sivêt was a common honorific of the ruling family. At the same time Barros was not alone in calling Adîl Şâh the Sabaio (see Alboquerque, Cartas, p. 24), where the name occurs. The mistake having been made, everyone accepted it."

RYOTWARRY, adj. A technicality of modern coigne. Hind. from Pers. râ'îyatwar, formed from the preceding. The ryotwarry system is that under which the settlement for land revenue is made directly by the Government agency with each individual cultivator holding land, not with the village community, nor with any middleman or landlord, payment being also received directly from every such individual. It is the system which chiefly prevails in the Madras Presidency; and was elaborated there in its present form mainly by Sir T. Munro.

1824.—"It has been objected to the ryotwâri system that it produces unequal assessment and destroys ancient rights and privileges; but these opinions seem to originate in some misapprehension of its nature."—Minutes, &c., of Sir T. Munro, i. 265. We may observe that the spelling here is not Munro's. The Editor, Sir A. Arbuthnot, has followed a system (see Preface, p. x.); and we see in Gleig's Life (iii. 355) that Munro wrote 'Rayetwar.'
There is a story, related as unquestionable by Firishta, that the Sabaio was in reality a son of the Turkish Sultan Aga Murad (or 'Anurath') II., who was saved from murder at his father's death, and placed in the hands of 'Imad-ud-din, a Persian merchant of Siūrā, by whom he was brought up. In his youth he sought his fortune in India, and being sold as a slave, and going through a succession of adventures, reached his high position in the Deccan (Briggs, Firishta, iii. 7-8).

1510.—"But when Afonso Dalboquerque took Goa, it would be about 40 years more or less since the Cabaiio had taken it from the Hindoos."—Dalboquerque, ii. 96.

, "In this island (Goa called Goga) there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain called Savaiu, who has 400 Mamelukes, he himself being also a Mameluke. . . ."—Varthema, 116.

1516.—"Going further along the coast there is a very beautiful river, which sends two arms into the sea, making between them an island, on which stands the city of Goa belonging to Deccan (Deccan), and it was a principality of itself with other districts adjoining in the interior; and in it there was a great Lord, as vassal of the said King (of Deccan) called Sabaiyo, who being a good soldier, well mannered and experienced in war, this lordship of Goa was bestowed upon him, that he might continually make war on the King of Narsinga, as he did until his death. And then he left this city to his son Gacuyym Hydalcyan . . ."—Barros, Lisbon ed. 287.

1563.—"O . . . And returning to our subject, as Adel in Persian means 'justice,' they called the prince of these territories Adelham, as it were 'Lord of Justice.'

"R. A name highly inappropriate, for neither he nor the rest of them are wont to do justice. But tell me also why in Spain they call him the Sabaio?"

"O. Some have told me that he was so called because they used to call a Captain by this name; but I afterwards came to know that in fact, salo, in Arabic means 'lord.' . . ."—Garcia, f. 36.

SABLE-FISH. See HILSA.

SAFRADES, SAFRASPATAM. n.p.

This name of a place 42 m. south of Madras, the seat of an old Dutch factory, was probably shaped into the usual form in a sort of conformity with Madras or Madraspatam. The correct name is Sadorei, but it is sometimes made into Sadrang- and Shatranj-patam. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam, Shathurangoppatam, Skt. chatur-anga, 'the four military arms, infantry, cavalry, elephants and cars.']

Fryer (p. 28) calls it Sandraslapatam, which is probably a misprint for Sandrasapatam.

1672.—"From Tirepoplier you come . . . to Sadrampatam, where our people have a Factory."—Baldaens, 152.

1726.—"The name of the place is properly Sadrangapatam; but for short it is also called Sadrampatam, and most commonly Sadrasapatam. In the Tellinga it indicates the name of the founder, and in Persian it means 'thousand troubles' or the Shabboard which we call chess."—Valentiijn, Choromanuel, 11. The curious explanation of Shatranj or 'chess,' as 'a thousand troubles,' is no doubt some popular etymology; such as P. sad-ranj, 'a hundred griefs.' The word is really of Sanskrit origin, from Chaturangam, literally, 'quadririparte'; the four constituent parts of an army, viz. horse, foot, chariots and elephants.

[1727.—"Saderoas, or Saderas Patam." (See under LONG-CLOTH.)]

SAFFLOWER, s. The flowers of the annual Calthamus tinctorius, L. (N.O. Compositae), a considerable article of export from India for use of a red dye, and sometimes, from the resemblance of the dried flowers to saffron, termed 'bastard saffron.' The colouring matter of safflower is the basis of rouge. The name is a curious modification of words by the 'striving after meaning.' For it points, in the first half of the name, to the analogy with saffron, and in the second half, to the object of trade being a flower. But neither one nor the other of these meanings forms any real element in the word. Safflower appears to be an eventual corruption of the Arabic name of the thing, usfūr. This word we find in medieval trade-lists (e.g. in Pegolotti) to take various forms such as asfiore, asfrole, astifore, saffrole, saffiore; from the last of which the transition to safflower is natural. In the old Latin translation of Avicenna it seems to be called Crocus hortulanus, for the corresponding Arabic is given hasfor. Another Arabic name for this article is kurtum, which we presume to be the origin of the botanist's carthamus. In Hind. it is called kusumbha or kusum. Bretschneider remarks that though the two plants, saffron and safflower, have not the slightest resemblance, and belong to two different families and classes of the nat. system, there has been a certain confusion between them among almost all nations, including the Chinese.

c. 1200. — "Usfur . . . Abu Hanifa. This plant yields a colouring matter, used in dyeing. "There are two kinds, cultivated and wild, both of which grow in Arabia, and the seeds of which are called al-kurtum." — Ibn Baithar, ii. 196.

c. 1343.—"Affiore vuol esser fresco, e asciutto, e colorito rosso in colore di buon zafferano, e non giallo, e chiaro a modo di femminella di zafferano, e che non sia trasandato, che quando è vecchio e trasandato si spolverizza, è fae vermini." —Pegolotti, 372.

1612.—"The two Indian ships aforesaid did discharge these goods following . . . oosfar, which is a red die, great quantitie." —Capt. Sars, in Purchas, i. 347.

1810.—"Le safran bâtard ou carthame, nommé dans le commerce safranon, est appelé par les Arabes . . . osfour ou . . . Kortom. Suivant M. Saffron, le premier nom désigne la plante ; et le second, ses graines." —Silv. de Sacy, Note on Abdallatif, p. 123.

1813.—"Safflower (Coussom, Hind., Aafour Arab.) is the flower of an annual plant, the Carthamus tinctorius, growing in Bengal and other parts of India, which when well-cured is not easily distinguishable from saffron by the eye, though it has nothing of its smell or taste." —Milburn, ii. 238.

SAFFRON, s. Arab. za'farûn. The true saffron (Crocus sativus, L.) in India is cultivated in Kashmir only. In South India this name is given to turmeric, which the Portuguese called açafrao da terra ("country saffron.") The Hind. name is haldu, or in the Deccan halad, [Skt. haridra, hari, 'green, yellow']. Garcia de Orta calls it croco Indiceo, 'Indian saffron.' Indeed, Dozy shows that the Arab. kurkum for turmeric (whence the bot. Lat. curcuma) is probably taken from the Greek κρόκος or obl. κρόκων.

Moodeen Sherif says that kurkum is applied to saffron in many Persian and other writers.

c. 1200.—"The Persians call this root al-Hard, and the inhabitants of Basra call it al-Kurkum, and al-Kurkum is Saffron. They call these plants Saffron because they dye yellow in the same way as Saffron does." —Ibn Baithar, ii. 370.

1563.—"R. Since there is nothing else to be said on this subject, let us speak of what we call 'country saffron.'

"O. This is a medicine that should be spoken of, since it is in use by the Indian physicians; it is a medicine and article of trade much exported to Arabia and Persia. In this city (Goa) there is little of it, but much in Malabar, i.e. in Cananor and Calecut. The Canarins call the root alad; and the Malabars sometimes give it the same name, but more properly call it mangale, and the Malays cunket; the Persians, darsard, which is as much as to say 'yellow-wood.' The Arabs call it habel; and all of them, each in turn, say that this saffron does not exist in Persia, nor in Arabia, nor in Turkey, except what comes from India." —Garcia, f. 78v. Further on he identifies it with curcuma.

1752.—"Curcuma, or Indian Saffron." —Valentijn, Chor. 42.

SAGAR-PESHA, s. Camp-followers, or the body of servants in a private establishment. The word, though usually pronounced in vulgar Hind. as written above, is Pers. shâtâr-î pesha (lit. shâtâr, 'a disciple, a servant,' and pesha, 'business').

[1767.—"Saggar Depessah-pay." —In Long, 518.]

SAGO, s. From Malay sâghî. The farinaceous pith taken out of the stem of several species of a particular genus of palm, especially Metroxylon laevé, Mart., and M. Rumphii, Willd., found in every part of the Indian Archipelago, including the Philippines, wherever there is proper soil. They are most abundant in the eastern part of the region indicated, including the Moluccas and N. Guinea, which probably formed the original habitat; and in these they supply the sole bread of the natives. In the remaining parts of the Archipelago, sago is the food only of certain wild tribes, or consumed (as in Mindanao) by the poor only, or prepared (as at Singapore, &c.) for export. There are supposed to be five species producing the article.

1298.—"They have a kind of trees that produce flour, and excellent flour it is for food. These trees are very tall and thick, but have a very thin bark, and inside the bark they are crammed with flour.”—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi.

1330.—“But as for the trees which produce flour, tis after this fashion. . . . And the result is the best pasta in the world, from which they make whatever they choose, cates of sorts, and excellent bread, of which I, Friar Odoric, have eaten.”—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 32.

1522.—“Their bread (in Tidore) they make of the wood of a certain tree like a palm-tree, and they make it in this way. They take a piece of this wood, and extract from it certain long black thorns which are situated there; then they pound it, and make bread of it which they call sagu. They make provision of this bread for their sea voyages.”—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. p. 136. This is a bad description, and seems to refer to the Sagwire, not the true sago-tree.

1552.—“There are also other trees which are called sagus, from the pith of which bread is made.”—Casanheida, vi. 24.

1553.—“Generally, although they have some millet and rice, all the people of the Isles of Maluco eat a certain food which they call sagum, which is the pith of a tree like a palm-tree, except that the leaf is softer and smoother, and the green of it is rather dark.”—Barros, III. v. 5.

1579.—“. . . and a Kind of meale which they call Sago, made of the toppes of certaine trees, tasting in the Mouth like some curds, but melts away like sugar.”—Drake’s Voyage, Hak. Soc. p. 142. Also in a list of “Certaine Words of the Naturall Language of Iau.” ; “Sagu, bread of the Country.”—Hokl. iv. 246.

c. 1600.—“Primo Sagus genuina, Malaice Sagu, sive Lapua tuni, h.e. vera Sagu.”—Rumphius, i. 75. (We cannot make out the language of lapua tuni.)

1727.—“And the inland people subsist mostly on Sagog, the Pith of a small Twig split and dried in the Sun.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 93; [ed. 1744].

SAGWIRE, s. A name applied often in books, and, formerly at least, in the colloquial use of European settlers and traders, to the Gomuti palm or Arenga saccharifera, Labill., which abounds in the Ind. Archipelago, and is of great importance in its rural economy. The name is Port. sagueira (analogous to palmera), in Span. of the Indies saguran, and no doubt is taken from sagu, as the tree, though not the Sago-palm of commerce, affords a sago of inferior kind. Its most important product, however, is the sap, which is used as toddy (q.v.), and which in former days also afforded almost all the sugar used by natives in the islands. An excellent cordage is made from a substance resembling black horse-hair, which is found between the trunk and the fronds, and this is the gomuti of the Malays, which furnished one of the old specific names (Borassus Gomutus, Loureiro). There is also found in a like position a fine cotton-like substance which makes excellent tinder, and strong stiff spines from which pens are made, as well as arrows for the blow-pipe, or Sumptian (see SARBATANE). “The seeds have been made into a confection, whilst their pulpy envelope abounds in a poisonous juice—used in the barbarian wars of the natives—to which the Dutch gave the appropriate name of ‘hell-water’” (Crawfurd, Desc. Dict. p. 145). The term sagwire is sometimes applied to the toddy or palm-wine, as will be seen below.

1515.—“They use no sustenance except the meal of certain trees, which trees they call Sagur, and of this they make bread.”—Giov. da Empoli, 86.

1615.—“Oryza tamen magna hic copia, ingens etiam modus arborum quas Saguras vocant, quaque varia suggerunt commoda.”—Jarric, i. 201.

1784.—“The natives drink much of a liquor called saguire, drawn from the palm-tree.”—Forrest, Mergui, 73.

1820.—“The Portuguese, I know not for what reason, and other European nations who have followed them, call the tree and the liquor sagwire.”—Crawfurd, Hist. i. 401.

SAHIB, s. The title by which, all over India, European gentlemen, and it may be said Europeans generally, are addressed, and spoken of, when no disrespect is intended, by natives. It is also the general title (at least where Hindustani or Persian is used) which is affixed to the name or office of a European, corresponding thus rather to Monsieur than to Mr. For Colonel Sahib, Collector Sahib, Lord Sahib, and even Sergeant Sahib are thus used, as well as the general vocative Sähib! ‘Sir!’ In other Hind. use the word is equivalent to ‘Master’; and it is occasionally used as a specific title both among Hindus and Muslims, e.g. Appa Sahib, Tipu Sahib; and generically is affixed to the titles of men of rank when indicated by those titles, as Khan Sahib, Nawab Sahib, Raja Sahib. The word is Arabic, and originally means 'a companion'; (sometimes a companion of Mahommed).

[In the Arabian Nights it is the title of a Wazir (Burton, i. 218.).]

1673.—"To which the subtle Heathen replied, Sahab (i.e. Sir), why will you do more than the Creator meant?"—Fryer, 417.

1689.—"Thus the distracted Husband in his Indian English confest, English fashion, Sab, best fashion, have one Wife best for one Husband."—Ovington, ii. 252.

1853.—"He was told that a 'Sahib' wanted to speak with him."—Oakfield, ii. 252.

1878.—"... forty Elephants and five Sahibs with guns and innumerable followers."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 194.

[ST. DEAVES, n.p. A corruption of the name of the island of Sanand in the Bay of Bengal, situated off the coast of Chittagong and Noakhali, which is best known in connection with the awful loss of life and property in the cyclone of 1876.

[1688.—"From Chittagaum we sailed away the 29th January, after had sent small vessels to search round the Island St. Deaves."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. I. ixxx.]

SAINT JOHN'S, n.p.

3. An English sailor's corruption, which for a long time maintained its place in our maps. It is the Sindan of the old Arab Geographers, and was the first durable settling-place of the Parsee refugees on their emigration to India in the 8th century. [Dosa-bhai Framji, Hist. of the Parsees, i. 30.] The proper name of the place, which is in lat. 20° 12' and lies 88 m. north of Bombay, is apparently Sajdan (see Hist. of Cambay, in Bo. Govt. Selections, No. xxvi, N.S., p. 52), but it is commonly called Sanjan. E. B. Eastwick in J. Bo. As. Soc. R. i. 167, gives a Translation from the Persian of the "Kisah-i-Sanjân, or History of the arrival and settlement of the Parsees in India," Sanjan is about 3 m. from the little river-mouth port of Umbargam. "Evidence of the greatness of Sanjan is found, for miles around, in old foundations and bricks. The bricks are of very superior quality."—Bomb. Gazetteer, vol. xiv. 302, [and for medieval references to the place, ibid. I. Pt. i. 262, 520 seq.]

ST. JOHN'S ISLAND, n.p.

This again is a corruption of San-SALAK. or more correctly Shang-chuany, the Chinese name of an island about 60 or 70 miles S.W. of Macao, and at some distance from the mouth of the Canton River, the place where St. Francis Xavier died, and was originally buried.

1559.—"Inde nos ad Sanctianum Simarum insulam a Cantone milia pas. cicerit ox Deus perduxit incolumnes."—Seti. Franc. Xavieri Epist., Praga 1667, IV. xiv.

1637.—"We came to Anchor the same Day, on the N.E. end of St. John's Island. This Island is in Lat. about 32 d. 30 min. North, lying on the S. Coast of the Province of Quanzung or Canton in China."—Dampier, i. 406.

1727.—"A Portuguese Ship... being near an Island on that Coast, called after St. Juan, some Gentlemen and Priests went ashore for Diversion, and accidentally found the Saint's Body uncorrupted, and carried it Passenger to Goa."—A. Hamilton, i. 252; [ed. 1744, ii. 255].

c. ST. JOHN'S ISLANDS. This is also the chart-name, and popular European name, of two islands about 6 m. S. of Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo Sikajang, [or as Denny's (Desc. Dict. 321) writes the word, Pulo Skijang].

SAIVÁ, s. A worshipper of Śiva; Skt. Śāivā, adj., 'belonging to Siva.'

1651.—"The second sect of the Bramins, Śēvīā. ... by name, say that a certain Kaivalya is the supreme among the gods, and that all the others are subject to him."—Roperius, 17.

1867.—"This temple is reckoned, I believe, the holiest shrine in India, at least among the Shaivites."—By. Milman, in Memoirs, p. 48.

SALA, s. Hind. sālá, 'brother-in-law,' i.e. wife's brother; but used elliptically as a low term of abuse.

[1856.—"Another reason (for infanticide) is the blind pride which makes them hate that any man should call them sala, or Sussor—brother-in-law, or father-in-law."—Forbes, Rās Māḷā, ed. 1878, 616.]

1881.—"Another of these popular Paris sayings is 'et tu soror?' which is as insulting a remark to a Parisian as the apparently harmless remark sālá, 'brother-in-law,' is to a Hindoo."—Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, 326.

SALAAM, s. A salutation; properly oral salutation of Mahometans to each other. Arab. salām, 'peace.' Used for any act of salutation; or for 'compliments.'

[c. 60 B.C.—"'ΑΛΛ 'ει μεν Σίφος ἐστι 'Σαλάμ,' ει δ' οὖν σὺ γε φοίη 'Ναίδος,' ει δ' 'Ελλην 'Χαίρε', το δ' αέτο φράσσω."

—Meleagros, in Anthologia Palatina, vii. 149.

The point is that he has been a bird of passage, and says good-bye now to his various resting-places in their own tongue.]

1513.—"The ambassador (of Bisnagar) entering the door of the chamber, the Governor rose from the chair on which he was seated, and stood up while the ambassador made him great calema."—Corrca, Lendas, i. 377. See also p. 431.

1552.—"The present having been seen he took the letter of the Governor, and read it to him, and having read it told him how the Governor sent him his calema, and was at his command with all his fleet, and with all the Portuguese. ..."—Castanheda, iii. 445.

1611.—"Calema. The salutation of an inferior."— Cobarruivas, Sp. Dict. s.v.

1626.—"Hee (Selim i.e. Jahangir) turneth over his Beades, and saith so many words, to wit three thousand and two hundred, and then presenteth himself to the people to receive their salames or good morrow. ..."—Pereus, Pilgrimage, 533.

1638.—"En entrant ils se salissent de leur Salam qu'ils accompagnent d'une profonde inclination."—Mandeloche, Paris, 1659, 223.

1648.—"... this salutation they call salam; and it is made with bending of the body, and laying of the right hand upon the head."—Van Twist, 55.

1689. —""The Salem of the Religious Bramins, is to join their Hands together, and spreading them first, make a motion towards their Head, and then stretch them out."—Ovington, 183.

1694. —"The Town Conicopolies, and chief inhabitants of Egmore, came to make their Salam to the President."—Wheeler, i. 281.

1717. —"I wish the Priests in Tranquebar a Thousand fold Schalaman."—Philipp's Act. 62.

1809. —"The old priest was at the door, and with his head uncovered, to make his salaams."—Ed. Valentin, i. 273.

1813. —"'Ho! who art thou?—This low salam Replies, of Moslem faith I am.'"—Byron, The Gitanj.

1832.—"Il me rendit tous les salams que je fis autrefois au 'Grand Mogol.'"—Jacquet- mont, Corresp. ii. 137.

1844.—"All chiefs who have made their salam are entitled to carry arms personally."—G. O. of Sir C. Napier, 2.

SALAK, s. A singular-looking fruit, sold and eaten in the Malay regions, described in the quotation.
SALEB, SALEP.  784  SALEMPOORY.

It is the fruit of a species of rattan (Salacca edulis), of which the Malay name is rotan-salak.

1768-71. — "The salac (Calamus rotang salacca) which is the fruit of a prickly bush, and has a singular appearance, being covered with scales, like those of a lizard; it is nutritious and well tasted, in flavour somewhat resembling a raspberry." — Stavorinus, E.T. i. 241.

SALEB, SALEP, s. This name is applied to the tubers of various species of orchis found in Europe and Asia, which from ancient times have had a great reputation as being restorative and highly nutritious. This reputation seems originally to have rested on the 'doctrine of signatures,' but was due partly no doubt to the fact that the mucilage of saleb has the property of forming, even with the addition of 40 parts of water, a thick jelly. Good modern authorities quite disbelieve in the virtues ascribed to saleb, though a decoction of it, spiced and sweetened, makes an agreeable drink for invalids. Saleb is identified correctly by Ibn Baithar with the Satyrium of Dioscorides and Galen. The full name in Ar. (analogous to the Greek orchis) is Khursal-thalab, i.e. 'testiculus vulpis'; but it is commonly known in India as salab magri, i.e. Salep of Egypt, or popularly salep-misry. In Upper India saleb is derived from various species of Eulophia, found in Kashmir and the Lower Himalaya. Salooop, which is, or used to be, supplied hot in winter mornings by itinerant vendors in the streets of London, is, we believe, a representative of Saleb; but we do not know from what it is prepared. [In 1889 a correspondent to Notes & Queries (7 ser. vii. 35) stated that "within the last twenty years saloop vendors might have been seen plying their trade in the streets of London. The term salooop was also applied to an infusion of the sassafras bark or wood. In Pereira's Materia Medica, published in 1850, it is stated that 'sassafras tea, flavoured with milk and sugar, is sold at daybreak in the streets of London under the name of saloop.' Saloop in balls is still sold in London, and comes mostly from Smyrna."]

In the first quotation it is doubtful what is meant by salif; but it seems possible that the traveller may not have recognised the tha'lab, sa'lab in its Indian pronunciation.

1734. — "After that, they fixed the amount of provision to be given by the Sultan, viz. 1000 Indian rits of flour; 1000 of meat, a large number of rits (how many I don't now remember) of sugar, of ghee, of salif, of areca, and 1000 leaves of betel." — Ibn Batuta, iii. 382.

1727. — "They have a fruit called Salob, about the size of a Peach, but without a stone. They dry it hard . . . and being beaten to Powder, they dress it as Tea and Coffee are. . . They are of opinion that it is a great restorative." — A. Hamilton, i. 125; [ed. 1744, i. 129].

[1754.—In his list of Indian drugs Ives (p. 44) gives "Rad. Salop, Persia Rs. 35 per m."

1838. — "Saleb Misree, a medicine, comes (a little) from Russia. It is considered a good nutritious for the human constitution, and is for this purpose powdered and taken with milk. It is in the form of flat oval pieces of about 80 grains each. . . It is sold at 2 or 3 Rupees per ounce." — Desc. of articles found in Bazar of Cabool. In Punjab Trade Report, 1862, App. vi.

1882 (!). — "Here we knock against an ambulant salop-shop (a kind of tea which people drink on winter mornings); there against roaming oil, salt, or water-vendors, bakers carrying brown bread on wooden trays, peddlars with cakes, fellows offering dainty little bits of meat to the knowing purchaser." — Levkovias, The Capital of Cyprus, ext. in St. James's Gazette, Sept. 10.

SALEM, n.p. A town and inland district of S. India. Properly Shelem, which is perhaps a corruption of Chera, the name of the ancient monarchy in which this district was embraced. ["According to one theory the town of Salem is said to be identical with Seran or Sheran, and occasionally to have been named Sheralan; when S. India was divided between the three dynasties of Chola, Sera and Pandia, according to the generally accepted belief, Karur was the place where the three territorial divisions met; the boundary was no doubt subject to vicissitudes, and at one time possibly Salem or Seran was a part of Sera." — Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 18.]

SALEMPOORY, s. A kind of chintz. See allusions under PALEMPORE. [The Madras Gloss., deriving the word from Tel. sale, 'weaver,' pura, Skt. 'town,' describes it as "a kind of cotton cloth formerly manufactured at Nellore; half the length of ordinary Punjams" (see PIECE-GOODS). The third quotation indicates that it was sometimes white.] 1558. — "Sarampars." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 95. [1611. — "I ... was only doubtful about the white Betteslas and Salempurys." — Davers, Letters, i. 155. [1614. — "Salampora, being a broad white cloth." — Foster, ibid. ii. 32.] 1680. — "Certain goods for Bantam priced as follows:— "Salampores. Blew, at 14 Pagodas per corse. ..." — Ft. St. Geo. Consn., April 22. In Notes and Exts. iii. 16; also ibid. p. 24. 1747. — "The Warehousekeeper reported that on the 1st inst. when the French entered our Bounds and attacked us ... it appeared that 5 Pieces of Long Cloth and 10 Pieces of Salampores were stolen, That Two Pieces of Salampores were found upon a Peon ... and the Person detected is ordered to be severely whipped in the Face of the Publick. ..." — Ft. St. David Consn., March 30 (MS. Records in India Office). c. 1780. — "... en l'on y fabriquoit differentes especes de toiles de coton, telles que salempouris." — Huafoyn, ii. 461.

SALIGRAM, s. Skt. Shalagrama (this word seems to be properly the name of a place, 'Village of the Sal-tree'—a real or imaginary tirtha or place of sacred pilgrimage, mentioned in the Mahabharata). [Other and less probable explanations are given by Oppert, Anc. Inhabitants, 337.] A pebble having mystic virtues, found in certain rivers, e.g. Gandak, Son, &c. Such stones are usually marked by containing a fossil ammonite. The shalagrama is often adopted as the representative of some god, and the worship of any god may be performed before it.* It is daily worshipped by the Brahmans; but it is especially connected with Vaishnava doctrine. In May 1883 a salagrama was the ostensible cause of great popular excitement among the Hindus of Calcutta. During the proceedings in a family suit before the High Court, a question arose regarding the identity of a salagrama, regarded as a household god. Counsel on both sides suggested that the thing should be brought into court. Mr. Justice Norris hesitated to give this order till he had taken advice. The attorneys on both sides, Hindus, said there could be no objection; the Court interpreter, a high-caste Brahman, said it could not be brought into Court, because of the coir-matting, but it might with perfect propriety be brought into the corridor for inspection; which was done. This took place during the excitement about the "Ilbert Bill," giving natives magisterial authority in the provinces over Europeans; and there followed most violent and offensive articles in several native newspapers reviling Mr. Justice Norris, who was believed to be hostile to the Bill. The editor of the Bengal newspaper, an educated man, and formerly a member of the covenanted Civil Service, the author of one of the most unscrupulous and violent articles, was summoned for contempt of court. He made an apology and complete retraction, but was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

c. 1590. — "Salgram is a black stone which the Hindos hold sacred. ... They are found in the river Sown, at the distance of 40 cose from the mouth." — Ayen, Gladwin's E.T. 1500, ii. 25; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 150]. 1782. — "Avant de finir l'histoire de Vichenou, je ne puis me dispenser de parler de la pierre de Salagranam. Elle n'est autre chose qu'une coquille petrifiée du genre des cornes d'Ammon, les Indiens prétendent qu'elle représente Vichenou, parcequ'ils en ont découvert de neuf nuances différentes, ce qu'ils rapportent aux neuf incarnations de ce Dieu. ... Cette pierre est aux sectateurs de Vichenou ce que le Lingam est à ceux de Chiven." — Somnerat, i. 307.

[1822. — "In the Nerbuddah are found those types of Shiva, called Solgrammas, which are sacred pebbles held in great estimation all over India." — Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 286.] 1824. — "The shalagramā is black, hollow, and nearly round; it is found in the Ganduk River, and is considered a representation of Vishnoo. ... The Shalagram is the only stone that is naturally divine; all the other stones are rendered sacred by incantations."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 43.

1885. — "My father had one (a Salagram). It was a round, rather flat, jet black, small, shining stone. He paid it the greatest reverence possible, and allowed no one to touch it, but worshipped it with his own hands. When he became ill, and as he would not allow a woman to touch it, he made it over to a Brahman ascetic with a money present."—Sundrabdi, in Punjab Notes and Queries, ii. 109. The sālagrāma is in fact a Hindu fetish.

SALLABAD.

This word, now quite obsolete, occurs frequently in the early records of English settlements in India, for the customary or prescriptive exclamations of the native Governments, and for native prescriptive claims in general. It is a word of Mahratti development, sālābād, 'perennial,' applied to permanent collections or charges; apparently a factitious word from Pers. sāl, 'year,' and Ar. ābād, 'ages.'

[180.—"Sallabad." See under ROOC-KA.]

1703.—"... although these are hardships, yet by length of time become Sallabad (as we esteem them), there is no great demur made now, and are not recited here as grievances."—In Wheeler, ii. 19.

1716.—"The Board upon reading them came to the following resolutions:—That for anything which has yet appeared the Comatees (Comaty) may cry out their Pennagandoo Nargarum . . . . at their houses, feasts, and weddings, &c. according to Sallabad but not before the Pagoda of Chindy Pillary . . . ."—Ibid. 234.

1788.—"Sallabadū. (Usual Custom). A word used by the Moors Government to enforce their demand of a present."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

SALOOTREE, SALUSTREE.

S. Hind. Sālotar, Sālotri. A native farrier or horse-doctor. This class is now almost always Mahommedan. But the word is taken from the Skt. name Sālohotra, the original owner of which is supposed to have written in that language a treatise on the Veterinary Art, which still exists in a form more or less modified and imperfect. "A knowledge of Sanskrit must have prevailed pretty generally about this time (14th century), for there is in the Royal Library at Lucknow a work on the veterinary art, which was translated from the Sanskrit by order of Ghiyāṣu-d din Muhammad Shāh Khilji. This rare book, called Kurrutul-Mulk, was translated as early as A.H. 783 (A.D. 1381), from an original styled Sālotar, which is the name of an Indian, who is said to have been a Brāhman, and the tutor of Susruta. The Preface says the translation was made 'from the barbarous Hindi into the refined Persian, in order that there may be no more need of a reference to infidels.'"* (Elliot, v. 573-4.)

[1831.—"... your aloes are not genuine.' 'Oh yes, they are,' he exclaimed. 'My salutree got them from the Bazaar.'—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, ii. 223.]

a. A considerable island immediately north of Bombay. The island of Bombay is indeed naturally a kind of pendant to the island of Salsette, and during the Portuguese occupation it was so in every sense. That occupation is still marked by the remains of numerous villas and churches, and by the survival of a large R. Catholic population. The island also contains the famous and extensive caves of Kānhēri (see KENNER). The old city of Tana (q.v.) also stands upon Salsette. Salsette was claimed as part of the Bombay dotation of Queen Catherine, but refused by the Portuguese. The Mahrattas took it from them in 1739, and it was taken from these by us in 1774. The name has been by some connected with the salt-works which exist upon the islands (Salinas). But it appears in fact to be the corruption of a Mahratti name Shatshī, from Shatshashti, meaning 'Sixty-six' (Skt. Shat-shashti), because (it is supposed) the island was alleged to contain that number of villages. This name occurs in the form Shat-sashti in a stone inscription dated Sak. 1103 (A.D. 1182). See Bo. J. R. As. Soc. xii. 334. Another inscription on copper plates dated Sak. 748 (A.D. 1027) contains a grant of the village of Naura, "one of the 66 of Śrī Śāhānaka (Thana)," thus entirely confirming the etymology (J.R. As. Soc. ii. 353). I have to thank Mr. J. M. Campbell, C.S.I., for drawing my attention to these inscriptions.

b. Salsette is also the name of the three provinces of the Goa territory which constituted the Velhas Conquistas or Old Conquests. These lay all along the coast, consisting of (1)

* "It is curious that without any allusion to this work, another on the Veterinary Art, styled Sālotar, and said to comprise in the Sanskrit original 16,000 slokas, was translated in the reign of Shāh Jāhān . . . by Saiyad 'Abdulla Khan Bahādur Firoz Jang, who had found it among some other Sanskrit books which . . . had been plundered from Amar Singh, Rānā of Chitor."
the Ilbas (viz. the island of Goa and minor islands divided by rivers and creeks), (2) Bardez on the northern mainland, and (3) Salsete on the southern mainland. The port of Marnagaon, which is the terminus of the Portuguese Indian Railway, is in this Salsete. The name probably had the like origin to that of the Island Salsete; a parallel to which was found in the old name of the Island of Goa, Teçar, meaning (Mahr.) Tis-wadî, “30 hamlets.” [See BARGANY.]

A.D. 1186.—“I, Aparâditya (‘the paramount sovereign, the Ruler of the Konkana, the most illustrious King’) have given with a libation of water 24 dharms, after exempting other taxes, from the fixed revenue of the earl of the village of Mahauli, connected with Shat-shashti.” — Inscription edited by Pandit Bhagavândâl Indrajit, in J. As. Br. R. A. S. xii. 332. [And see Bombay Gazetteer, I. Pt. ii. 544, 567.]

1538.—“Beyond the Isle of Elephants (do Alfant) about a league distant is the island of Salsete. This island is seven leagues long by 5 in breadth. On the north it borders the Gulf of Cambay, on the south it has the I. of Elephants, on the east the mainland, and on the west the I. of Bombay or of Boa Vida. This island is very fertile, abounding in provisions, cattle, and game of sorts, and in its hills is great plenty of timber for building ships and galleys. In that part of the island which faces the S.W. wind is built a great and noble city called Thana; and a league and a half in the interior is an immense edifice called the Pagoda of Salsete; both one and the other objects most worthy of note; Thana for its decay (destriçao) and the Pagoda as a work unique in its way, and the like of which is nowhere to be seen.” —Jóto de Castro, Primo Roteiro da Índia, 69-70.

And to the Tanadar (tenadar) of Salsete 30,000 reis.

“He has under him 12 peons (piâes) of whom the said governor takes 7; leaving him 5, which at the aforesaid rate amount to 10,800 reis.

“And to a Parvu (see PARVOE) that he has, who is the country writer and having the same pay as the Tenadar Mor, which is 3 pardas a month, amounting in a year at the said rate to 10,800 reis.” —Botelho, Tomo, in Subsidios, 211-212.

1610. — “Frey Manuel de S. Mathias, guardian of the convent of St. Francis in Goa, writes to me that . . . in Goa alone there are 90 resident friars; and besides in Maccaim and its adjuncts, viz., in the island of Salsete and other districts of the north they have 18 parishes (Freguezias) of native Christians with vicars; and five of the convents have colleges, or seminaries where they bring up little orphans; and that the said Ward of Goa extends 300 leagues from north to south.” —Livros das Monções, 298.

[1674. — “From whence these Pieces of Land receive their general Name of Salset . . . either because it signifies in Canarein a Granary.” —Fryer, 62.]

c. 1700.—“It was a melancholy sight on the loss of Salset, to see the many families forced to seek refuge on Bombay, and among them some Portuguese Hidalgós or noblemen, reduced of a sudden from very flourishing circumstances to utter beggary.”

—Grose, i. 72.

[1768. — “Those lands are comprised in 66 villages, and from this number it is called Salsete.” —Foral of Salsete, India Office MS.]

1777.—“The acquisition of the Island of Salset, which in a manner surrounds the Island of Bombay, is sufficient to secure the latter from the danger of a famine.” —Price’s Tracts, i. 101.

1808.—“The island of Sashky (corrupted by the Portuguese into Salssete) was conquered by that Nation in the year of Christ 1534, from the Mohammedan Prince who was then its Sovereign; and thereafter parcelled out, among the European subjects of Her Most Faithful Majesty, into village allotments, at a very small Foro or quitrent.” —Bombay, Regn. I. of 1808, sec. ii.

b.—

1510.—“And he next day, by order of the Governor, with his own people and many more from the Island (Goa) passed over to the mainland of Salsete and An-truz, scouring the districts and tana-dars, and placing in them by his own hand and tanadars and collectors of revenue, and put all in such order that he collected much money, inasmuch that he sent to the factor at Goa very good intelligence, accompanied by much money.” —Correa, ii. 161.

1546.—“We agree in the manner following, to wit, that I Idalxaa (Idalcan) promise and swear on our Koran (no num mopaffo), and by the head of my eldest son, that I will remain always firm in the said amity with the King of Portugal and with his governors of India, and that the lands of Salsete and Burdoes, which I have made contract and donation of to His Highness,
I confirm and give anew, and I swear and promise by the oath aforesaid never to reclaim them or make them the Subject of War."—Treaty between D. John de Castro and Idralzo, who was formerly called Idalpão (Adil Khwâ),—Botelho, Tombo, 49, 1506.—"On the South side of the land of Goa, when the river runneth againe into the Sea, there cometh even out with the coast a land called Salsette, which is also ynder the subjection of the Portingales, and is ... planted both with people and fruit."
—Linschoten, 51; [Hak. Soc. i. 177].

1602.—"Before we treat of the Wars which in this year (c. 1546) Idaixa (Adil Shah) waged with the State about the mainland provinces of Salsete and Bardês, which caused much trouble to the Government of India, it seems well to us to give an account of these Moor Kings of Vissiapor."—Couto, IV. x. 4.

SALWEN, n.p. The great river entering the sea near Martaban in British Burma, and which the Chinese in its upper course call Lu-kiang. The Burmese form is Than-iwen, but the original form is probably Shan. ("The Salwen River, which empties itself into the sea at Maulmain, rivals the Irrawaddy in length but not in importance."—[Forbes, British Burma, 8].)

SAMBOOK, s. Ar. sanbuk, and sunbâk (there is a Skt. word sâmâbâka, 'a bivalve shell, but we are unable to throw any light on any possible transfer); a kind of small vessel formerly used in Western India and still on the Arabian coast. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. Pt. ii. 470.] It is smaller than the bagâl (see BUGGALOW), and is chiefly used to communicate between a roadstead and the shore, or to go inside the reefs. Burton renders the word 'a foyst,' which is properly a smaller kind of galley. See description in the last but one quotation below.

c. 330.—"It is the custom when a vessel arrives (at Makdahau) that the Sultan's sungbuk boards her to ask whence the ship comes, who is the owner, and the skipper (or pilot), what she is laden with, and what merchants or other passengers are on board."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 183; also see pp. 17, 181, &c.

1489.—"The Zambuco was loaded with down-dung, which they have in those islands, and which they were carrying, it being merchandize for Cambay, where it is used in dyeing cloths."—Correa, Lendas, i. 33-34.

1518.—"Zambuquo." See under PROW.

1543.—"Item — that the Zanubuos which shall trade in his port in rice or nele (paddy) and cottons and other matters shall pay the customary dues."—Treaty of Martin Alfonso de Sousa with Coutom, in Botelho, Tombo, 37.

[1814.—"Sambuk." See under DHOW.]

1855.—"Our pilgrim ship ... was a Sambuk of about 400 arldês (50 tons), with narrow wedge-like bows, a clean water-line, a sharp keel, undeedeked except upon the poop, which was high enough to act as a sail in a gale of wind. We carried 2 masts, imminently raking forward, the main considerably longer than the mizen, and the former was provided with a large triangular latine. ..."—Burton, Pilgrimage to El Melinah and Meccah, i. 276; [Memorial ed. i. 188].

1858.—"The vessels of the Arabs called Sembuk are small Baggallows of 80 to 100 tons burden. Whilst they run out forward into a sharp prow, the after part of the vessel is disproportionately broad and elevated above the water, in order to form a counterpoise to the colossal triangular sail which is hoisted to the masthead with such a spread that often the extent of the yard is greater than the whole length of the vessel."—F. von Neimans, in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. SANDAL, SANDLE, SANDERS. 790 has been long applied, both in English and in the Indian vernaculars, to the wood of _Pterocarpus santalina_, L., a tree of S. India, the wood of which is inodorous, but which is valued for various purposes in India (pillars, turning, &c.), and is exported as a dye-wood. According to Hanbury and Flückiger this last was the _sanders_ so much used in the cookery of the Middle Ages for colouring sauces, &c. In the opinion of those authorities it is doubtful whether the red sandal of the medieval pharmacologists was a kind of the real pharmacological wood, or was the wood of _Pteroc. santal._ It is possible that sometimes the one and sometimes the other was meant. For on the one hand, even in modern times, we find Milburn (see below) speaking of the three colours of the real sandal-wood; and on the other hand we find Matthioli in the 16th century speaking of the red sandal as inodorous.

It has been a question how the _Pterocarpus santalina_ came to be called sandal-wood at all. We may suggest, as a possible origin of this, the fact that its powder "mixed with oil is used for bathing and purifying the skin" (Drury, s.v.), much as the true sandal-wood powder also is used in the East.

c. 545. — "And from the remoter regions, I speak of Tainista and other places of export, the imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, _Sandalwood_ (πτάρδαρν), and so forth..." — Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clxvii.

c. 1390. — "Take powdered rice and boil it in almond milk... and colour it with _Saunders._" — Recipe quoted by Wright, Domestic Manners, &c., 350.

1564. — "Le _Santal_ done croist es Indes Orientales et Occidentales: en grandes Forestes, et fort espesses. Il s'en trouve trois espesses: mais le plus pasle est le meilleur; le blanc apres: le rouge est mis au dernier ranc, pource qu'il n'a aucune odeur: mais les deux premiers sentent fort bon." — Matthioli (old Fr. version), liv. i. ch. xix.

1668. — "The _Sandal_ grows about Timor, which produces the largest quantity, and it is called _chundana_; and by this name it is known in all the regions about Malaca; and the Arabs, being those who carried on the trade of those parts, corrupted the word and called it _sandal_. Every Moor, whatever his nation, calls it thus..." — Garcia, t. 185v. He proceeds to speak of the _sandal_ _vermelho_ as quite a different product, growing in Tenasserim and on the Coromandel Coast.

1584. — "... _Sandalies_ wilde from Cochin. _Sandalies_ domestick from Malaca..." — Wm. Barret, in Hakt. ii. 412.

1613. — "... certain renegade Christians of the said island, along with the Moors, called in the Hollanders, who thinking it was a fine opportunity, went one time with five vessels, and another time with seven, against the said fort, at a time when most of the people... were gone to Solor for the _Sandal_ trade, by which they had their living." — Bocarro, Decada, 723.

1615. — "Committee to procure the commodities recommended by Capt. Saris for Japan, viz. pictures of wars, steel, skins, _sanders-wood._" — Sainsbury, i. 380.

1813. — "When the trees are felled, the bark is taken off; they are then cut into billets, and buried in a dry place for two months, during which period the white ants will eat the outer wood without touching the _sandal_; it is then taken up and... sorted into three kinds. The deeper the colour, the higher is the perfume; and hence the merchants sometimes divide _sandal_ into red, yellow, and white; but these are all different shades of the same colour." — Milburn, i. 291.

1825. — "_Redwood_, properly _Red Sanders_, is produced chiefly on the Coromandel Coast, whence it has of late years been imported in considerable quantity to England, where it is employed in dyeing. It... comes in round billets of a thickish red colour on the outside, a deep brighter red within, with a wavy grain; no small or taste." — Ibld. ed. 1825, p. 249.

SANOWAY, n.p. A town of Arakan, the Burmese name of which is _Thandwe_ (Sand-wé), for which an etymology ("iron-tied"), and a corresponding legend are invented, as usual [see Burmah Gazetteer, ii. 606]. It is quite possible that the name is ancient, and represented by the _Sada_ of Ptolemy.

1555. — "In crossing the gulf of Bengal there arose a storm which dispersed them in such a manner that Martin Affonso found himself alone, with his ship, at the island called Negamale, opposite the town of _Sode_, which is on the mainland, and there was wrecked upon a reef..." — Barros, IV, ii. 1.

In 1. ix. 1, it is called _Sedo_.

1690. — "Other places along this Coast subjected to this King (of Arracan) are _Coromoria_, _Seda_, Zera, and _Novel Mugauni._" — Appendix to Ovington, p. 563.
Sanguical, s. This is a term (pl. sanguicles) often used by the Portuguese writers on India for a kind of boat, or small vessel, used in war. We are not able to trace any origin in a vernacular word. It is perhaps taken from the similar proper name which is the subject of the next article. [This supposition is rendered practically certain from the quotation from Albuquerque below, furnished by Mr. Whiteway.] Bluteau gives "Sanguicel; termo da India. He hum genero de embarcaçao pequena q serve na costa da India para dar alcance aos parôs dos Mouros," 'to give chase to the prows of the Moors.'

[1512.—"Here was Nuno Vaz in a ship, the St. John, which was built in Camagueiar."—Albuquerque, Carlos, p. 99. In a letter of Nov. 30, 1513, he varies the spelling to Camugiar. There are many other passages in the same writer which make it practically certain that Sanguicles were the vessels built at Sanguicier.]

1598.—"The Conde (Francisco da Gama) was occupied all the winter (q.v.) in reforming the fleets... and as the time came on he nominated his brother D. Luiz da Gama to be Captain-Major of the Indian Seas for the expedition to Malabar, and wrote to Baqaim to equip six very light Sanguicles according to instructions which should be given by Sebastiao Botelho, a man of great experience in that craft. These orders were given by the Count Admiral because he perceived that big fleets were not of use to guard convoys, and that it was light vessels like these alone which could catch the paros and vessels of the pirates... for these escaped our fleets, and got hold of the merchant vessels at their pleasure, darting in and out, like light horse, where they would..."—Costa, Dec. XII. liv. i. ch. 18.

1605.—"And seeing that I am informed that... the incursions of certain pirates who still infest that coast might be prevented with less apparatus and expense, if we had light vessels which would be more effective than the foists and galleys of which the fleets have hitherto been composed, seeing how the enemy use their sanguicles, which our ships and galleys cannot overtake, I enjoined and ordered you to build a quantity of light vessels to be employed in guarding the coast in place of the fleet of galleys and foists..."—King's Letter to Dom Afonso de Castro, in Livros das Monçôes, i. 26.

1614.—"The eight Malabarques Sanguicles that Francis de Miranda despatched to the north from the bar of Goa went with three chief captains, each of them to command a week in turn..."—Boecorro, Decada, 262.

Sanguicier, Sangueca, Zinguizar, &c., n.p. This is a place often mentioned in the Portuguese narratives, as very hostile to the Goa Government, and latterly as a great nest of corsairs. This appears to be Sangameshvar, lat. 17° 9', formerly a port of Canara on the River Shastri, and standing 20 miles from the mouth of that river. The latter was navigable for large vessels up to Sangameshvar, but within the last 50 years has become impassable. [The name is derived from Skt. sangama-isvara, 'Siva, Lord of the river confluence.]

1516.—"Passing this river of Dabul and going along the coast towards Goa you find a river called Cinguiçar, inside of which there is a place where there is a traffic in many wares, and where enter many vessels and small Zamboocos (Sambook) of Malabar to sell what they bring, and buy the products of the country. The place is peopled by Moors, and Gentiles of the aforesaid Kingdom of Daquem" (Deccan).—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. p. 286.

1538.—"Thirty-five leagues from Guoa, in the middle of the Gulf of the Malabars there runs a large river called Zamgizara. This river is well known and of great renown. The bar is bad and very tortuous, but after you get within, it makes amends for the difficulties without. It runs inland for a great distance with great depth and breadth."—De Castro, Primeiro Roteiro, 36.

1563.—De Barros calls it Zingaçar in II, i. 4, and Sangaca in IV, i. 14.

1584.—"There is a Haven belonging to those ryvers (rovers), distant from Goa about 12 miles, and is called Sanguiseo, where many of those Rovers dwell, and doe so much mischiefe that no man can passe by, but they receive some伤害 by them... Which the Viceroy understanding, prepared an armie of 15 Foists, over which he made chiefe Captaine a Gentleman, his Nephew called Don Italiano Mascarenhas, giving him express commandement first to goe unto the Haven of Sanguiseu, and utterly to raze the same downe to the ground."—Linschoten, ch. 92; [Hak. Soc. ii. 170].

1602.—"Both these projects he now began to put in execution, sending all his treasures (which they said exceeded ten millions in gold) to the river of Sanguicier, which was also within his jurisdiction, being a seaport, and there embarking it at his pleasure."—Costa, ix. 8. See also Dec. X. iv.:

"How D. Gileanes Mascarenhas arrived in Malabar, and how he entered the river of Sanguicier to chastise the Nabigue of that place; and of the disaster in which he met his death." (This is the event of 1584 related by Linschoten); also Dec. X. vi. 4:

"Of the things that happened to D. Jeronimo Mascarenhas in Malabar, and how he had a SANSKRIT, s. The name of the classical language of the Brahmans, Samskrita, meaning in that language 'purified' or 'perfected.' This was obviously at first only an epithet, and it is not of very ancient use in this specific application. To the Brahman Sanskrit was the bhasha, or language, and had no particular name. The word Sanskrit is used by the protogrammarian Pāṇini (some centuries before Christ), but not as a deno-mination of the language. In the latter sense, however, both 'Sanskrit', and 'Prakrit' (Pracrit) are used in the Brihat Samhita of Varāhamihira, c. a.d. 504, in a chapter on omens (lxxxvi. 3), to which Prof. Kern's translation does not extend. It occurs also in the Mṛchāhakaṭakā, translated by Prof. H. H. Wilson in his Hindu Theatre, under the name of the 'Toy-cart'; in the works of Kumārila Bhattra, a writer of the 7th century; and in the Pāṁiniya Śikshā, a metrical treatise ascribed by the Hindus to Pāṇini, but really of comparatively modern origin.

There is a curiously early mention of Sanskrit by the Mahomedan poet Amīr Khusrū of Delhi, which is quoted below. The first mention (to our knowledge) of the word in any European writing is in an Italian letter of Sassetti's, addressed from Malabar to Bernardo Davanzati in Florence, and dating from 1586. The few words on the subject, of this writer, show much acumen.

In the 17th and 18th centuries such references to this language as occur are found chiefly in the works of travellers to Southern India, and by these it is often called Grandoni, or the like, from grānta, 'a book' (see GRUNTH, GRUNTHUM) i.e. a book of the classical Indian literature. The term Sanskrit came into familiar use after the investigations into this language by the English in Bengal (viz. by Wilkins, Jones, &c.) in the last quarter of the 18th century. [See Macdonell, Hist. of Sanskrit Lit. ch. i.]

A.D. 21—"Maitreyā. Now, to me, there are two things at which I cannot choose but laugh, a woman reading Sanskrit, and a man singing a song: the woman snuffles like a young cow when the rope is first passed through her nostrils; and the man wheezes like an old Pandit repeating his bead-roll."—The Toy-Cart, E.T. in Wilson's Works, xi. 60.

A.D. y—"Three-and-sixty or four-and-sixty sounds are there originally in Prakrit (Pracrit) even as in Sanskrit, as taught by the Svyamabhū."—Pāṁiniyā Śikṣā, quoted in Weber's Ind. Studien (1858), iv. 348. But see also Weber's Academ. Vorlesungen (1876), p. 194.

1818.—"But there is another language, more select than the other, which all the Brahmans use. Its name from of old is Sahasrit, and the common people know nothing of it."—Amīr Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 563.

1586.—"Sono scritte le loro scienze tutte in una lingua che dimandano Sanscrita, che vuol dire ' bene articolata': della quale non si ha memoria quando fusse parlata, con avere (com' io dico) memorie antichissime. I'Imparana come noi la greca e la latina, e vi pongono molto maggior tempo, si che in 6 anni o 7 sene fanno padroni: e ha la lingua d'oggi molte cose comun con quella, nella quale sono molti de' nostri nomi, e particolarmente de numeri il 6, 7, 8, e 9, lido, serpe, et altri assai."—Sassetti, extracted in De Guernatii, Storia, &c., Livorno, 1875, p. 221.

c. 1590.—"Although this country (Kashmir) has a peculiar tongue, the books of knowledge are Sanskrit (or Sahasrit). They also have a written character of their own, with which they write their books. The substance which they chiefly write upon is Tāx, which is the bark of a tree, which with a little pains they make into leaves, and it lasts for years. In this way ancient books have been written thereon, and the ink is such that it cannot be washed out."—Āvin (orig.), i. p. 563; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 351].

1623.—"The Jesuites conceive that the Bramenes are of the dispersion of the Israelites, and their Bookes (called Samscrcaten) doe somewhat agree with the Scriptures, but that they understand them not."—Peches, Pilgrimage, 55, 56.

1651.—"... Sourī signifies the Sun in Sanscortam, which is a language in which all the mysteries of Heathendom are written, and which is held in esteem by the Bramines just as Latin is among the Learned in Europe."—Rogerius, 4.

In some of the following quotations we have a form which it is difficult to account for:

c. 1666.—"Their first study is in the Hanscrito, which is a language entirely different from the common Indian, and which is only known by the Pendas. And this is that Tongue, of which Father Kircher hath published the Alphabet received from Father Rou. It is called Hanscrit, that is, a pure Language; and because they believe this to be the Tongue in which God, by means of Brahma, gave them the four Bêths (see VEDA), which they esteem Sacred Books, they call it a Holy and Divine Language."—Bernier, E.T. 107; [ed. Constable, 335].

1673.—"... who founded these, their Annals nor their Sanscrit deliver not."—Fryer, 161.

1839.—"... the learned Language among them is called the Sanscreek."—Ovington, 248.

1694.—"Indicus ludus Tekâper, sic nominatus veterum Brachmanorum lingua Indici dictâ Sanscroot, seu, ut vulgo, exiliori sunt elegantiae causâ Sanscreek, non autem Hanscreek ut minus recte eam nuncupat Kircherus."—Hyde, De Ludis Orientt., in Synagoga Dia., ii. 264.

1726.—"Above all it would be a matter of general utility to the Coast that some more chaplains should be maintained there for the sole purpose of studying the Sanskrit tongue (de Sanscritze taad) the head-and-mouth tongue of most of the Eastern languages, and once for all to make an exact translation of the Vedam or Law book of the Heathen. ..."—Valentijn, Chor: p. 72.

1760.—"They have a learned language peculiar to themselves, called the Hanscrit. ..."—Grose, i. 202.

1774.—"This code they have written in their own language, the Shanscrit. A translation of it is begun under the inspection of one of the body, into the Persian language, and from that into English."—W. Hastings, to Lord Mansfield, in G eig, i. 402.

1778.—"The language so well as the written character of Bengal are familiar to the Natives ... and both seem to be base derivatives from the Shanscrit."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 5.

1782.—"La langue Sanscrit, Sanskrid, Hanscreek ou Grandon, est la plus étendue: ses caractères multipliés donnent beaucoup de facilité pour exprimer ses pensées, ce qui l'a fait nommer langue divine par le P. Pons."—Sonnerat, i. 224.

1794.—"With Jones, a linguist, Sanskrit, Greek, or Manks."—Pursuits of Literature, 6th ed. 236.

1796.—"La madre di tutte le lingue Indiane é la Sanskrida, cioè, lingua perfetta, piena, ben digerita. Krâa opera perfetta o compita, som, simul, insieme, o vuol dire lingua tutta insieme ben digerita, legata, perfetta."—Fra Paolino, p. 258.

SAPECA, SAPÈQUE, s. This word is used at Macao for what we call cash (q.v.) in Chinese currency; and it is the word generally used by French writers for that coin. Giles says: "From sapek, a coin found in Tonquin and Cochin-China, and equal to about half a pfennig (¹⁄₁₆ Thaler), or about one-sixth of a German Kreutzer" (Gloss. of Reference, 122). We cannot learn much about this coin of Tonquin. Milburn says, under 'Cochin China': "The only currency of the country is a sort of cash, called sappica, composed chiefly of tutenague (see TOOTNAGUE), 600 making a quan: this is divided into 10 mace of 60 cash each, the whole strung together, and divided by a knot at each mace." (ed. 1825, pp. 444-445). There is nothing here inconsistent with our proposed derivation, given later on. Mace and Sappica are equally Malay words. We can hardly doubt that the true origin of the term is that communicated by our friend Mr. E. C. Baber: "Very probably from Malay sa, 'one,' and paku, 'a string or file of the small coin called pichis.' Pichis is explained by Crawford as 'Small coin ... money of copper, brass, or tin.' ... It was the ancient coin of Java, and also the only one of the Malays when first seen by the Portuguese." Paku is written by Favre pekâ (Dict. Malais-Français) and is derived by him from Chinese pê-ko, 'cent.' In the dialect of Canton pak is the word for 'a hundred,' and one pak is the colloquial term for a string of one hundred cash." Sapecu would then be properly a string of 100 cash, but it is not difficult to conceive that it might through some misunderstanding (e.g. a confusion of peku and pichis) have been transferred to the single coin. There is a passage in Mr. Gerson da Cunha's Contributions to the Study of Portuguese Numismatics, which may seem at first sight inconsistent with this derivation. For he seems to imply that the smallest denomination of coin struck by Albuquerquc at Goa in 1510 was called cepayqua, i.e. in the year before the capture of Malaca, and consequent familiarity with Malay terms. I do not trace his authority for this; the word is not mentioned in the Commentaries of Alboquerque, and it is quite possible that the dinheiros, as these small copper coins were also called, only received the name cepayqua at a later date, and some time after the occupation of Malacca (see Da Cunha, pp. 11-12, and 22). [But also see the quotation of 1510 from Correa under PARDAO. This word has been discussed by Col. Temple (Ind. Antiq., August 1897, pp. 222 seq.), who gives quotations establishing the derivation from the Malay sapaku.]

[1639.—"It (caxa, cash) hath a four-square hole through it, at which they string them on a Straw; a String of two hundred Caxzes, called Sata, is worth about three farthings sterling, and five Satas tyed together make a Sapoco. The Javians, when this money first came amongst them, were so cheated with the Novelty, that they would give six bags of Pepper for ten Sapocnes, thirteen whereof amount to but a Crown."—Mun- derislo, Voyages, E.T. p. 117.]

[1703.—"This is the reason why the Caxzes are valued so little: they are punched in the middle, and string'd with little twists of Straw, two hundred in one Twist, which is called Santa, and is worth nine Deniers. Five Santas tied together make a thousand Caxzes, or a Sapoon (? Sapoco)."—Collection of Dutch Voyages, 198.]

[1830.—"The money current in Bali consists solely of Chinese pice with a hole in the centre. . . . They however put them up in hundreds and thousands; two hundred are called sathe, and are equal to one rupee copper, and a thousand called Sapaku, are valued at five rupees."—Singapore Chronicle, June 1830, in Moor, Indian Archip. p. 94.]

[1892.—"This is a brief history of the Sapec (more commonly known to us as the cash), the only native coin of China, and which is found everywhere from Malaysia to Japan."—Ridgeway, Origin of Currency, 157.]

SAPPAN-WOOD. s. The wood of Caesalpinia sappan; the bakkam of the Arabs, and the Brazil-wood of medieval commerce. Bishop Caldwell at one time thought the Tamil name, from which this was taken, to have been given because the wood was supposed to come from Japan. Rumphius says that Siam and Champa are the original countries of the Sappan, and quotes from Rheede that in Malabar it was called Tajampangan, suggestive apparently of a possible derivation from Champa. The mere fact that it does not come from Japan would not disprove this derivation any more than the fact that turkeys and maize did not originally come from Turkey would disprove the fact of the birds and the grain (gran turco) having got names from such a belief. But the tree appears to be indigenous in Malabar, the Deccan, and the Malay Peninsula; whilst the Malayāl. shappinanm, and the Tamil sappu, both signifying 'red (wood),' are apparently derivatives from shauva, 'to be red,' and suggest another origin as most probable. [The Mad. Gloss. gives Mal. chappannam, from chappu, 'leaf,' Skt. anga, 'body'; Tam. shappunam.] The Malay word is also sapang, which Crawford supposes to have originated the trade-name. If, however, the etymology just suggested be correct, the word must have passed from Continental India to the Archipelago. For curious particulars as to the names of this dye-wood, and its vicissitudes, see BRAZIL; [and Burnell's note on Lins- choten, Hak. Soc. i. 121].

1588.—"There are likewise some Diamants and also . . . . the wood Sapon, whereof also much is brought from Siam, it is like Brasill to die withall."—Linschoten, 36; [Hak. Soc. i. 120].

c. 1616.—"There are in this city of Ová (read Oloia, Judea), capital of the kingdom of Siam, two factories; one of the Hollanders with great capital, and another of the English with less. The trade which both drive is in deer-skins, shagreen sappan (sapão) and much silk which comes thither from Chineheo and Cochinchina . . . ."—Borsaro, Decades, 590.

[1615.—"Hindering the cutting of baccam or brazill wood."—Foster, Letters, iii. 158.]

1616.—"I went to Sapān Dono to know whether he would lend me any money upon interest, as he promised me; but . . . . he drove me afe with words, offering to deliver me money for all our sappon which was com in this junk, at 22 mos per pico."—Cocks's Diary, i. 208-9.

1617.—Johnson and Pitts at Judea in Siam "are glad they can send a junk well laden with sapon, because of its scarcity."—Sainsbury, ii. 32.

1860. — "The other productions which constituted the exports of the island were Sapan wood to Persia. . . ."—Tennent, Ceylon, ii. 54.

SARBATANE, SARBACANE, s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it often occurs in French works on the East, as applied to the blowing-tubes used by various tribes of the Indian Islands for discharging small arrows, often poisoned. The same instrument is used among the tribes of northern South America, and in some parts of Madagascar. The word comes through the Span. cebplatana, cebbatana, zarbatana, also Port. zarbatana, &c., Ital. cebbotana, Mod. Greek ζαρποτάνα, from the Ar. zabatana, 'a tube for blowing pellets' (a pea-shooter in fact!). Dozy says that the r must have been sounded in the Arabic of the Spanish Moors, as Pedro de Alcala translates zebbatana by Ar. zarbatana. The resemblance of this to the Malay sumpit-tan (q.v.) is curious, though it is not easy to suggest a transition, if the Arabic word is, as it appears, old enough to have been introduced into Spanish. There is apparently, however, no doubt that in Arabic it is a borrowed word. The Malay word seems to be formed directly from sumpit, 'to discharge from the mouth by a forcible expiration' (Crawford, Mal. Dict.).

[1516.—"... the force which had accompanied the King, very well armed, many of them with bows, others carrying blowing tubes with poisoned arrows (Zarbatanam com setas erradas, ...")—Comm. of Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. iii. 104.]

SARBOJI, s. This is the name of some weapon used in the extreme south of India; but we have not been able to ascertain its character or etymology. We conjecture, however, that it may be the long lance or pike, 18 or 20 feet long, which was the characteristic and formidable weapon of the Marava Colleries (q.v.). See Bp. Caldwell's H. of Tinnevelly, p. 103 and passim; [Stuart, Man. of Tinnevelly, 50. This explanation is probably incorrect. Welsh (Military Rem. i. 104) defines sarabogies as "a species of park guns, for firing salutes at feasts, &c.; but not used in war." It has been suggested that the word is simply Hind. sivbojha, 'a head-load,' and Dr. Grierson writes: "'Laden with a head' may refer to a head carried home on a spear." Dr. Pope writes; "Sarboji is not found in any Dravidian dialect, as far as I know. It is a synonym for Sivaji. Sarbha (sarbo)-ji is honorific. In the Tanjore Inscription it is Serfogi. In mythology Siva's name is 'arrow,' 'spear,' and 'head-burthen,' of course by metonymy." Mr. Brandt suggests Tam. sēṟū, "war," byger, "a tube." No weapon of the name appears in Mr. Egerton's Hand-book of Indian Arms.]

1801.—"The Rt. Hon. the Governor in Council . . . orders and directs all persons, whether Polygars (see POLIGAR), Colleries, or other inhabitants possessed of arms in the Provinces of Dindigul, Tinnevelly, Ramnad-puram, Sivagangai, and Madura, to deliver the said arms, consisting of Muskets, Matchlocks, Pikes, Gingauls (see GINGALL), and Sarabogoi to Lient.-Col. Agnew . . ."

c. 1814.—"Those who carry spear and sword have land given them producing 5 kalams; those bearing muskets, 7 kalams; those bearing the sarboji, 9 kalams; those bearing the sanjāli (see GINGALL), or gun for two men, 14 kalams. . . ."
—Account of the Maravas, from Mackenzie MSS. in Madras Journal, iv. 360.

SAREE, s. Hind. sārī, sarā. The cloth which constitutes the main part of a woman's dress in N. India, wrap round the body and then thrown over the head.

1598.—"... likewise they make whole pieces or webbes of this heare, sometimes mixed and woven with silke. . . . Those webs are named saryn . . ."—Linschoten, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 96].

1785.—"... Her clothes were taken off, and a red silk covering (a saurry) put upon her."—Act. of a Sutte, in Seton-Karr, i. 90.

SARNAU, SORNAU, n.p. A name often given to Siam in the early part of the 16th century; from Shahr-i-nau, Pers. 'New-city;' the name by which Yuthia or Ayodhya (see JUDEA), the capital founded on the Menam about 1350, seems to have become known to the traders of the Persian Gulf. Mr. Bradell (J. Ind. Arch. v. 317) has suggested that the name (Sheher-al-nawī, as he calls it) refers to the distinction spoken of by La Loubère between the Thai-Yai, an older people of the race, and the Thai-Noi, the people known to us as Siamee. But this is less probable,
We have still a city of Siam called Lophaburi, and a city of Bengal, the cities of Zirbad, Tenasiri, Sokotora, Shahr-i-nao; and this indeed may have first given rise to the latter name. The Cernove of Nicolo Conti (c. 1430) is generally supposed to refer to a city of Bengal, and one of the present writers has identified it with Lakhnauti or Gaur, an official name of which in the 14th cent. was Shahr-i-nao. But it is just possible that Siam was the country spoken of.

1442.—"The inhabitants of the sea-costs arrive here (atOrmuz) from the counties of Chfn, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbad, Tenasiri, Sokotora, Shahr-i-nao...." Abdurrazzak, in Not. et Acta, xiv. 429.

1510.—"... They said they were from a city called Sarnau, and had brought for sale silken stuffs, and aloeswood, and benzoin, and musk."—Varthema, 110.

1514.—"... Tannazzari, Sarnau, where is produced all the finest white benzoin, storax, and lac finer than that of Martaman, Letter of Giov. d'Empoli, in Arch. Storico Italiano, App. 80.

1540.—"... all along the coast of Malaya, and within the land, a great King commands, who for a more famous and recommendable Title above all other Kings, causeth himself to be called Prechau Salem, Emperor of all Sornau, which is a Country wherein there are thirteen kingdoms, by us commonly called Siam" (Sião).—Pinto (orig. cap. xxxvi.), in Cogan, p. 43.

C. 1612.—"It is related of Siam, formerly called Sheher-al-Nawi, to which Country all lands under the wind here were tributary, that there was a King called Bubaninia, who when he heard of the greatness of Malaca sent to demand submission and homage of that kingdom."—Síjara Malaya, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 454.

1726.—"About 1340 reigned in the kingdom of Siam (then called Sjabinouw or Sornau), a very powerful Prince."—Valentijn, v. 319.

SARONG, s. Malay. sârung; the body-cloth, or long kilt, tucked or girt at the waist, and generally of coloured silk or cotton, which forms the chief article of dress of the Malays and Javanese. The same article of dress, and the name (saran) are used in Ceylon. It is an old Indian form of dress, but is now used only by some of the people of the south; e.g. on the coast of Malabar, where it is worn by the Hindus (white), by the Mappilas (Moplah) of that coast, and the Labhais (Lubbye) of Coromandel (coloured), and by the Bunts of Canara, who wear it of a dark blue. With the Labbais the coloured sarong is a modern adoption from the Malays. Crawford seems to explain sarung as Javanese, meaning first 'a case or sheath,' and then a wrapper or garment. But, both in the Malay islands and in Ceylon, the word is no doubt taken from Skt. sâranga, meaning 'variegated' and also a garment.'

[1830.—"... the cloth or sarong, which has been described by Mr. Marsden to be 'not unlike a Scots highlander's plaid in appearance, being a piece of party-coloured cloth, about 6 or 8 feet long, and 3 or 4 feet wide, sewed together at the ends, forming, as some writers have described it, a wide sack without a bottom.' With the Maldives, the sarong is either worn swung over the shoulders as a sash, or tucked round the waist and descending to the ankles, so as to enclose the legs like a petticoat."—Raffles, Java, i. 96.]

1858.—"He wore a sarong or Malay petticoat, and a green jacket."—Wallace, Mal. Arch. 171.

SATIGAM, n.p. Sâtigân, formerly and from remote times a port of much trade on the right bank of the Hoogly R., 30 m. above Calcutta, but for two and a half centuries utterly decayed, and now only the site of a few huts, with a ruined mosque as the only relic of former importance. It is situated at the bifurcation of the Saraswati channel from the Hoogly, and the decay dates from the silting up of the former. It was commonly called by the Portuguese Porto Ponqueno (q.v.).

C. 1340.—"About this time the rebellion of Fakhrâh broke out in Bengal. Fakhra and his Bengali forces killed Kâdar Khân (Governor of Lakhnauti). He then plundered the treasury of Lakhnauti, and secured possession of that place and of Sätigaun and Sunârgânaw."—Zia-ul-din Barânî, in Elliot, ii. 243.

1535.—"In this year Diogo Rabello, finishing his term of service as Captain and Factor of the Choromandel fishery, with license from the Governor went to Bengal in a vessel of his... and he went well armed along with two foists which equipped with his own money, the Governor only lending him artillery and nothing more. So this Diogo Rabello arrived at the Port of Satim, where he found two great ships of Cambaya which three days before had arrived with great quantity of merchandize, selling and buying; and these, without touching them, he caused to quit the port and go down the river, forbidding them to carry on any trade, and he also sent one of the foists, with 30 men, to the other port of Chatim, where they found three ships from the Coast of Choromandel, which were driven away from the port. And Diogo Rabello sent word to the Govizil that he was sent by the Governor with choice of peace or war, and that he should send to ask the King if he chose to liberate the (Portuguese) prisoners, in which case he also would liberate his ports and leave them in their former peace. . . .—Correa, iii. 619.

SATIN. s. This is of course English, not Anglo-Indian. The common derivation [accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. 2nd ed. s.v.)] is with Low Lat. sata, ‘silk,’ Lat. seta, sēta, ‘a bristle, a hair,’ the Port. sētim. Dr. Wells Williams (Mid. King., ii. 123) says it is probably derived eventually from the Chinese szê-blem, though interchangeably through other languages. It is true that szēm or sz'-tem is a common (and ancient) term for this sort of silk texture. But we may remark that trade-words adopted directly from the Chinese are comparatively rare (though no doubt the intermediate transit indicated would meet this objection, more or less). And we can hardly doubt that the true derivation is that given in Cathay and the Way Thither, p. 486; viz. from Zaitun or Zaityon, the name by which Chwan-chai (Chincheew), the great medieval port of western trade in Fokien, was known to western traders. We find that certain rich stuffs of damask and satin were called from this place, by the Arabs, Zaitūnia; the Span. aceytun (for ‘satin’), the medieval French zatony, and the medieval Ital. zetani, afford intermediate steps.

c. 1350.—“The first city that I reached after crossing the sea was Zaitim. . . . It is a great city, superb indeed; and in it they make masks of velvet as well as those of satin (kīnkhā—see KINCOB, ATLAS), which are called from the name of the city zaitūnia.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 299.

1352.—In an inventory of this year in Douel d’Aroy we have: “Zatony at 4 écus the ell” (p. 342).

1405.—“And besides, this city (Samar-land) is very rich in many wares which come to it from other parts. From Russia and Tartary come hides and linens, and from Cathay silk-stuffs, the best that are made in all that region, especially the setunis, which are said to be the best in the world, and the best of all are those that are without pattern.”—Clavijo (translated anew—the passage corresponding to Markham’s at p. 171). The word setuni occurs repeatedly in Clavijo’s original.

1440.—In the Libro de Gabelis, &c., of Giov. da Uzzano, we have mention among silk stuffs, several times, of ‘zetani velutati, and other kinds of zetani.’—Della Decina, iv. 58, 107, &c.

1441.—“Before the throne (at Bijanagar) was placed a cushion of zaitiuni satin, round which three rows of the most exquisite pearls were sewn.”—Abharruzad, in Elliot, iv. 120. (The original is ‘darapesh-i-takht bālisha az atlas-i-zaitiuni’; see Not, et Exs. xiv. 376. Quatremère (ibid. 462) translated ‘un carreau de satin olivé,’ taking zaitiun in its usual Arabic sense of ‘an olive tree.’) Also see Elliot, iv. 113.

SATRAP. s. Anc. Pers., kshatrapa, which becomes satrap, as kshaḥyathya becomes sāth. The word comes to us direct from the Greek writers who speak of Persia. But the title occurs not only in the books of Ezra, Esther, and Daniel, but also in the ancient inscriptions, as used by certain lords in Western India, and more precisely in Surashtra or Peninsular Guzerat. Thus, in a celebrated inscription regarding a dam, near Gīnarā:

c. A.D. 150.—“ . . . he, the Mahī-Khshaṭrāpa Rudradāman . . . for the increase of his merit and fame, has rebuilt the embankment three times stronger.”—In Indian Antiquary, vii. 262. The identity of this with sātraḷ was pointed out by James Prinsep, 1888 (J. As. Soc. Ben. vii. 345). [There were two Indian satrap dynasties, viz. the Western Satraps of Saurashtra and Gujarat, from about A.D. 150 to A.D. 988; for which see Rapson and Indrāji, The Western Kshatrapas (J. R. A. S., N. S., 1890, p. 689); and the Northern Kshatrapas of Mathura and the neighbouring territories in the 1st cent. A.D. See articles by Rapson and Indrāji in J. R. A. S., N. S., 1894, pp. 525, 541.]

1883.—“An eminent Greek scholar used to warn his pupils to beware of false analogies in philology. ‘Because,’ he used to say, ‘σατράπης is the Greek for satrap, it does not follow that parapēς is the Greek for rat-trap.’”—Sat. Rev. July 14, p. 53.
SATSUMA, n.p. Name of a city and formerly of a principality (daimio-ship) in Japan, the name of which is familiar not only from the deplorable necessity of bombarding its capital Kagosima in 1863 (in consequence of the murder of Mr. Richardson, and other outrages, with the refusal of reparation), but from the peculiar cream-coloured pottery made there and now well known in London shops.

1615.—"I said I had received suffition at his highnes hands in havinge the good hap to see the face of soo mightie a King as the King of Shashma; whereat he smiled."—Cocks’s Diary, i. 4-5.

1617.—"Speeches are given out that the cuboques or Japon players (or whores) going from Holland for Pusshuma to meete the Corean ambassadors, were set on by the way by a boate of Xaxma theives, and kild all both men and women, for the money they had gotten at Firando."—Ibid. 256.

SAUGOR, SAUGOR ISLAND, n.p. A famous island at the mouth of the Hoogly R., the site of a great fair and pilgrimage—properly Ganga Sāgara (‘Ocean Ganges’). It is said once to have been populous, but in 1688 (the date is clearly wrong) to have been swept by a cyclone-wave. It is now a dense jungle haunted by tigers.

1683.—"We went in our Budgeiros to see ye Pagodas at Sagor, and returned to ye Oyster River, where we got as many Oysters as we desired."—Hedges, March 12; [Hak. Soc. i. 68].

1684.—"James Price assured me that about 40 years since, when ye Island called Gonga Sagur was inhabited, ye Raja of ye Island gathered yearly Rent out of it, to ye amount of 26 Lacks of Rupees."—Ibid. Dec. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1705.—"Sagore est une Ile où il y a une Pagode très-regardée parmi les Gentils, où ils vont en pelerinage, et où il y a deux Faquers qui y font leur residence. Ces Faquers gavent charmer les bêtes feroces, qu’o y trouve en quantité, sans quoi ils seroient tous les jours exposes à estre devorez."—Luitier, p. 123.

1727.—"... among the Pagans, the Island Sagor is accounted holy, and great numbers of Jongies go yearlyither in the Months of November and December, to worship and wash in Salt-Water, the' many of them fall Sacrifices to the hungry Tigers."—A. Hamilton, ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

SAUL-WOOD, s. Hind. sāl, from Skt. sāla; the timber of the tree Shorea robusta, Gaertner, N.O. Dipteracarpaceae, which is the most valuable building timber of Northern India. Its chief habitat is the forest immediately under the Himalaya, at intervals throughout that region from the Brahmaputra to the Bías; it abounds also in various more southerly tracts between the Ganges and the Godavery. [The botanical name is taken from Sir John Shore. For the peculiar habitat of the Sāl as compared with the Teak, see Forsyth, Highlands of C.I. 25 seqq.] It is strong and durable, but very heavy, so that it cannot be floated without more buoyant aids, and is, on that and other accounts, inferior to teak. It does not appear among eight kinds of timber in general use, mentioned in the Ain. The saul has been introduced into China, perhaps at a remote period, on account of its connection with Buddha’s history, and it is known there by the Indian name, so-lo (Bretschneider on Chinese Botan. Works, p. 6).

c. 650.—"L’Honorable du siecle, animé d’une grande pitié, et obéissant à l’ordre des temps, jugea utile de paraître dans le monde. Quand il eut fin de convertir les hommes, il se plongea dans les joies du Nirvâna. Se plaçant entre deux arbres Sālas, il tourna sa tête vers le nord et s’endormit."—Hienon Thsaug, Mémoires (Voyages des Pèl. Bouddh. ii. 340).

1765.—"The produce of the country consists of saul timbers (a wood equal in quality to the best of our oak)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 200.

1774.—"This continued five kas; towards the end there are sāl and large forest trees."—Bogle, in Markham’s Tibet, 19.

1810.—"The saul is a very solid wood ... it is likewise heavy, yet by no means so ponderous as teak; both, like many of our former woods, sink in fresh water."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 69.

SAVER, SYRE, &c., s. Hind. from Arab. sa’dir, a word used technically for many years in the Indian accounts to cover a variety of items of taxation and impost, other than the Land Revenue.

The transitions of meaning in Arabic words are (as we have several times had occasion to remark) very obscure; and until we undertook the investigation of the subject for this article (a task in which we are indebted to the kind help of Sir H. Waterfield, of the India Office, one of the busiest men in the public service, but, as so often happens, one of the readiest to render assistance) the obscurity attaching to the word sayer in this sense was especially great.

Wilson, s.v. says: "In its original purport the word signifies moving, walking, or the whole, the remainder; from the latter it came to denote the remaining, or all other, sources of revenue accruing to the Government in addition to the land-tax." In fact, according to this explanation, the application of the term might be illustrated by the ancient story of a German Professor lecturing on botany in the pre-scientific period. He is reported to have said: 'Every plant, gentlemen, is divided into two parts. This is the root,—and this is the rest of it!' Land revenue was the root, and all else was 'the rest of it.'

Sir C. Trevelyan, again, in a passage quoted below, says that the Arabic word has "the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.'" Neither of these explanations, we conceive, pace tantorum virorum, is correct.

The term Sayer in the 18th century was applied to a variety of inland imposts, but especially to local and arbitrary charges levied by zamindars and other individuals, with a show of authority, on all goods passing through their estates by land or water, or sold at markets (bazar, haut, gunge) established by them, charges which formed in the aggregate an enormous burden upon the trade of the country.

Now the fact is that in sa'ir two old Semitic forms have coalesced in sound though coming from different roots, viz. (in Arabic) sa'ir, producing sa'ir, 'walking, current,' and sa'r, producing sa'r, 'remainder,' the latter being a form of the same word that we have in the Biblical Shear-jashub, 'the remnant shall remain' (Isaiah, vii. 3). And we conceive that the true sense of the Indian term was 'current or customary charges'; an idea that lies at the root of sundry terms of the same kind in various languages, including our own Customs, as well as the dustyorey which is so familiar in India. This interpretation is aptly illustrated by the quotation below from Mr. Stuart's Minute of Feb. 10, 1790.

At a later period it seems probable that some confusion arose with the other sense of sa'ir, leading to its use, more or less, for 'et ceteras,' and accounting for what we have indicated above as erroneous explanations of the word.

I find, however, that the Index and Glossary to the Regulations, ed. 1832 (vol. iii.), defines: "Sayer. What moves. Variable imports, distinct from land-rent or revenue, consisting of customs, tolls, licenses, duties on merchandise, and other articles of personal moveable property; as well as mixed duties, and taxes on houses, shops, bazaars, &c." This of course throws some doubt on the rationale of the Arabic name as suggested above.

In a despatch of April 10, 1771, to Bengal, the Court of Directors drew attention to the private Bazar charges, as "a great detriment to the public collections, and a burthen and oppression to the inhabitants"; enjoining that no Buzars or Gunges should be kept up but such as particularly belonged to the Government. And in such the duties were to be rated in such manner as the respective positions and prosperity of the different districts would admit.

In consequence of these instructions it was ordered in 1773 that 'all duties coming under the description of Sayer Chelluntah (H. chalanta, 'in transit'), and Ruk-darry (radaree) . . . and other oppressive impositions on the foreign as well as the internal trade of the country' should be abolished; and, to prevent all pretext of injustice, proportional deductions of rent were conceded to the zamindars in the annual collections. Nevertheless the exactions went on much as before, in defiance of this and repeated orders. And in 1786 the Board of Revenue issued a proclamation declaring that any person levying such duties should be subject to corporal punishment, and that the zamindar in whose zamindarry such an offence might be committed, should forfeit his lands.

Still the evil practices went on till 1790, when Lord Cornwallis took up the matter with intelligence and determination. In the preceding year he had abolished all radaree duties in Behar and Benares, but the abuses in Bengal Proper seem to have been more swarming and persistent. On June 11, 1790, orders were issued resuming the collection of all duties indicated into the hands of Government; but this was followed after a few weeks (July 28) by an order abolishing them altogether, with some exceptions, which will be presently alluded to. This double step is explained by the Governor-General in a Minute dated July 18: "When I first proposed the resumption of the Sayer from the Landholders, it appeared to me advisable to continue the former collection (the unauthorised articles excepted) for the current year, in order that by the necessary accounts [we might have the means] for making a fair adjustment of the compensation, and at the same time acquire sufficient knowledge of the collections to enable us to enter upon the regulation of them from the commencement of the ensuing year. . . . The collections appear to be so numerous, and of so intricate a nature, as to preclude the possibility of regulating them all; and as the establishment of new rates for such articles as it might be thought advisable to continue would require much consideration, . . . I recommend that, instead of continuing the collection . . . for the current year . . . all the existing articles of Sayer collection (with the exception of the Abkarry (Abcarree) . . .) be immediately abolished; and that the Collectors be directed to withdraw their officers from the Gunges, Bazars and Hauts," compensation being duly made. The Board of Revenue could then consider on what few articles of luxury in general consumption it might be proper to reimpose a tax.

The Order of July 28 abolished "all duties, taxes, and collections coming under the denomination of Sayer (with the exception of the Government and Calcutta Customs, the duties levied on pilgrims at Gya, and other places of pilgrimage,—the Abkarry . . . which is to be collected on account of the Government . . . the collections made in the Gunges, Bazars and Hauts situated within the limits of Calcutta, and such collections as are confirmed to the landholders and the holders of Gunges &c. by the published Resolutions of June 11, 1790, namely, rent paid for the use of land (and the like) . . . or for orchards, pasture-ground, or fisheries sometimes included in the sayer under the denomination of phalkur (Hind. phalkar, from phal, 'fruit'), bunkur (from Hind. ban, 'forest or pasture-ground'), and julkur (Hind. jalkar, from jal, 'water'). . . ." These Resolutions are printed with Regn. XXVII. of 1793.

By an order of the Board of Revenue of April 28, 1790, correspondence regarding Sayer was separated from 'Land Revenue'; and on the 16th idem the Abkarry was separately regulated.

The amount in the Accounts credited as Land Revenue in Bengal seems to have included both Sayer and Abkarry down to the Accts. presented to Parliament in 1796. In the "Abstract Statement of Receipts and Disbursements of the Bengal Government" for 1793-94, the "Collections under head of Syer and Abkarry" amount to Rs. 10,98,256. In the Accounts, printed in 1799, for 1794-5 to 1796-7, the "Land and Sayer Revenues" are given, but Abkārī is not mentioned. Among the Receipts and Disbursements for 1800-1 appears "Syer Collections, including Abkaree, 7,81,925."

These forms appear to have remained in force down to 1833. In the accounts presented in 1834, from 1828-9, to 1831-2, with Estimate for 1832-3, Land Revenue is given separately, and next to it Syer and Abkaree Revenue. Except that the spelling was altered back to Sayer and Abkarry, this remained till 1856. In 1857 the accounts for 1854-5 showed in separate lines,—

Land Revenue,
Excise Duties, in Calcutta, Sayer Revenue,
Abkarry ditto.

In the accounts for 1861-2 it became—

Land Revenue,
Sayer and Miscellaneous,
Abkaree,

and in those for 1863-4 Sayer vanished altogether.

The term Sayer has been in use in Madras and Bombay as well as in Bengal. From the former we give an example under 1802; from the latter we have not met with a suitable quotation.

The following entries in the Bengal accounts for 1858-59 will exemplify the application of Sayer in the more recent times of its maintenance: —

Under Bengal, Behar and Orissa: —
Sale of Trees and Sunken Boats . . . Rs. 555 0 0
Under Pegu and Martaban Provinces: —
Fisheries . . . Rs. 1,22,874 0 2
Tax on Birds' nests &c. . . . 7,449 0 0
Fees for fruits and gardens . . . 7,287 9 1
Tax on Bees' wax . . . 1,179 8 0
Do. Collections . . . 8,050 0 0
Sale of Government Timbers, &c. . . . 4,19,141 12 8

Under the same: — Sale proceeds of unclaimed and confiscated Timbers . . . Rs. 146 11 10
Net Salvage on Drift Timbers . . . 2,247 10 0

6,09,043 1 9

(current Rupees) 3,01,00,000 . . . which is 9,35,691 Rupees less than the Average Collections of the three preceding Years. On this Jumna, the Estimate for 1791-2 is formed, and the Sayer Duties, and some other extra Collections, formerly included in the Land Revenue, being abolished, accounts for the Difference. . . . — Heads of Mr. Dundas's Speech on the Finances of the E.I. Company, June 5, 1792.

1793.— "A Regulation for re-enacting with alterations and modifications, the Rules passed by the Governor General in Council on 11th June and 28th July, 1790, and subsequent dates for the resumption and abolition of Sayer, or internal Duties and Taxes throughout Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa," &c. "Passed by the Governor General in Council on the 1st May, 1793. . . ." — Title of Regulation, XXVII. of 1793.

1802.— "The Government having reserved to itself the entire exercise of its discretion in continuing or abolishing, temporarily or permanently, the articles of revenue included according to the custom and practice of the country, under the several heads of salt and saltpetre,—of the sayer or duties by sea or land,—of the abkarry . . . of the excise duties,—of all takes personal and professional, as well as those derived from markets, fairs and bazaars,—of lakhiraj (see LACKERAGE) lands. . . . The permanent land-tax shall be made exclusively of the said articles now recited." — Madras Regulation, XXV. § iv.

1817.— "Besides the land-revenue, some other duties were levied in India, which were generally included under the denomination of Sayer." — Mill, H. of Br. India, v. 417.

1863.— "The next head was 'Sayer,' an obsolete Arabic word, which has the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.' It has latterly been composed of a variety of items connected with the Land Revenue, of which the Revenue derived from Forests has been the most important. The progress of improvement has given a value to the Forests which they never had before, and it has been determined . . . to constitute the Revenue derived from them a separate head of the Public Accounts. The other Miscellaneous Items of Land Revenue which appeared under 'Sayer,' have therefore been added to Land Revenue, and what remains has been denominated 'Forest Revenue.'" — Sir C. Trevelyan, Financial Statement, dd. April 30.

SCAVENGER, s. We have been rather startled to find among the MS. records of the India Office, in certain "Lists of Persons in the Service of the Right. Honble, the East India Company, in Fort St. George, and the other Places on the Coast of Choromandell," beginning with Feby. 1704, and in the entries for that year, the following:

"Fort St. David.

"5. Trevor Gaines, Land Customer and Scavenger of Cuddalore, 5th Councl. . . ."

"7. John Butt, Scavenger and Corn-meeter, Tevenapatam, Mercht."

Under 1714 we find again, at Fort St. George:

"Joseph Smart, Rentall General and Scavenger, 8th of Council."

and so on, in the entries of most years down to 1761, when we have, for the last time:

"Samuel Ardley, 7th of Council, Masulipatam, Land - Customer, Military Storekeeper, Rentall General, and Scavenger."

Some light is thrown upon this surprising occurrence of such a term by a reference to Cowell's Law Dictionary, or The Interpreter (published originally in 1607) new ed. of 1727, where we read:

"Scavenger. Scavagium. It is otherwise called Scavage, Shavage, and Schoaving; maybe deduced from the Saxon Scawian (Sceawian?) Ostenders, and is a kind of Toll or Custom exacted by Mayors, Sheriffs, &c., of Merchant-strangers, for Wares shewed or offered to Sale within their Precincts, which is prohibited by the Statute 19 H. 7, 8. In a Charter of Henry the Second to the City of Canterbury it is written Sevenga, and (in Mon. Ang. 2, per fol. 890 b.) Scavengia; and elsewhere I find it in Latin Tributum Ostensarium. The City of London still retains the Custom, of which in an old printed Book of the Customs of London, we read thus, Of which Custom halfein del appartneth to the Sheriffs, and the other halfein del to the Hostys in whose Houses the Merchants been lodged; And it is to be not that Scavage is the Shep by cause that Merchants (sic) shewn unto the Sherif's Merchandizes, of which the Customs ought to be taken ere that any thing thereof be sold, etc.

"Scavenger, From the Belgick Scavan, to scrape. Two of every Parish within London and the suburbs are yearly chosen into this Office, who hire men called Rakers, and carts, to cleanse the streets, and carry away the Dirt and Filth thereof, mentioned in 13 Car. 2. The Germans call him a Drecksimon, from one Simon, a noted Scavenger of Marpurg.

"Schabalbus, The officer who collected the Scavage-Money, which was sometimes done with Extortion and great Oppression." (Then quotes Hist. of Durham from Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Pt. i. p. 75; "Anno 1311. Schavaldos insurgentes in Episcopatu (Richardus episcopus) fortiter composit. Aliqui suspendebantur, aliqui extra Episcopatum fugabantur.")"

In Spelman also (Glossarium Archæologicum, 1688) we find:

"Scavage.] Tributum quod a mercatoribus exigere solent nudinarum domini, ob licentiam proponenti ibidem venditionis mercimonia, a Saxon (sceawian) id est, Ostendere, inspicerie, Angl. schtawage and shtwage." Spelman has no Scavenger or Scavenger.

The scavage then was a tax upon goods for sale which were liable to duty, the word being, as Skeat points out, a Law French (or Low Latin?) formation from shew. ["From O.F. escaue-er, to examine, inspect. O. Sax. skewun, to behold; cognate with A.S. sceawan, to look at." (Concise Dilt. s.v.)] And the scavenger or scavenger was originally the officer charged with the inspection of the goods and collection of this tax. Passages quoted below from the Liber Albìus of the City of London refer to these officers, and Mr. Riley in his translation of that work (1861, p. 34) notes that they were "Officers whose duty it was originally to take custom upon the Scavage, i.e. inspection of the opening out, of imported goods. At a later date, part of their duty was to see that the streets were kept clean; and hence the modern word "scaven-ger," whose office corresponds with the rakyer (raker) of former times." [The meaning and derivation of this word have been discussed in Notes & Queries, 2 ser. ix. 325; 5 ser. v. 49, 452.]

We can hardly doubt then that the office of the Coromandel scavenger of the 18th century, united as we find it with that of "Rentall General," or of Land-customer," and held by a senior member of the Company’s Covenanted Service, must be understood in the older sense of Visitor or Inspector of Goods subject to duties, but (till we can find more light) we should suppose rather duties of the nature of bazar tax, such as at a later date we find classed as sayer (q.v.), than customs on imports from seaward. It still remains an obscure matter how the charge of the scavengers or scavengers came to be transferred to the oversight of streets and street-cleaning. That this must have become a predominant part of their duty at an early period is shown by the Scavenger's Oath which we quote below from the Liber Albus. In Skinner's Etymologicion, 1671, the definition is Collector sordium abrasarum (erroneously connecting the word with shaving and scraping), whilst he adds: "Nostri Scavengers vilissimo omnium ministerio sordes et purgamenta urbis auferendi funguntur." In Cotgrave's English-French Dict., ed. by Howel, 1673, we have: "Scabinger. Boueuer. Gadouard"—agreeing precisely with our modern use. Neither of these shows any knowledge of the less sordid office attaching to the name. The same remark applies to Ly's Juniurs, 1743. It is therefore remarkable to find such a survival of the latter sense in the service of the Company, and coming down so late as 1761. It must have begun with the very earliest of the Company's establishments in India, for it is probable that the denomination was even then only a survival in England, due to the Company's intimate connection with the city of London. Indeed we learn from Mr. Norton, quoted below, that the term scavage was still alive within the City in 1829.

Prior to 1419. — "Et debent ad dictum Wardemotum per Aldermannum et probos Wardae, necnon per juratores, eligi Constabularii, Scavegeours, Aleconners, Bedelle, et alii Officierii."—Liber Albus, p. 38.

"SERMET DE SCAVEGEOURS.

Et ces ne jerez—si Dieu vous eyde et lez Saintz."—Ibid. p. 313.

1594. — Letter from the Lords of the Council to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, requesting them to admit John de Cardenas to the office of Collector of Scavage, the reversion of which had . . . been granted to him.—Index to the Remembrancia of the C. of London (1787), p. 284.

1607. — Letter from the Lord Mayor to the Lord Treasurer . . . enclosing a Petition from the Ward of Aldersgate, complaining that William Court, an inhabitant of that Ward for 8 or 10 years past, refused to undergo the office of Scavenger in the Parish, claiming exemption . . . being privileged as Clerk to Sir William Spencer, Knight, one of the Auditors of the Court of Exchequer, and praying that Mr. Court, although privileged, should be directed to find a substitute or deputy and pay him.—Ibid. 288.

1628.—Letter . . . reciting that the City by ancient Charters held . . . "the office of Package and Scavage of Strangers' goods, and merchandise carried by them by land or water, out of the City and Liberties to foreign parts, whereby the Customs and Duties due to H.M. had been in an actual paid, and a stricter oversight taken of such commodities so exported."—Remembrancia, p. 321.

1632.—Order in Council, reciting that a Petition had been presented to the Board from divers Merchants born in London, the sons of Strangers, complaining that the "Pack of London required of them as much fees for Package, Ballage, Shewage, &c., as of Strangers not English-born . . ."—Ibid. 322.

1760. — "Mr. Handle, applying to the Board to have his allowance of Scavenger increased, and representing to us the great fatigue he undergoes, and loss of time, which the Board being very sensible of. Agreed we allow him Rs. 20 per month more than before on account of his diligence and assiduity in that post."—P. William Consn., in Long, 245. It does not appear from what this the duties of the scavenger in Mr. Handle's case were.

1829. — "The oversight of customable goods. This office, termed in Latin superius, is translated in another charter by the words search and surveying, and in the 2nd Charter of Charles I. it is termed the scavage, which appears to have been its most ancient and common name, and that which is retained to the present day . . . The real nature of this duty is not a toll for showing, but a toll paid for the oversight of showing; and under that name supervisius apertum it was claimed in an action of debt in the reign of Charles II. . . . The duty performed was seeing and knowing the merchandise on which the King's import customs were paid, in order that no concealment, or fraudulent practices . . . should deprive the King of his just dues . . . (The duty) was well known under the name of scavage, in the time of Henry III., and it seems at that time to have been a franchise of the commonalty."—G. Norton, Commentaries on the Hist., &c., of the City of London, 3rd ed. (1869), pp. 380-381.

SCRIVAN, s. An old word for a clerk or writer, from Port. escrevão.

[1616.—"He desired that some English might early on the Morow come to his howse, wher shall meetee a Scriuano and finish that busines."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 173. On the same page "The Scriuane of Zulpheckeareon."]

1673.—"In some Places they write on Cocoa-Leafes dried, and then use an Iron Style, or else on Paper, when they use a Pen made with a Reed, for which they have a Brass Case, which holds them and the Ink too, always stuck at the Girdles of their Scrivans."—Fryer, 191.

1683.—"Mr. Watson in the Taffaty ware-house without any provocation called me Pittyful Prodigall Scrivian, and told me my Hatt stood too high upon my head,"—Letter of S. Langley, in Hedges Diary, Sept. 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 108].

SCYMITAR, s. This is an English word for an Asiatic sabre. The common Indian word is talwar (see TULWAUR). We get it through the French cimeterre, Ital. scimiettra, and according to Marcel Devic originally from Pers. shamsheer (shimšir as he writes it). This would be still very obscure unless we consider the constant clerical confusion in the Middle Ages between c and t, which has led to several metamorphoses of words; of which a notable example is Fr. carquois from Pers. tirkhash. Scimiettra representing shimsheer might easily thus become scimiettra. But we cannot prove this to have been the real origin. This word (shamsheer) was known to Greek writers. Thus:

A.D. 93.—"... Καλα καθότητι τῶν πρεσβύτατον παύα Μορβάζων βασιλέα περαιότερο το διάδημα καὶ δούσα τον σμαινθρα τον πατρός δακτυλιών, τίτερε σαμψιρπάν θεομαβμένην παρ' αιτοίς."—Joseph. Antípig. xx. ii. 3.

C. A.D. 114. —"Δώρα φέρει Τραμάρινον υφάσματα στερκά καὶ σαμψίρας αἱ ἐκεί σπάθα βαρβαρικά."—Quoted in Suidas Lexicon, s.v.

1595.—"... By this scimitar,
That slew the Sophy, and a Persian prince
That won three fields of Sultan Soliman
... "—Merchant of Venice, ii. 1.

1610.—"... Anon the Patron starting up, as if of a sodaine restored to life; like a mad man skips into the boate, and drawing a Turkish Cymiter, beginneth to lay about him (thinking that his vessell had been surprized by Pirats), when they all leapt into the sea; and diving under water such many Dine-dappers, ascended without the reach of his furie."—Sandys, Relation, &c., 1615, p. 28.

1614.—"Some days ago I visited the house of a goldsmith to see a scimitar (scimittera) that Nazubahash the first vizir, whom I have mentioned above, had ordered as a present to the Grand Signor. Scabbard and hilt were all of gold; and all covered with diamonds, so that little or nothing of the gold was to be seen."—P. della Valle, i. 43.

c. 1630.—"They seldom go without their swords (shamshers they call them) form'd like a cresent, of pure metall, broad, and sharper than any rasor; nor do they value them, unless at one blow they can cut in two an Asinogo. ..."—Sir T. Herbert, ed.
1638, p. 228.

1675.—"I kept my hand on the Cock of my Carabine; and my Comrade followed a foote pace, as well armed; and our Janizary better than either of us both; but our Armenian had only a Scimeter."—(Sir)
George Wheler, Journey into Greece, London, 1682, p. 252.

1758.—"The Captain of the troop ... made a cut at his head with a scymetar which Mr. Lally parried with his stick, and a Coffeee (Gaffer) servant who attend him shot the Tanjerine dead with a pistol."
—Orme, i. 328.

SEACUNNY, s. This is, in the phraseology of the Anglo-Indian marine, a steersman or quartermaster.
The word is the Pers. sukkan, 'a helm.'

c. 1580.—"Aos Mocados, Socôes, e Vogas."—Primor e Honra, &c. i. 68c. ("To the Mocuddums, Seacunnes, and earsomen.")

c. 1590.—"Sukkanhangir, or helmman. He steers the ship according to the orders of the Mallerim."—Ain. i. 250.

1805. —"I proposed concealing myself with 5 men among the bales of cloth, till that should be night, when the Frenchmen being necessarily divided into two watches might be easily overpowered. This was agreed to ... till daylight, when unfortunately descriing the masts of a vessel on our weather beam, which was immediately supposed to be our old friend, the sentiments of every person underwent a most unfortunate alteration, and the Nakhoda, and the Soucan, as well as the Supercargo, informed me that they would not toll a lie for all the world, even to save their lives; and in short, that they would neither be aire nor part in the business."—Letter of Legden, dd. Oct. 4-7, in Morton's Life.
1810.—"The gunners and quartermasters ... are Indian Portuguese; they are called Secunnis."—Maria Graham, 85.

[1855.—"... the Seacunnies, or helmsmen, were principally Manilla men."—Neate, Residence in Siam, 45.]

SEBUNDY, s. Hind. from Pers. sibbandi (sth. 'three'). The rationale of the word is obscure to us. [Platts says it means 'three-monthly or quarterly payment.' The Madras Gloss, less probably suggests Pers. sipahbandi (see SEPOY), 'recruitment.'] It is applied to irregular native soldiery, a sort of militia, or imperfectly disciplined troops for revenue or police duties, &c. Certain local infantry regiments were formerly officially termed Sebundy. The last official appearance of the title that we can find is in application to "The Sebundy Corps of Sappers and Miners" employed at Darjeeling. This is in the E.I. Register down to July, 1869, after which the title does not appear in any official list. Of this corps, if we are not mistaken, the late Field-Marshall Lord Napier of Magdala was in charge, as Lieut. Robert Napier, about 1840. An application to Lord Napier, for corroboration of this reminiscence of many years back, drew from him the following interesting note:—

"Captain Gilmore of the (Bengal) Engineers was appointed to open the settlement of Darjeeling, and to raise two companies of Sebundy Sappers, in order to provide the necessary labour.

"He commenced the work, obtained some (Native) officers and N.C. officers from the old Bengal Sappers, and enlisted about half of each company.

"The first season found the little colony quite unprepared for the early commencement of the Rains. All the Coolies, who did not die, fled, and some of the Sappers deserted. Gilmore got sick; and in 1838 I was suddenly ordered from the extreme border of Bengal—Nynocelle—to relieve him for one month. I arrived somehow, with a pair of pitarahs as my sole possession.

"Just then, our relations with Nepaul became strained, and it was thought desirable to complete the Sebundy Sappers with men from the Border Hills not connected with Nepaul—Garrows and similar tribes. Through the Political Officer the necessary number of men were enlisted and sent to me.

"When they arrived I found, instead of the 'fair recruits' announced, a number of most unfit men; some of them more or less crippled, or with defective sight. It seemed probable that, by the process known to us in India as sudder buddle (see BUDLEE), the original recruits had managed to insert substitutes during the journey! I was much embarrassed as to what I should do with them; but night was coming on, so I encamped them on the newly opened road, the only clear space amid the dense jungle on either side. To complete my difficulty it began to rain, and I pitched my poor recruits! During the night there was a storm—and in the morning, to my intense relief, they had all disappeared!

"In the expressive language of my sergeant, there was not a 'visage' of the men left.

"The Sebundies were a local corps, designed to furnish a body of labourers fit for mountain-work. They were armed, and expected to fight if necessary. Their pay was £4, a month, instead of a Sepoy's 7s. The pensions of the Native officers were smaller than in the regular army, which was a ground of complaint with the Bengal Sappers, who never expected in accepting the new service that they would have lower pensions than those they enlisted for.

"I eventually completed the corps with Nepauis, and, I think, left them in a satisfactory condition.

"I was for a long time their only sergeant-major. I supplied the Native officers and N.C. officers from India with a good pea-jacket each, out of my private means, and with a little gold-lace made them smart and happy.

"When I visited Darjeeling again in 1872, I found the remnant of my good Sapper officers living as pensioners, and waiting to give me an affectionate welcome.

"* * *

"My month's acting appointment was turned into four years. I walked 30 miles to get to the place, lived much in hovels and temporary huts thrown up by my Hill-men, and derived more benefit from the climate than from my previous visit to England. I think I owe much practical teaching to the Hill-men, the Hills and the Climate. I learnt the worst the elements could do to me—very nearly—excepting earthquakes! And I think I was thus prepared for any hard work."

1778.—"At Dacca I made acquaintance with my venerable friend John Cowe. He had served in the Navy so far back as the memorable siege of Havannah, was reduced when a lieutenant, at the end of the American War, went out in the Company's military service, and here I found him in command of a regiment of Sebundees, or native militia."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in L. of the Lindsays, iii. 161.

1861.—"Sliding down Mount Tendong, the summit of which, with snow lying there, the Sebundy Sappers were employed cutting a passage for the mules; this delayed our march exceedingly."

SEEDY, s. Hind. sidi; Arab. sa'yid, 'lord' (whence the Cid of Spanish romantic history), sa'yidi, 'my lord'; and Mahr. siddhi. Properly an honorific name given in Western India to African Mahommedans, of whom many held high positions in the service of the kings of the Deccan. Of these at least one family has survived in princely position to our own day, viz. the Nawâb of Jangira (see JUNGEERA), near Bombay. The young heir to this principality, Siddhi Ahmad, after a minority of some years, was installed in the Government in Oct., 1883. But the proper application of the word in the ports and on the shipping of Western India is to negroes in general. [It "is a title still applied to holy men in Maroc and the Magrib; on the East African coast it is assumed by negro and negroid Moslems, e.g. Sidi Mubarak Bombay; and 'Seedy boy' is the Anglo-Indian term for a Zanzibar-man" (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 231).]

c. 1563.—"And among these was an Abyssinian (Abecim) called Cide Meriam, a man reckoned a great cavalier; and who entertained 500 horse at his own charges and who greatly coveted the city of Daman to quarter himself in, or at least the whole of its pergunnas (pergunnas—see PER-GUNNAH) to devour."—Conto, VII. x. 8.

SEEMUL, SIMMUL, &c. (sometimes we have seen Symbol, and Cymbal), s. Hind. semal andsembhal; [Skt. śānmāli]. The (so-called) cotton-tree Bombax Malabaricum, D.C. (N.O. Malvaceae), which occurs sporadically from Malabar to Sylhet, and from Burma to the Indus and beyond. It is often cultivated. “About March it is a striking object with its immense buttressed trunks, and its large showy red flowers, 6 inches in breadth, clustered on the leafless branches. The flower-buds are used as a potherb and the gum as a medicine” (Punjab Plants). We remember to have seen a giant of this species near Kishnahar, the buttresses of which formed chambers, 12 or 13 feet long and 7 or 8 wide. The silky cotton is only used for stuffing pillows and the like. The wood, though wretched in quality for any ordinary purpose, lasts under water, and is commonly the material for the curbs on which wells are built and sunk in Upper India.

[c. 1807.—“...the Salmoli, or Simul...is one of the most gaudy ornaments of the forest or village...”—Buchanan Hamilton, E. India, ii. 789.]

SEEE, s. Hind. ser; Skt. setak. One of the most generally spread Indian denominations of weight, though, like all Indian measures, varying widely in different parts of the country. And besides the variations of local ser and ser we often find in the same locality a pakkā (pucka) and a kachchhā (cutcha) ser; a state of things, however, which is human, and not Indian only (see under PUCKA). The ser is generally (at least in upper India) equivalent to 80 tolas or rupee-weights; but even this is far from universally true. The heaviest ser in the Useful Tables (see Thomas’s ed. of Prinsep) is that called “Coolpahar,” equivalent to 123 tolas, and weighing 3 lbs. 1 oz. 6½ dr. avoird.; the lightest is the ser of Malabar and the S. Maharatta country, which is little more than 8 oz. [The Macleod ser of Malabar, introduced in 1802, is of 130 tolas; 10 of these weigh 33 lb. (Madras Man. ii. 516.).]

Regulation VII. of the Govt. of India of 1833 is entitled “A Reg. for altering the weight of the Furruckabad Rupee (see RUPEE) and for assimilating it to the legal currency of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies; for adjusting the weight of the Company’s sicca Rupee, and for fixing a standard unit of weight for India.” This is the nearest thing to the establishment of standard weights that existed up to 1870. The preamble says: “It is further convenient to introduce the weight of the Furruckabad Rupee as the unit of a general system of weights for Government transactions throughout India.” And Section IV. contains the following:

“The Tola or Sicca weight to be equal to 180 grains troy, and the other denominations or weights to be derived from this unit, according to the following scale:—

8 Rutties = 1 Masha = 15 troy grains.
12 Mashas = 1 Tola = 150 ditto.
80 Tolas (or sicca weight) = 1 Seer = 2¾ lbs. troy.
40 Seers = 1 Men or Bazar Maund = 100 lbs. troy.”

Section VI. of the same Regulation says:

“The system of weights and measures (?) described in Section IV. is to be adopted at the mints and assay offices of Calcutta and Sangor respectively in the adjustment and verification of all weights for Government or public purposes sent thither for examination.”

But this does not go far in establishing a standard unit of weight for India: though the weights detailed in § iv. became established for Government purposes in the Bengal Presidency. The seer of this Regulation was thus 14,400 grains troy—2½ lbs. troy, 2.057 lbs. avoirdupois.

In 1870, in the Government of Lord Mayo, a strong movement was made by able and influential men to introduce the metrical system, and an Act was passed called “The Indian Weights and Measures Act” (Act XI. of 1870) to pave the way for this. The preamble declares it expedient to provide “for the ultimate adoption of an uniform system of weights and measures throughout British India, and the Act prescribes certain standards, with powers to the Local Governments to declare the adoption of these.”

Section II. runs:

“Standards.—The primary standard of weight shall be called ser, and shall be a weight of metal in the possession of the Government of India, which weight, when weighed in a vacuum, is equal to the weight known in France as the kilogramme des Archives.”
 Again, Act XXXI. of 1872, called "The Indian Weights and Measures of Capacity Act," repeats in substance the same preamble and prescription of standard weight. It is not clear to us what the separate object of this second Act was. But with the death of Lord Mayo the whole scheme fall to the ground. The ser of these Acts would be 2:2 lbs. avoirdupois, or 0:143 of a pound greater than the 80 tola ser.

SEER-FISH, s. A name applied to several varieties of fish, species of the genus Cymbium. When of the right size, neither too small nor too big, these are reckoned among the most delicate of Indian sea-fish. Some kinds salt well, and are also good for preparing as Tamarind-Fish. The name is sometimes said to be a corruption of Pers. síah (qu. Pers. 'black?') but the quotations show that it is a corruption of Port. serra. That name would appear to belong properly to the well-known saw-fish (Pristis) — see Bluteau, quoted below; but probably it may have been applied to the fish now in question, because of the serrated appearance of the rows of finlets, behind the second dorsal and anal fins, which are characteristic of the genus (see Day's Fishes of India, pp. 254-256, and plates iv., lvi.).

SEERP A W, s. Pers. through Hind, sar-a-pá — 'cap-a-pie.' A complete suit, presented as a Khilat (Killut) or dress of honour, by the sovereign or his representative.

c. 1666.—"He . . . commanded, there should be given to each of them an embroidery'd Vest, a Turban, and a Girdle of Silk Embroidery, which is that which they call Ser-apah, that is, an Habit from head to foot."—Bernier, E.T. 37; [ed. Constable, 147].

1673.—"Sir George Oxendine . . . had a Collat (Killut) or Serpaw, a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 87.

1780.—"The Answer is returned that it hath not been necessary for the Governors to go out to receive a bare Phymaund (Firmann), except there come therewith a Serpow or a Tashirife (Tashreef)."—F. St. Geo. Conn. Dec. 2, in N. & E. No. iii. 40.

1715.—"We were met by Padre Stephanus, bringing two Seerpaws."—In Wheeler, ii. 245.

1727.—"As soon as he came, the King embraced him, and ordered a serpaw or a royal Suit to be put upon him."—A. Hamilton, i. 171 [ed. 1744].

1735.—"The last Nabob (Sadatulla) would very seldom suffer any but himself to send a Serpaw; whereas in February last Sunta Sáhib, Subder Ali Sáhib, Jehan Khan and Imaum Sáhib, had all of them taken upon them to send distinct Seerpaws to the President."—In Wheeler, iii. 140.

1759.—"Another deputation carried six costly Seerpaws; these are garments which are presented sometimes by superiors in token of protection, and sometimes by inferiors in token of homage."—Orme, i. 159.

SEETULPUTTY. 809 SEPOY, SEAPOY.

SEETULPUTTY, s. A fine kind of mat made especially in Eastern Bengal, and used to sleep on in the cold weather. [They are made from the split stems of the mukta pata, Prynium dichotomum, Roxb. (see Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. 216 seq.)] Hind. situlpati, 'cold-slip.' Williamson's spelling and derivation (from an Arab. word impossibly used, see SICLEEGUR) are quite erroneous.

1810.—"A very beautiful species of mat is made ... especially in the south-eastern districts ... from a kind of reedy grass. ... These are peculiarly slippery, whence they are designated 'seekul-putty' ([i.e. polished sheets]. ... The principal uses of the 'seekul-putty' are to be laid under the lower sheet of a bed, thereby to keep the body cool."—Williamson, V.M., ii. 41.

[1818.—"Another kind (of mat) the shetulapatea, laid on beds and couches on account of their coolness, are sold from one ropee to five each."—Ward, Hindoos, i. 106.]

1879.—In Fallon’s Dicty, we find the following Hindi riddle:—

"Chhun jà pijaal tata, koi jyotà nakh; Majh ji kà bag lagà, koi toràt nakh; Situl-pati bichh, koi sotà nakh; Ráj-banshi mā, koi rota nakh."

Which might be rendered:

A china bowl that, broken, none can join;
A flowery field, whose blossoms none purloin;
A royal scion slain, and none shall weep;
A situlpati spread where none shall sleep.

The answer is an Egg; the Stary Sky; a Snake (*Ráj-banshi, ‘royal scion,’ is a placatory name for a snake); and the Sea.

SEMBALL, s. Malay-Javan. sambil, sambil. A spiced condiment, the curry of the Archipelago. [Dennys (Descr. Dict. p. 337) describes many varieties.]

1817.—"The most common seasoning employed to give a relish to their insipid food is the lombook ([i.e. red-pepper]; triturated with salt it is called sambel."

—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 98.

SEPOY, SEAPOY, s. In Anglo-Indian use a native soldier, disciplined and dressed in the European style. The word is Pers. sipádí, from sipád, ‘soldier, an army'; which J. Oppert traces to old Pers. spádá, ‘a soldier" (Le peuple et la Langue des Médes, 1879, p. 24). But Shah is a horseman in Armenian; and sound etymologists connect sipád with *asy, ‘a horse’; [others with Skt. padáti, ‘a foot-soldier]. The original word sipádī occurs frequently in the poems of Amír Khurshú (*c. A.D. 1300), bearing always probably the sense of a ‘horse-soldier,’ for all the important part of an army then consisted of horsemen. See spádī below.

The word sepoy occurs in Southern India before we had troops in Bengal; and it was probably adopted from Portuguese. We have found no English example in print older than 1750, but probably an older one exists. The India Office record of 1747 from Fort St. David's is the oldest notice we have found in extant MS. [But see below.]

c. 1300.—"Pride had inflated his brain with wind, which extinguished the light of his intellect, and a few sipádis from Hindu-stan, without any religion, had supported the credit of his authority."—Amír Khurshú, in Elliott, iii. 598.

[1865.—"Soldier—Suppya and Haddée."—Persian Gloss. in Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1877, p. 99.]

1682.—"As soon as these letters were sent away, I went immediately to Ray Nundellall's to have ye Seappy, or Nabob's horseman, consigned to me, with order to see ye Perramma put in execution; but having thought better of it, ye Ray desired me to have patience till tomorrow morning. He would then present me to the Nabob, whose commands to ye Seappy and Bul-chunds Vekel would be more powerful and advantageous to me than his own."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 55, seq. Here we see the word still retaining the sense of ‘horseman’ in India.

[1717.—"A Company of Sepoys with the colours."—I'tle, in ditto, ii. ecclis. On this Sir H. Yule notes: "This is an occurrence of the word sepoy, in its modern signification, 30 years earlier than any I had been able to find when publishing the A.-I. Gloss. I have one a year earlier, and expect now to find it earlier still."

[1733.—"You are next ... to make a complete survey ... of the number of fighting Sępovs ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 55.]

1737.—"Elle com tota una força desponível, que eram 1156 soldados pagos em que entra-ram 281 chegados na mão Mercês, o 780 sypaes ou lascarios (lascar), recuperou o território."—Azion de las Possesions Portu-guesas no Oriente, &c., por Joaquim Pedro Celestino Soares, Lisboa, 1851, p. 58.

1746.—"The Enemy, by the best Intelligence that could be got, and best Judgment that could be formed, had or would have on Shore next Morning, upwards of 3000 Europeans, with at least 500 Cofryns, and a number of Cepboys and Peons."—Eest. of Diary, &c., in App. to A Letter to a Proprietor of the E.I. Co., London, 1750, p. 94.

[1746.—Their strength on shore I compute 2000 Europeans Shipahs and 300 Cooffresses."—Letter from Madras, Oct. 9, in Bengal Consultations. Ibid. p. 600, we have Seapies.]

"It is further ordered that Captn. Crompton keep the Detachment under his Command at Cuddalore, in a readiness to march to the Choultry over against the Fort as soon as the Signal shall be made from the Place, and then upon his firing two Muskets, Boats shall be sent to bring them here, and to leave a serjeant at Cuddalore Who shall conduct his Seapoy to the Garden Guard, and the Serjeant shall have a Word by which He shall be received at the Garden."—Original MS. Proceedings (in the India Office)."

The Council of Fort St. David write to Bombay March 16th, "if they could not supply us with more than 300 Europeans, We should be glad of Five or Six Hundred of the best Northern People their way, as they are reported to be much better than ours, and not so liable to Desertion."

In Consn. May 30th they record the arrival of the ships Leven, Warwick, and Ilchester, Princess Augusta, "on the 28th inst., from Bombay, (bringing) us a General from that Presidency," as entered No. 38, advising of having sent us by them sundry stores and a Reinforcement of Men, consisting of 70 European Soldiers, 200 Topasses (Topaz), and 100 well-trained Seapoyes, all of which under the command of Capt. Thomas Andrews, a Good Officer."

And under July 13th. "... The Reinforcement of Seapoyes having arrived from Tellicherry, which, with those that were sent from Bombay, making a formidable Body, besides what are still expected; and as there is far greater Dependance to be placed on those People than on our own Peons... many of whom have a very weakly Appearance, Agreed, that a General Review be now had of them, that all such may be discharged, and only the Chioceest of them continued in the Service."—MS. Records in India Office.

1752.—"... they quitted their entrenchments on the first day of March, 1752, and advanced in order of battle, taking possession of a rising ground on the right, on which they placed 30 Europeans; the front consisted of 1500 Sipoyes, and one hundred and twenty or thirty French."—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1761, pp. 9-10.

1758.—A Tabular Statement (Mappe) of the Indian troops, 20th Jan. of this year, shows "Corpo de Sipaes" with 1162 "Sipeps" besides.—Bosquejo, as above.

"A stout body of near 1000 Seapoyes has been raised within these few days."—In Long, 134.

[1759.—"Boat rice extraordinary for the Gentoo Seapois. "..."—Ibid. 174.]

1763.—"The Indian natives and Moors, who are trained in the European manner, are called Sipoyes."—Orme, i. 80.

1763.—"Major Carnac... observes that your establishment is loaded with the expense of more Captains than need be, owing to the unnecessarily making it a point that they should be Captains who command the Seapoy Battalions, whereas such officers are not in manner of Seapoyes that it requires a peculiar genius and talent to be qualified for that service, and the Battalion should be given only to such who are so without regard to rank."—Court's Letter, of March 9. In Long, 290.

1770.—"England has at present in India an establishment to the amount of 8800 European troops, and 54,000 sipahis well armed and disciplined."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 459.

1774.—"Sipai sono li soldati Indiani."—Della Tomba, 297.

1778.—"La porta del Ponente della città si custodiva dalli sipai soldati Indiani radunati da tutte le tribù, e religioni."—Fra Paolino, Viaggio, 4.

1780.—"Next morning the sepoys came to see me... I told him that I owed my life... He then told me that he was not very rich himself, as his pay was only a pagoda and a half a month—and at the same time drew out his purse and offered me a rupee. This generous behaviour, so different to what I had hitherto experienced, drew tears from my eyes, and I thanked him for his generosity, but I would not take his money."—Hon. J. Lindsay's Imprisonment, Lives of Lindseys, iii. 274.

1782.—"As to Europeans who run from their natural colours, and enter into the service of the country powers, I have heard one of the best officers the Company ever had... say that he considered them no otherwise than as so many Seapoyes; for acting under blacks they became mere blacks in spirit."—Price, Some Observations, 95-96.

1789.—"There was not a captain, nor scarce a sepoys, But a Prince would depose, or a Bramin destroy."—Letter of Simpkin the Second, &c., 8.

1803.—"Our troops behaved admirably; the sepoys astonished me."—Wellington, ii. 384.
1827.—"He was betrothed to the daughter of a Sipahee, who served in the mud-fort which they saw at a distance rising above the jungle."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1836.—"The native army of the E. I. Company...Their formation took place in 1757. They are usually called sepoys, and are light and short."—In R. Phillips, A Million of Facts, 715.

1831.—"As early as a.d. 1592 the chief of Sind had 200 natives dressed and armed like Europeans: these were the first "sepoys.""—Burton's Camoens, A Commentary, ii. 150.

The French write cipaye or cipay:

1759.—"De quinze mille Cipayes dont l'armée est censée composée, j'en compte à peu près huit cens sur la route de Pondicherry, chargé de sucre et de poivre et autres marchandises, quant aux Coulis, ils sont tous employés pour le même objet."—Letter of Lally to the Governor of Pondicherry, in Cambridge's Account, p. 150.

c. 1835-38.—"The regular cavalry was also originally composed of tribute children. The sipahis acquired the same pre-eminence among the cavalry which the janissaries held among the infantry, and their seditious conduct rendered them much sooner troublesome to the Government."—Finlay, H. of Greece, ed. 1877, v. 37.

SERAI, SERYE, s. This word is used to represent two Oriental words entirely different.

a. Hind. from Pers. sara, sarai. This means originally an edifice, a palace. It was especially used by the Turks when they began to build palaces. Hence Sarai, the name of one of the royal residence of the Mongol Khans upon the Volga, the Sarra of Chaucer. The Russians retained the word from their Tartar oppressors, but in their language sarai has been degraded to mean 'a shed.'

The word, as applied to the Palace of the Grand Turk, became, in the language of the Levantine Franks, sera'il and serraglio. In this form, as P. della Valle lucidly explains below, the "striving after meaning" connected the word with Ital. serrato, 'shut up,' and with a word serraglio perhaps previously existing in Italian in that connection. [Serraglio, according to Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) is "formed with suffix-aglio (L. -aculum) from Late Lat. sarare, 'to bar, shut in'—Lat. sera, a 'bar, bolt;' Lat. serere, 'to join together.'] It is this association that has attached the meaning of 'women's apartments' to the word. Sarai has no such specific sense.

But the usual modern meaning in Persia, and the only one in India, is that of a building for the accommodation of travellers with their pack-animals; consisting of an enclosed yard with chambers round it.

Recurring to the Italian use, we have seen in Italy the advertisement of a travelling menagerie as Serraglio di Belbo. A friend tells us of an old Scotchman whose ideas must have run in this groove, for he used to talk of 'a Serragle of blackguards.' In the Diary in England of Annibale Litolfi of Mantua the writer says: "On entering the tower there is a Serraglio in which, from grandeur, they keep lions and tigers and cat-lions." (See Rawdon Brown's Calendar of Papers in Archives of Venice, vol. vi. pt. iii. 1557-8. App.) [The Stanf. Dict. quotes Evelyn as using the word of a place where persons are confined: 1644. "I passed by the Piazza Judea, where their serraglio begins" (Diary, ed. 1872, i. 142.).]

c. 1584.—"At Sariaum Turcis palatium principis est, vel alind aedificium, non a Car* voce Tatarica, quae regem significat, dictum; unde Reineccius Saragliam Turcis vocari putet, ut region. Nam aliena quoque domus, extra Sultani region, nomen hoc ferent... vt ampla Turcorum hospitia, sive diversa publica, quae vulgo Caravansaries (Caravansery) nostri vacant." —Leunclavius, ed. 1550, p. 103.

1609.—"... by it the great Suray, besides which are divers others, both in the city and suburbs, wherein divers neat lodgings are to be let, with doores, lockes, and keys to each." —W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 434.

1614.—"This term serraglio, so much used among us in speaking of the Grand Turk's dwelling... has been corrupted into that form from the word serai, which in their language signifies properly 'a palace.'... But since this word serai resembles serrato, as a Venetian would call it, or serraglio as we say, and seeing that the palace of the Turk is (serrato or) shut up all round by a strong wall, and also because the women and a great part of the courtiers dwell in it barred up and shut in, so it may perchance have seemed to some to have deserved such a name. And thus the real term serai has been converted into serraglio." —P. della Valle, i. 36.

1615.—"Onely from one dayes Journey to another the Sophie hath caused to be erected certaine kind of great harbours, or huge lodgings (like hamlets) called caravansara, or surroyes, for the benefit of Caravanes. ..." —De Montfart, 8.

1616.—"In this kingdome there are no Houses to entertaine strangers, only in great Townes and Cities are faire Houses built for their receit, which they call Sarryn, not inhabited, where any Passenger may have roome freely, but must bring with him his Bedding, his Cooke, and other necessaries." —Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1475.

1638.—"Which being done we departed from our Sarry (or Inne)." —W. Bruton, in Hakl. v. 49.

1648.—"A great sary or place for housing travelling folk." —Van Tweist, 17.

[1754.—"... one of the Sciddes (seedy) officers with a party of men were lodged in the Sorrey..." —Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 307.]

1782.—"The stationary tenants of the Seranee, many of them women, and some of them very pretty, approach the traveller on his entrance, and in altering language describe to him the varied excellencies of their several lodgings." —Forster, Journeys, ed. 1808, i. 86.

1825.—"... the whole number of lodgers in and about the serai, probably did not fall short of 500 persons. What an admirable scene for an Eastern romance would such an inn as this afford!" —Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 122.

1850.—"... He will find that, if we omit only three names in the long line of the Delhi Emperors, the comfort and happiness of the people were never contemplated by them; and with the exception of a few sarais and bridges,—and these only on roads traversed by the imperial camps—he will see nothing in which purely selfish considerations did not prevail." —Sir H. M. Elliot, Original Preface to Historians of India, Elliot, i. xxiii.

b. A long-necked earthenware (or metal) flagon for water; a goget (q.v.). This is Ar.—P. gurudh. [This is the dork or kalleh of Egypt, of which Lane (Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 186 seq.) gives an account with illustrations.]

c. 1666.—"... my Nwab having vouchsafed me a very particular favour, which is, that he hath appointed to give me every day a new loaf of his house, and a Souray of the water of Ganges... Souray is that Tin-flagon full of water, which the servant that marcheth on foot before the Gentleman on horseback, carrieth in his hand, wrapt up in a sleeve of red cloath." —Bermier, E.T. 114; [ed. Constable, 356].

1808.—"... We had some bread and butter, two surahees of water, and a bottle of brandy." —Elphinstone, in Life, i. 183.

[1880.—"The best known is the gilt silver work of Cashmere, which is almost confined to the production of the water-vessels or sarais, copied from the clay goblets in use throughout the northern parts of the Pan-jab." —Birdwood, Indus. Arts of India, 149.]

SERANG, s. A native boatswain, or chief of a lascar crew; the skipper of a small native vessel. The word is Pers. sarhang, 'a commander or overseer.' In modern Persia it seems to be used for a colonel (see Wills, 80).
(Macao) from the City of Goa, as occurs every year. They are commanded by Captains, with Pilots, quartermasters, clerks, and other officers, who are Portuguese; but manned by sailors who are Arabs, Turks, Indians, and Bengalis, who serve for so much a month, and provide themselves under the direction and command of a chief of their own whom they call the Saranghi, who also belongs to one of these nations, whom they understand, and recognise and obey, carrying out the orders that the Portuguese Captain, Master, or Pilot may give to the said Saranghi.—Carletti, Viegs, ii. 206.

1690.—"Indus quem de hoc Ludo consului fuit scriba satis peritus ab officio in nave sua dictus le sarang, Anglico boatswain sed Bosun."—Hyde, De Ludo Orienti, in Syntagma, ii. 264.

[1822.—"... the ghaut syranga (a class of men equal to the kidnappers of Holland and the crimps of England). ..."—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 256.]

SERAPHIN. See XERAFIN.

SERENDĪB, n.p. The Arabic name of the city of Ceylon in the earlier Middle Ages. (See under CEYLON.)

SERINGAPATAM, n.p. The city which was the capital of the Kingdom of Mysore during the reigns of Hyder Ali and his son Tipoo. Written Sri-ranga-pattana, meaning according to vulgar interpretation 'Vishnu's Town.' But as both this and the other Srirangam (Seringam town and temple, so-called, in the Trichinopoly district) are on islands of the Cauvery, it is possible that ranga stands for Lanka, and that the true meaning is 'Holy-Isle-Town.'

SERPEYCH, s. Pers. skarpech, skarpech; an ornament of gold, silver or jewels, worn in front of the turban; it sometimes consists of gold plates strung together, each plate being set with precious stones. Also a band of silk and embroidery worn round the turban.

[1753.—"... a fillet. This they call a sirpeach, which is worn round the turban; persons of great distinction generally have them set with precious stones."—Hanway, iv. 191.

[1786.—"Surpaishes." See under CULGEE.

[1813.—"Serpeych." See under KIL-LUT.]

SETT, s. Properly Hind. seth, which according to Wilson is the same word with the Cheetti (see GHTTY) or Shetti of the Malabar Coast, the different forms being all from Skt. śresthī, 'best, or chief;' śrestha, 'the chief of a corporation, a merchant or banker.' C. P. Brown entirely denies the identity of the S. Indian shetti with the Skt. word (see GHTTY).

1740.—"The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Fillick Chund (&c.), they being of a different caste; and consequently they could not do business with them."—In Long, p. 9.

1757.—"To the Seats Mootabray and Roopchund the Government of Chandnagore was indebted a million and a half Rupees."—Orme, ii. 198 of reprint (Bk. vili.).

1776.—"As soon as an European arrived the Gentoons, who know mankind better than is commonly supposed, study his character ... and lend or procure him money upon bottomry, or at interest. This interest, which is usually 9 per cent. at this is higher when he is under a necessity of borrowing of the Cheyks.

"These Cheyks are a powerful family of Indians, who have, time immemorial, inhabited the banks of the Ganges. Their riches have long ago procured them the management of the bank belonging to the Court. ..."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 427. Note that by Cheyks the Abbé means Setsa.

[1883.—"... from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin a security endorsed by the Mathura Seth is as readily convertible into cash as a Bank of England Note in London or Paris."—F. S. Grose, Mathura, 14.]

SETTLEMENT, s. In the Land Revenue system of India, an estate or district is said to be settled, when instead of taking a quota of the year's produce the Government has agreed with the cultivators, individually or in community, for a fixed sum to be paid at several periods of the year, and not liable to enhancement during the term of years for which the agreement or settlement is made. The operation of arranging the terms of such an agreement, often involving tedious and complicated considerations and enquiries, is known as the process of settlement. A Permanent Settlement is that in which the annual payment is fixed in perpetuity. This was introduced in Bengal by Lord Cornwallis in 1793, and does not exist except within that great Province, [and a few districts in the Benares division of the N.W.P., and in Madras.] [SEVEN PAGODAS, n.p. The Tam. Mawalliparam, Skt. Mahabali-pura, 'the City of the Great Ball,' a place midway between Sadras and Covelong. But in one of the inscriptions (about 620 A.D.) a King, whose name is said to have been Amara, is described as having conquered the chief of the Mahamalla race. Mall was probably the name of a powerful highland chieftain subdued by the Chalukyans. (See Crole, Man. of Chingleput, 93 seq.). Dr. Oppert (Orig. Inhabit., 98) takes the name to be derived from the Malla or Palli race.

SEVEN SISTERS, or BROTHERS. The popular name (Hind. sati-bhāt) of a certain kind of bird, about the size of a thrush, common throughout most parts of India, Malacocercus terricolor, Hodgson, 'Bengal babbler' of Jerdon. The latter author gives the native name as Seven Brothers, which is the form also given in the quotation below from Tribes on My Frontier. The bird is so named from being constantly seen in little companies of about that number. Its characteristics are well given in the quotations. See also Jerdon's Birds (Godwin-Austen's ed., ii. 59). In China certain birds of starling kind are called by the Chinese pa-ko, or "Eight Brothers," for a like reason. See Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist, 1868, p. 319. (See MYNA.)

1878. — "The Seven Sisters pretend to feed on insects, but that is only when they cannot get peas . . . sad-coloured birds hopping about in the dust, and incessantly calling whilst they hop."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 30-31.

1883.—". . . the Satbhāi or 'Seven Brothers' . . . are too shrewd and knowing to be made fun of. . . . Among themselves they will quarrel by the hour, and bandy foul language like fishwives; but let a stranger treat one of their number with disrespect, and the other six are in arms at once. . . . Each Presidency of India has its own branch of this strange family. Here (at Bombay) they are brothers, and in Bengal they are sisters; but everywhere, like Wordsworth's opinionative child, they are seven."—Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

SEVERNDOOG, n.p. A somewhat absurd corruption, which has been applied to two forts of some fame, viz.:

a. Swarnda-droog, or Swavandrug, on the west coast, about 78 m. below Bombay (Lat. 17° 48' N.). It was taken in 1755 by a small naval force from Tulaji Angria, of the famous piratical family. [For the commander of the expedition, Commodore James, and his monument on Shooter's Hill, see Douglas, Bombay and W. India, i. 117 seq.]

b. Savandrug; a remarkable double hill-fort in Mysore, standing on a two-topped bare rock of granite, which was taken by Lord Cornwallis's army in 1791 (Lat. 12° 55'). [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 228, ii. 232) calls it Sevand Droog, and Seven-droog.]

SEYCHELLE ISLANDS, n.p. A cluster of islands in the Indian Ocean, politically subordinate to the British Government of Mauritius, lying between 3° 40' & 4° 50' S. Lat., and about 950 sea-miles east of Mombas on the E. African coast. There are 29 or 30 of the Seychelles proper, of which Mahé, the largest, is about 17 m. long by 3 or 4 wide. The principal islands are granitic, and rise "in the centre of a vast plateau of coral" of some 120 m. diameter.

These islands are said to have been visited by Soares in 1506, and were known vaguely to the Portuguese navigators of the 16th century as the Seven Brothers (Os sete Irmanos or Hermanos), sometimes Seven Sisters (Sei Irmanas), whilst in Delisle's Map of Asia (1700) we have both "Les Sept Frères" and "Les Sept Soeurs." Adjoining these on the W. or S.W. we find also on the old maps a group called the Almirantes, and this group has retained that name to the present day, constituting now an appendage of the Seychelles.

The islands remained uninhabited, and apparently unvisited, till near the middle of the 18th century. In 1742 the celebrated Mahé de la Bourdonnais, who was then Governor of Mauritius and the Isle of Bourbon, despatched two small vessels to explore the islands of this little archipelago, an expedition which was renewed by Lazare Picault, the commander of one of the two vessels, in 1774, who gave to the principal island the name of Mahé, and to the group the name of Ises de Bourdonnais, for which Iles Mahé (which is the name given in the Neptune Orientale of D'Armes de Manneville, 1775, pp. 29-38, and the charts), seems to have been substituted. Whatever may have been La Bourdonnais' plans with respect to these islands, they were interrupted by his engagement in the Indian campaigns of 1745-46, and his government of Mauritius was never resumed. In 1756 the Sieur Morphey (Murphy!), commander of the frigate Le Cerf, was sent by M. Magon, Governor of Mauritius and Bourbon, to take possession of the Island of Mahé. But it seems doubtful if any actual settlement of the islands by the French occurred till after 1769. [See the account of the islands in Owen's Narrative, ii. 158 seqq.]

A question naturally has suggested itself to us as to how the group came by the name of the Seychelles Islands; and it is one to which no trustworthy answer will be easily found in English, if at all. Even French works of pretension (e.g. the Dictionnaire de la Rousse) are found to state that the islands were named after the "Minister of Marine, Herault de Séchelles, who was eminent for his services and his able administration. He was the first to establish a French settlement there," This is quoted from La Rousse; but the fact is that the only man of the name known to fame is the Jacobin and friend of Danton, along with whom he perished by the guillotine. There never was a Minister of Marine so called! The name Sêchelles first (so far as we can learn) appears in the Hydrographie Française of Belin, 1767, where in a map entitled Carte réduite du Canal de Mozambique the islands are given as Les Îles Sêcheyes, with two enlarged plans in cartouche of the Port de Sêcheyes. In 1767 also Chev. de Grenier, commanding the Heure du Berger, visited the Islands, and in his narrative states that he had with him the chart of Picault, "envoyé par La Bourdonnais pour reconnoître les îles des Sept Frères, lesquelles ont été depuis nommées les Mahé et ensuite îles Sêchelles." We have not been able to learn by whom the latter name was given, but it was probably by Morphey of the Cerf; for among Dalrymple's Charts (pub. 1771), there is a "Plan of the Harbour adjacent to Bat River on the Island Seychelles, from a French plan made in 1756, published by Bellin." And there can be no doubt that the name was bestowed in honour of Moreau de Sêchelles, who was Contrôleur-Général des Finances in France in 1754-56, i.e. at the very time when Governor Magon sent Capt. Morphey to take possession.

One of the islands again is called Silhouette, the name of an official who had been Commissaire du roi près la Compagnie des Indes, and succeeded Moreau de Sêchelles as Controller of Finance; and another is called Praslin, apparently after the Duc de Choiseul Praslin who was Minister of Marine from 1766 to 1770.

The exact date of the settlement of the islands we have not traced. We can only say that it must have been between 1769 and 1772. The quotation below from the Abbé Rochon shows that the islands were not settled when he visited them in 1769; whilst that from Capt. Neale shows that they were settled before his visit in 1772. It will be seen that both Rochon and Neale speak of Mahé as "the island Seychelles, or Sécheyles," as in Belin's chart of 1767. It seems probable that the cloud under which La Bourdonnais fell, on his return to France, must have led to the suppression of his name in connection with the group.

The islands surrendered to the English Commodore Newcome in 1794, and were formally ceded to England with Mauritius in 1815. Seychelles appears to be an erroneous English spelling, now however become established. (For valuable assistance in the preceding article we are indebted to the courteous communications of M. James Jackson, Librarian of the Société de Géographie at Paris, and of M. G. Marcel of the Bibliothèque Nationale. And see, besides the works quoted here, a paper by M. Elie Pujot, in L'Explorateur, vol. iii. (1876) pp. 523-526).

The following passage of Pyard probably refers to the Seychelles:

"c. 1610.—"Le Roy [des Maldives] envoya par deux fois un très expert pilote pour aller découvrir une certaine île nommée polonous, qui leur est presque inconnue. . . . Ils disent aussi que le diable les y tourmentoit visiblement, et que pour l'île elle est fertile en toutes sortes de fruits, et même ils ont opinion que ces gros Cocos medicinaux qui sont si chers-là en viennent. . . . Elle est sous la hauteur de dix degrés au delà de la ligne et environ six vingt SHA, SAH.

s. A merchant or banker; often now attached as a surname. It is Hind. sîh and sâhu from Skt. sāhù, ‘perfect, virtuous, respectable’ (‘prudhomme’). See SOW-CAR.

[1809.—“... the people here called Mahajans (Mahajun), Sahu, and Bahariyas, live by lending money.”—Buchanan Hamilton, E. India, i. 573.]

SHABUNDER, s. Pers. Shah-bandar, lit. ‘King of the Haven,’ Harbour-Master. This was the title of an officer at native ports all over the Indian seas, who was the chief authority with whom foreign traders and ship-masters had to transact. He was often also head of the Customs. Hence the name is of prominent and frequent occurrence in the old narratives. Portuguese authors generally write the word Xabander; ours Shabunder or Sabunder. The title is not obsolete, though it does not now exist in India; the quotation from Lane shows its recent existence in Cairo, and the Persians still call their Consuls Shâh-bandar (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 158). In the marine Malay States the Shâbandar was, and probably is, an important officer of State. The passages from Lane and from Tavernier show that the title was not confined to seaports, at Aleppo Thevenot (1663) calls the corresponding official, perhaps by a mistake, ‘Sachek Bandar’ (Voyages, i. 121). [This is the office which King Mîhrjân conferred upon Sindbâd the Seaman, when he made him “his agent for the port and registrar of all ships that entered the harbour” (Burton, iv. 351).]

c. 1530.—“The chief of all the Musulmans in this city (Kaukan—see QUILON) is Mahomed Shâhbandar.”—Ibn Battûta, iv. 100.

c. 1539.—“This King (of the Batas) understanding that I had brought him a Letter and a Present from the Captain of Malacca, caused me to be entertained by the Xabandar, who is the man that with absolute Power governs all the affairs of the Army.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xv.), in Çogon’s Transl., p. 18.

1552.—“And he who most insisted on this was a Moor, Xabandar of the Guzaraties (at Malacca).—Vastanhatu, ii. 355.

1553.—“A Moorish lord called Sabayo (Sabão)... as soon as he knew that our ships belonged to the people of these parts of Christendom, desiring to have confirmation on the matter, sent for a certain Polish Jew who was in his service as Shabandar (Xabandar), and asked him if he knew of what nation were the people who came in these ships....”—Barros, i. iv. 11.

1561.—“... a boatman, who, however, called himself Xabandar.”—Correa, Lendas, ii. 80.

1599.—“The Sabandar took off my Hat, and put a Roll of white linen about my head....”—J. Davis, in Purchas, i. 12.

[1604.—“Sabindar.” See under KLING.]
SHADDOCK, s. This name properly belongs to the West Indies, having been given, according to Grainger, from that of the Englishman who first brought the fruit thither from the East, and who was, according to Crawford, an interloper captain, who traded to the Archipelago about the time of the Revolution, and is mentioned by his contemporary Dampier. The fruit is the same as the pommele (q.v.). And the name appears from a modern quotation below to be now occasionally used in India.

[Nothing definite seems to be known of this Capt. Shaddock. Mr. R. C. A. Prior (7 ser. N. & Q., vii. 375) writes: "Lunan, in Hortus Jamaicensis, vol. ii. p. 171, says, 'This fruit is not near so large as the shaddock, which received its name from a Capt. Shaddock, who first brought the plant from the East Indies.' The name of the captain is believed to have been Shattock, one not uncommon in the west of Somersetshire. Sloane, in his Voyage to Jamaica, 1707, vol. i. p. 41 says, 'The seed of this was first brought to Barbados by one Capt. Shaddock, commander of an East Indian ship, who touch'd at that island in his passage to England, and left its seed there.'"]

Watt (Econ. Dict. ii. 349) remarks that the Indian vernacular name *Batavi lihā 'Batavian lime,' suggests its having been originally brought from Batavia.

1711.—"The Duties the Honourable Company require to be paid here on Goods are not above one fifth Part of what is paid to the Shabander or Custom-Master."—Lockyer, 223.

1726.—Valentyn, v. 313, gives a list of the Shuhbandars of Malakka from 1641 to 1725. They are names of Dutchmen.

1759.—"I have received a long letter from the Shazhada, in which he complains that you have begun to carry on a large trade in salt, and betel nut, and refuse to pay the duties on those articles... which practice, if continued, will oblige him to throw up his post of Shuhbunder Droga (Daroga)..."—W. Hastings to the Chief at Dacca, in Van Sittart, i. 5.

1785.—"... two or three days after my arrival (at Batavia), the landlord of the hotel where I lodged told me he had been ordered by the shebandar to let me know that my carriage, as well as others, must stop, if I should meet the Governor, or any of the council; but I desired him to acquaint the shebandar that I could not consent to perform any such ceremony."

1837.—"The Seyd Mohammad El Mahrookeye, the Shuhbandar (chief of the Merchants of Cairo) hearing of this event, suborned a common fellah...."—Lane's Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1837, i. 157.
SHADE (TABLE-SHADE, WALL-SHADE), s. A glass guard to protect a candle or simple oil-lamp from the wind. The oldest form, in use at the beginning of the last century, was a tall glass cylinder which stood on the table, the candlestick and candle being placed bodily within it. In later days the universal form has been that of an inverted dome fitting into the candlestick, which has an annular socket to receive it. The wall-shade is a bracket attached to the wall, bearing a candle or cocoa-nut oil lamp, protected by such a shade. In the wine-drinking days of the earlier part of last century it was sometimes the subject of a challenge, or forfeit, for a man to empty a wall-shade filled with claret. The second quotation below gives a notable description of a captain's outfit when taking the field in the 18th century.

1780.—"Borrowed last Month by a Person or Persons unknown, out of a private Gentleman's House near the Esplanade, a very elegant Pair of Candle Shades. Whoever will return the same will receive a reward of 40 Sicca Rupees. —N.B. The Shades have private marks."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8.

1789.—"His tent is furnished with a good large bed, mattress, pillow, &c., a few camp-stools or chairs, a folding table, a pair of shades for his candles, six or seven trunks with table equipage, his stock of linen (at least 24 shirts); some dozens of wine, brandy, and gin; tea, sugar, and biscuit; and a hamper of live poultry and his milk-goat."—Munro's Narrative, 186.

1817.—"I am now finishing this letter by candle-light, with the help of a handkerchief tied over the shade."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 511.

[1838.—"We brought carpets, and chandeliers, and wall shades (the great staple commodity of Indian furniture), from Calcutta. ..."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, 2nd ed. i. 182.]

SHAGREEN, s. This English word—French chagrin; Ital. zigrino; Mid. High Ger. Zager,—comes from the Pers. saghrī, Turk. sāghrī, meaning properly the cope or hour of a horse, from which the peculiar granulated leather, also called sāghrī in the East, was originally made. Diez considers the French (and English adopted) chagrin in the sense of vexation to be the same word, as certain hard skins prepared in this way were used as files, and hence the word is used figuratively for gnawing vexation, as (he states) the Ital. vima also is (Etym. Worterbuch, ed. 1861, ii. 240). He might have added the figurative origin of tribulation. [This view is accepted by the N.E.D.; but Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict.) denies its correctness.]

1663.—"... à Alep ... on y travaille aussi bien qu'à Damas le sagri, qui est ce qu'on appelle chagrin en France, mais l'on en fait une bien plus grande quantité en Perse. ... Le sagri sa fait de croupe d'âne," &c.—Thvenot, Voyages, iii. 115-116.

1825.—"Saghree, or Kemookt, Horse or Ass-Hide."—Punjab Trade Report, App. cxx.; [For an account of the manufacture of kimkhi, see Hoey, Mon. on Trades and Manufactures of N. India, 94.]

SHAITAN, Ar. 'The Evil One; Satan.' Shaitān īt bhedā, 'Brother of the Arch-Enemy,' was a title given to Sir C. Napier by the Amirs of Sind and their followers. He was not the first great English soldier to whom this title had been applied in the East. In the romance of Cœur de Lion, when Richard entertains a deputation of Saracens by serving at table the head of one of their brethren, we are told:

"Every man sat style and pokyd othier; They saide: 'This is the Devleys brother, That sles our men, and thus hem esteet'...
[c. 1630.—"But a Mountebank or Imposter is nick-named Shitan. Tabib, i.e. the Devil's Chirurgeon."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 304.

1753.—"God preserve me from the Scheitan Alragim."—Hanway, ii. 90.]

1863.—"Not many years ago, an eccentric gentleman wrote from Sikkim to the Secretary of the Asiatic Society in Calcutta, stating that, on the snows of the mountains there were found certain mysterious foot-steps, more than 30 or 40 paces assaulting, which the natives alleged to be Shaitan's. The writer at the same time offered, if Government would give him leave of absence for a certain period, etc., to go and trace the author of these mysterious vestiges, and thus this strange creature would be discovered without any expense to Government. The notion of catching Shaitan without any expense to Government was a sublime piece of Anglo-Indian tact, but the offer was not accepted."—Sir H. Yule, Notes to Friar Jordanus, 87.

SHALOO, &c., s. We have a little doubt as to the identity of all these words; the two latter occur in old works as names of cotton stuffs; the first two (Shakespeare and Fallon give \( \text{sala} \)) are names in familiar use for a soft twilled cotton stuff, of a Turkey-red colour, somewhat resembling what we call, by what we had judged to be a modification of the word, shaloon. But we find that Sket and other authorities ascribe the latter word to a corruption of Chalons, which gave its name to certain stuffs, apparently bed-coverlets of some sort. Thus in Chaucer:

"With shètes and with chalons faire yspredede."—The Ree's Tale.

On which Tyrwhitt quotes from the Monasticon, "... aut pannos pictos qui vocantur chalons loco lectisternii." See also in Liber Albus:

"La charge de chalouns et draps de Reynes..."—p. 225, also at p. 231.

c. 1343.—"I went then to \( \text{Shāliyāt} \) (near Calicut—see CHALLIA) a very pretty town, where they make the stuffs (qu. \( \text{shāli} \? \)) that bear its name."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 109.

[It is exceedingly difficult to disentangle the meanings and derivations of this series of words. In the first place we have \( \text{saloo} \), Hind. \( \text{sālū} \), the Turkey-red cloth above described; a word which is derived by Platts from Skt. \( \text{sālā} \), 'a kind of astrigent substance,' and is perhaps the same word as the Tel. \( \text{sālū} \), 'cloth.' This was originally an Indian fabric, but has now been replaced in the bazars by an English cloth, the art of dyeing which was introduced by French refugees who came over after the Revolution (see 7 ser. \( \text{N. & Q.} \) viii. 485 seq.). See PIECE-GOODS, SALOÖ-PAUTS.

[c. 1590.—"\( \text{Sālu} \), per piece, 3 R. to 2 M."—Aín, i. 94.]

[1610.—"\( \text{Sallallo}, \) blue and black."—Dawers, Letters, i. 72.]

[1672.—"\( \text{Salloos}, \) made at Gulcundah, and brought from thence to Surat, and go to England."—In Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 62.]

[1896.—"\( \text{Sālu} \) is another fabric of a red colour prepared by dyeing English cloth named \( \text{mārkīn} \) ("American") in the \( \text{āl} \) dye, and was formerly extensively used for turbans, curtains, borders of female coats and female dress."—Muhammad Ḥadī, Mon. on Dyes, 94.]

Next we have \( \text{shelah} \), which may be identical with Hind. \( \text{sela} \), which Platts connects with Skt. \( \text{chela, chaula} \), "a piece of cloth," and defines as "a kind of scarf or mantle (of silk, or lawn, or muslin; usually composed of four breadthts depending from the shoulders loosely over the body: it is much worn and given as a present, in the Dakkhan); silk turban." In the Deccan it seems to be worn by men (Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, Madras reprint, 18). The Madras Gloss. gives \( \text{sheelay} \), Mal. \( \text{shāla} \), said to be from Skt. \( \text{chīra} \), 'a strip of cloth,' in the sense of clothes; and \( \text{sulah} \), Hind. \( \text{sela} \), 'gauze for turbans.'

[c. 1590.—"\( \text{Shelah}, \) from the Dek'han, per piece, \( \frac{1}{2} \) to 2 M."—Aín, i. 95.]

[1598.—"\( \text{Cheyla}, \) in Lisachoten, i. 91.]

[1800.—"\( \text{Shillas}, \) or thin white muslins. ... They are very coarse, and are sometimes striped, and then called Dupattas (see DOOPUTTY)."—Buchanan, Mysores, ii. 240.]

1809.—"The shalie, a long piece of coloured silk or cotton, is wrapped round the waist in the form of a petticoat, which leaves part of one leg bare, whilst the other is covered to the ankle with long and graceful folds, gathered up in front, so as to leave one end of the shalie to cross the breast, and form a drapery, which is sometimes thrown over the head as a veil."—Maria Graham, 3. [But, as Sir H. Yule suggested, in this form the word may represent \( \text{Saree} \).]

1813.—"\( \text{Red Shellas or Salloes} \)...."—Milburne, i. 124.

["\( \text{His shela}, \) of fine cloth, with a silk or gold thread border. ..."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 219 seq.

The following may represent the same word, or be perhaps connected with P.-H. \( \text{chilla}, \) 'a selvage, gold threads in the border of a turban, &c.'

[1610.—"\( \text{Tsyle}, \) the corge, Rs. 70."—Dawers, Letters, i. 72.]

1615.—"\( 320 \) pieces red \( \text{zeias} \)."—Foster, Letters, iv. 129. The same word is used by Cocks, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 4.]

SHAMA. s. Hind. \( \text{shāmā} \) [Skt. \( \text{sūmā}, \) 'black, dark-coloured.'] A favourite song-bird and cage-bird, \( \text{Kittā cinclā macrura}, \) Gmel. "In confinement it imitates the notes of other birds, and of various animals, with ease and accuracy." (Jerdon). The long tail seems to indicate the identity of This bird rather than the mainá (see Myna) with that described by Aelian. [Mr. M'Crinde (Invasion of India, 186) favours the identification of the bird with the Mainā.]

c. a.d. 250.—"There is another bird found among the Indians, which is of the size of a starling. It is particoloured; and in imitating the voice of man it is more loquacious and clever than a parrot. But it does not readily bear confinement, and yearning for liberty, and longing for intercourse with its kind, it prefers hunger to bondage with fat living. The Macedonians who dwell among the Indians, in the city of Bucephala and thereabouts... call the bird kekliów ("Tally"); and the name arose from the fact that the bird switches its tail just like a wagtail."—Aelian, De Nat. Anim. xvi. 9.

SHAMAN, SHAMANISM.

These terms are applied in modern times to superstitions of the kind that connects itself with exorcism and "devil-dancing" as their most prominent characteristic, and which are found to prevail with wonderful identity of circumstance among non-Caucasian races over parts of the earth most remote from one another; not only among the vast variety of Indo-Chinese tribes, but among the Dravidian tribes of India, the Veddas of Ceylon, the races of Siberia, and the red nations of N. and S. America. "Hinduism has assimilated these 'prior superstitions of the sons of Tur,' as Mr. Hodgson calls them, in the form of Tantrika mysteries, whilst, in the wild performance of the Dancing Dervishes at Constantinople, we see, perhaps, again, the infection of Turanian blood breaking out from the very heart of Musulman orthodoxy" (see Notes to Marco Polo, Bk. II. ch. 50). The characteristics of Shamanism is the existence of certain sooth-sayers or medicine-men, who profess a special art of dealing with the mischievous spirits who are supposed to produce illness and other calamities, and who invoke these spirits and ascertain the means of appeasing them, in trance produced by fantastic ceremonies and convulsive dancings.

The immediate origin of the term is the title of the spirit-conjuror in the Tunguz language, which is shaman, in that of the Manchus becoming saman, pl. samaa. But then in Chinese Sha-mán or Chi-mán is used for a Buddhist ascetic, and this would seem to be taken from the Skt. sámana, Pali samaa. Whether the Tunguz word is in any way connected with this or adopted from it, is a doubtful question. W. Schott, who has treated the matter elaborately (Über den Doppelstimm des Wortes Shamane und über den tungsischen Schamanen-Cultus am Hofe der Mandju Kaiser, Berlin Akad. 1842), finds it difficult to suppose any connection. We, however, give a few quotations relating to the two words in one series. In the first two the reference is undoubtedly to Buddhist ascetics.

SHAMBOGUE.

s. Canar. *shána- or *sána-bhoga; shándiya, 'allowance of grain paid to the village accountant,' Skt. *bhoga, 'enjoyment.' A village clerk or accountant.

[c. 1766.—"... this order to be enforced in the accounts by the shabogue."]—Lopen, Malabar, iii. 120.

[1800.—"Shanaboga, called Shanboghe by corruption, and Curnum by the Musulmans, is the village accountant."—Buchanan's Mysores, i. 263.]

[1801.—"When the whole k../sht is collected, the shabogue and potail (see PATEL) carry it to the teshidar's cutcherry."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 316.]
SHAMEEANA, SEMIANNA, s. Pers. shamiyana or shamiyana [very doubtfully derived from Pers. shah, 'king', mityana, 'centre'), an awning or flat tent-roof, sometimes without sides, but often in the present day with canauts; sometimes pitched like a porch before a large tent; often used by civil officers, when on tour, to hold their court or office proceedings coram populo, and in a manner generally accessible. [In the early records the word is used for a kind of striped calico.]

c. 1590.—"The Shamyana-awning is made of various sizes, but never more than of 12 yards square."—And., i. 54.

[1609. —"A sort of Calico here called seminjas are also in abundance, it is broader than the Calico."—Davers, Letters, i. 29.]

1616.—" . . . there is erected a throne fourfe foot from the ground in the Durbar Court from the backe whereof, to the place where the King comes out, a square of 56 paces long, and 49 broad was rayed in, and covered with fair Semiaenes or Canopies of Cloth of Gold, Silke, or Velvet lynned together, and sustained with Canes so covered."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i.; Hak. Soc. i. 142.

[1676.—"We desire you to furnish him with all things necessary for his voyage . . . with saddle and *salline, Semianna, canatts (Canaut). . . ."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 89.]

1814.—"I had seldom occasion to look out for gardens or pleasure grounds to pitch my tent or erect my Summiniana or Shamyana, the whole country being generally a garden."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 455; 2nd ed. ii. 64. In ii. 294 he writes Shumeana.

1857.—"At an early hour we retired to rest. Our beds were arranged under large canopies, open on all sides, and which are termed by the natives Shameananas."—M. Thornhill, Personal Adventures, 14.

SHAMPOO, v. To knead and press the muscles with the view of relieving fatigue, &c. The word has now long been familiarly used in England. The Hind. verb is champha, from the imperative of which, champó, this is most probably a corruption, as in the case of Bunow, Puckerow, &c. The process is described, though not named, by Terry, in 1616: "Taking thus their ease, they often call their Barbers, who tenderly grape and smite their Armes and other parts of their bodies instead of exercise, to stirre the bloud. It is a pleasing wantonnesse, and much valued in these hot climes." (In Purchas, ii. 1475). The process was familiar to the Romans under the Empire, whose slaves employed in this way were styled tractator and tractatrix. [Perhaps the earliest reference to the practice is in Strabo (McCrindle, Ancient India, 73.]. But with the ancients it seems to have been allied to vice, for which there is no ground that we know in the Indian custom.

1748.—"Shampooing is an operation not known in Europe, and is peculiar to the Chinese, which I had once the curiosity to go through, and for which I paid but a trifle. However, had I not seen several China merchants shampooed before me, I should have been apprehensive of danger, even at the sight of all the different instruments . . ." (The account is good, but too long for extract.)—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748. London, 1762, p. 226.

1750-60.—"The practice of champing, which by the best intelligence I could gather is derived from the Chinese, may not be unworthy particularizing, as it is little known to the modern Europeans. . . ."—Grose, i. 113. This writer quotes Martial, iii.Ep. 82, and Seneca, Epist. 66, to show that the practice was known in ancient Rome.

1800.—"The Sultan generally rose at break of day: after being champooed, and rubbed, he washed himself, and read the Koran for an hour."—Beaton, War with Tippoo, p. 159.

[1810. —"Shampooing may be compared to a gentle kneading of the whole person, and is the same operation described by the voyagers to the Southern and Pacific ocean."—Wicks, Hist. Sketches, Madras [reprint, i. 276.]

"Then whilst they fanned the children, or champeed them if they were restless, they used to tell stories, some of which dealt of marvels as great as those recorded in the 1001 Nights."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog., 410.

"That considerable relief is obtained from shampooing, cannot be doubted; I have repeatedly been restored surprisingly from severe fatigue. . . ."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 198.

1813.—"There is sometimes a voluptuousness in the climate of India, a stillness in nature, an indescribable softness, which soothes the mind, and gives it up to the most delightful sensations: independent of the effects of opium, champeing, and other luxuries indulged in by oriental sensualists."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 35; [2nd ed. i. 25.]

SHAN, n.p. The name which we have learned from the Burmese to apply to the people who call themselves the great Tai, kindred to the Siamese, and occupying extensive tracts in Indo-China, intermediate between Burma, Siam, and China. They are the same people that have been known, after the Portuguese, and some of the early R. C. Missionaries, as Laos (q.v.); but we now give the name an extensive signification covering the whole race. The Siamese, who have been for centuries politically the most important branch of this race, call (or did call themselves—see De la Lou-bère, who is very accurate) Tai-Noe or 'Little Tai,' whilst they applied the term Tai-Yai, or 'Great Tai,' to their northern kindred or some part of these;* sometimes also calling the latter Tai-güit, or the 'Ta'i left behind.' The Tai or Shan are certainly the most numerous and widely spread race in Indo-China, and innumerable petty Shan States exist on the borders of Burma, Siam, and China, more or less dependent on, or tributary to, their powerful neighbours. They are found from the extreme north of the Irawadi Valley, in the vicinity of Assam, to the borders of Camboja; and in nearly all we find, to a degree unusual in the case of populations politically so segregated, a certain homogeneity in language, civilisation, and religion (Buddhist), which seems to point to their former union in considerable States.

One branch of the race entered and conquered Assam in the 13th century, and from the name by which they were known, Ahom or Aham, was derived, by the frequent exchange of aspirant and sibilant, the name, just used, of the province itself. The most extensive and central Shan State, which occupied a position between Ava and Yunnan, is known in the Shan traditions as Mung-Maw, and in Burma by the Buddhisto-classical name of Kau-sâmbi (from a famous city of that name in ancient India) corrupted by a usual process into Ko-Shan-pyi and interpreted to mean 'Nine-Shan-States.' Further south were those Tai States which have usually been called Laos, and which formed several considerable kingdoms, going through many vicissitudes of power. Several of their capitals were visited and their ruins described by the late Francis Garnier, and the cities of these and many smaller States of the same race, all built on the same general quadrangular plan, are spread broadcast over that part of Indo-China which extends from Siam north of Yunnan.

Mr. Cushing, in the Introduction to his Shan Dictionary (Rangoon, 1881), divides the Shan family by dialectic indications into the Ahoms, whose language is now extinct, the Chinese Shan (occupying the central territory of what was Man or Kausatunbi), the Shan (Proper, or Burmese Shan), Laos (or Siamese Shan), and Siamese.

The term Shan is borrowed from the Burmese, in whose peculiar orthography the name, though pronounced Shan, is written rham. We have not met with its use in English prior to the Mission of Col. Symes in 1798. It appears in the map illustrating his narrative, and once or twice in the narrative itself, and it was frequently used by his companion, F. Buchanan, whose papers were only published many years afterwards in various periodicals difficult to meet with. It was not until the Burmese war of 1824-1826, and the active investigation of our Eastern frontier which followed, that the name became popularly known in British India. The best notice of the Shans that we are acquainted with is a scarce pamphlet by Mr. Ney Elias, printed by the Foreign Dept. of Calcutta in 1876 (Introd. Sketch of the Hist. of the Shans, &c.). [The ethnology of the race is discussed by J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 187 seqq. Also see Prince Henri d'Orange, Du Tonkin aux Indes, 1890; H. S. Hallett, Among the Shans, 1885, and A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 1890.]

Though the name as we have taken it is a Burmese oral form, it seems to be essentially a genuine ethnic name for the race. It is applied in the form Sam by the Assamese, and the Khakhyens; the Siamese themselves have an obsolete Siêm (written Siêyam) for themselves, and Sieng (Siéyang) for the Laos. The former word is evidently the Siêm, which the Chinese used in the compound Siêm-lo (for Siam,—see Marco Polo, 2nd ed. Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3), and from which we got, probably through a Malay

* On the probable indication of Great and Little used in this fashion, see remarks in notes on Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 9.
medium, our Siam (q.v.). The Burmese distinguish the Siamese Shans as Yudia (see JUDEA) Shans, a term perhaps sometimes including Siam itself. Symes gives this (through Arakanese corruption) as 'Yoodra-Shaan,' and he also (no doubt improperly) calls the Manipur people 'Cassay Shaan' (see CASSAY).

1795.—"These events did not deter Shanbau from pursuing his favourite scheme of conquest to the westward. The fertile plains and populous towns of Munnipoora and the Cassay Shaan, attracted his ambition."—Symes, p. 77.

1743.—"... They were assisted by many of the Zabod (see CHOBWA) or petty princes of the Sciam, subject to the Burmese, who, warred by the oppressions and exactions of the Burmese Mandarins and generals, had revolted, and made common cause with the enemies of their cruel masters. ... The war which the Burmese had to support with these enemies was long and disastrous... instead of overcoming the Sciam (they) only lost daily by day the territories... and saw their princes range themselves... under the protection of the King of Siam."—Sangermane, p. 57.

1851.—"Fix! Fix! Captain Spry! You are surely in joke With your wires and your trams, Going past all the Shams With branches to Bam-yon (see BAMO), and end in An-smoke." Ode on the proposed Yunnan Railway. Bhamo and Eamok were names constantly recurring in the late Capt. Spry's railway projects.

SHANBAFF, SINABAFF, &c., s. Pers. shahbaft. A stuff often mentioned in the early narratives as an export from Bengal and other parts of India. Perhaps indeed these names indicate two different stuffs, as we do not know what they were, except that (as mentioned below) the sinabaff was a fine white stuff. Sinabaff is not in Vuller's Lexicon. Shanhbaft is, and is explained as genu panni grossioris, sic descripta (E.T.): "A very coarse and cheap stuff which they make for the sleeves of kābīs (see CABAYA) for sale."—Bahrār-t'Ajam. But this cannot have been the character of the stuffs sent by Sultan Mahommed Tughlāk (as in the first quotation) to the Emperor of China. [Badger (quoted by Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 153) identifies the word with sina-bāfta, 'China-woven' cloths.]

1498.—"... The overseer of the Treasury came next day to the Captain-Major, and brought him 20 pieces of white stuff, very fine, with gold embroidery which they call beyrāmes (beiramee), and other 20 large white stuffs, very fine, which were named sinabafos. ..."—Correa, E.T. b., Ed. Stanley, 197.

SHASTER, s. The Law books or Sacred Writings of the Hindus. From Skt. stāstra, 'a rule,' a religious code, a scientific treatise.

1612.—"... They have many books in their Latin. ... Six of these they call Xastra, which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Purāna (Poorana), which are the limbs."—Conto, V. vi. 3.

1630.—"... The Banians deliver that this book, by them called the Shaster, or the Book of their written word, consisted of these three tracts."—Lord's Display, ch. viii.

1651.—In Rogerius, the word is everywhere misprinted Isāstra.

1717.—"The six Sastrangōl contain all the Points and different Ceremonies in Worship. ..."—Phillips's Account, 40.

1765.—"... at the capture of Calcutta, A.D. 1766, I lost many curious Gentoo manuscripts, and among them two very correct and valuable copies of the Gentoo Shastah."—J. Z. Houtt., Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 2d ed., 1766, i. 3.

1770.—"The Shastah is looked upon by some as a commentary on the vedams, and by others as an original work."—Raynal (tr 1777), i. 50.
1776.—"The occupation of the Bramin should be to read the Beids, and other Shasters."—Hathed, Gentoo Code, 39.

[SHASTREE, s. Hind. śāstrī (see SHASTER). A man of learning, one who teaches any branch of Hindu learning, such as law.

[1824.—"Gungadzhur Shastree, the minister of the Baroda state, . . . was murdered by Tumbuckees under circumstances which left no doubt that the deed was perpetrated with the knowledge of Bajerow."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 307.]

SHAWL, s. Pers. and Hind. shāl, also dooshala, 'a pair of shawls.' The Persian word is perhaps of Indian origin, from Skt. śāvala, 'variegated.' Sir George Birdwood tells us that he has found among the old India records "Carmania shells" and "Carmania shawools," meaning apparently Kerānān shawls. He gives no dates unfortunately. [In a book of 1685 he finds "Shawles Carmania" and "Carmania Wooll"; in one of 1704, "Chawools" (Report on Old Records, 27, 40). Carmania goats are mentioned in a letter in Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.] In Meninski (published in 1680) shāl is defined in a way that shows the humble sense of the word originally:

"Panni villores qui partim albi, partim cineritii, partim nigri esse solent ex lana et pilis caprinis; hujusmodi pannum seu telam injiciunt humeris Dervisi ... instar stolae aut pullii." To this he adds, "Datur etiam sericiae ejusmodi tela, fere instar nostri multitii, sive simplicis sive duplicati." For this the 2nd edition a century later substitutes: "Shāl-i-Hindī" (Indian shawl), "Tela sericæ subtilissima ex Índia adferri solita."

c. 1590.—"In former times shawls were often brought from Kashmir. People folded them in four folds, and wore them for a very long time. . . . His Majesty encourages in every possible way the (shāl-bēfī) manufacture of shawls in Kashmir. In Lahore also there are more than 1000 workshops."—Atīn i. 92. [Also see ed. Jarrett, ii. 349, 355.]

c. 1665.—"Ils mettent sur eux a toute saison, lorsqu'ils sortent, une Chai, qui est une manièrë de toilette d'une laine très-fine qui se fait a Cachmir. Ces Chais ont environ deux aunes (the old French aune, nearly 47 inches English) de long sur une de large. On les achète vingt-cinq ou trente écus si elles sont fines. Il y en a même qui contiennent cinquante écus, mais ce sont les très-fines."—Thevenot, v. 110.

c. 1666.—"Ces chales sont certaines pièces d'étoffe d'une aulme et demie de long, et d'une de large ou environ, qui sont bordées aux deux bouts d'une espèce de broderie, faite au métier, d'un pied ou environ de large. . . . J'en ai vu de ceux que les Omrans font faire exprès, qui coutoient jusqu'à cent cinquante Roupies; et autrefois qui sont de cette laine du pays, je n'en ai pas vu qui passaient 50 Roupies."—Bernier, ii. 280-281; [ed. Constable, 402.]

1717.—"Con tutto ciò preziosissime nobilissime e senza comparazione magnifice sono le tele che si chiamano Scial, si nella lingua Hindustana, come ancora nella lingua Persiana. Tali Scial altro non sono, che alcuni manti, che si posano sulla testa, e facendo da man destra, e da man sinistra sederne le due metà, con queste si cinge, . . ."—MS. Narrative of Padre Ip. Desideri.

[1662.—"Another rich Skarf, which they call schal, made of a very fine stuff."—J. Davies, Ambassador's Trav., Bk. vi. 238, Stanf. Dict.]

1727.—"When they go abroad they wear a Shawl folded up, or a piece of White Cotton Cloth, hanging loose on the Top of their Heads."—A. Hamilton, ii. 50; [Shahin in ed. 1744, ii. 49.]

c. 1760.—"Some Shawls are manufactured there. . . . Those coming from the province of Cashmire on the borders of Tartary, being made of a peculiar kind of silky hair, that produces from the loom a cloth beautifully bordered at both ends, with a narrow flowered selvage, about two yards and a half long, and a yard and a half wide . . . and according to the price, which is from ten pounds and upwards to fifteen shillings, join, to exquisite fineness, a substance that renders them extremely warm, and so pliant that the fine ones are easily drawn through a common ring on the finger."—Grose, i. 118.

1781.—Sonnerat writes challes. He says: "Ces étoffes (faites avec la laine des moutons de Tibet) surpassent nos plus belles soieries en finesse."—Voyage, i. 52.

It seems from these extracts that the large and costly shawl, woven in figures over its whole surface, is a modern article. The old shawl, we see, was from 6 to 8 feet long, by about half that breadth; and it was most commonly white, with only a border of figured weaving at each end. In fact what is now called a Rampoor Chudder when made with figured ends is probably the best representation of the old shawl.

SHEEAH, SHIA, s. Arab. shī'a, i.e. 'sect.' A follower (more properly the followers collectively) of the Mahommedan 'sect,' or sects rather, which especially venerate 'Ali, and regard the Imáms (see IMAUM), his descendants, as the true successors to the Caliphate. The Persians (since the accession of the 'Sophy' dynasty, (q.v.)) are Shi'as, and a good many of the Moslems in India. The sects which have followed more or less secret doctrines, and the veneration of hereditary quasi-divine heads, such as the Karmathites and Ishaqite of Musulman history, and the modern Bohras (see BORA) and "Mulahis," may generally be regarded as Shi'a. [See the elaborate article on the sect in Hughes, Dict. of Islâm, 572 seqq.]

c. 339.—"... dont encore il est ainsi, que de tuit ci qui croient en la joy Haali dient que ci qui croient en la joy Mahomet sont mescrant; et aussi tuit ci qui croient en la joy Mahomet dient que tuit ci qui croient en la joy Haali sont mescrant." — Jonville, 252.

1552.—"Among the Moors there have always been controversies ... which of the first four Caliphs was the most legitimate successor to the Caliphate. The Arabians favoured Bubac, Homar, and Otthoman, the Persians (Pareesa) favoured Alle, and held the others for usurpers, and as holding it against the testament of Mahamed ... to the last this schism has endured between the Arabians and the Persians. The latter took the appellation Xia, as much as to say 'Union of one Body,' and the Arabs called them in reproach Raipady [Rafidic, a heretic (lit. 'deserter')] as much as to say 'People astray from the Path,' whilst they call themselves Guny (see SUNNEE), which is the contrary." — Barros, II. x. 6.

1620.—"The Sunnite adherents of tradition, like the Arabs, the Turks, and an infinite number of others, accept the primacy of those who actually possess it. The Persians and their adherents who are called Shia's (Scial), i.e. 'Sectarians,' are not ashamed of the name, believe in the primacy of those who have only claimed it (without possessing it), and obstinately contend that it belongs to the family of Ali only." — P. della Valle, ii. 75; [conf. Hak. Soc. i. 152].

1626.—"He is by Religion a Mahometan, descended from Persian Ancestors, and retaineth their opinions, which differing in many points from the Turks, are distinguished in their Sectes by tearmes of Seaw and Sunnec." — Purchas, Pilgrimage, 996.

1633.—"Les Persans et Keeshachas (Kuzzilbashi) se disent Scial, ... sur les Ottomans estoient Scials, ou de la Secte de Haly, les Persans se feroient Sonnis qui est la Secte des Ottomans." — De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 106.

1673.—"His Substitute here is a Chias Moor." — Fryer, 29.

1701.—"In contradistinction to the Sons, who in their prayers cross their hands on the lower part of the breast, the Schiahs drop their arms in straight lines." — G. Forster, Travels, ii. 129.

1805.—"The word Sh'eeah, or Sheeet, properly signifies a troop or sect... but has become the distinctive appellation of the followers of Aly, or all those who maintain that he was the first legitimate Khulieffah, or successor to Moomhammad." — Bailie, Digest of Mah. Law, II. xii.

1809.—"La tolerance indienne est venue diminuer dans l'Inde le fanatisme Musulman. La Sumnites et Sh'ite n'ont point entre eux cette animosité qui divise les Turcs et les Persans... ces deux sectes divisent les musulmans de l?'Inde; mais comme je viens de dire, elles n'excitent généralement entre eux aucune animosité." — Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 12.

SHERMAUL, s. Pers.—Hind. sharmâl, a cake made with flour, milk and lemon; a sort of brioche. [The word comes from Pers. shir, 'milk,' mal, 'crushing.' Riddell (Domest. Econ. 461) gives a receipt for what he calls "Nauna Sheer Mhal," nân being Pers., 'bread.]" —[1832.—"The dishes of meetah (milhâ, 'sweet') are accompanied with the many varieties of bread common to Hindoostan, without leaven, as Sheah-maul, bakirkhanie (bakir-khan), chapotte (chupatty), &c.; the first two have milk and ghee mixed with the flour, and nearly resemble our pie-crust. — Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 101.

SHEIKH, s. Ar. shaikh; an old man, elder, chief, head of an Arab tribe. The word should properly mean one of the descendants of tribes of genuine Arab descent, but at the present day, in India, it is often applied to converts to Islam from the lower Hindu tribes. For the use of the word in the sense of a saint, see under PEER.

1599.—"Lieutenant (which the Arabians called sezen)." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 24.

1626.—"They will not have them judged by any Custome, and they are content that their Kexue doe determine them as he list." — Purchas, Pilgrimage, ii. 1148.

1727.—"... but if it was so, that he (Abraham) was their Sheek, as they allege, they neither follow him in Morals or Religion." — A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 37.

1835.—"Some parents employ a sheykh or fikée to teach their boys at home." — Lane, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1871, i. 77.]

SHERBET, s. Though this word is used in India by natives in its native (Arab. and Pers.) form sharbat,*

* In both written alike, but the final t in Arabic is generally silent, giving sharba, in Persian sharbat. So we get minared from Pers. and Turk. mandaraf, in Ar. (and in India) mandra (mandar, mandra).
SHERBET. 826 SKEVAROY HILLS.

'draught,' it is not a word now specially in Anglo-Indian use. The Arabic seems to have entered Europe by several different doors. Thus in Italian and French we have sorbeto and sorbet, which probably came direct from the Levantine or Turkish form shurbat or shorbat; in Sp. and Port. we have xarabe, axarabe (ash-sharáb, the standard Ar. sharáb, 'wine or any beverage'), and xarope, and from these forms probably Ital. sciropo, stroppo, with old French ysserop and mod. French sirop; also English syrup, and more directly from the Spanish, shrub. Mod. Span. again gets, by reflexion from French or Italian, sorbete and sirop (see Dozy, 17, and Marcel Devix, s.v. sirop). Our sherbet looks as if it had been imported direct from the Levant. The form shrub is applied in India to all wines and spirits and prepared drinks, e.g. Port-shrub, Sherry-shrub, Lall-shrub, Brandy-shrub, Beer-shrub.

c. 1344.—"... They bring cups of gold, silver, and glass, filled with sugar-candy-water; i.e. syrup diluted with water. They call this beverage sherbet" (ash-sharub).—Inn Batuta, iii. 124.

1554.—"... potio est gratissima praesertim ubi multa nive, quae Constantino-poli nullo tempore defect, fuerit refrigerata, Arab Sorbet vocant, hoc est, potionem Arabicam."—Busbey. Ep. i. p. 92.

1578.—"The physicians of the same country use this xarave (of tamarinds) in bilious and ardent fevers."—Acosta, 67.

c. 1580.—"Et saccharo potum jucundissimum parant quem Sarbet vocant."—Prosper Alpinius, Pt. i. p. 70.

1612.—"In Persia there is much good wine of grapes which is called Xarab in the language of the country."—Teixeira, i. 16.

c. 1630.—"Their liquor may perhaps better delight you; 'tis faire water, sugar, rose-water, and juyce of Lemons mixt, call'd Sherbets or Zerbets, wholesome and potable."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 241.

1632.—"The Moores... dranke a little milk and water, but not a drop of wine; they also dranke a little sorbet, and jaceolat (see JOCOLE)."—Evelyn's Diory, Jan 24.

1827.—"On one occasion, before Barakel-Hadgi left Madras, he visited the Doctor, and partook of his sherbet, which he preferred to his own, perhaps because a few glasses of rum or brandy were usually added to enrich the compound."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. x.

1837.—"The Egyptians have various kinds of sherbets. The most common kind (called simply shurbat or shurbát sūk'har...) is merely sugar and water... lemonade (ley'mo'nātch, or sharáb elleymo'nāt) is another."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1837, i. 206.

1863.—"The Estate overseer usually gave a dance to the people, when the most dissolve of both sexes were sure to be present, and to indulge too freely in the shrub made for the occasion."—Waddell, 29 Years in the W. Indies, 17.

SHEREEF, s. Ar. sharíf, 'noble.' A dignitary descended from Mahomed.

1498.—"The ambassador was a white man who was Xarife, as much as to say a creligio" (i.e. clericgo).—Rotoreio, 2nd ed. 30.

[1672.—"Schierifi." See under CASIS.
[c. 1666.—"The first (embassage) was from the Sherif of Meca...".—Bernier, ed. Constable, 183.]

1701.—"... ye Shreif of Judda..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 232.]

SHERISTADAR, s. The head ministerial officer of a Court, whose duty it is to receive plaints, and see that they are in proper form and duly stamped, and generally to attend to routine business. Properly H.—P. from sar-rishta-dár or sarishta-dár, 'register-keeper.' Sar-rishtá, an office of registry, literally means 'head of the string.' C. P. Brown interprets Sarrishtadar as "he who holds the end of the string (on which puppets dance)"—satirically, it may be presumed. Perhaps 'keeper of the clue,' or 'of the file' would approximately express the idea.

1786.—(With the object of establishing "the officers of the Canongee's Department upon its ancient footing, altogether independent of the Zemindars... and to prevent confusion in the time to come..."

For these purposes, and to avail ourselves as much as possible of the knowledge and services of Mr. James Grant, we have determined on the institution of an office well-known in this country under the designation of Chief Serrashtadar, with which we have invested Mr. Grant, to act in that capacity under your Board, and also to attend as such at your deliberations, as well as at our meetings in the Revenue Department..."—Letter from G. G. in C. to Board of Revenue, July 19 (Bengal Rev. Regulation xix.).

1878.—"Nowadays, however, the Serrashtadar's signature is allowed to authenticate copies of documents, and the Assistant is thus spared so much drudgery."—Life in the Moghussi, i. 117.

SHEVAROY HILLS, n.p. The name applied to a range of hills in the Salem district of Madras. The origin of the name has given rise to much difference of opinion. Mr. Lefanu (Man. of Salem, ii. 19 seq.) thinks that the original name was possibly Sivarayan, whence the German name Shivarai and the English Shivaroy; or that Sivarayan may by confusion have become Shivarayan, named after the Raja of Sera; lastly, he suggests that it comes from sharpy or sharvu, 'the slope or declivity of a hill,' and yay, 'a mouth, passage, way.' This he is inclined to accept, regarding Shivarayan or Shavrayyan, as 'the cliff which dominates (rayyan) the way (wayy) which leads through or under the declivity (sharvu). The Madras Gloss. gives the Tam. form of the name as Shavarayanmalai, from Sheran, 'the Chera race,' irayan, 'king,' and malai, 'mountain.'

[1823. — 'Mr. Cockburn ... had the kindness to offer me the use of a bungalow on the Shavrayva hills. . . .']—Hoote, Missions in Madras, 282.

[SHIBAR, SHIBBAR, s. A kind of coating vessel, sometimes described as a great pattamar. Molesworth (Mahr. Dict. s.v.) gives shibdr which, in the usual dictionary way, he defines as 'a ship or large vessel of a particular description.' The Bombay Gazetteer (x. 171) speaks of the shibadí, a large vessel, from 100 to 300 tons, generally found in the Ratnagiri sub-division ports'; and in another place (xiii. Pt. ii. 720) says that it is a large vessel chiefly used in the Malabar trade, deriving the name from Pers. sháthá-bár, 'royal-carrier.'

[1854.—"The Mucaffam (MOCUDDUM) of this shibar bound for Goa."—Yule, in Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. clxv.; also see cxxiv.

[1727.—" ... the other four were Grabs or Gallies, and Sheybars, or half Gallies."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 134.

[1758.—" ... then we cast off a boat called a large seebar, bound to Muscat. ..."]—Ives, 196."

SHIGRAM, s. A Bombay and Madras name for a kind of hack palankin carriage. The camel-shigram is often seen on roads in N. India. The name is from Mahr. šíhār, Skt. śśhāra, 'quick or quickly.' A similar carriage is the Jutkah, which takes its name from Hind. jhatā, 'swift.'

[1830.—At Bombay, "In heavy coaches, lighter landaulets, or singular-looking shigrampoes, might be seen bevies of British fair . . ."]—Mrs. Elwood, Narr. ii. 376.

[1875.—"As it is, we have to go . . . 124 miles in a dak gharri, bullock shigram, or mail-cart. . . ."]—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 18."

SHIKAR, s. Hind. from Pers. šhikār, 'la chasse'; sport (in the sense of shooting and hunting); game.

c. 1590.—"Āin, 27. Of Hunting (orig. Āin-i-Shikār). Superficial worldly observers see in killing an animal a sort of pleasure, and in their ignorances strive about, as if senseless, on the field of their passions. But deep enquirers see in hunting a means of acquisition of knowledge. . . . This is the case with His Majesty."—Āin, i. 282.

1609-10. —"Sykary, which signifies, seeking, or hunting."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 428.

1800.—"250 or 300 horsemen . . . divided into two or three small parties, supported by our infantry, would give a proper shekar; and I strongly advise not to let the Mahratta boundary stop you in the pursuit of your game."—Sir A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Life of Munro, iii. 117.

1847.—"Yet there is a charm in this place for the lovers of Shikar."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 8.

[1859.—"Although the jungles literally swarm with tigers, a shikar, in the Indian sense of the term, is unknown."—Oliphant, Narr. of Mission, i. 25.]

1866.—"May I ask what has brought you out to India, Mr. Cholmondeley? Did you come out for shikar, eh?"—Trelveyan, The Duck Bungalow, in Fraser, lxiii. 222.

In the following the word is wrongly used in the sense of Shikaree.

[1900.—"That so experienced a shikar should have met his death emphasises the necessity of caution."—Field, Sept. 1."

SHIKAREE, SHEKARRY, s. Hind. shikārī, a sportsman. The word is used in three ways:

a. As applied to a native expert, who either brings in game on his own account, or accompanies European sportsmen as guide and aid.

[1822.—"Shecaries are generally Hindoos of low cast, who gain their livelihood entirely by catching birds, hares, and all sorts of animals."—Johnson, Sketches of Field Sports, 25.]

1879.—"Although the province (Pegu) abounds in large game, it is very difficult to discover, because there are no regular shikarees in the Indian acceptance of the word. Every village has its local shikaree, who lives by trapping and killing game. Taking life as he does, contrary to the principles of his religion, he is looked upon as damned by his neighbours, but that does not prevent their buying from him the spoils of the chase."—Pollok, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 13.

b. As applied to the European sportsman himself: e.g. "Jones is well known as a great Shikaree." There are several books of sporting adventure written circa 1860-75 by Mr. H. A. Leveson under the name of 'The Old Shekarry.'

[c. A shooting-boat used in the Cashmere lakes.

[1875.—"A shikāri is a sort of boat, that is in daily use with the English visitors; a light boat manned, as it commonly is, by six men, it goes at a fast pace, and, if well fitted with cushions, makes a comfortable conveyance. A bandāū or (see Bundook) shikāri is the smallest boat of all; a shooting punt, used in going after wild fowl on the lakes."—Drew, Jummo, &c., 181.]

SHIKAR-GĀH, s. Pers. A hunting ground, or enclosed preserve. The word has also a technical application to patterns which exhibit a variety of figures and groups of animals, such as are still woven in brocade at Benares, and in shawl-work in Kashmir and elsewhere (see Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 17, and notes). [The great areas of jungle maintained by the Amirs of Sind and called Shikargāhs are well known.

[1831.—"Once or twice a month when they (the Ameers) are all in good health, they pay visits to their different shikargahs or preserves for game."—J. Burnes, Visit to the Court of Sind, 103.]

SHIKHÓ, n. and v. Burmese word. The posture of a Burmese in presence of a superior, i.e. kneeling with joined hands and bowed head in an attitude of worship. Some correspondence took place in 1883, in consequence of the use of this word by the then Chief Commissioner of British Burma, in an official report, to describe the attitude used by British envoys at the Court of Ava. The statement (which was grossly incorrect) led to remonstrance by Sir Arthur Phayre. The fact was that the envoy and his party sat on a carpet, but the attitude had no anology whatever to that of shikho, though the endeavour of the Burmese officials was persistent to involve them in some such degrading attitude. (See KOWTOW.)

1855.—"Our conductors took off their shoes at the gate, and the Woudouk made an ineffectual attempt to induce the Envoy to do likewise. They also at four different places, as we advanced to the inner gate, dropped on their knees and shikhoed towards the palace."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 82.

1882.—"Another ceremony is that of shekhoing to the spire, the external emblem of the throne. All Burmans must do this at each of the gates, at the foot of the steps, and at intervals in between. . . ."—The Burman, His Life and Notions, ii. 206.

SHINBIN, SHINBEAM, &c., s. A term in the Burmese teaek-trade, apparently a corruption from Burm. shin-byin. The first monosyllable (shin) means 'to put together side by side;' and byin, 'plank;' the compound word being used in Burmese for 'a thick plank used in constructing the side of a ship.' The shinbin is a thick plank, about 15" wide by 4" thick, and running up to 25 feet in length (see Milburn, i. 47). It is not sawn, but split from green trees.

1791.—"Teak Timber for sale, consisting of Duggia (see Duggie). Maguire planks (?) Shinbeens. Joists and Sheathed Coma planks (?)."

Madras Courier, Nov. 10.

SHINKALI, SHIGALA, n.p. A name by which the City and Port of Oranganore (q.v.) seems to have been known in the early Middle Ages. The name was probably formed from Tiruvan-jiculam, mentioned by Dr. Gundert below. It is perhaps the Gingaleh of Rabbi Benjamin in our first quotation; but the data are too vague to determine this, though the position of that place seems to be in the vicinity of Malabar.

C. 1167.—"Gingaleh is but three days distant by land, whereas it requires a journey of fifteen days to reach it by the sea; this place contains about 1,000 Jami'ites."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Wright's Early Travels, p. 117.

C. 1300.—"Of the cities on the shore (of Malibar) the first is Sindābūr (Goa), then Faknūr (see BACANOIRE), then the country of Manjarūr (see MANGALORE) . . . then Chinkali (or Jinkali), then Kusalm (see QUILON)."—Rashiduddin, see J. R. A. Soc., N.S., iv. pp. 342, 345.

C. 1320.—"Le pays de Mainbār, appelé pays du Poivre, comprend les villes suivantes."—"La ville de Shinkli, dont la majeure partie de la population est composée de Juifs.
"Kaulam est la dernière ville de la côte de Poivre."—Shesweddin Dimishqui, by Mohren (Cosmographie du Moyen Age), p. 234.

3. 1328.—"... there is one very powerful King in the country where the pepper grows, and his kingdom is called Molbear. There is also the King of Singuylia..."—Fr. Jordanus, p. 40.

1330. — "And the forest in which the pepper growth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Plandrina (see PANDARANI), and the other Cyngilin..."—Fr. Ootorz, in Cathay, &c., 15-76.

3. 1390.—"Etiam Shalîyât (see CHALLIA) et Shinkala urbes Malabaricae sunt, quaram alteram Judaei incloent..."—Abulfedâ, in Gildevenster, 185.

2. 1399. — "And in the second India, which is called Mynhar, there is a place called Cynkali, which signifieth Little Indin" (Little China) "for Kali is 'little.'"—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 373.

1844.—"The place (Codungalur) is identified with Tiruvan-jiculam river-harbour, which Cheraman Perumal is said to have declared the best of the existing 18 harbours of Kerala..."—Dr. Gundert, in Madras Journal, xiii. 120.

"One Kerala Ulpatti (i.e. legendary history of Malabar) of the Naasani, says that their forefathers... built Codungalur, as may be learned from the granite inscription at the northern entrance of the Tiruvan-jiculam temple..."—Ibid. 122.

SHINTOO, SINTOO, s. Japanese Shintau, 'the Way of the Gods.' The primitive relation of Japan. It is described by Faria y Sousa and other old writers, but the name does not apparently occur in those older accounts, unless it be in the Sentô of Couto. According to Kaempfer the philosophic or Confucian sect is called in Japan Sintto. But that hardly seems to fit what is said by Couto, and his Sentô seems more likely to be a mistake for Sento. [See Lowell's articles on Eastern Shintoo, in Proc. As. Soc. Japan, 1893.]

"But above all these idols they adore one Sentô, of which they say that it is the substance and principle of All, and that its abode is in the Heavens."—Couto, V. xxxi.

1727. — "Le Sinto qu'on appelle aussi Sinju et Kaminitis, est le Culte des Idoles, établi anciennement dans le pays. Sin et Kami sont les noms des Idoles qui font l'objet de ce Culte. Sinju (sic) signifie la Foi, ou la Religion. Sinjus et au pluriel Sinju, ce sont les personnes qui professent cette Religion."—Kämper, Hist. de Japan, i. 176; [E.T. 204].

1770. — "Far from encouraging that gloomy fanaticism and fear of the gods, which is inspired by almost all other religions, the Xinto sect had applied itself to prevent, or at least to moderate that disorder of the imagination."—Raynal (E.T. 1777), i. 187.

1878. — "The indigenous religion of the Japanese people, called in later times by the name of Shintau or Way of the Gods, in order to distinguish it from the way of the Chinese moral philosophers, and the way of Buddha, had, at the time when Confucianism and Buddhism were introduced, passed through the earliest stages of development."—Westminster Recr., N.S., No. evii. 29.

SHIRAZ, n.p. The wine of Shiraz was much imported and used by Europeans in India in the 17th century, and even later.

1627. — "Sheraz then probably derives it self either from sherab which in the Persian Tongue signifies a Grape here abounding... or else from sheer which in the Persian signifies Milk."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 127.

1690. — "Each Day there is prepared at Surat a Publick Table for the Use of the President and the rest of the Factory. The Table is spread with the choicest Meat Surat affords... and equal plenty of generous Sherash and Arak Punch..."—Ovington, 394.

1737. — "Shyrash is a large City on the Road, about 200 Miles from Gombroon."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 99.

1813. — "I have never tasted this (pomegranate wine), nor any other Persian wine, except that of Schiraz, which, although much extolled by poets, I think inferior to many wines in Europe."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 468.

SHIREENBAF, s. Pers. Shīrīnbāf, 'sweet-woof.' A kind of fine cotton stuff, but we cannot say more precisely what.

2. 1343.—"... one hundred pieces of shirīnbāf..."—Ibn Batata, iv. 5.

1609.—"Serribaff, a fine light stuff or cotton whereof the Moors make their cabayes or clothing."—Daveners, Letters, i. 29.] 1673. — "... siring chintz, Broad Batas.

..."—Fryer, 88.
SHISHAM. See under SISSOO.

SHISHAMHULL, s. Pers. shisha-mahal, lit. 'glass apartment' or palace. This is or was a common appellation of native palaces, viz. a hall or suite of rooms lined with mirror and other glittering surfaces, usually of a gimbark crack. There is a place of exactly the same description, now gone to hideous decay, in the absurd Villa Palagonia at Bagheria near Palermo.

1885.—"The Shisha-mahal, or house of glass, is both curious and elegant, although the material is principally pounded talse and looking-glass. It consists of two rooms, of which the walls in the interior are divided into a thousand different panels, each of which is filled up, with raised flowers in silver, gold, and colours, on a ground-work of tiny convex mirrors."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 365.

SHOE OF GOLD (or of Silver). The name for certain ingots of precious metal, somewhat in the form of a Chinese shoe, but more like a boat, which were formerly current in the trade of the Far East. Indeed of silver they are still current in China, for Giles says: "The common name among foreigners for the Chinese silver ingot, which bears some resemblance to a native shoe. May be of any weight from 1 oz. and even less, to 50 and sometimes 100 oz., and is always stamped by the assayer and banker, in evidence of purity" (Gloss. of Reference, 128). [In Hisss the Chinese silver is called silli from the slabs (sil) in which it is sold (Maclagan, Mon. on Gold and Silver Work in Punjab, p. 5).] The same form of ingot was probably the balsish (or yestok) of the Middle Ages, respecting which see Cathay, &c., 115, 481, &c. Both of these latter words mean also 'a cushion,' which is perhaps as good a comparison as either 'shoe' or 'boat.' The word now used in C. Asia is yambū. There are cuts of the gold and silver ingots in Tavernier, whose words suggest what is probably the true origin of the popular English name, viz. a corruption of the Dutch Goldschuyl.

1566.—"... valuable goods exported from this country (china) ... are first, a quantity of gold, which is carried to India, in leaves in the shape of boats. ..."—C. Frederic in Ramusio, iii. 391b.

1611.—"Then, I tell you, from China I could load ships with cakes of gold fashioned like boats, containing, each of them, roundly speaking, 2 marks weight, and so each cake will be worth 280 pardoes."

1676.—"The Pieces of Gold mark'd Fig. 1, and 2, are by the Hollanderers called Goltschut, that is to say, a Boat of Gold, because they are in the form of a Boat. Other Nations call them Loaves of Gold. ... The Great Pieces come to 12 hundred Gilders of Holland Money, and thirteen hundred and fifty Livres of our Money."—Turquot's Hist. II. 8.

1702.—"Soons the Moolah will be delivered the Nabob, Dewan, and Buxie 48 China Oranges ... but the Dewan bid the Moolah write the Governor for a hundred more that he might send them to Court; which is understood to be One Hundred shoes of gold, or so many thousand pagodas or rupees."—In Wheeler, i. 597.

1704.—"Price Current, July, 1704, (at Malacca) ... Gold, China, in Shoos 94 Touch."—Lockyer, 70.

1862.—"A silver ingot 'Yambu' weighs about 2 (Indian) seers. ... 4 lbs., and is worth 165 Co.'s rupees. Roomoosh, also called 'Yabhucha,' or small silver ingot, is worth 33 Rs. ... 3 yambuchas, being equal to 1 yambu. There are two descriptions of 'yambucha': one is a square piece of silver, having a Chinese stamp on it; the other ... in the form of a boat, has no stamp. The Yambu is in the form of a boat, and has a Chinese stamp on it."—Punjab Trade Report, App. ccxxvi.-xxviii. I.

1875.—"The yambū or kāra is a silver ingot something the shape of a deep boat with projecting bow and stern. The upper surface is lightly hollowed, and stamped with a Chinese inscription. It is said to be pure silver, and to weigh 50 (Cashghar) ser = 30,000 grains English."—Report of Forsyth's Mission to Kashghar, 494.

1876.—"... he received his pay in Chinese yambos (gold coins), at the rate of 125 rubles each, while the real commercial value was only 115 rubles."—Schuyler, Turkistan, ii. 322.

1901.—A piece of Chinese shoe money, value 10 taels, was exhibited before the Numismatic Society.—Athenaeum, Jan. 26, p. 118. Perhaps the largest specimen known of Chinese "boat-money" was exhibited. It weighed 894 ounces troy, and was presented 50 taels, or 48, 8s. 0d. English.—Ibid. Jan. 25, 1902, p. 120.

SHOE-FLOWER, s. A name given in Madras Presidency to the flower of the Hibiscus Rosa-sinensis, L. It is a literal translation of the Tam. shapattpu, Singh. sappattumala, a name given because the flowers are used at Madras to blacken shoes. The Malay name Kempang sapatu means the same. Voigt gives shoe-flower as the English name, and adds: "Petals astringent, used by the Chinese to blacken their shoes (?) and eyebrows? (Hortus Suburbanus Calcuttensis, 116-7); see also Drury, s.v. The notion of the Chinese blackening their shoes is surely an error, but perhaps they use it to blacken leather for European use.

[1773.—"The flower (Trepalsa, or Morroock) (which commonly by us is called Shoe-flower, because used to black our shoes) is very large, of a deep but beautiful crimson colour."—Tees, 475.] 1791.—"La nuit suivante ... je joignis aux pavots ... une fleur de foule sapate, qui sert aux cordonniers à teindre leurs cuirs en noir."—B. de St. Pierre, Chauvière Indienne. This foule-sapate is apparently some quasi Hindustani form of the name (phul-sabāt) used by the Portuguese.

SHOE-GOOSE, s. This ludicrous corruption of the Pers. syah-gush, lit. 'black-ear,' i.e. lynx (Felis Caracal) occurs in the passage below from A. Hamilton. [The corruption of the same word by the Times, below, is equally amusing.]

[c. 1830.—"... ounces, and another kind something like a greyhound, having only the ears black, and the whole body perfectly white, which among these people is called Siagosis."—Friar Jordanius, 18.] 1727.—"Antelopes, Hares and Foxes, are their wild game, which they hunt with Dogs, Leopards, and a small fierce creature called by them a Shoe-goose."—A. Hamilton, i. 124; [ed. 1744, i. 125].

1802.—"... between the cat and the lion, are the ... syagush, the lynx, the tiger-cat. ..."—Risdon, Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food, 12.

1813.—"The Moguls train another beast for antelope-hunting called the Syah-gush, or black-ears, which appears to be the same as the caracal, or Russian lynx."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 277; [2nd ed. i. 175 and 169].

[1886.—"In 1760 a Moor named Abdallah arrived in India with a 'Shah Goest' (so spelt, evidently a Shali Goat) as a present for Mr. Secretary Pitt."—Account of 1. O. Records, in Times, Aug. 3.]

SHOKE, s. A hobby, a favourite pursuit or whim. Ar.—shauk.

1796.—"This increased my shouq ... for soldiering, and I made it my study to become a proficient in all the Hindostanee modes of warfare."—Mily. Mem. of Lt.-Col. J. Steiner, i. 109.

[1866.—"One Hakim has a shoukh for turning everything ootapoota."—Confessions of an Orderly, 94.]

SHOLA, s. In S. India, a wooded ravine; a thicket. Tam. sholai.

1862.—"At daylight ... we left the Sisipara bungalow, and rode for several miles through a valley interspersed with sholas of rhododendron trees."—Markham, Peru and India, 356.

1876.—"Here and there in the hollows were little jungles; sholas, as they are called."—Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, Notes of Indian Journey, 202.

SHOOCKA, s. Ar.—H. shukka (properly 'an oblong strip'), a letter from a king to a subject.

1787.—"I have received several melancholy Shukhas from the King (of Dehli) calling on me in the most pressing terms for assistance and support."—Letter of Lord Cornwallis, in Corresp. i. 307.

SHOOLDARRY, s. A small tent with steep sloping roof, two poles and a ridge-piece, and with very low side walls. The word is in familiar use, and is habitually pronounced as we have indicated. But the first dictionary in which we have found it is that of Platts. This author spells the word chholdari, identifying the first syllable with jhol, signifying 'puckering or bagging.' In this light, however, it seems possible that it is from jhaal in the sense of a bag or wallet, viz. a tent that is crammed into a bag when carried. [The word is in Fallon, with the rather doubtful suggestion that it is a corruption of the English 'soldier's' tent. See PAWL.]

1808.—"I have now a shooldarree for myself, and a long paul (see PAWL) for my people."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 183.

[1869.—"... the men in their suldaris, or small single-roofed tents, had a bad time of it. ..."—Ball, Jungle Life, 156.]

SHRAUB, SHROBB, s. Ar. sharab; Hind. sharāb, shrab, 'wine.' See under SHERBET.

SHROFF, s. A money-changer, a banker. Ar. sarrāf, sairāf, sifir. The word is used by Europeans in China as well as in India, and is there applied to the experts who are employed by banks and mercantile firms to check the quality of the dollars that pass into the houses (see Giles under next word). Also shroffage, for money-dealer's commission. From the same root comes the Heb. sōrēf, 'a goldsmith.' Compare the figure in Malachi, iii. 3: "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi." Only in Hebrew the goldsmith tests metal, while the sūraf tests coins. The Arab poet says of his mare: "Her forefeet scatter the gravel every midday, as the dirhams are scattered at their testing by the sūraf" (W. R. S.)

1554.—"Salaries of the officers of the Custom Houses, and other charges for these which the Treasurers have to pay. . . . Also to the Xarafō, whose charge it is to see to the money, two pārdāos a month, which make for a year seven thousand and two hundred reis."—Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 283.

1560.—"There are in the city many and very wealthy Xaraffos who change money."—Tenreiro, ch. 1.

1584.—"5 tangas make a seraphin (see XERAFINE) of gold; but if one would change them into basaruchies (see BUDGROOK) he may have 5 tangas and 16 basaruchies, which overplus they call cerafagio. . . ."—Barret, in Hakl. ii. 410.

1585.—"This present year, because only two ships came to Goa, (the reais) have sold at 12 per cent. of Xaraflaggio (shroffage), as this commission is called, from the word Xaraffo, which is the title of the banker."—Sassetti, in De Gubernatis, Storia, p. 203.

1598.—"There is in every place of the street-exchangers of money, by them called Xaraffos, which are all Christian Jews."—Linschoten, 66; [Hak. Soc. i. 231, and see 244.]

c. 1610.—"Dans ce Marché . . . aussi sont les changeurs qu'ils nomment Cherafes, dont il y en a en plusieurs autres endroits; leurs boutiques sont aux bouts des rues et carrefours, toutes couvertes de monnoye, dont ils payent tribut au Roy."—Pyrard de Lavall, ii. 39; [Hak. Soc. ii. 67.]

[1614.—". . . having been borne in hand by our Sarafes to pay money there."—Foster, Letters, iii. 282. The "Sheriff of Bantam" (ibid. iv. 7) may perhaps be a shroff, but compare Shereef.]

1673.—"It could not be improved till the Governor had released the Shroffs or Bankers."—Priest, 413.

1697.—"In addition to the cash and property which they had got by plunder, the enemy fixed two lacs of rupees as the price of the ransom of the prisoners. . . . To make up the balance, the Sarasafes and merchants of Nandubar were importuned to raise a sum, small or great, by way of loan. But they would not consent."—Khāfī Khân, in Elliot, vii. 302.

1750.—". . . the Irruption of the Mo-rattas into Carnatic, was another event that brought several eminent Shroffs and wealthy Merchants into our Town; insomuch, that I may say, there was hardly a Shroff of any Note, in the Mogul empire but had a House in it; in a word, Madras was become the Admiration of all the Country People, and the Envy of all our [Neighbours."—Letter to a Proprietor of the E. I. Co. 53-54.

1809.—"I had the satisfaction of hearing the Court order them (i.e. Gen. Martin's executors) to pay two lacs and a half to the plaintiff, a shroff of Lucknow."—Ed. Valentia, i. 243.

[1891.—"The banker in Persia is looked on simply as a small tradesman—in fact the business of the Seref is despised."—Wills, in the Land of the Lion and the Sun, 192].

SHROFF, TO, v. This verb is applied properly to the sorting of different rupees or other coins, so as to discard refuse, and to fix the various amounts of discount or aqio upon the rest, establishing the value in standard coin. Hence figuratively 'to sift,' choosing the good (men, horses, facts, or what not) and rejecting the inferior.

[1554.—(See under BATTÁ, b.b.)]

1878.—"Shroffing schools are common in Canton, where teachers of the art keep bad dollars for the purpose of exercising their pupils; and several jworkes on the subject have been published there, with numerous illustrations of dollars and other foreign coins, the methods of scooping out silver and filling up with copper or lead, comparisons between genuine and counterfeit dollars, the difference between native and foreign milling, etc., etc."—Giles, Glossary of Reference, 129.

1882.—(The Compradore) "derived a profit from the process of shroffing which (the money received) underwent before being deposited in the Treasury."—The Fankrae at Canton, 55.

SHRUB, s. See under SHERBET.

SHULWAURS, s. Trousers, or drawers rather, of the Oriental kind, the same as pyjamaams, long-drawers, or mogul - breeches (qq.v). The Persian is shabwār, which according to Prof. Max Müller is more correctly shubār, from shul, 'the thigh,' related to Latin crurus, crucis, and to Skt. kshura or kshura, 'breeches' (see Pusey on Daniel, 570). Be this as it may, the Ar. form is sirwāl (vulg. sharwāl), pl. sarwāl, [which Burton (Arab. Nights, i. 205) translates 'bag-trousers' and 'petticot-trousers,' 'the latter being the divided skirt of the future.'] This appears in the ordinary editions of the Book of Daniel in Greek, as sarabapa, and also in the Vulgate, as follows: "Et capillus capitis eorum non esset adustus, et sarabala eorum non fuissent immutata, et odor ignis.
non transisset per eos" (iii. 27). The original word is sarabāla, pl. of sarabāla. Luther, however, renders this Mantel; as the A.V. also does by coats; [the R.V. hosen]. On this Prof. Robertson-Smith writes:

"It is not certain but that Luther and the A.V. are right. The word sarabāla means 'cloak' in the Gemara; and in Arabic sirbal is 'a garment, a coat of mail.' Perhaps quite an equal weight of scholarship would now lean (though with hesitation) towards the cloak or coat, and against the breeches theory.

"The Arabic word occurs in the Traditions of the Prophet (Bokhārī, vii. 36).

"Of course it is certain that sarabāra comes from the Persian, but not through Arabic. The Bedouins did not wear trowsers in the time of Ammianus, and don't do so now.

"The ordinary so-called LXX. editions of Daniel contain what is really the post-Christian version of Theodotion. The true LXX. text has ἕσπόδημα.

"It may be added that Jerome says that both Aquila and Symmachus wrote saraballa. [The Encycl. Biblica also prefers the rendering of the A.V. (i. 607), and see iii. 2904.]

The word is widely spread as well as old; it is found among the Tartars of W. Asia as žalbär, among the Siberians and Bashkirds as zălbăr, among the Kalmaks as šalbär, whilst it reached Russia as sharawari, Spain as saragueles, and Portugal as zarelos. A great many Low Latin variations of the word will be found in Ducange, serabula, serabulla, sarabella, sarabola, sarabura, and more! [And Crawford (Desc. Dict. 124) writes of Malay dress: 'Trowsers are occasionally used under the sarung by the richer classes, and this portion of dress, like the imitation of the turban, seems to have been borrowed from the Arabs, as is implied by its Arabic name, sarual, corrupted salwaru.']

In the second quotation from Isidore of Seville below it will be seen that the word had in some cases been interpreted as 'turbans.'

A.D. (I).—'Kal ἑθεώρω τοὺς ἀνδρας δεῖ ὁμ ἐκφυλεσ τὸ πῦρ τοῦ σῶματος αὐτῶν καὶ ἡ θρία τῆς κεφαλῆς αὐτῶν ὀκ ἐφερλεγέθαι καὶ τα σαράβαρα αὐτῶν ὀκ ἢλιολιῳ, καὶ σομή πυρὸς ὃν ἦν ἐν αὐτοῖς.'—Gr. Tr. of Dan. iii. 27.

c. A.D. 200.—'Ἐν δὲ τοῖς Σκύθαις Ἀρτυ-φάνης ἐγέρ Σαράβαρα καὶ χιτώνας πάντας ἐνδυκάστατο.'—Julius Pollux, Onomast. vii. 13, sec. 59.

c. A.D. 500.—"Σαράβαρα, τὰ περὶ τὰς κυνηγίας (sic) ἑνδύματα."—Herod. viii. 126. a.s. v.

c. 1000 ?—"Σαράβαρα, εὐθὺς Περσίκης ἔνεοι δὲ λέγουσι βραζία."—Stæolas, a.s. v.

which may be roughly rendered:

"A garb outlandish to the Greeks.

Which some call Shalwãrs, some call Breeks!"

c. 900.—"The deceased was unchanged, except in colour. They dressed him then with sarāwil, overhose, boots, a kurāk and khafrān of gold-cloth, with golden buttons, and put on him a golden cap garnished with sable."—Don Fœxelán, in Frœchlin, 15.

c. 1300.—"Disconsacratur altare eorum, et oportet recollari per episcopum . . . si intraret ad ipsam abuis quid non esset Nestorius; si intraret eciam ad ipsam qui cumque sine sorrabulis vel capitae cooperto."—Ricoldo de Monte Croce, in Peregrinatores Quatuor, 122.

c. 1330.—"Haec autem mulieres vadunt dis-calectae portantes sarabulas usque ad terram."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App. iv.

c. 1495.—"The first who wore sarāwil was Solomon. But in another tradition it is alleged that Abraham was the first."—The 'Beginnings,' by Soyati, quoted by Frœchlin, 113.

c. 1567.—"Portauano braghesses quasi alla turchesa, et anche saluari."—C. Federici, in Romantia, iii. f. 389.

c. 1624.—". . . tell me how much he will be contented with? Can I offer him five Tsumaus, and a pair of crimson Shul- waurs?"—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 179.

c. 1881.—"I used to wear a red shirt and velveteen sharrowy, and lie on the sofa like a gentleman, and drink like a Swede."—Ten Years of Penal Servitude in Siberia, by Fedor Dostojevski, E.T. by Maria v. Thilo, 191.

SIAM. n.p. This name of the Indo-Chinese Kingdom appears to come to us through the Malays, who call it Siyām. From them we presume the Portuguese took their Reyno de Sīdō as Barros and Couto write it, though we have in Correa Siam precisely as we write it. Camões also writes Syōd for the kingdom; and the statement of De la Loubère quoted below that the Portuguese used Siam as a national, not a geographical, expression cannot be accepted in its generality, accurate as that French writer usually is. It is true that both Barros and F. M. Pinto use os Siames for the nation, and the latter also uses the adjective form o reyno Siam. But he also constantly says reyn de Sido. The origin of the name would seem to be a term Sien, or Siam, identical with Shan (q.v.). “The kingdom of Siam is known to the Chinese by the name Sien-lo ... . The supplement to Matvianlin’s Encyclopaedia describes Sien-lo as on the seaboard, to the extreme south of Chen-ching (or Cochín China). ‘It originally consisted of two kingdoms, Sien and Lo-hoh. The Sien people are the remains of a tribe which in the year (A.D. 1341) began to come down upon the Lo-hoh and united with the latter into one nation.’ See Marco Polo, 2nd ed., Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3. The considerations there adduced indicate that the Lo who occupied the coast of the Gulf before the descent of the Sien, belonged to the Lautian Shans, Thaviyai, or Great T’ai, whilst the Sien or Siamese Proper were the T’ai Noi, or Little T’ai. (See also SARNAU.) [‘The name Siam ... whether it is ‘a barbarous Anglicism derived from the Portuguese or Italian word Siciam,’ or is derived from the Malay Sayam, which means ‘brown.’”—J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 205.]

1516.—“Proceeding further, quitting the kingdom of Peguau, along the coast over against Malacca there is a very great kingdom of pagans which they call Danseam (of Ansseam); the king of which is a pagan also, and a very great lord.”—Barbosa (Lisbon, Acad.), 369. It is difficult to interpret this Ansseam, which we find also in C. Federici below in the form Asion. But the An is probably a Malay prefix of some kind. [Also see anysane in quotation from the same writer under MALACCA.]

c. 1522.—‘The king (of Zamba) answered him that he was welcome, but that the custom was that all ships which arrived at his country or port paid tribute, and it was only 4 days since that a ship called the Junk of Ciama, laden with gold and slaves, had paid him his tribute, and to verify what he said, he showed them a merchant of the said Ciama, who had remained there to trade with the gold and slaves.”—Piga-fetta, Hak. Soc. 85.

“All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the king of Siam, who is named Siri Zacebedera, and who inhabits Iudia (see JUDEA).”—Ibid. 156.

1525.—“In this same Port of Pam (Pahang), which is in the kingdom of Syam, there was another junk of Malacqua, the captain whereof was Alvaro daCostaa, and it had aboard 15 Portuguese, at the same time that in Joatane (Patane) they seized the ship of Andre de Bryto, and the junk of Gaspar Soarco, and as soon as this news was known they laid hands on the junk and the crew and the cargo; it is presumed that the people were killed, but it is not known for certain.”—Lembrança das Coisas da India, 6.

1572.—“Vês Pam, Patâne, reinos e a longura De Syão, que estes e outros mais sujeita; Olho o rio Menâo que se derrama Do grande lago, que Chiamay se chiana.”—Contos, x. 25.

By Burton:

“See Pam, Patande and in length obscure, Siam that ruleth all with lordly sway; behold Menam, who rolls his lordly tide from source Chiamâf called, lake long and wide.”

c. 1567.—“Va etiandio ogun’ anno per l’istesso Capitano (di Malacca) vn nauhilo in Asion, a caricare di Venezia” (Brasiliad).

—Ces. Federici, in Rambusio, iii. 396.

“Fu già Sion vna grandissima Città e sedia d’Imperio, ma l’anno mdxvii fu pressa dal Re del Pegu, qual caminando per terra quattro mesi di viaggio, con vn esercito d’vn million, e quattro cento mila uomini da guerra, la venne ad assediare ... e lo so io perciocche mi ritroiai in Pegu sei mesi dopo la sua partita.”—Ibid.

1598.—“... The King of Sian at this time is become tributarie to the king of Pegu. The cause of this most bloody battale was, that the king of Sian had a white Elephant”—Linschoten, p. 39; [Hak. Soc. ] 1627.—In ii. 1 Sion.

[1611.—“We have news that the Hollanderes were in Shian.”—Daveners, Letters, i. 149.]

1688.—“The Name of Siam is unknown to the Siamese. Tis one of those words which the Portugues of the Indies do use, and of which it is very difficult to discover the Original. They use it as the Name of the Nation and not of the Kingdom: And the Names of Pegu, Lao, Magul, and most of the Names which we give to the Indian Kingdoms, are likewise National Names.”—De la Lomère, B.T. p. 6.

SICCA, s. As will be seen by reference to the article RUPEE, up to 1835 a variety of rupees had been coined in the Company’s territories. The term sicca (stèkà, from Ar. sikka, ‘a coining die,’—and ‘coined money,’—whence Pers. sikka zadun, ‘to coin’) had been applied to newly coined rupees, which were at a batta or premium over those worn, or assumed to be worn, by use. In 1793 the Government of Bengal, with a view to terminating, as far as that Presidency was concerned, the confusion and abuses engendered by this system, ordered that all rupees coined for the future should bear the impress of the 19th year of Shāh 'Alam (the "Great Mogul" then reigning), and this rupee, "19 San Sikkah," struck in the 19th year, was to be the legal tender in Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. This rupee, which is the Sicca of more recent monetary history, weighed 192 grs. troy, and then contained 176:13 grs. of pure silver. The "Company's Rupee," which introduced uniformity of coinage over British India in 1835, contained only 165 grs. silver. Hence the Sicca bore to the Company's Rupee (which was based on the old Farrukhabad rupee) the proportion of 16:15 nearly. The Sicca was allowed by Act VII. of 1833 to survive as an exceptional coin in Bengal, but was abolished as such in 1836. It continued, however, a ghosty existence for many years longer in the form of certain Government Book-debts in that currency. (See also CHICK.)

1537.—"... Sua senhoria avia d'aver por bem que as siquas das moedas corressem em seu nome per todo o Reino do Guzerate, ass em Dêo como nos outroslugares que forem del Rey de Portugal."—Treaty of Nuno da Cunha with Nizamamadd Zamam (Mikammed Zamam) concerning Cambay, in Botelho, Tomo, 225. 1557.—"... e quanto á moeda ser chapada de sua sica (read sica) pois já lhe concedia."—Ibid. 226.

[1615.—"... cecaus of Amadavrs which goeth for eighty-six pious (see PICE). ..."—Foster, Letters, iii. 87.]

1683.—"Having received 25,000 Rupees Siccas for Rajamala."—Hodges, Diary, April 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 75.]

1705.—"Les roupies Sicca valent à Bengale 39 sols."—Lulliet, 255.

1779.—"In the 2nd Term, 1779, on Saturday, March 6th: Judgment was pronounced for the plaintiff. Damages fifty thousand sicca rupees.

... 50,000 Sicca Rupees are equal to five thousand one hundred and nine pounds, two shillings and elevenpence sterling, reckoning according to the weight and fineness of the silver."—Notes of Mr. Justice Hyde on the case Grand v. Francis, in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 243. [To this Mr. Bustedel adds: "Nor does there seem to be any foundation for the other time-honoured story (also repeated by Kaye) in connection with this judgment, viz., the alleged interruption of the Chief Justice, while he was delivering judgment, by Mr. Justice Hyde, with the eager suggestion or reminder of 'Siccas, Siccas, Brother Impye,' with the view of making the damages as high at the awarded figure as possible. Mr. Merivale says that he could find no confirmation of the old joke. ... The story seems to have been first promulgated in a book of 'Personal Recollections' by John Nicholls, M.P., published in 1822."—Ibid. 3rd ed. 229]. 1833.— * * *

"III.—The weight and standard of the Calcutta sicca rupee and its sub-divisions, and of the Farruckabad rupee, shall be as follows:

Calcutta sicca rupee 192 176 15

* * * * *

"IV.—The use of the sicca weight of 179:666 grains, hitherto employed for the receipt of bullion at the Mint, being in fact the weight of the Moorshebad rupee of the old standard ... shall be discontinued, and in its place the following unit to be called the Tola (q.v.) shall be introduced."—India Regulation VII. of 1833.

[SICKMAN, s. adj. The English sick man has been adopted into Hind. sepoy patois as meaning 'one who has to go to hospital,' and generally sikeman ho jānā means 'to be disabled.'

[1665.—"That sickman Chaseman."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. II. cclxx.

[1843.—"... my hired cart was broken —[or, in the more poetical garb of the seapee, 'seek mān hogya,' i.e. become a sick man]."—Davidson, Travels, i. 251.]

SICLEEGUR, s. Hind. saikulgar, from Ar. saikal, 'polish.' A furnisher of arms, a sword-armourer, a sword- or knife-grinder. [This, in Madras, is turned into Chickledar, Tel. chikildarudur.]

Sikh, seikh, n.p. Panjāb-Hind. Sikh, 'a disciple,' from Skt. Sisya; the distinctive name of the disciples of Nānāk Shāh who in the 16th century established that sect, which eventually rose to warlike predominance in the Punjab, and from which sprang Ranjīt Singh, the founder of the brief Kingdom of Lahore.

c. 1650-60.—"The Nanac-Panthians, who are known as composing the nation of the Sikhs, have neither idols, nor temples of idols. . ." (Much follows.) —Dabistan, ii. 246.

1708-9.—"There is a sect of infidels called Gurud (see GOOROO), more commonly known as Sikhs. Their chief, who dresses as a fakir, has a fixed residence at Lahore. . . This sect consists principally of Jats and Khatri of the Panjab and of other tribes of infidels. When Aurangzeb got knowledge of these matters, he ordered these deputy Guruds to be removed and the temples to be pulled down."—Khaf Kahan, in Elliot, vii. 413.

1756.—"April of 1716, when the Emperor took the field and marched towards Lahore, against the Sykes, a nation of Indians lately reared to power, and bearing mortal enmity to the Mahomedans."—Orme, ii. 22. He also writes Sikis.

1781.—"Before I left Calcutta, a gentleman with whom I chanced to be discoursing of that sect who are distinguished from the worshippers of Brithm, and the followers of MAHOMMED by the appellation Seek, informed me that there was a considerable number of them settled in the city of Patna, where they had a College for teaching the tenets of their philosophy."—Wilkins, in As. Res. i. 280.

1781-2.—"In the year 1128 of the Hedjra" (1716) "a bloody action happened in the plains of the Pendjab, between the Sycs and the Imperialists, in which the latter, commanded by Abdol-semed-Khan, a famous Viceroy of that province, gave these inhuman freebooters a great defeat, in which their General, Benda, fell into the victors' hands. . . He was a Syc by profession, that is one of those men attached to the tenets of Guru-Govind, and who from their birth or from the moment of their admission never cut or shave either their beard or whiskers or any hair whatever of their body. They form a particular Society as well as a sect, which distinguishes itself by wearing almost always blue cloaths, and going armed at all times." &c.—Seir Mutakerhin, i. 87.

1782.—"News was received that the Seiks had crossed the Jumna."—India Gazette, May 11.

1790.—"Particulars relating to the seizure of Colonel Robert Stewart by the Siquees."—Calcut. Monthly Register, &c., i. 152.

1810.—Williamson (V. M.) writes Seeks. The following extract indicates the prevalence of a very notable error:—

1840.—"Runjeet possesses great personal courage, a quality in which the Sikhs (sic) are supposed to be generally deficient."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 83. We occasionally about 1845-6 saw the word written by people in Calcutta, who ought to have known better, Sheiks.

SILBOOT, SILPET, SLIPPET, s. Domestic Hind. corruptions of 'slipper.' The first is an instance of "striving after meaning" by connecting it in some way with 'boot.' [The Railway 'sleeper' is in the same way corrupted into siltipat.]

SILLADAR, adj. and s. Hind. from Pers. silāh-dār, 'bearing or having arms,' from Ar. silāh, 'arsa.' [In the Arabian Nights (Burton, ii. 114) it has the primary sense of an 'armour-bearer.'] Its Anglo-Indian application is to a soldier, in a regiment of irregular cavalry, who provides his own arms and horse; and sometimes to regiments composed of such men—"a corps of Silladar Horse." [See Irvine, The Army of the Indian Moghuls, (J. R. As. Soc., July 1896, p. 549).]

1766.—"When this intelligence reached the Nawaub, he leaving the whole of his troops and baggage in the same place, with only 6000 stable horse, 9000 Sillahdars, 4000 regular infantry, and 6 guns . . . fell bravely on the Mahrtattas. . ."—Mir Hussein Ali, H. of Hyder Naiq, 178.

1804.—"It is my opinion, that the arrangement with the Soubah of the Deccan should be, that the whole of the force . . . should be sizzlar horse."—Wellington, iii. 671.

1813.—"Bhaut . . . in the prosecution of his plan, selected Malhar Row Holcar, a Silledar or soldier of fortune."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 949.

[SILLAPOSH, s. An armour-clad warrior; from Pers. silāh, 'body armour,' posh, Pers. poshidan, 'to wear,' (1790)—"The Sillah posh or body-guard of the Rajah (of Jaipur)."—W. Franklin, Mil. Mem. of Mr. George Thomas, ed. 1805, p. 165.

[1829.—". . . he stood two assaultns, in one of which he slew thirty Sillehposh, or men in armour, the body-guard of the prince."—Ted, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 462.]

SILMAGOOB, s. Ship Hind. for 'sail-maker' (Roebuck).

SIMKIN, s. Domestic Hind. for champagne, of which it is a corruption; sometimes samkin.

1853.—"The dinner was good, and the iced simkin, Sir, delicious."—Oakfield, ii. 127.
SIND, SCINDE, &c, n.p. The territory on the Indus below the Punjab. [In the early inscriptions the two words Sindhu-Savirora are often found conjoined, the latter probably part of Upper Sind (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 36.).] The earlier Mahomedans hardly regarded Sind as part of India, but distinguished sharply between Sind and Hind, and denoted the whole region that we call India by the copula 'Hind and Sind.' We know that originally these were in fact but diverging forms of one word; the aspirant and sibilant tending in several parts of India (including the extreme east—compare ASSAM, Ahom—and the extreme west), as in some other regions, to exchange places.

C. 545.—"Σινδ, ο Ορθνα, Καλλακα, Σιδιρκαια και Μαλε πτερει εμπορια έχουνη." —Cosmas, lib. xi. 114.

770.—"Per idem tempus quingenti circiter ex Mauris, Sindis, et Chazaris servi in urbe Haran rebelarrant, et facto agrimi regium thesaurum disperso tentarunt." — Dionysi Poisitarchi Chronicon, in Assamani, ii. 114. But from the association with the Khazars, and in a passage on the preceding page with Alans and Khazars, we may be almost certain that these Sindis are not Indian, but a Sarmatic people mentioned by Ammianus (xxii. 5), Valerius Flaccus (vi. 86), and other writers.

C. 1630.—"Sind and her sister (i.e. Hind) trembled at his power and vengeance." —Al l'Ubi, in Elliot, ii. 32.

C. 1540.—"Mohammed ben-Iousouf Thaka fi trouvé dans la province de Sind quarante behar (see BAHAR) d'or, et chaque behar comprend 333 maunds." —Skiphuddin Dimishki, in Not. et Ext. xiii. 173.

1525.—"Expenses of Melyquya (i.e. Malik Ayaz of Dinu) :—1,000 foot soldiers (lasquyra), viz., 300 Arabs, at 40 and 50 fideus each; also 200 Coragones (Khorasânis) at the wage of the Arabs; also 200 Guzarates and Cymdes at 25 to 30 fideus each; also 30 Rumes at 100 fideus each; 120 Fartaquys at 50 fideus each. Horse soldiers (Lasquyra a guanalo), whom he supplies with horses, 300 at 70 fideus a month. . . ." —Lembrança, p. 37.

The preceding extract is curious as showing the comparative value put upon Arabs, Khorasânis (qu. Afghâns?), Sindis, Râmis (i.e. Turks), Farrakts (Arabs of Hadramaut), &c.

1548.—"And the rent of the shops (butica) of the Guzaratis of Cindy, who prepare and sell parched rice, (æcol), paying 6 bazaranos (see BUDGROOK) a month." —Botelho, Tombo, 156.

1554.—"Towards the Gulf of Chakad, in the vicinity of Sind." —Sidé Alf, in J. Az. Ser. 1. tom. ix. 77.

1558.—"The first citie of India . . . after we had passed the coast of Zindi is called Dinu." —Fitch, in Hakl. p. 385.

1584.—"Spiecknard from Zindi and Lahor." —W. Barret, in Hakl. ii. 412.

1598.—"I have written to the said Antônio d'Azvedo on the ill treatment experienced by the Portuguese in the kingdom of Cimde." —King's Letter to Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fascic. iii. 877.

1727.—"Sindy is the westmost Province of the Mogul's Dominions on the Sea-coast, and has Larribunder (see LARRY-BUNDER) to its Mart." —A. Hamilton, i. 114; [ed. 1744, i. 115].

C. 1760.—"Scindy, or Tatta." —Grose, i. 286.

SINDÁBÚR, SANDÁBÚR., n.p. This is the name by which Goa was known to the old Arab writers. The identity is clearly established in Cathay and the Way Thither, pp. 444 and ccli. We will give the quotations first, and then point out the grounds of identification.

A.D. 943.—"Crocodiles abound, it is true, in the ayowin or bays formed by the Sea of India, such as that of Sindabura in the Indian Kingdom of Bâghira, or in the bay of Zâbaq (see JAVA) in the dominion of the Maharâj." —Maythâi, i. 197.

1013.—"I have it from Abû Yüsaf bin Muslim, who had it from Abû Bakr of Fasâ at Saimur, that the latter heard told by Mûsa the Sindabûri: 'I was one day conversing with the Sahib of Sindabûr, when suddenly he burst out laughing . . . . It was, said he, because there is a lizard on the wall, and it said, 'There is a guest-coming to-day. . . . Don't you go till you see what comes of it.' So we remained talking till one of his servants came in and said 'There is a ship of Oman come in.' Shortly after, people arrived, carrying hampers with various things, such as cloths, and rose-water. As they opened one, out came a long lizard, which instantly clung to the wall and went to join the other one. It was the same person, they say, who enchanted the crocodiles in the estuary of Sindābūr, so that now they hurt nobody.'—Liivre des Merveilles de l'Inde. V. der Likh et Desr. 157-158.

1150. — "From the city of Barīt (Barī, i.e. Broach) following the coast, to Sindābūr 4 days.

"Sindābūr is on a great inlet where ships anchor. It is a place of trade, where one sees fine buildings and rich bazars."—Edrisī, i. 179. And see Elliot, i. 89.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Konkan and Tāmā; beyond them the country of Malībūr. . . . The people are all Samāns (Buddhists), and worship idols. Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindābūr, then Fānkūr, then the country of Manjārūr, then the country of Hīl. . . ."—Rashīduddīn, in Elliot, i. 48.

c. 1390. — "A traveller states that the country from Sindābūr to Hanāwār towards its eastern extremity joins with Malabar."—Abūl feda, Fr. tr., II. ii. 115. Further on in his Tables he jumbles up (as Edrisi has done) Sindābūr with Sindān (see ST. JOHN).

"The heat is great at Aden. This is the port frequented by the people of India; great ships arrive there from Cambay, Tānā, Kaulam, Calicut, Fandārīnā, Shāliyāt, Manjārūr, Fānakūr, Hānāur, Sandābūr, et cetera."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 177.

c. 1343-4.—"Three days after setting sail we arrived at the Island of Sandābūr, within which there are 36 villages. It is surrounded by an inlet, and at the time of ebb the water of this is fresh and pleasant, whilst at flow it is salt and bitter. There are in the island two cities, one ancient, built by the pagans; the second built by the Musulmans when they conquered the island the first time. . . . We left this island behind us and anchored at a small island near the mainland, where we found a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. . . ."—Ibid. iv. 61-62.

1350,—1375.—In the Medicean and the Catalan maps of those dates we find on the coast of India Cintābar and Chintābar respectively, on the west coast of India.

c. 1554. — "24th Voyage: from Gouvah-Sindābūr to Aden. If you start from Gouvah-Sindābūr at the end of the season, take to fall on Cape Fāl," &c.—Mokhī, in J.A.S.R. v. 564.

The last quotation shows that Goa was known even in the middle of the 16th century to Oriental seamen as Goa-Sindābūr, whatever Indian name the last part represented; probably, from the use of the word ādār by the earlier Arab writers, and from the Chintabur of the European maps, Chandāpur rather than Sandābūr. No Indian name like this has yet been recovered from inscriptions as attaching to Goa; but the Turkish author of the Mohit supplies the connection, and Ibn Batuta's description even without this would be sufficient for the identification. His description, it will be seen, is that of a delta-island, and Goa is the only one partaking of that character upon the coast. He says it contained 36 villages; and Barros tells us that Goa Island was known to the natives as Firdūdī, a name signifying "Thirty villages." (See SAL-SETTE.) Its vicinity to the island where Ibn Batuta proceeded to anchor, which we have shown to be Anchedivā (q.v.), is another proof. Turning to Rashīduddīn, the order in which he places Sindābūr, Fānkūr (Baccanore), Manjārūr (Mangalore), Hīl (Mt. D'Elī), is perfectly correct, if for Sindābūr we substitute Goa. The name, from Edrisī and one indicated from Abulfeda only show a confusion which has misled many readers since.

SINGALESE, CINGHALESE, n.p. Native of Ceylon; pertaining to Ceylon. The word is formed from Sinhala, 'Dwelling of Lions,' the word used by the natives for the Island, and which is the origin of most of the names given to it (see CEYLON). The explanation given by De Barros and Couto is altogether fanciful, though it leads them to notice the curious and obscure fact of the introduction of Chinese influence in Ceylon during the 15th century.

1552.—"That the Chinese (Chiā) were masters of the Choromandal Coast of the part of Malabar, and of this Island of Ceylon, we have not only the assertion of the Natives of the latter, but also evidence in the buildings, names, and language that they left in it. . . . and because they were in the vicinity of this Cape Galle, the other people who lived from the middle of the Island upwards called those dwelling about there Chingālā, and their language the same, as much as to say the language, or the people of the Chins of Galle."—Barros, III. ii. 1.

1583. (The Cauchin Chinsāna) "are of the race of the Chingalās, which they say are the best kinds of art from Malabar."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 397.

1598.—". . . inhabited with people called Cingalās . . ."—Linschoten, 74; [Hak. Soc. i. 77; in i. 81, Chingalas].

c. 1610.—"Il s'entien du que . . . les premiers qui y allèrent, et qui les peuples (les Maldives) furent . . . les Cingalas de l'Isle de Ceylan."—Pyramd de Laval, i. 185; [Hak. Soc. i. 105, and see i. 266].

1612.—Couto, after giving the same explanation of the word as Barros, says: "And as they spring from the Chins, who are the falsest heathen of the East . . . so are they Singapor, Singapore.

This name was adopted by Sir Stamford Raffles in favour of the city which he founded, February 23, 1819, on the island which had always retained the name since the Middle Ages. This it derived from Singhapura, Skt. 'Lion-city,' the name of a town founded by Malay or Javanese settlers from Sumatra, probably in the 14th century, and to which Barros ascribes great commercial importance. The Indian origin of the name, as of many other names and phrases which survive from the old Indian civilisation of the Archipelago, had been forgotten, and the origin which Barros was taught to ascribe to it is on a par with his etymology of Singalese quoted in the preceding article. The words on which his etymology is founded are no doubt Malay: singah, 'to tarry, halt, or lodge;' and pora-pora, 'to pretend;' and these were probably supposed to refer to the temporary occupation of Sinhapura, before the chiefs who founded it passed on to Malacca. [It may be noted that Dennys (Desc. Dict. s.v.) derives the word from singho, 'a place of call,' and pura, 'a city.' In Dalboquerque's Comm. Hak. Soc. iii. 73, we are told: 'Singapura, whence the city takes its name, is a channel through which all the shipping of those parts passes, and signifies in his Malay language, 'treacherous delay.' See quotation from Barros below.]

The settlement of Hindueized people on the site, if not the name, is probably as old as the 4th century, A.D., for inscriptions have been found there in a very old character. One of these, on a rock at the mouth of the little river on which the town stands, was destroyed some 40 or 50 years ago for the accommodation of some wretched bungalow.

The modern Singapore and its prosperity form a monument to the patriotism, sagacity, and fervid spirit of the founder. According to an article in the Geogr. Magazine (i. 107) derived from Mr. Archibald Ritchie, who was present with the expedition which founded the colony, Raffles, after consultation with Lord Hastings, was about to establish a settlement for the protection and encouragement of our Eastern trade, in the Nicobar Islands, when his attention was drawn to the superior advantages of Singapore by Captains Ross and Crawford of the Bombay Marine, who had been engaged in the survey of those seas. Its great adaptation for a mercantile settlement had been discerned by the shrewd, if somewhat vulgar, Scot, Alexander Hamilton, 120 years earlier. It seems hardly possible, we must however observe, to reconcile the details in the article cited, with the letters and facts contained in the Life of Raffles; though probably the latter had, at some time or other, received information from the officers named by Mr. Ritchie.

1512.—"And as the enterprise was one to make good booty, everybody was delighted to go on it, so that they were more than 1200 men, the soundest and best armed of the garrison, and so they were ready incontinently, and started for the Strait of Cincapura, where they were to wait for the junk."—Correa, ii. 284-5.

1553.—"Anciently the most celebrated settlement in this region of Malaca was one called Cingapura, a name which in their tongue means 'pretended halt;' (falsa dimora) and this stood upon a point of that country which is the most southerly of all Asia, and lies, according to our graduation, in half a degree of North Latitude... before the foundation of Malaca, at this same Cingapura... flocked together all the navigators of the Seas of India from West and East..."—Barros, ii. vi. 1

[The same derivation is given in the Comm. of Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. iii. 73.]

1572.—"Mas na ponta da terra Cingapura: Verds, onde o caminho as maos se estreita; Daqui, tornando a costa a Cynosura, Se incuva, e para a Aurora se endireita."—Camões, x. 125.

By Burton:

"But on her Lands-end throned see Cingapur, where the wide sea-road shrinks to narrow way: Thence curves the coast to face the Cynosura, and lastly trends Aurora-wards its lay,"

1598.—"... by water the coast stretcheth to the Cape of Singapura, and from thence..."

1599.—"In this voyage nothing occurred worth relating, except that, after passing the Strait of Sinçapora, situated in one degree and a half, between the main land and a variety of islands ... with so narrow a channel that from the ship you could jump ashore, or touch the branches of the trees on either side, our vessel struck on a shoal."—Viaggi d’i Carletti, ii. 208-9.

1606.—"The 5th May came there 2 Prows from the King of Johore, with the Shabander (Shabunder) of Singa-pora, called Siri Raja Nagara. ..."—Valentijn, v. 331.

1616.—"Found a Dutch man-of-war, one of a fleet appointed for the siege of Malaca, with the aid of the King of Acheen, at the entrance of the Straits of Singapore."—Seinsbury, i. 458.

1727.—"In anno 1703 I called at Johore on my Way to China, and he treated me very kindly, and made me a Present of the Island of Sinçapure, but I told him it could be of no use to a private Person, tho’ a proper Place for a Company to settle a Colony in, lying in the Center of Trade, and being accommodated with good Rivers and safe Harbours, so conveniently situated that all Winds served Shipping, both to go out and come in."—J. Hamilton, ii. 98; [ed. 1744, ii. 97].

1818.—"We are now on our way to the eastward, in the hope of doing something, but I much fear the Dutch have hardly left us an inch of ground. ... My attention is principally turned to Johore, and you must not be surprised if my next letter to you is dated from the site of the ancient city of Singapora."—Raffles, Letter to Marsden, dated Sandheads, Dec. 12.

SINGARA, s. Hind. singhârd, Skt. srîngattaka, srîngâ, ‘a horn.’ The caltrop or water-chestnut; Trapa bis-pînoasa, Roxb. (N.O. Halorthaceae).

[c. 1590.—The ān (ed. Jarrett, ii. 65) mentions it as one of the crops on which revenue was levied in cash.

1798.—In Kashmir ‘many of them ... were obliged to live on the Kernel of the singhâra, or water-nut. ...’—Forster, Travels, ii. 29.

1809.—Buchanan-Hamilton writes sing-hâra.—Eastern Indies, i. 241.]

1835.—"Here, as in most other parts of India, the tank is spoiled by the water-chestnut, singhâra (Trapa bispînoasa), which is everywhere as regularly planted and cultivated in fields under a large surface of water, as wheat or barley is in the dry plains. ... The nut grows under the water after the flowers decay, and is of a triangular shape, and covered with a tough brown integument adhering strongly to the kernel, which is wholly esculent, and of a fine car-thilaginous texture. The people are very fond of these nuts, and they are carried often upon bullocks’ backs two or three hundred miles to market."—Sheenan, Rambles, &c. (1844), i. 101; [ed. Smith, i. 94].

1839.—"The nuts of the Trapa bispînoasa, called Singhâra, are sold in all the Bazaars of India; and a species called by the same name, forms a considerable portion of the food of the inhabitants of Cashmere, as we learn from Mr. Forster [loc. cit.] that it yields the Government 12,000l. of revenue; and Mr. Moorcroft mentions nearly the same sum as Runjeet Sing’s share, from 96,000 to 128,000 ass-loads of this nut, yielded by the Lakes of Oeller."—Royte, Hem. Plants, ii. 211.

SIPAHSELAR, s. A General-in-chief; Pers. sipâh-salâr, ‘army-leader,’ the last word being the same as in the title of the late famous Minister-Regent of Hyderabad, Sir Sâlâr Jang, i.e. ‘the leader in war.’

1590-1100.—"Voici quelle étoit alors la gloire et la puissance des Orphéans dans le royaume. Ils possédoient la charge de sbasalar, ou de générauxissime de toute la Georgie. Tous les officiers du palais étoient de leur dependance."—Hist. of the Orphéans, in St. Martin, Mem. sur l’Arménie, ii. 77.

1638.—"At 16 my father took me by the hand, and brought me to his own Monastery. He there addressed me: ‘My boy, our ancestors from generation to generation have been commanders of the armies of the Jâghtay and the Berlas family. The dignity of (Sephâl Salar) Commander-in-Chief has now descended to me, but as I am tired of this world ... I mean therefore to resign my public office. ...’—Autobi. Mem. of Timour, E.T. p. 22.

1712.—"Omnibus illis superior est Sipah Salaar, sive Imperator Generalis Regni, Præsidem dignitatem exerciptionem. ..."—Kemmfer, Aemom. Exot. 73.

1755.—"After the Sipahsalar Hydor, by his prudence and courage, had defeated the Maharatts and recovered the country taken by them, he placed the government of Seringaput tun on a sure and established basis. ..."—Meer Hussein Ali Khan, H. of Hydor Neak, O. T. F. p. 61.

1803.—In a collection of native letters, the titles of Lord Lake are given as follows: ‘Ash-ja-ul-Mulk Khan Dwarun, General-Governor Lake-Bahâdûr, Sipahsalar—kishwar-I-Hind, Governor and Chief of the Kingdom, Lord of the Cycle, Commander-in-chief of the Territories of Hindustan.’—North Indian Notes and Queries, iv. 17.]

SIRCAR, s. Hind. from Pers. sur-kâr, ‘head (of affairs).’ This word has very divers applications; but its senses may fall under three heads.
a. The State, the Government, the Supreme authority; also 'the Master' or head of the domestic government. Thus a servant, if asked 'Whose are those horses?' in replying 'They are the sarkar's,' may mean according to circumstances, that they are Government horses, or that they belong to his own master.

b. In Bengal the word is applied to a domestic servant who is a kind of house-steward, and keeps the accounts of household expenditure, and makes miscellaneous purchases for the family; also, in merchants' offices, to any native accountant or native employed in making purchases, &c.

c. Under the Mahommedan Governments, as in the time of the Mogul Empire, and more recently in the Decan, the word was applied to certain extensive administrative divisions of territory. In its application in the Decan it has been in English generally spelt Circar (q.v.).

| a. | [1759.—"... there is no separation between your Honour ... and this Circar. ..."
  |  | Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 129.]
  |  | 1800.—"Would it not be possible and proper to make people pay the Circar according to the exchange fixed at Seringapatam?"—Wellington, i. 60.
  |  | [1866.—"... the Sirkar Buhadoor gives me four rupees a month. ..."
  |  | Confessions of an Orderly, 43.]

b. | 1777.—"There is not in any country in the world, of which I have any knowledge, a more pernicious race of vermin in human shape than are the numerous cast of people known in Bengal by the appellation of Sirkars; they are educated and trained to deceive."—Price's Tracts, i. 24.
  | 1810.—"The Sircar is a genius whose whole study is to handle money, whether receivable or payable, and who contrives either to confuse accounts, when they are adverse to his view, or to render them most expressively intelligible, when such should suit his purpose."—Williamson, V. M. i. 200.
  | 1822.—"One morning our Sircar, in answer to my having observed that the articles purchased were highly priced, said, 'You are my father and my mother, and I am your poor little child. I have only taken 2 annas in the rupee dustoorie'" (dustoor).—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 21-22.
  | 1834.—"And how the deuce,' asked his companion, 'do you manage to pay for them?' 'Nothing so easy,—I say to my Sirkar: 'Baboo, go pay for that horse 2000 rupees, and it is done, Sir, as quickly as you could dock him.'"—The Baboo and Other Tales, i. 13.

b. | 1590.—"... in the forty-ninth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sircars, subdivided into 2737 kusbahs" (cubba),' the revenue of which he settled for ten years at 9 Arribs, 62 Crore, 97 Lacks, 55,246 Dams" (q.v. 3,62,97,55,246 dams = about 9 millions sterling).—Ayes, E. T. by Gladwin, 1800, ii. 1; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115.]

SIRDAR, s. Hind. from Pers. sardar; and less correctly sirdar, 'leader, a commander, an officer'; a chief, or lord; the head of a set of palankin-bearers, and hence the 'sirdar-bearer,' or elliptically the 'Sirdar,' is in Bengal the style of the valet or body-servant, even when he may have no others under him (see BEARE). [Sirdar is now the official title of the Commander-in-Chief of the Egyptian Army; Sirdar Buhadar is an Indian military distinction.]
[c. 1610.—"... a captain of a company, or, as they call it, a Sardare."—Pyard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 254.
  | 1675.—"Sardar." See under SEPOY.]
  | 1808.—"I, with great difficulty, knocked up some of the villagers, who were nearly as much afraid as Christie's Will, at the visit of a Sirdar" (here an officer).—Life of Legden.
  | [c. 1817.—"... the bearers, with their Sardin, have a large room with a verandah before it."—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Buxey, 63.]
  | 1826.—"Goppee's father had been a Sirdar of some consequence."—Pandurang Hari, 174; [ed. 1873, i. 252.]

SIRDRAHS, s. This is the name which native valets (bearer) give to common drawers (underclothing). A friend (Gen. R. Maclagan, R.E.) has suggested the origin, which is doubtless "short drawers" in contrast-distinction to Long-drawers, or Pyjamas (qq.v.). A common bearer's pronunciation is sirdraj; as a chest of drawers is also called 'Drâj kâ almairâ' (see ALMYRA).

SIRKY, s. Hind. sirkî. A kind of unplatted matting formed by laying the fine cylindrical culms from the upper part of the Saccharum Sora, Roxb. (see SURKUNDA) side by side, and binding them in single or double layers. This is used to lay under the thatch of a house, to cover carts and palankins, to make Chicks (q.v.) and table-mats, and for many other purposes of rural and domestic economy.

1810—"It is perhaps singular that I should have seen seerky in use among a group of gypsies in Essex. In India these itinerants, whose habits and characters correspond with this intolerable species of banditti, invariably shelter themselves under seerky."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 490.

1852.—"... neat little huts of sirrakee, a reed or grass, resembling bright straw."—Mrs. Moor Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 23.

SIRRIS, s. Hind. siris, Skt. shirshâ, shri, 'to break,' from the brittleness of its branches; the tree Acacia Lebbek, Benth., indigenous in S. India, the Sâtpura range, Bengal, and the sub-Himalayan tract; cultivated in Egypt and elsewhere. A closely kindred sp., A. Julibrissin, Boivin, affords a specimen of scientific 'Hobson-Jobson'; the specific name is a corruption of Gulbusheshâm, 'silk-flower.'

1808.—"Quelques années après le mort de Dariyal, des charpentiers ayant abattu un arbre de Seris, qui croisait auprès de son tombeau, le coupèrent en plusieurs pièces pour l'employer à des constructions. Tout-à-coup une voix terrible se fit entendre, la terre se mit à trembler et le tronc de cet arbre se releva de lui-même. Les ouvriers épuvantés s'enfuirent, et l'arbre ne tarda pas à revedir."—Afîs, Arâjish-i-Mahâlî, quoted by Garecin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. 88.

[c. 1890.—"
An it fell when sirris-shaws were sere,
And the nights were long and mirk."
R. Kipling, Departmental Ditties, The Fall of Jock Gillespie.]

SISSOO, SHISHAM, s. Hind. sêsh, sêshâm, shisham, Skt. esâsâm; Ar. esâsam, asâm; the tree Dalbergia Sissoo, Roxb. (N.O. Leguminosae) and its wood. This is excellent, and valuable for construction, joinery, boat- and carriage-building, and furniture. It was the favourite wood for gun-carriages as long as the supply of large timber lasted. It is now much cultivated in the Punjab plantations. The tree is indigenous in the sub-Himalayan tracts; and believed to be so likewise in Beluchistan, Guzerat, and Central India. Another sp. of Dalbergia (D. latifolia) affords the Black Wood (q.v.) of S. and W. India. There can be little doubt that one or more of these species of Dalbergia afforded the sesamine wood spoken of in the Periplus, and in some old Arabic writers. A quotation under Black Wood shows that this wood was exported from India to Chaldaea in remote ages. Sissoo has continued in recent times to be exported to Egypt, (see Forskal, quoted by Royle, Hindu Medicine, 128). Royle notices the resemblance of the Biblical shittim wood to shisham.

C. A.D. 80.—"... Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza (Broach) to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers, and beams of teak (śīlõm saγhãlim wâl dôkõm) ... and logs of shisham (phâλãγõn saγhãlim) ..."—Periplus, Maria Erythr., cap. 36.

C. 545.—"These again are passed on from Siedelduba to the marts on this side, such as Malé, where the pepper is grown, and Kalliana, whence are exported brass, and shisham logs (σηραμίνα ἕλαλα), and other wares."—Cosmas, lib. xi.

? before 1200.—"
There are the wolf and the parrot, and the peacock, and the dove,
And the plant of Zinj, and al-sâsim, and pepper. ..."
Verses on India by Abu'l-thalî, the Sindî, quoted by Kâsemîn, in Gildemeister, p. 218.

1810.—"Sissoo grows in most of the great forests, intermixed with saul. ... This wood is extraordinarily hard and heavy, of a dark brown, inclining to a purple tint when polished."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 71.

1889.—"As I rode through the city one day I saw a considerable quantity of timber lying in an obscure street. On examining it I found it was shisham, a wood of the most valuable kind, being not liable to the attacks of white ants."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, ed. 1851, p. 102.

SITTING-UP. A curious custom, in vogue at the Presidency towns more than a century ago, and the nature of which is indicated by the quotations. Was it of Dutch origin?

1777.—"Lady Impye sits up with Mrs. Hastings; vulgo toad-eating."—Ph. Francis's Diary, quoted in Busteed, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 124; [3rd ed. 125.]

1780.—"When a young lady arrives at Madras she must, in a few days afterwards sit up to receive company, attended by some beau or master of the ceremonies, which perhaps continues for a week, or until she has seen all the fair sex, and gentlemen of the settlement."—Muerno's Narr., 66.

1795.—"You see how many good reasons there are against your scheme of my taking horse instantly, and hastening to throw myself at the lady's feet; as to the other, of proxy, I can only agree to it under certain conditions. ... I am not to be forced to sit up, and receive male or female SIWALIK, n.p. This is the name now applied distinctively to that outer range of tertiary hills which in various parts of the Himalaya runs parallel to the foot of the mountain region, separated from it by valleys known in Upper India as duns (see DHOON). But this special and convenient sense (d) has been attributed to the term by modern Anglo-Indian geographers only. Among the older Mahommedan historians the term Siwalik is applied to a territory to the west of and perhaps embracing the Aravalli Hills, but certainly including specifically Nagore (Năgaur) and Mandăwar the predecessor of modern Jodhpūr, and in the vicinity of that city. This application is denoted by (a).

In one or two passages we find the application of the name (Siwalik) extending a good deal further south, as if reaching to the vicinity of Mālwā. Such instances we have grouped under (b). But it is possible that the early application (a) habitually extended thus far.

At a later date the name is applied to the Himalaya; either to the range in its whole extent, as in the passages from Cherefedīn (Sharifuddīn 'Ali of Yezd) and from Baber; sometimes with a possible limitation to that part of the mountains which overlooks the Punjab; or, as the quotation from Rennell indicates, with a distinction between the less lofty region nearest the plains, and the Alpine summits beyond, Siwalik applying to the former only.

The true Indian form of the name is, we doubt not, to be gathered from the occurrence, in a list of Indian national names, in the Vishnu Purāṇa, of the Saivālas. But of the position of these we can only say that the nations, with whom the context immediately associates them, seem to lie towards the western part of Upper India. (See Wilson’s Works, Vishnu Purāṇa, ii. 175.) The popular derivation of Siwalik as given in several of the quotations below, is from savalakh, ‘One lakh and a quarter’; but this is of no more value than most popular etymologies.

We give numerous quotations to establish the old application of the term, because this has been somewhat confused in Elliot’s extracts by the interpolated phrase ‘Siwalik Hills,’ where it is evident from Raverty’s version of the Ṭabakāt-i-Nāvīrī that there is no such word as Hills in the original.

We have said that the special application of the term to the detached sub-Himalayan range is quite modern. It seems in fact due to that very eminent investigator in many branches of natural science, Dr. Hugh Falconer; at least we can find no trace of it before the use of the term by him in papers presented to the Asiatic Society of Bengal. It is not previously used, so far as we can discover, even by Royle; nor is it known to Jacquemont, who was intimately associated with Royle and Cautley, at Sahārampūr, very shortly before Falconer’s arrival there. Jacquemont (Journal, ii. 11) calls the range: "la première chaine de montagnes que j’appellerai les montagnes de Dehra." The first occurrence that we can find is in a paper by Falconer on the ‘Aptitude of the Himalayan Range for the Culture of the Tea Plant,' in vol. iii. of the J. As. Soc. Bengal, which we quote below. A year later, in the account of the Siwalikherum fossil, by Falconer and Cautley, in the As. Researches, we have a fuller explanation of the use of the term Siwalik, and its alleged etymology. It is probable that there may have been some real legendary connection of the hills in the vicinity with the name of Siva. For in some of the old maps, such as that in Bernier's Travels, we find Siba given as the name of a province about Hurdwar; and the same name occurs in the same connection in the Mem. of the Emperor Jahangir (Elliot, vi. 382). [On the connection of Siva worship with the lower Himalaya, see Atkinson, Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 743.]

1118.—"Again he rebelled, and founded the fortress of Naghawr, in the territory of Siwalik, in the neighbourhood of Birah(?)"—Tabakat-i-Nasiri, E.T. by Raverty, 110.

1192.—"The seat of government, Ajmir, with the whole of the Siwalik [territory], such as (?) Hansi, Sursuti, and other tracts, were subjugated."—Ibid. 468-469.

1227.—"A year subsequent to this, in 624 H., he (Sultan Ilyatimish) marched against the fort of Mandawar within the limits of the Siwalik [territory], and its capture, likewise the Almighty God facilitated for him."—Ibid. 611.

c. 1247. —... When the Sultan of Islam, Nasir-ud Dunyâ - wa - ud - Din, ascended the throne of sovereignty ... after Malik Balban had come [to Court?] he, on several occasions made a request for Uchchah together with Multan. This was acquiesced in, under the understanding that the Siwalik [territory] and Nâg-avr should be relinquished by him to other Malikis. ..."—Ibid. 781.

1253.—"When the new year came round, on Tuesday, the 1st of the month of Muharram, 651 H., command was given to Ulugh Khan-i-A'zam ... to proceed to his fiefs, the territory of Siwalik and Hansi."—Ibid. 693.

1257.—"Malik Balban ... withdrew (from Dehil), and by way of the Siwalik [country], and with a slight retinue, less than 200 or 300 in number, returned to Uchchah again."—Ibid. 786.

1255.—"When the royal tent was pitched at Tath-pat, the [contingent] forces of the Siwalik [districts], which were the fiefs of Ulugh Khan-i-A'zam, had been delayed ... (he) set out for Hansi ... (and there) issued his mandate, so that, in the space of 14 days, the troops of the Siwalik, Hansi, Sursuti, Jind [Jhind], and Barwâlah ... assembled."—Ibid. 837.

1260.—"Ulugh Khan-i-A'zam resolved upon making a raid upon the Koh-pâyah [hill tracts of Mewât] round about the capital, because in this ... there was a community of obdurate rebels, who, unceasingly, committed highway robbery, and plundered the property of Musalmâns ... and destruction of the villages in the districts of Harînâh, the Siwalik, and Bhiñâh, whose carriers followed their outbreaks."—Ibid. 850.

1300-10.—"The Mughals having wasted the Siwalik, had moved some distance off. When they and their horses returned weary and thirsty to the river, the army of Isânâ, which had been waiting for them some days, caught them as they expected. ..."—Zid-ud-din Barnâ, in Elliot, iii. 199.

c. 1300.—"Of the cities on the shore the first is Sândâbûr, then Faknûr, then the country of Manjarûr, then the country of (Fandarainâ), then Jangli (Jinkaili), then Kûlâm ... After this comes the country of Sauralik, which comprises 125,000 cities and villages. After that comes Mâlwa (but in some MSS. Mâlak).—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 65. Rashiduddin has got apparently much astray here, for he brings in the Siwalik territory at the far end of Malabar. But the mention of Mâlwa as adjoining is a probable indication of the true position. (Elliot imagines here some allusion to the Maldives and Laccadives. All in that way that seems possible is that Rashiduddin may have heard of the Maldives and made some jumble between them and Malâwâ). And this is in a manner confirmed by the next quotation from a Portuguese writer who places the region inland from Guzerat.

1644.—"It confines ... on the east with certain kingdoms of heathen, which are called Sâualacca prabatta (Sktt. parvata), as much as to say 120,000 mountains."—Bochart, MS.

1399.—"Le Détroit de Coupelé est situé au pied d’une montagne par où passe le Gange, et à quinze milles plus haut que ce Détroit il y a une pierre en forme de Vache, de laquelle sort la source de ce grand Fleuve; c’est la cause pour laquelle les Indiens appellent cette pierre, et dans tous les pays circonvoisins jusques à une année de chemin, ils se tournent pour prier du côté de ce Détroit et de cette Vache de pierre. ... Cependant on eut avis que dans la montagne de Souâlec, qui est une des plus considérables de l’Inde, et qui s’étend dans le deux tiers de ce grand Émpire, il s’était assemblé un grand nombre d’Indiens qui chercheroient à nous faire insulter."—H. de Timour-Bec, par Chereftedin Ali d’Yezd (Fr. Tr. by Pietro de la Croix), Delf, 1723, iii. ch. xxv.-xxvi.
1528.—"The northern range of hills has been mentioned, after leaving Kashmir, these hills contain innumerable tribes and states, pargannahs and countries, and extend all the way to Bengal and the shores of the Great Ocean. . . . The chief trade of the inhabitants of these hills is in musk-bags, the tails of the mountain cow, saffron, lead, and copper. The natives of Hind call these hills Sewalik-Parbat. In the language of Hind Sewalik means a lak and quarter (or 125,000), and Parbat means a hill, that is, the 125,000 hills. On these hills the snow never melts, and from some parts of Hindustán, such as Lahore, Sehrend, and Sambal, it is seen white on them all the year round."—Baber, p. 313.

1545.—"Sher Shâh's dying regrets.

"On being remarooned with for giving way to low spirits, when he had done so much for the good of the people during his short reign, after earnest solicitation, he said, 'I have had three or four desires on my heart, which still remain without accomplishment, . . . One is, I desired to have depopulated the country of Roh, and to have transferred its inhabitants to the tract between the Niláb and Lahore, including the hills below Nindûna as far as the Siwalik.'"—Târikh-Khán Jahân Lodi, in Elliot, v. 107-8. Nindûna was on Balkhâ, a hill over the Jelam (compare Elliot, ii. 450-1).

c. 1547-8.—"After their defeat the Nádža took refuge with the Ghakkars, in the hill-country bordering on Kashmir. Islâm Shâh . . . during the space of two years was engaged in constant conflicts with the Ghakkars, whom he desired to subdue. . . . Skirting the hills he went thence to Mûrín (!), and all the Rájás of the Siwalik presented themselves. . . . Parsurám, the Rájá of Gâwlîor, became a staunch servant of the King. . . . Gâwlîor is a hill, which is on the right hand towards the South, amongst the hills, as you go to Kângra and further (See NUGGUÈ-COTE).—Târikh-i-Dádâ, in Elliot, iv. 495-4.

c. 1555.—"The Imperial forces encountered the Afghans near the Siwalik mountains, and gained a victory which elicited gracious marks of approval from the Emperor. Sikandar took refuge in the mountains and jungles. . . . Rájá Râm Chand, Rájá of Nagarkot, was the most renowned of all the Rájás of the hills, and he came and made his submission."—Tabâkát-i-Akbarî, in Elliot, v. 248.

c. 1560.—"The Emperor (Akbar) then marched onwards towards the Siwalik hills, in pursuit of the Kán-Khán. He reached the neighbourhood of Talwarâ, a district in the Siwalik, belonging to Rájá Gobind Chand. . . . A party of adventurous soldiers dashed forward into the hills, and surrounding the place put many of the defenders to the sword."—Ibid. 267.

c. 1570.—"Husain Khán . . . set forth from Lucknow with the design of breaking down the idols, and demolishing the idol temples. For false reports of their unbounded treasures had come to his ears. He proceeded through Oudh, towards the Siwalik hills. . . . He then ravaged the whole country, as far as the Kasbah of Wajrâlı, in the country of Râjá Banka, a powerful zamindâr, and from that town to Ajmîr which is his capital."—Badâûnî, in Elliot, iv. 497.

1594-5.—"The force marched to the Siwalik hills, and the Bâkbhâi resolved to begin by attacking Jamnî, one of the strongest forts of that country."—Akbar Nâmâ, in Elliot, v. 125.

c. 1599.—"Râm Deo . . . returned to Kanauj . . . after that he marched into the Siwalik hills, and made all the zamindârs tributary. The Râjá of Kamâdn . . . came out against Râm Deo and gave him battle."—Vîrîshâ's Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 561.

1793.—"Mr. Daniel, with a party, also visited Sirânagur the same year [1789]: . . . It is situated in an exceedingly deep and very narrow valley; formed by Mount Sewalik, the northern boundary of Hindostan, on the one side; and the vast range of snowy mountains of Hûmâlîh or IMAIIT, on the other; and from the report of the natives, it would appear, that the nearest part of the base of the latter (on which snow was actually falling in the month of May), was not more than 14 or 15 G. miles in direct distance to the N. or N.E. of Siranagar town.

"In crossing the mountains of Sewalik, they met with vegetable productions, proper to the temperate climates."—Rennell's Mem., ed. 1793, pp. 368-369.

1834.—"On the flank of the great range there is a line of low hills, the Sewalik, which commence at Roopur, on the Satlej, and run down a long way to the south, skirting the great chain. In some places they run up to, and rise upon, the Hûmâlîh; in others, as in this neighbourhood (Sehârânpur), they are separated by an intermediate valley. Between the Jumna and Ganges they attain their greatest height, which Capt. Herbert estimates at 2,000 feet above the plains at their foot, or 3,000 above the sea. Sehârânpur is about 1,000 feet above the sea. About 25 miles north are the Sewalik hills."—Falconer, in J.A.S.B. iii. 152.

1855.—"We have named the fossil Sivâtherium from Siva the Hindu god, and bpallav, belna. The Sivâlik, or Sub-Himalayan range of hills, is considered, in the Hindu mythology, as the Lâtâh or edge of the roof of Siva's dwelling on the Himalaya, and hence they are called the Sivâ-ala or Sîb-ala, which by an easy transition of sound became the Sewalik. The fossil has been discovered in a tract which may be included in the Sewalik range, and we have given the name of Siva-themum to it, to commemorate the remarkable form, so rich in new names. Another derivation of the name of the hills, as explained by the Mahant, or High Priest at Dohna, is as follows:—

"Sewálik, a corruption of Sêva-râda, a name given to the tract of mountains between the Jumna and Ganges, from having been the residence of Iswarâ Siva and his son Ganâs."—Falconer and Cauntley, in 1879.—"These fringing ranges of the later formations are known generally as the Sub-Himalayas. The most important being the Siwalik hills, a term especially applied to the hills south of the Deyra Dun, but frequently employed in a wider sense."—Macleod and Blanford, Man., of the Geology of India, Intro. p. x.

(1889.—Even so late as this year the old inaccurate etymology of the word appears:
"The term Sewalik is stated by one of the native historians to be a combination of two Hindoo words 'sewa' and 'lae' (sic), the word 'sewa' signifying one and a quarter, and the word 'lae' being the term which expresses the number of one hundred thousand."—Thornhill, Haunts and Hobbies, SLAVE. We cannot now attempt a history of the former tenure of slaves in British India, which would be a considerable work in itself. We only gather a few quotations illustrating that history.

1676.—"Of three Theves, two were executed and one made a Slave. We do not approve of putting any to death for theft, nor that any of our own nation should be made a Slave, a word that becomes not an Englishman's mouth."—The Court to Ft. St.
Geo., March 7. In Notes and Extracts, No. i.
p. 18.

1682.—"... making also proclamation by beat of drum that if any Slave would run away from us he should be free, and liberty to go where they pleased."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 14.; [Hak. Soc. i. 38].

[... "There being a great number of Slaves yearly exported from this place, to ye great grievance of many persons whose Children are very commonly stolen away from them, by those who are constant traders in this way, the Agent, &c., considering the Scandal that might accrue to ye Government, &c., the great losse that many parents may undergo by such actions, have order'd that noe more Slaves be sent off the shore again."—Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 70.]

1752.—"Sale of Slaves... Rs. 10 : 1 : 3."
—Among Items of Revenue. In Long, 34.

1637.—"We have taken into consideration the most effectual and speedy method for supplying our settlements upon the West Coast with slaves, and we have therefore fixed upon two ships for that purpose... to proceed from hence to Madagascar to purchase as many as can be procured, and the said ships conveniently carry, who are to be delivered by the captains of those ships to our agents at Fort Marlborough at the rate of £15 a head."—Court's Letter of 1764.—"That as an inducement to the Commanders and Chief Mates to exert themselves in procuring as large a number of Slaves as the Ships can conveniently carry, and to encourage the Surgeons to take proper care of them in the passage, there is to be allowed 20 shillings for every slave shipped at Madagascar, to be divided, viz., 13s. 4d. a head to the Commander, and 6s. 8d. to the Chief Mate, also for every one delivered at Fort Marlborough the Commander is to be allowed the further sum of 6s. 8d. and the Chief Mate 3s. 4d. The Surgeon is likewise to be allowed 10s. for each slave landed at Fort Marlborough."— Court's Letter, Feb. 22. In Long, 386.

1775.—Mr. Busteed has given some curious extracts from the charge-sheet of the Calcutta Magistrate in this year, showing slaves and slave-girls, of Europeans, Portuguese, and Armenians, sent to the magistrate to be punished with the rattan for running away and such offences.—Echoes of Old Calcutta, 117 seqq. [Also see extracts from newspapers, &c., in Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 71 seqq.].

1782.—"On Monday the 29th inst. will be sold by auction... a bay Buggy Horse, a Buggy and Harness... some cut Diamonds, a quantity of China Sugarandy
... a quantity of the best Danish Claret
... deliverable at Serampore; two Slave Girls about 6 years old; and a great variety of other articles."—India Gazette, July 27.

1785.—"Malver. Hair-dresser from Europe, proposes himself to the ladies of the settlement to dress hair daily, at two gold mohurs per month, in the latest fashion, with ganzo flowers, &c. He will also instruct the slaves at a moderate price.
"—In Seton-Karr, i. 119. This was surely a piece of slang. Though we hear occasionally, in the advertisements of the time, of slave boys and girls, the domestic servants were not usually of that description.

1794.—"50 Rupees Reward for Discovery.

SLING, SELING. n.p. This is the name used in the Himalayan regions for a certain mart in the direction of SNAKE-STONE.

China which supplies various articles of trade. Its occurrence in Trade Returns at one time caused some discussion as to its identity, but there can be no doubt that it is Si-ning (Fu) in Kan-su. The name Sling is also applied, in Ladak and the Punjab, to a stuff of goat's wool made at the place so called.

c. 1730.—"Kokonor is also called Tso-njogombo, which means blue lake. . . . The Tibetans pretend that this lake belongs to them, and that the limits of Tibet adjoin those of the town of Shilin or Shilingh."—P. Orazio della Penna, E.T. in Markham's Tibet, 2d ed. 314.

1774.—"The natives of Kashmir, who like the Jews of Europe, or the Armenians in the Turkish Empire, scatter themselves over the Eastern kingdoms of Asia . . . have formed extensive establishments at Lhasa and all the principal towns in the country. Their agents, stationed on the coast of Coromandel, in Bengal, Benares, Nepal, and Kashmir, furnish them with the commodities of these different countries, which they dispose of in Tibet, or forward to their associates at Seling, a town on the borders of China."—Bogle's Narrative, in Markham's Tibet, 124.

1793.—". . . it is certain that the product of their looms (i.e. of Tibet and Nepaul) is as inconsiderable in quantity as it is insignificant in quality. The Jooa (read TOOS) or flannel procured from the former, were it really a fabric of Tibet, would perhaps be admitted as an exception to the latter part of this observation; but the fact is that it is made at Sling, a place situated on the western borders of China."—Kirkpatrick's Acc. of Nepaul (1811), p. 194.

1854.—"List of Chinese Articles brought to India. . . . Sling, a soft and silky woollen of two kinds—1. Shirrin. 2. Goran."—Cunningham's Ladak, 241-2.

1862.—"Sling is a 'Pushkima' (fine wool) cloth, manufactured of goat-wool, taken from Karashahr and Urumchi, and other districts of Turkish China, in a Chinese town called Sling."—Punjab Trade Report, App. p. ccxxix.

1871.—"There were two Calmucks at Yärkand, who had belonged to the suite of the Chinese Amän. . . . Their own home they say is Zilm" (qu. Zilin?) "a country and town distant 1½ months journey from either Aksoo or Khoten, and at an equal distance in point of time from Lhassa . . . Zilm possesses manufactures of carpets, horse-trappings, pen-holders, &c. . . . This account is confirmed by the fact that articles such as those described are imported occasionally into Ladik, under the name of Zilm or Zirm goods.

"Now if the town of Zilm is six weeks journey from either Lhassa or Aksoo, its position may be guessed at."—Skeat, Visits to High Tartary, 33.

SLOTH, s. In the usual way of transferring names which belong to other regions, this name is sometimes applied in S. India to the Lemur (Loris gracilis, Jerdon).

SNAKE-STONE. s. This is a term applied to a substance, the application of which to the part where a snake-bite has taken effect, is supposed to draw out the poison and render it innocuous. Such applications are made in various parts of the Old and New Worlds. The substances which have this reputation are usually of a porous kind, and when they have been chemically examined have proved to be made of charred bone, or the like. There is an article in the 13th vol. of the Asiatic Researches by Dr. J. Davy, entitled An Analysis of the Snake-Stone, in which the results of the examination of three different kinds, all obtained from Sir Alex. Johnstone, Chief Justice of Ceylon, is given. (1) The first kind was of round or oval form, black or brown in the middle, white towards the circumference, polished and somewhat lustrous, and pretty enough to be sometimes worn as a neck ornament; easily cut with a knife, but not scratched by the nail. When breathed on it emitted an earthy smell, and when applied to the tongue, or other moist surface, it adhered firmly. This kind proved to be of bone partially calcined. (2) We give below a quotation regarding the second kind. (3) The third was apparently a bezoar, (q.v.), rather than a snake-stone. There is another article in the As. Res. xvi. 382 seqq. by Captain J. D. Herbert, on Zehr Moherek, or Snake-Stone. Two kinds are described which were sold under the name given (Zahr muhra, where zahr is 'poison,' muhra, 'a kind of polished shell,' a 'bead, applied to a species of bezoar). Both of these were mineral, and not of the class we are treating of.

c. 1666.—"C'est dans cette Ville de Diu que se font les Pierres de Cobras, si renommées; elles sont composées de racines qu'on brûle, et dont on amasse les cendres pour les mettre avec une sorte de terre qu'ils ont, et les brûler encore une fois avec cette terre; et aprés cela on en fait la pâte dont ces Pierres sont formées . . . Il faut faire sortir avec une égluine, un peu de sang de la plaie, y appliquer la Pierre, et l'y laisser jusqu'à ce qu'elle tombe d'elle-même."—Thevenot, v. 97.

SLING, SELING. 847 SNAKE-STONE.
1673. — "Here are also those Elephant Legged St. Thomeans, which the unbiassed Enquirers will tell you chances to them two ways: By the Venom of a certain Snake, by which the Injurers (serpents or Pilgrims) furnish them with a Fabulous Stone (which we call a snake-stone), and is a Counter-poison of all deadly Bites; if it stick, it attracts the Poison; and put into Milk it recovers itself again, leaving its virulence therein, discovered by its Greenness." — Fryer, 58.

c. 1676. — "There is the Serpent's stone not to be forgot, about the bigness of a double (doubloon); and some are almost oval, thick in the middle and thin about the sides. The Indians report that it is bred in the head of certain Serpents. But I rather take it to be a story of the Idoloter's Priests, and that the Stone is rather a composition of certain Drugs. If the Person bit be not much wounded, the place must be incis'd; and the Stone being appl'd thereto, will not fall off till it has drawn all the poison to it: To cleanse it you must steep it in a Womans-milk, or Cow's-milk. There are two ways to try whether the Serpent-stone be true or false. The first is, by putting the Stone in your mouth, for there it will give a lay, and fix to the Palate. The other is by putting it in a glass full of water; for if the Stone be true, the water will fall a boiling, and rise in little bubbles..." — Tavernier, E.T., Pt. ii. 155; [ed. Bull, ii. 132]. Tavernier also speaks of another snake-stone alleged to be found behind the hood of the Cobra: "This Stone being rubb'd against another Stone, yields a slime, which being drank in water," &c. &c. — Ibid.

1690. — "The thing which he carried... is a Specific against the Poison of Snakes... and therefore obtained the name of Snake-stone. It is a small artificial Stone. The Composition of it is Ashes of burnt Roots, mith with a kind of Earth, which is found at Diu..." — Ovington, 260-261.

1772. — "Being returned to Roode-Zand, the celebrated Snake-stone (Stange-sten) was shown to me, which few of the farmers here could afford to purchase, it being sold at a high price, and held in great esteem. It is imported from the Indies, especially from Malabar, and cost several, frequently 10 or 12, rix dollars. It is round, and convex on one side, of a black colour, with a pale ash-grey speck in the middle, and tabulated with very minute pores. When it is applied to any part that has been bitten by a serpent, it sticks fast to the wound, and extracts the poison; and soon after it is withdrawn, it falls off of itself." — Thunberg, Travels, E.T. i. 155 (A Journey into Caffraria).

1796. — "Of the remedies to which cures of venomous bites are often ascribed in India, some are certainly not less frivolous than those employed in Europe for the bite of the viper; yet to infer from thence that the effects of the poison cannot be very dangerous, would not be more rational than to ascribe the recovery of a person bitten by a Cobra de Capello, to the application of a snake-stone, or to the words muttered over the patient by a Bramin." — Patrick Russell, Account of Indian Serpents, 77.

1820. — "Another kind of snake-stone... was a small oval body, smooth and shining, externally black, internally grey; it had no earthy smell when breathed on, and had no absorbent or adhesive power. By the person who presented it to Sir Alexander Johnstone it was much valued, and for adequate reason if true, 'it had saved the lives of four men.'" — Dr. Davy, in As. Res. xi. 318.

1880. — "The use of the Pambou-Kalo, or snake-stone, as a remedy in cases of wounds by venomous serpents, has probably been communicated to the Singhalese by the itinerant snake-charmers who resort to the island from the Coast of Coromandel; and more than one well-authenticated instance of its successful application has been told to me by persons who had been eye-witnesses."

... These follow."

... As to the snake-stone itself, I submitted one, the application of which, I have been describing, to Mr. Faraday, and he has communicated to me as the result of his analysis, his belief that it is 'a piece of charred bone which has been filled with blood, perhaps several times, and then charred again.' The probability is, that the animal charcoal, when instantaneously applied, may be sufficiently porous and absorbent to extract the venom from the recent wound, together with a portion of the blood, before it has had time to be carried into the system."

Tennent, Ceylon, i. 197-200.

1861. — "Have you been bitten? 'Yes, Sabih,' he replied, calmly; 'the last snake was a vicious one, and it has bitten me. But there is no danger,' he added, extracting from the recesses of his mysterious bag a small piece of white stone. This he wetted, and applied to the wound, to which it seemed to adhere... he apparently suffered no... material hurt. I was thus, at once, convinced that snake-charming is a real art, and not merely clever conjuring, as I had previously imagined. These so-called snake stones are well known throughout India." — Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 91-92.

1872. — "With reference to the snake-stones, which, when applied to the bites, are said to absorb and suck out the poison, SNEAKER, s. A large cup (or small basin) with a saucer and cover. The native servants call it sinigar. We had guessed that it was perhaps formed in some way from sinî in the sense of 'china-ware,' or from the same word, used in Ar. and Pers., in the sense of 'a salver' (see CHINA, s.). But we have since seen that the word is not only in Grosse's Lexicon Balatronicum, with the explanation 'a small bowl,' but is also in Todd: 'A small vessel of drink.' A sneaker of punch is a term still used in several places for a small bowl; and in fact it occurs in the Spectator and other works of the 18th century. So the word is of genuine English origin; no doubt of a semi-slang kind.

1714. — "Our little burlesque authors, who are the delight of ordinary readers, generally abound in these pert phrases, which have in them more vivacity than wit. I lately saw an instance of this kind of writing, which gave me so truly an idea of it, that I could not forbear begging a copy of the letter...."

"Dear Jack, a frosty morning. I have just left the Right Worshipful and his myrmidons about a sneaker of 5 gallons. The whole magistracy was pretty well disguised before I gave them the slip." The Spectator, No. 616.

1715. — "Hugh Peters is making A sneaker within For Luther, Buchanan, John Knox, and Calvin; and when they have toss'd off A brace of full bowls, 3 H You'll swear you ne'er met With honester souls."

1743. — "Wild... then retired to his seat of contemplation, a night-cellar, where, without a single farthing in his pocket, he called for a sneaker of punch, and placing himself on a bench by himself, he softly vented the following soliloquy." — Fielding, Jonathan Wild, Bk. ii. ch. iv.

1772. — "He received us with great cordiality, and entreated us all, five in number, to be seated in a bungalow, where there were only two broken chairs. This compliment we could not accept of; he then ordered five sneakers of a mixture which he denominated punch." — Letter in Forbes, Or. Mem, iv. 217.

[SNOW RUPEE, s. A term in use in S. India, which is an excellent example of a corruption of the 'Hobson-Jobson' type. It is an Anglo-Indian corruption of the Tel. tsanawwu, 'authority, currency.]

SOFA, n.p. Ar. Sufala, a district and town of the East African coast, the most remote settlement towards the south made upon that coast by the Arabs. The town is in S. Lat. 20° 10', more that 2° south of the Zambesi delta. The territory was famous in old days for the gold produced in the interior, and also for iron. It was not visited by V. da Gama either in going or returning.

c. 1150. — "This section embraces the description of the remainder of the country of Sofala... The inhabitants are poor, miserable, and without resources to support them except iron; of this metal there are numerous mines in the mountains of Sofala. The people of the islands... come hither for iron, which they carry to the continent and islands of India... for although there is iron in the islands and in the mines of that country, it does not equal the iron of Sofala." — Edrisi, i. 65.

c. 1220. — "Sofala is the most remote known city in the country of the Zenj... Wares are carried to them, and left by the merchants who then go away, and coming again find that the natives have laid down the price [they are willing to give] for every article beside it... Sofali gold is well-known among the Zenji merchants." — Yâkût, Mu'jam al-Buldân, s.v.

In his article on the gold country, Yâkût describes the kind of dumb trade in which the natives decline to come face to face with the merchants at greater length. It is a practice that has been ascribed to a great variety of uncivilized races; e.g. in various parts of Africa; in the extreme north of Europe and of Asia; in the Clove Islands, up to the Verulam, and to the Polians of Malabar, and (by Pliny, surely under some mistake) to the Seres or Chinese.

See on this subject a note in Marco Polo, Bk. iv. ch. 21; a note by Mr. De B. Priaulx, in J. R. As. Soc., xviii. 348 (in which several references are erroneously printed); Tennent's Ceylon, i. 593 seqq.; Rawlinson's Herodotus, under Bk. iv. ch. 196.

c. 1330.—"Soñala is situated in the country of the Zenil. According to the author of the Kānân, the inhabitants are Muslim. Ibn Saiyad says that their chief means of subsistence are the extraction of gold and of iron, and that their clothes are of leopard-skin."—Abufelde, Fr. Tr. i. 222.

"A merchant told me that the town of Sofala is a half month's march distant from Cula (Quila), and that from Sofala to Yüft (Nift) ... is a month's march. From Yüft they bring gold-dust to Sofala."— Ibn Batuta, i. 192-3.

1499. — "Coming to Mozambique (i.e. Vasco and his squadron on their return) they did not desire to go in because there was no need, so they kept their course, and being off the coast of Çofala, the pilots warned the officers that they should be alert and ready to strike sail, and at night they should keep their course, with little sail set, and a good look-out, for just thereabouts there was a river belonging to a place called Çofala, whence there sometimes issued a tremendous squall, which tore up trees and carried cattle and all into the sea ..."—Correa, Lendas, i. 134-135.

1516.—"... at xviii. leagues from them there is a river, which is not very large, whereon is a town of the Moors called Sofala, close to which town the King of Portugal has a fort. These Moors established themselves there a long time ago on account of the great trade in gold, which they carry on with the Gentiles of the mainland."—Barbosa, 4.

1523.—"Item—that as regards all the ships and goods of the said Realm of Urnauz, and its ports and vassals, they shall be secure by land and by sea, and they shall be as free to navigate where they please as vassals of the King our lord, save only that they shall not navigate inside the Strait of Mecca, nor yet to Çofala and the ports of that coast, so as to be forbidden by the King our lord. ..."—Treaty of Dom Duarte de Menezes, with the King of Ormuz, in Botelho, Tombo, 80.

1553.—"Vasco da Gama ... was afraid that there was some gulf running far inland, from which he would not be able to get out. And this apprehension made him so careful to keep well from the shore that he passed without even seeing the town of Çofala, so famous in these parts for the quantity of gold which the Moors procured there from the Blacks of the country by trade. ..."—Barros, i. iv. 3.

1572. — "... Fizemos desta costa algum desvio Detendo para o pégo toda a armada: Porque, ventando Noto manso e frio, Não nos apanhasse a agua da enseada, Que a costa faz alli daquella banda, Donde a rica Sofala o onro manda."—Canães, v. 73.

By Burton:

"off from the coast-line for a spell we stood, till deep 'blue water 'neath our kelsons lay; for frigid Notus, in his fainty mood, was fain to drive us leewards to the Bay made in that quarter by the crooked shore, whence rich Sofala sendeth golden ore."—1665.

"Mombaza and Quiloa and Melind, And Sofala, thought Ophir, to the realm Of Congo, and Angola farthest south."—Paradise Lost, xi. 599 seqq.

Milton, it may be noticed, misplaces the accent, reading Sófala.

1727.—"Between Delagoa and Mosambique a dangerous Sea-coast, it was formerly known by the names of Suffola and Cuxama, but now by the Portuguese, who know that country best, is called Sena."—A. Hamilton, i. 8 [ed. 1744].

SÓLÁ, vulg. SOLAR, s. This is properly Hind. sholá, corrupted by the Bengalí inability to utter the shibboleth, to sold, and often again into solar by English people, led astray by the usual "striving after meaning." Sholá is the name of the plant Aeschynomene aspera, L. (N.O. Leguminosae), and is particularly applied to the light pith of that plant, from which the light thick Sóla topées, or pith hats, are made. The material is also used to pad the roofs of palankins, as a protection against the sun's power, and for various minor purposes, e.g. for slips of tinder, for making models, &c.

The word, until its wide diffusion within the last 45 years, was peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In the Deccan the thing is called bhend, Mahr. bhenda, and in Tamil. netti, ['breaking with a crackle.'] Solar hats are now often advertised in London. [Hats made of elder pith were used in S. Europe in the early 16th century. In Albert Dürer's Diary in the Netherlands (1520-21) we find: "Also Tomasín has given me a plaited hat of elder-pith" (Mrs. Heaton, Life of Albert Dürer, 269). Miss Eden, in 1839, speaks of Europeans wearing "broad white feather hats to keep off the sun"] (Up the Country, ii. 56).
Illustrations of the various shapes of Sola hats used in Bengal about 1854 will be found in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 105 seq.]

1836.—"I stopped at a fisherman's, to look at the curiously-shaped floats he uses for his very large and heavy fishing-nets; each float was formed of eight pieces of sholà, tied together by the ends. . . . When this light and spongy pith is wetted, it can be cut into thin layers, which pasted together are formed into hats; Chinese paper appears to be made of the same material."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 100.

1872.—"In a moment the flint gave out a spark of fire, which fell into the sola; the sulphur match was applied; and an earthen lamp. . . ."—Gowinda Samanta, i. 10.

1875.—"My solar topee (pith hat) was whisked away during the struggle."—Life in the Mafussil, i. 164.

1885.—"I have slipped a pair of galoshes over my ordinary walking-boots; and, with my solar topee (or sun helmet) on, have ridden through a mile of deserted streets and thronged bazaars, in a grilling sunshine."—A Professional Visit in Persia, St. James's Gazette, March 9.

[1614.—"Sombay or presents."—Foster, Letters, ii. 112.

[1615.—". . . concluded rather than pay the great Somba of eight hundred reals."—Ibid: iv. 43.]

SOMBREIRO, s. Port. sumbireiro. In England we now understand by this word a broad-brimmed hat; but in older writers it is used for an umbrella. Summerhead is a name in the Bombay Arsenal (as M.-Gen. Keatinge tells me) for a great umbrella. I make no doubt that it is a corruption (by 'striving after meaning') of Sombreiro, and it is a capital example of Hobson-Jobson.

1503.—"And the next day the Captain-Major before daylight embarked armed with all his people in the boats, and the King (of Cochin) in his boats which they call tones (see DONEY) . . . and in the tone of the King went his Sombreiros, which are made of straw, of a diameter of 4 palms, mounted on very long canes, some 3 or 4 fathoms in length. These are used for state ceremonial, showing that the King is there in person, as it were his pennon or royal banner, for no other lord in his realm may carry the like."—Correa, i. 378.

1516.—"And besides the page I speak of who carries the sword, they take another page who carries a sombreiro with a stand to shade his master, and keep the rain off him; and some of these are of silk stuff finely wrought, with many fringes of gold, and set with stones and seed pearl. . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 288.

1553.—"At this time Dom Jorge discerned a great body of men coming towards where he was standing, and amid them a sombreiro or a lofty staff, covering the head of a man on horseback, by which token he knew it to be some noble person. This sombreiro is a fashion in India coming from China, and among the Chinese no one may use it but a gentleman, for it is a token of nobility, which we may describe as a one-handed pallium (having regard to those which we use to see carried by four, at the reception of some great King or Prince on his entrance into a city). . . ."—Barros, III. x. 9. Then follows a minute description of the sombreiro or umbrella.

[1599.—". . . a great broad sombreiro or shadow in their hands to defend them in the Summer from the Sunne, and in the Winter from the Raines." Hakl. II. i. 261 (Stanz. Dict.).

[1602.—In his character of D. Pedro Mascarenhas, the Viceroys, Couto says he was anxious to change certain habits of the Portuguese in India: "One of these was to forbid the tall sombreiros for warding off the rain and sun, to relieve men of the expense of paying those who carried them; he himself did not have one, but used a woollen umbrella with small cords (?), which they called for many years Mascarenhas. Afterwards finding the sun intolerable and the rain immoderate, he permitted the use of tall umbrellas, on the condition that private slaves should bear them, to save the wages of the Hindus who carry them, and are called boys de sombreiro (see BOY)."

[1845.—"No open umbrellas or summerheads allowed to pass through the gates."—Public Notice on Gates of Bombay Town, in Douglas, Glimpses of Old Bombay, 86.] SONTHALS. N.P. Properly Santals, [the name being said to come from a place called Saont, now Silda in Medinipur, where the tribe remained for a long time (Dalton, Descr. Eth. 210-11)]. The name of a non-Aryan people belonging to the Kolarian class, extensively settled in the hilly country to the west of the Hoogly R. and to the south of Bhāgālpur, from which they extended to Balasore at interval, sometimes in considerable masses, but more generally much scattered. The territory in which they are chiefly settled is now formed into a separate district called Santal Parganas, and sometimes Santalīa. Their settlement in this tract is, however, quite modern; they have emigrated thither from the S.W. In Dr. F. Buchanan's statistical account of Bhāgālpur and its Hill people the Santals are not mentioned. The earliest mention of this tribe that we have found is in Mr. Sutherland's Report on the Hill People, which is printed in the Appendix to Long. No date is given there, but we learn from Mr. Man's book, quoted below, that the date is 1817. [The word is, however, much older than this. Forbes (Or. Mem. ii. 374 seq.) gives an account-taken from Lord Teignmouth of witch tests among the Soontaar.

[1798.—"... amongst a wild and unlettered tribe, denominated Soontaar, who have reduced the detection and trial of persons suspected of witchcraft to a system."—As. Res. iv. 398.]

1817.—"For several years many of the industrious tribes called Sonthurs have established themselves in these forests, and have been clearing and bringing into cultivation large tracts of lands..."—Sutherland's Report, quoted in Long, 569.

1867.—"This system, indicated and proposed by Mr. Eden,* was carried out in its integrity under Mr. George Yule, C.B., by whose able management, with Messrs. Robinson and Wood as his deputies, the Sonthals were raised from misery, dull despair, and deadly hatred of the government, to a pitch of prosperity which, to my knowledge, has never been equalled in any other part of India under the British rule. The Regulation Courts, with their hordes of leeches in the shape of badly paid, and corrupt Amlah (Omlah) and petitprogeg Mooktears, were abolished, and in their place a Number of active English gentlemen, termed Assistant Commissioners, and nominated by Mr. Yule, were set down among the Sonthals, with a Code of Regulations drawn up by that gentleman, the pith of which may be summed up as follows—

"'To have no medium between the Sonthal and the Hakim, i.e. Assistant Commissioner.

"'To patiently hear any complaint made by the Sonthal from his own mouth, without any written petition or charge whatever, and without any Amlah or Court at the time.

"'To carry out all criminal work by the aid of the villagers themselves, who were to bring in the accused, with the witnesses, to the Hakim, who should immediately attend to their statements, and punish them, if found guilty, according to the tenor of the law.'

"These were some of the most important of the golden rules carried out by men who recognised the responsibility of their situation; and with an adored chief, in the shape of Yule, for their ruler, whose firm, judicial, and gentlemanly conduct made them work with willing hearts, their endeavours were crowned with a success which far exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine..."—Sonthalia and the Sonthals, by E. G. Mon, Barrister-at-Law, &c. Calcutta, 1867, pp. 125-127.

SOODRA, SOODER. s. Skt. śūdra, [usually derived from root. śuc, 'to be afflicted,' but probably of non-Aryan origin]. The (theoretical) Fourth Caste of the Hindus. In South India, there being no claimants of the 2nd or 3rd classes, the highest castes among the (so-called) Śūdras come next after the Brahmans in social rank, and śūdra is a note of respect, not of the contrary as in Northern India.

1630.—"The third Tribe or Cast, called the Shudderies."—Lord, Display, &c., ch. xii.

1651.—"La quatrième lignée est celle des Soudraes; elle est composée du commun peuple: cette lignée a sous soy beaucoup et diverses familles, dont une chacune prétend surpasser l’autre..."—Abr. Roger, Fr. ed. 1670, p. 8.

[c. 1685.—"The fourth caste is called Charados or Soudra."—Tavernier, ed. Bell, ii. 184.]

[1687.—"... and fourthly, the tribe of Seydra, or artisans and labourers."—Bennier, ed. Constable, 325.]

1674.—"The... Chudrer (these are the Nayres)."—Faria y Sousa, ii. 710.

1717.—"The Brahmens and the Tschudirers are the proper persons to satisfy your Enquiries."—Phillips, An Account of the Religion, &c., 14.

1858.—"Such of the Aborigines as yet remained were formed into a fourth class, the Čhūdra, a class which has no rights, but only duties."—Whitney, Or. and Ling. Studies, ii. 6.

1867.—"A Brahman does not stand aloof from a Soudra with a keener pride than a Greek Christian shows towards a Copt."—Dixon, New America, 7th ed. i. 276.

SOOJEE, SOOJY. s. Hind. sūjī, [which comes probably from Skt. sūk, 'pure']; a word curiously misinterpreted ("the coarser part of pounde wheat") by the usually accurate Shakespeare. It is, in fact, the fine flour, made from the heart of the wheat, used in India to make bread for European tables. It is prepared by grinding between two millstones which are not in close contact. [Sūjī is a granular meal obtained by moistening the grain overnight, then grinding it. The fine flour passes through a coarse sieve, leaving the Suji and bran above. The latter is got rid of by winnowing, and the round, granular meal or Šūji, composed of the harder pieces of the grain, remains" (Watt. Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 167.) It is the semolina of Italy. Bread made from this was called in Low Latin simella; Germ. Semmelbrötchen, and old English simmel-cakes. A kind of porridge made with soojee is often called soojee simply. (See ROULONG.)

1810.—"Bread is not made of flour, but of the heart of the wheat, which is very fine, ground into what is called soojy . . . Soojy is frequently boiled into 'stirabout, for breakfast, and eaten with milk, salt, and butter; though some of the more zealous may be seen to moisten it with porter.'—Williamson, V.M. ii. 135-136.

1878.—"Suje flour, ground course, and water."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 213.

SOORKY, s. Pounded brick used to mix with lime to form a hydraulic mortar. Hind. from Pers. surkhi, 'red-stuff.'

c. 1770. —"The terrace roofs and floors of the rooms are laid with fine pulverized stones, which they call surkee; these are mixed up with lime-water, and an inferior kind of molasses, and in a short time grow as hard and as smooth, as if the whole were one large stone."—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 514.

1777. —"The inquiry verified the information. We found a large group of miserable objects confined by order of Mr. Mills; some were simply so; some under sentence from him to beat Salkey."—Report of Impey and others, quoted in Stephen's Nuncomar and Impey, ii. 201.

1784.—"One lack of 9-inch bricks, and about 1400 maunds of soorky."—Notifs. in Seton-Karr, i. 34; see also i. 15.

1811. —"The road from Calcutta to Barapore . . . like all the Bengal roads it is paved with bricks, with a layer of sulky, or broken bricks over them."—Solyns, Les Hindous, iii. The word is misused as well as misspelled here. The substance in question is khoa (q.v.).

SOORMA, s. Hind. from Pers. surna. Sulphuret of antimony, used for the purpose of darkening the eyes, kuhl of the Arabs, the stimmi and stibium of the ancients. With this Jezebel "painted her eyes" (2 Kings, ix. 30; Jeremiah, iv. 30 R.V.) "With it, I believe, is often confounded the sulphuret of lead, which in N. India is called soormee (ee is the feminine termination in Hindustan) , and used as a substitute for the former: a mistake of not of recent occurrence only, as Sprengel says, 'Distinguit vero Plinivus maren a feminâ?'" (Royle, on Ant. of Hindu Medicine, 100). [See Watt. Econ. Dict. i. 271.]

1766.—"The powder is called by them surma; which they pretend refreshes and cools the eye, besides exciting its luster, by the ambient blackness."—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 142.

[1829.—"Soorma, or the oxide of antimony, is found on the western frontier."—Todd, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 13.

[1832.—"Sulmah—A prepared permanent black dye, from antimony. . . ."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, ii. 72.]

SOOSIE, s. Hind. from Pers. sasi. Some kind of silk cloth, but we know not what kind. [Sir G. Birdwood (Industr. Arts, 246) defines sasis as "fine-coloured cloths, made chiefly at Battala and Sialkote, striped in the direction of the warp with silk, or cotton lines of a different colour, the cloth being called dokanni [dohkâni], 'in two stripes' if the stripe has two lines, if three, tinkanni [tinkkâni], and so on." In the Punjab it is 'a striped stuff used for women's trousers. This is made of fine thread, and is one of the fabrics in which English thread is now largely used' (Frances, Mon. on Cotton Manufactures, 7). A silk fabric of the same name is made in the N.W.P., where it is classed as a variety of chârkhana, or check (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 93). Forbes Watson (Textile Manufactures, 85) speaks of Soose as chiefly employed for trousering, being a mixture of cotton and silk. The word seems to derive its origin from Susa, the Biblical Shushan, the capital of Susiana or Elam, and from the time of Darius I. the chief residence of the Achaemenian kings. There is ample evidence to show that fabrics from Babylon were largely exported in early times. Such was perhaps the "Babylonish garment" found at Ai (Josh. vii. 21), which the R.V. marg. translates as a "mantle of Shinar"). This a writer in Smith's Dict. of the Bible calls "robes trimmed with valuable furs, or the skins themselves ornamented with embroidery" (i. 452). These Babylonian fabrics have been often described (see Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, 537; Maspero, Dawn of Civ., 470, 758; Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1286 seq.; Fraser, Pauwania, iii. 545 seq.). An early reference to this old trade in costly cloths will be found in the quotation from the Periplus under CHINA, which has been discussed by Sir H. Yule (Introdt. to Gill, River of Golden Sand, ed. 1883, p. 88 seq.). This Sasi cloth appears in a log of 1746 as Soacie, and was known to the Portuguese in 1550 as Soajes (J. R. As. Soc., Jan. 1900, p. 158.)]

SOPHY, n.p. The name by which the King of Persia was long known in Europe—“The Soophy,” as the Sultan of Turkey was “The Turk” or “Grand Turk,” and the King of Delhi the “Great Mogul.” This title represented Safi, Safavi, or Safi, the name of the dynasty which reigned over Persia for more than two centuries (1449-1722, nominally to 1736). The first king of the family was Isma’ul, claiming descent from ‘Ali and the Imâms, through a long line of persons of saintly reputation at Ardebil. The surname of Sufi or Safi assumed by Isma’ul is generally supposed to have been taken from Shaikh Safi-ud-din, the first of his more recent ancestors to become famous, and who belonged to the class of Sûfis or philosophic devotees. After Isma’il the most famous of the dynasty was Shâh Abbâs (1585-1629).

[1568.—“The King of Persia (whom here we call the great SOPHY) is not there so called, but is called the Shaung. It were dangerous to call him by the name of SOPHY, because that SOPHY in the Persian tongue is a beggar, and it were as much as to call him The great beggar.”—Jeffrey Ducket, ibid. i. 447.]

1598.—“And all the Kings continued so with the name of Xa, which in Persia is a King, and Ismael is a proper name, whereby Xa Ismael, and Xa Thamus are as much as to say King Ismael, and King Thamus, and of the Turkes and Rumes are called Sufy or Sofy, which signifies a great Captaine.”—Linschoten, ch. xxvii.; [Hak. Soc. i. 173].

1626.—“Were it to bring the Great Turk bound in chains Through France in triumph, or to couple up The SOPHY; and great Prester-John together; I would attempt it.”—Beaum. & Fletch., The Noble Gentleman, v. 1.

c. 1630.—“Ismael at his Coronation proclai’d himself King of Persia by the name of Pot-shaw (Pashaw)-Ismael-SOPHY. Whence that word SOPHY was borrowed is much controverted. Whether it be from the Armenian idiom, signifying Wool, of which the Shashes are made that ennobled his new order. Whether the name was from SOPHY his grandsire, or from the Greek word Sophos imposed upon Aydar at his con- quest of Trebizond by the Greeks there, I know not. Since then, many have called the Kings of Persia SOPHY’s: but I see no reason for it; since Ismael’s son, grand and great grandsons Kings of Persia never continued that name, till this that now reigns, whose name indeed is Saffa, but casual.”—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, 296.

1815.—"The Sufvean monarchs were revered and deemed holy on account of their descent from a saint."—Malcolm, H. of Pers., ii. 427.

1828.—"It is thy happy destiny to follow in the train of that brilliant star whose light shall shed a lustre on Persia, unknown since the days of the earlier Soffees."—J. B. Fraser, The Kuzzabah, i. 192.

SOUBA, SOOBAH, s. Hind. from Pers. sözba. A large Division or Province of the Mogul Empire (e.g. the Söbah of the Deccan, the Sözba of Bengal). The word is also frequently used as short for Sábado (see SOUBADAR), 'the Viceroy' (over a sözba). It is also "among the Marathas sometimes applied to a smaller division comprising from 5 to 8 tarafas" (Wilson).

c. 1584.—"In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sirkars. . . . The empire was then parcelled into 12 grand divisions, and each was committed to the government of a Soobadär . . . upon which occasion the Sovereign of the world distributed 12 Lack's of beetle. The names of the Soobahs were Allahabad, Agra, Owdh, Ajmeer, Ahmedabad, Bahar, Bengal, Dehly, Cabul, Lahoor, Multan, and Malwa: when his majesty conquered Berar, Khandees, and Ahmednagar, they were formed into three Soobahs, increasing the number to 15."—Ayken, ed. Gladwin, ii. 1-5; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115].

1753.—"Princes of this rank are called Subbahs. Nizam al mothuck was Subbah of the Deccan (or Southern) provinces . . . The Nabobs of Condanore, Cutepah, Carnatiche, Yalore, &c., the Kings of Triticinopoly, Mysore, Tanjore, are subject to this Subbah-ship. 1804.—"It is impossible for persons to have behaved in a more shuffling manner than the Soubah's servants have. . . ."—Wellington, ed. 1837, iii. 11.

1809.—"These (pillars) had been removed from a sacred building by Monsieur Duplex, when he assumed the rank of Soubah."—Lord Valentinia, i. 373.

1823.—"The Delhi Sovereigns whose vast empire was divided into Soubahs, or Governments, each of which was ruled by a Soubadhär or Viceroy."—Malcolm, Cen. India, i. 2.

SOUBADAR, SUBADAR, s. Hind. from Pers. sözdadär, 'one holding a sözba' (see SOUBA).

a. The Viceroy, or Governor of a sözba.

b. A local commandant or chief officer.

c. The chief native officer of a company of Sepoys; under the original constitution of such companies, its actual captain.

a. See SOUBA.

1673.—"The Subidar of the Town being a Person of Quality . . . he (the Ambassador) thought good to give him a Visit."—Fryer, 77.

[c. 1809.—"The term Soudagar, which implies merely a principal merchant, is here (Behar) usually given to those who keep what the English of India call Europe shops; that is, shops where all sorts of goods imported from Europe, and chiefly consumed by Europeans, are retailed."—Buchanant, Eastern India, i. 375.]

[c. 1817.—"This sahib was a very rich man, a Soudagar. ..."—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Boosy, 84.]

a. The fruit Anona muricata, L., a variety of the Custard apple. This kind is not well known on the Bengal side of India, but it is completely naturalised at Bombay. The terms soursoap and sweetsoap are, we believe, West Indian.

b. In a note to the passage quoted below, Grainger identifies the soursoap with the surraak of the Dutch. But in this, at least as regards use in the East Indies, there is some mistake. The latter term, in old Dutch writers on the East, seems always to apply to the Common Jack fruit, the 'sourjack,' in fact, as distinguished from the superior kinds, especially the champada of the Malay Archipelago.

a. 1764.—"... a neighbouring hill Which Nature to the Soursoap had re- signed." Grainger, Bk. 2.

b. 1657.—"The whole is planted for the most part with coco-palms, mangoes, and suursacks."—Ruyffl van Goens, in Valentijn, Ceylon, 223.

1778.—"The one which yields smaller fruit, without seed, I found at Columbo, Gale, and several other places. The name by which it is properly known here is the Maldviwan Sour Sack, and its use here is less universal than that of the other sort, which ... weighs 30 or 40 lbs."—Thunberg, É.T. iv. 255.

[1833.—"Of the eatable fruitied kinds above referred to, the most remarkable are the sweetsop, sour sop, and cherimoyer. ..."—Fenny Cyc., ii. 64.]

SOWAR, SUWAR, s. Pers. suwar, 'a horseman.' A native cavalry soldier; a mounted orderly. In the Greek provinces in Turkey, the word is familiar in the form soufâpis, pl. soufâpides, for a mounted gendarme. The regulations for suwârs in the Mogul armies are given by Blochmann, Ain, i. 244 seq.

1824.—"... The sowars who accompanied him."—Heber, Orig. i. 494.

1827.—"Hartley had therefore no re- source save to keep his eye steadily fixed on the lighted match of the sowar ... who rode before him."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xii.

[1830.—"... Meera, an Asswar well known on the Collector's establishment."—Or. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, i. 390.]

SOWAR, SHOOTER-, s. Hind. from Pers. shutur-sawrâr, the rider of a dromedary or swift camel. Such riders are attached to the establishment of the Viceroy on the march, and of other high officials in Upper India. The word sawar is quite mis-used by the Great Duke in the passage below, for a camel-driver, a sense it never has. The word written, or intended, may however have been surwaun (q.v.)

[1815.—"As we approached the camp his oont-sowar was (camel-riders) went ahead of us."—Journal, Marques of Hastings, i. 337.]

1834.—"I found a fresh horse at Suffer Jung's tomb, and at the Kutub (cootub) a couple of riding camels and an attendant Shutur Suwar."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 129.

SOY, s. Hind. sāvākār. A native banker; corresponding to the Chetty of S. India.

1803. — "You should not confine your dealings to one soucar. Open a communication with every soucar in Poonah, and take money from any man who will give it you for bills." — Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 1.

1896. — "We were also sahoukars, and granted bills of exchange upon Bombay and Madras, and we advanced moneys upon interest." — Pandurang Hari, 174 ; [ed. 1873, i. 251].

[In the following the word is confounded with Sowar:

[1877.—"It was the habit of the sowars, as the goldsmiths are called, to bear their wealth upon their persons." — Mrs. Guthrie, My Year in an Indian Fort, i. 294.]

SOY, s. A kind of condiment once popular. The word is Japanese si-yau (a young Japanese fellow-passenger gave the pronunciation clearly as shoyu.—A. B.), Chin. shi-yu. [Mr. Platts (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 475) points out that in Japanese as written with the native character soy would not be siyau, but siyou-ya ; in the Romanised Japanese this is simplified to shoyu (colloquially this is still further reduced, by dropping the final vowel, to shoy or soy). Of this monosyllable only the so represents the classical siyau ; the final consonant (y) is a relic of the termination yu. The Japanese word is itself derived from the Chinese, which at Shanghai is se-yu, at Amoy, st-iu, at Canton, shi-yau, of which the first element means 'salted beans,' or other fruits, dried and used as condiments; the second element merely means 'oil.' It is made from the beans of a plant common in the Himalaya and E. Asia, and much cultivated, viz. Glycine Soja, Sieb. and Zucc. (Soya hispida, Moench.), boiled down and fermented. [In India the bean is eaten in places where it is cultivated, as in Chutia Nagpur (Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 510 seq.).]

1688. — "I have been told that soy is made with a fishy composition, and it seems most likely by the Taste; tho' a Gentleman of my Acquaintance who was very intimate with one that sailed often from Tonquin to Japan, from whence the true Soy comes, told me that it was made 1841. — "At Peshawur, it appears by the papers I read last night, that they have camels, but no sowars, or drivers." — Letter of D. of Wellington, in Indian Administration of Lt. Ellenhorough, 228.

1897. — "I have given general notice of the Shutur Sowar going into Meerut to all the Meerut men." — H. Greatheed's Letters during Siege of Delhi, 42.

SOWARRY, SOWARREE, s. Hind. from Pers. sowarī. A cavalcade, a cortège of mounted attendants.

1803. — "They must have tents, elephants, and other sowary; and must have with them a sufficient body of troops to guard their persons." — A. Wellesley, in Life of Munny, i. 346.

1809. — "He had no sowary." — Id. Valenti, i. 388.

1814. — "I was often reprimanded by the Zemindars and native officers, for leaving the sowarree, or state attendants, at the outer gate of the city, when I took my evening excursion." — Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 420 ; [2nd ed. ii. 372].

[1837. — "The Raja of Benares came with a very magnificent sowarree of elephants and camels." — Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 35.]

SOWARRY CAMEL, s. A swift or riding camel. See SOWAR, SHOOTER.

1895. — "I am told you dress a camel beautifully," said the young Princess, 'and I was anxious to... ask you to instruct my people how to attire a sawari camel.' This was flattering me on a very weak point: there is but one thing in the world that I perfectly understand, and that is how to dress a camel." — Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 86.

SOWCAR, s. Hind. sāhākār, alleged to be from Skt. sādhu, 'right,' with the Hind. affix kār, 'doer'; Guj. Mahr. sāvākār. A native banker; corresponding to the Chetty of S. India.

1803. — "You should not confine your dealings to one soucar. Open a communication with every soucar in Poonah, and take money from any man who will give it you for bills." — Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 1.

1896. — "We were also sahoukars, and granted bills of exchange upon Bombay and Madras, and we advanced moneys upon interest." — Pandurang Hari, 174 ; [ed. 1873, i. 251].

[In the following the word is confounded with Sowar:

[1877.—"It was the habit of the sowars, as the goldsmiths are called, to bear their wealth upon their persons." — Mrs. Guthrie, My Year in an Indian Fort, i. 294.]

1690.—"... Souy, the choicest of all Savees."—Ovington, 387.

[1900.—"Mushrooms shred into small pieces, flavoured with shoyu" (soy).—Mrs. Frazer, A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan, i. 238.]

SPIN. s. An unmarried lady; popular abbreviation of 'Spinster.' [The Port. equivalent soltera (soliterra) was used in a derogatory sense (Gray, note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 128).]

SPONGE-CAKE. s. This well-known form of cake is called throughout Italy pane di Spagna, a fact that suggested to us the possibility that the English name is really a corruption of Spanish-cake. The name in Japan tends to confirm this, and must be our excuse for introducing the term here.

1880.—"There is a cake called kasateira resembling sponge-cake... It is said to have been introduced by the Spaniards, and that its name is a corruption of Castilla."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 255.

SPOTTED-DEER. s. Axis maculatus of Gray; [Cervus axis of Blanford (Mammalia, 546)]; Hind. chital, Skt. chitra, 'spotted.'

1673.—"The same Night we travelled easily to Megatana, using our Fowling-Pieces all the way, being here presented with Rich Game, as Peacocks, Doves, and Pigeons, Chitrels, or Spotted Deer."—Fryer, 71.

[1677.—"Spotted Deare we shall send home, some by ye Europe ships, if they touch here."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.]

1679.—"There being conveniency in this place for ye breeding up of Spotted Deer, which the Hon'ble Company doe every year order to be sent home for His Majesty, it is ordered that care be taken to breed them up in this Factory (Madapollam), to be sent home accordingly."—Pl. St. George Council (on Tour), 16th April, in Notes and Extents, Madras, 1871.

1682.—"This is a fine pleasant situation, full of great shady trees, most of them Tamarins, well stored with peacocks and Spotted Deer like our fallow-deer."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 39].

SQUEEZE, s. This is used in Anglo-Chinese talk for an illegal action. It is, we suppose, the translation of a Chinese expression. It corresponds to the maladilota of the Middle Ages, and to many other slang phrases in many tongues.

1882.—"If the licence (of the Hong merchants)... was costly, it secured to them uninterrupted and extraordinary pecuniary advantages; but on the other hand it subjected them to 'calls' or 'squeezes' for contributions to public works... for the relief of districts suffering from scarcity... as well as for the often imaginary... damage caused by the overflowing of the 'Yangtse Keang' or the 'Yellow River.'"—The Pink Wars at Canton, p. 96.

STATION, s. A word of constant recurrence in Anglo-Indian colloquial. It is the usual designation of the place where the English officials of a district, or the officers of a garrison (not in a fortress) reside. Also the aggregate society of such a place.

[1832.—"The nobles and gentlemen are frequently invited to witness a 'Station ball.'..."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 196.]

1866.—"And if I told how much I ate at one Mofussil station, I'm sure 'twould cause at home a most extraordinary sensation."—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiiii. p. 391.

"Who asked the Station to dinner, and allowed only one glass of Simkin to each guest."—Ibid. 291.

STEVEDORE, s. One employed to stow the cargo of a ship and to unload it. The verb estivar [Lat. stipare] is used both in Sp. and Port. in the sense of stowing cargo, implying originally to pack close, as to press wool. Estivador in the sense of a wool-packor only is given in the Sp. Dictionaries, but no doubt has been used in every sense of estivar. See Sheat, s.v.

STICK-INSECT, s. The name commonly applied to certain orthopterous insects of the family Phasmdidae, which have the strongest possible resemblance to dry twigs or pieces of stick, sometimes 6 or 7 inches in length.

1754.—"The other remarkable animal which I met with at Cuddalore was the animated Stalk, of which there are different kinds. Some appear like dried straws tied together, others like grass. . . ."—Ives, 20.

1860.—"The Stick-Insect. —The Phasmdidae or spectres . . . present as close a resemblance to small branches, or leafless twigs, as their congener do to green leaves. . . ."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 252.

STICKLAC, s. Lac encrusted on sticks, which in this form is collected in the jungles of Central India.

[1880.—"Where, however, there is a regular trade in stick-lac, the propagation of the insect is systematically carried on by those who wish for a certain and abundant crop."—Ball, Jungle Life, 308.]

STINK-WOOD, s. Foetidia Mauritiana, Lam., a myrtaceous plant of Mauritius, called there Bois puant.

"At the Carnival in Goa, one of the sports is to drop bits of this stink-wood into the pockets of respectable persons."—Birdwood (MS.).

STRIDHANA, STREEDHANA, s. Skt. stri-thana, 'women's property.' A term of Hindu Law, applied to certain property belonging to a woman, which follows a law of succession different from that which regulates other property. The term is first to be found in the works of Jones and Colebrooke (1790-1800), but has recently been introduced into European scientific treatises. [See Mayne, Hindu Law, 541 seqq.]

1875.—"The settled property of a married woman . . . is well known to the Hindoos under the name of stridhan."—Maine, Early Institutions, 321.

STUPA. See TOPE.

SUAKIN, n.p. This name, and the melancholy victories in its vicinity, are too familiar now to need explanation. Arab. Sawakin.

c. 1331.—"This very day we arrived at the island of Sawakin. It is about 6 miles from the mainland, and has neither drinkable water, nor corn, nor trees. Water is brought in boats, and there are cisterns to collect rain water. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 161-2.

1526.—"The Preste continued speaking with our people, and said to Don Rodrigo that he would have great pleasure and complete contentment, if he saw a fort of ours erected in Macuh, or in Cuauhem, or in Zyula."—Correa, iii. 42; [see Dalboquerque, Comm. ii. 229].

[c. 1590.—" . . . thence it (the sea) washes both Persia and Ethiopia where are Dahlak and Suakin, and is called (the Gulf of) Omán and the Persian Sea."—Aín, ed. Jarrett, ii. 121.]

SUCKER-BUCKER, n.p. A name often given in N. India to Upper Sind, from two neighbouring places, viz., the town of Sukkar on the right bank of the Indus, and the island fortress of Bakkar or Bhakkar in the river. An alternative name is Roree-Bucker, from Rohri, a town opposite Bakkar, on the left bank, the name of which is probably a relic of the ancient town of Aror or Alor, though the site has been changed since the Indus adopted its present bed. [See McGrindle, Invasion of India, 352 seqq.]

c. 1383.—"I passed 5 days at Lähr . . . and quitted it to proceed to Bakar. They thus call a fine town through which flows a canal derived from the river Sind."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 114-115.

1521.—Shah Beg then took his departure for Bhakkar, and after seven days' marching arrived at the plain surrounding Sakkar."—Turkhisn Nama, in Elliot, i. 311.

1554.—"After a thousand sufferings we arrived at the end of some days' journey, at Siwán (sewán), and then, passing by Patara and Darilja, we entered the fortress of Bakor."—Sidi Aín, p. 136.

[c. 1590. — "Bhakkar (Bhukkar) is a notable fortress; in ancient chronicles it is called Mamsúrah."—Aín, ed. Jarrett, ii. 327.]

1616.—"Buckor, the Chief Cheie Citie, is called Buckor Succor."—Terry, [ed. 1777], p. 75.

1753.—"Vient ensuite Bukor, ou comme il est écrit dans la Géographie Turque, Péker, ville située sur une colline, entre deux bras de l'Indus, qui en font une ile . . . la géographie . . . ajoute que Lonhri (i.e. Rori) est une autre ville située vis-à-vis de cette ile du côté meridional, et que Sekar, autrement Sukor, est en même position du côté septentrional."—D'Anville, p. 37.

SUCKET, s. Old English. Wright explains the word as 'dried sweet-meats or sugar-plums.' Does it not in the quotations rather mean bowf-sugar? [Palmer (Folk Etymology. 378) says that the original meaning was a 'slice of melon or gourd,' Ital. succata, a kind of meat made of Pumphions or Gourdes' (Florio) from zucca, 'a gourd or pumpkin,' which is a shortened form of cucuzza, a corruption of Lat. cucurbita (Diez). This is perhaps the same word which appears in the quotation from Linschoten below, where the editor suggests that it is derived from Mahr sukata, 'slightly dried, desiccated,' and Sir H. Yule suggests a corruption of H. sout, 'dried ginger.'

[1537.—"... packed in a friable, two little barrels of suckat. ..."—Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII. ii. pt. i. 451.]

1584.—"White sucket from Zindi" (i.e. Sind) "Cambalain, and China."—Barret, Hakl. ii. 412.

[1538.—"Ginger by the Arabians, Persians, and Turks is called Gengibbl (see GINGER), in Gusurate, Decan, and Bengal, when it is fresh and green Adrac, and when dried sukute."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 79.]

c. 1620-30.—
"... For this, This Candy wine, three merchants were undone; These suckets brake as many more."
Beaum. and Fletch., The Little French Lawyer, i. 1.

SUCIAT, SACKCLOTH, &c., s. Pers. sakallat, sakallat, saklatan, saklatan, applied to certain woollen stuffs, and particularly now to European broadcloth. It is sometimes defined as scarlet broad cloth; but though this colour is frequent, it does not seem to be essential to the name. [Scarlet was the name of a material long before it denoted a colour. In the Liberale Roll of 14 Hen. III. (1230, quoted in N. & Q. 8 ser. i. 129) we read of sanguine scarlet, brown, red, white and scarlet colouris de Marble.] It has, however, been supposed that our word scarlet comes from some form of the present word (see Skeat, s. v. Scarlet).* But the fact that the Arab, dictionaries give a form saklat must not be trusted to. It is a modern form, probably taken from the European word, [as according to Skeat, the Turkish iskerlat is merely borrowed from the Ital. scarlatto].

The word is found in the medieval literature of Europe in the form sictlatown, a term which has been the subject of controversy both as to etymology and to exact meaning (see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 58, notes). Among the conjectures as to etymology are a derivation from Ar. sukti, 'polishing' (see SICLEEGUR); from Sicily (Ar. ‘Siklita); and from the Lat. cyclas, cycladater. In the Arabic Vocabularia of the 13th century (Florence, 1871), siklatan is translated by ciclos. The conclusion come to in the note on Marco Polo, based, partly but not entirely, on the modern meaning of sakallat, was that saklatan was probably a light woolen texture. But Dozy and De Jong give it as éttof de soie, brochée d'or, and the passage from Edrisi supports this undoubtedly. To the north of India the name suktat is given to a stuff imported from the borders of China.

1040.—"The robes were then brought, consisting of valuable frocks of saklatan of various colours. ..."—Balkis, in Elliot, ii. 148.

c. 1150.—"Almeria (A'maria) was a Musulman city at the time of the Moravidae. It was then a place of great industry, and reckoned, among others, 800 silk looms, where they manufactured costly robes, brocades, the stuffs known as Saklatan Isfahania and various other silk tissues."—Edrisi (Jontbert), ii. 40.

c. 1220.—"Fabriz. The chief city of Azarbajian. ... They make there the stuffs called 'utadib (see TABBY), Siklatan, Khitibi, fine satins and other textures which are exported everywhere."—Yaküt, in Barbier de Meynard, i. 138.

c. 1370?
"His heer, his berd, was lyk saffron That to his girdel raughte adoun Hise shooes of Cordewane, Of Brugges were his hosen broun His Robe was of Skylatoun That coste many a Jane," Chaucer, Sir Thopas, 4 (Farnival, Ellesmere Text).

c. 1590—
"Suklat-i-Ramī or Farangī or Portagātī" (Broadcloth of Turkey, of Europe, and of Portugal). ...—Ain (orig.) i. 110. Blochmann renders 'Scarlet Broadcloth' (see above). [The same word, sakłat, is used later on of 'woollen stuffs' made in Kashmir (Farret, Ain, ii. 935.)] 1675.—"Saffahana is already full of London Cloath, or Sackcloath London, as they call it."—Fryer, 224.

"His Hose of London Sackcloth of any Colour."—Ibid. 391.

[1840.—"... his simple dress of sooklaat and flat black woolen cap. ..."—Lloyd, Gerard, Narr. i. 167.]
SUDDEN DEATH. Anglo-Indian slang for a fowl served as a spatchcock, the standing dish at a dawk-bungalow in former days. The bird was caught in the yard, as the traveller entered, and was on the table by the time he had bathed and dressed.

[S. 1848.—"'Sudden death' means a young chicken about a month old, caught, killed, and grilled at the shortest notice."—Berncastle, Voyage to China, i. 193.]

Sudder, adj., but used as s. Literally 'chief,' being Ar. sadr. This term had a technical application under Mahommedan rule to a chief Judge, as in the example quoted below. The use of the word seems to be almost confined to the Bengal Presidency. Its principal applications are the following:

a. Sudder Board. This is the 'Board of Revenue,' of which there is one at Calcutta, and one in the N.W. Provinces at Allahabad. There is a Board of Revenue at Madras, but not called 'Sudder Board' there.

b. Sudder Court, i.e. 'Sudder Adawlut (sadr 'adālat). This was till 1863, in Calcutta and in the N.W.P., the chief court of appeal from the Mofussil or District Courts, the Judges being members of the Bengal Civil Service. In the year named the Calcutta Sudder Court was amalgamated with the Supreme Court (in which English Law had been administered by English Barrister-Judges), the amalgamated Court being entitled the High Court of Judicidary. A similar court also superseded the Sudder Adawlut in the N.W.P.

c. Sudder Ameen, i.e. chief Ameen (q.v.). This was the designation of the second class of native Judge in the classification which was superseded in Bengal by Act XVI. of 1868, in Bombay by Act XIV. of 1869, and in Madras by Act III. of 1873. Under that system the highest rank of native Judge was Principal Sudder Ameen; the 2nd rank, Sudder Ameen; the 3rd, Moonsiff. In the new classification there are in Bengal Subordinate Judges of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd grade, and Munsiffs (see MOONSIFF) of 4 grades; in Bombay, Subordinate Judges of the 1st class in 3 grades, and 2nd class in 4 grades; and in Madras Subordinate Judges in 3 grades, and Munsiffs in 4 grades.

d. Sudder Station. The chief station of a district, viz. that where the Collector, Judge, and other chief civil officials reside, and where their Courts are.

c. 1340.—"The Sadr-Jihān (Chief of the Word') i.e. the 'Kadi-al-Kuślāt ('Judge of Judges') (GAZEE) . . . possesses ten townships, producing a revenue of about 60,000 tankas. He is also called Sadr-al-Islām."—Skilhabudīn Dimishkī, in Notes et Ets. xiii. 185.

SUFEEENA, s. Hind. sāfīna. This is the native corr. of sūlpoena. It is shaped, but not much distorted, by the existence in Hind. of the Ar. word sāfīnā for 'a blank-book, a note-book.'

SUGAR, s. This familiar word is of Skt. origin. Sākara originally signifies 'grit or gravel,' thence crystallised sugar, and through a Prakrit form sakkara gave the Pers. shakkar, the Greek σάκχαρον and ὄσκχαρον, and the late Latin sucrarum. The Ar. is sukkar, or with the article as-suukkar, and it is probable that our modern forms, it. zucchero and succheri, Fr. sucre, Germ. Zucker, Eng. sugar, came as well as the Sp. azucar, and Port. açucar, from the Arabic direct, and not through Latin or Greek. The Russian is sakkar; Polish cukier; Hung. cukor. In fact the ancient knowledge of the product was slight and vague, and it was by the Arabs that the cultivation of the sugar-cane was introduced into Egypt, Sicily, and Andalusia. It is possible indeed, and not improbable, that palm-sugar (see JAGGERY) is a much older product than that of the cane. [This is disputed by Watt (Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. p. 31), who is inclined to fix the home of the cane in E. India.] The original habitat of the cane is not known; there is only a slight and doubtful statement of Loureiro, who, in speaking of Cochin-China, uses the words "habitat et colitur," which may imply its existence in a wild state, as well as under cultivation, in that country. De Candolle assigns its earliest production to the country extending from Cochin-China to Bengal.

Though, as we have said, the knowledge which the ancients had of sugar was very dim, we are disposed greatly to question the thesis, which has been so confidently maintained by Salmasius and later writers, that the original saccharon of Greek and Roman writers was not sugar but the siliceous concretion sometimes deposited in bamboo, and used in medieval medicine under the name tabasheer (q.v.) (where see a quotation from Royle, taking the same view). It is just possible that Pliny in the passage quoted below may have jumbled up two different things, but we see no sufficient evidence even of this. In White's Latin Dict. we read that by the word saccharon is meant (not sugar but) "a sweet juice distilling from the joints of the bamboo." This is nonsense. There is no such sweet juice distilled from the joints of the bamboo; nor is the substance tabasheer at all sweet. On the contrary it is slightly bitter and physickly in taste, with no approach to sweetness. It is a hydrate of silica. It could never have been called "honey" (see Dioscorides and Pliny below); and the name of bamboo-sugar appears to have been given to it by the Arabs merely because of some resemblance of its concretions to lumps of sugar. [The same view is taken in the Encyl. Brit. 9th ed. xxii. 625, quoting Not. et Extr., xxv. 267.] All the erroneous notices of αδχαρων seem to be easily accounted for by lack of knowledge; and they are exactly paralleled by the loose and inaccurate stories about the origin of camphor, of lac, and what-not, that may be found within the boards of this book.

In the absence or scarcity of sugar, honey was the type of sweetness, and hence the name of honey applied to sugar in several of these early extracts. This phraseology continued down to the Middle Ages, at least in its application to uncrystallised products of the sugar-cane, and analogous substances. In the quotation from Pegolotti we apprehend that his three kinds of honey indicate honey, treacle, and a syrup or treacle made from the sweet pods of the carob-tree.

Sugar does not seem to have been in early Chinese use. The old Chinese books often mention shii-mi or "stone-honey" as a product of India and Persia. In the reign of Taitseng (627-650) a man was sent to Gangetic India to learn the art of sugar-making; and Marco Polo below mentions the introduction from Egypt of the further art of refining it. In India now, Chini (Cheeny) (Chinese) is applied to the whiter kinds of common sugar; Misri (Misree) or Egyptian, to sugar-candy; loaf-sugar is called kand.

* c. A.D. 60.—
"Qua'ke ferens rapidum diviso gurgitam fontem.

Hydaspen:
Quique bibunt tenera dulces ab arundine succos.
—Lucan, iii. 235.

* c. A.D. 65.—"It is called σακχαρων, and is a kind of honey which solidifies in India, and in Arabia Felix; and is found upon canes, in its substance resembling salt, and cru|en|ched by the teeth as salt is. Mixed with water and drunk, it is good for the belly and stomach, and for affections of the bladder and kidneys."—Dioscorides, Med., ii. c. 104.

* c. 170.—"But all these articles are hotter than is desirable, and so they aggravate fevers, much as wine would. But oxymel alone does not aggravate fever, whilst it is an active purgative. . . . Not undeservedly, I think, that saccharum may also be counted among things of this quality. . . .

* c. 636.—"In Indicis stagnis nasci arundines calamique diciuntur, ex quorum radicibus expressum suavissimum succum bibunt. Vade et Varro ait: Indica non magno in arbores crescit arundo; Illius et lentis premittur radicibus humor, Dulcia qui nequeant succo concedere melia."—Isidori Hispalensis Origium, Lib. xvii. cap. vii.

* 1298.—"Bangala est une provence vers midit. . . Il font grant merchandise, car il ont espi e galanga e gingiber e succare et de maintes autres chieres espices."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text, ch. cxxvi.

1298. — "Je voz di que en ceste provences" (Quinsai or Chekiang) "naist et se fait plus sucar que ne fait en tout le autre monde, et ce est encore grandissime vente."—Ibid. ch. ciii.

1298. — "And before this city" (a place near Fu-chau) "came under the Great Can these people knew not how to make fine sugar (zuccher) ; they only used to boil and skim the juice, which, when cold, left a black paste. But after they came under the Great Can some men of Babylonia." (i.e. of Cairo) "who happened to be at the Court proceeded to this city and taught the people to refine sugar with the ashes of certain trees."—Dem. in Ramusio, ii. 49.

c. 1343. — "In Cyprus the following articles are sold by the hundred-weight (cantara di peso) and at a price in besants: Round pepper, sugar in powder (poivere di zuccho) ... sugars in loaves (zuccheria di pane), bees' honey, sugar-cane honey, and carob-honey (mele d'ape, mele di cannameli, mele di carrube)."—Pegolotti, 64.

Loaf sugars are of several sorts, viz. zuccheria muscattino, caffettino, and bambilonia; and muscattino, and dommaschino; and the muscattino is the best sugar there is; for it is more thoroughly boiled, and its paste is whiter, and more solid, than any other sugar; it is in the form of the bambilonia sugar like this Δ; and of this muscattino kind but little comes to the west, because nearly the whole is kept for the mouth and for the use of the Soldan himself.

"Zuccheria caffettino is the next best after the muscara . . . .

"Zuccherio Bambilonia is the best next after the best caffettino.

"Zuccherio muscattino is the best after that of Bambilonia.

Zuccherio chandì, the bigger the pieces are, and the whiter, and the brighter, so much is it the better and finer, and there should not be too much small stuff.

"Powdered sugars are of many kinds, as of Cyprus, of Rhodes, of the Crano of Monreale, and of Alexandria; and they are all made originally in entire loaves; but as they are not so thoroughly done, as the other sugars that keep their loaf shape . . . the loaves tumble to pieces, and return to powder, and so it is called powdered sugar . . ." (and a great deal more).—Ibid. 382-385. We cannot interpret most of the names in the preceding extract. Bambilonia is 'Sugar of Babylon,' i.e. of Cairo, and Dommaschino of Damascus. Muschera (see CANDY (SUGAR), the second quotation), Caffettino, and Muscattino, no doubt all represent Arabic terms used in the trade at Alexandria, but we cannot identify them.

c. 1345. — "J'ai vu vendre dans le Bengale . . . un rith (rotli) de sucre (al-sukkar), poids de Dihly, pour quatre drachmes."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 211.

1516. — "Moreover they make in this city (Bengala, i.e. probably Chittagong) much and good white cane sugar (acoquere branco de cana), but they do not know how to consolidate it and make leaves of it, so they wrap up the powder in certain wrappers of raw hide, very well stitched up; and make great loads of it, which are despatched for sale to many parts, for it is a great traffic."—Barbosa, Lisbon od. 362.

1630. — "Let us have a word or two of the prices of sugar and sugar candy."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 5.

1697. — "Chacun sait que par effet des regards de Farid, des monecaux de terre se changeaient en sucre. Tel est le motif du surnom de Shchakar ganq, 'tresor de sucre' qui lui a ete donne."—Arbisch-i-Mohfil, quoted by Gavrin de Tausy, Rel. Mus. 95. (This is the saint, Farid-uddin Shakkarganj (d. A.D. 1268) whose shrine is at Pák Paltan in the Punjab.) [See Crooke, Popular Religion, &c. i. 214 seqq.]

1810. — "Although the sugar cane is supposed by many to be indigenous in India, yet it has only been within the last 50 years that it has been cultivated to any great extent. . . . Strange to say, the only sugar-cane used until that time" (20 years before the date of the book) "was received from China; latterly, however, many gentlemen have speculated deeply in the manufacture. We now see sugar-candy of the first quality manufactured in various places of Bengal, and I believe that it is at least admitted that the raw sugars from that quarter are eminently good."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 193.

SULTAN, s. Ar. sulhdn, 'a Prince, a Monarch.' But this concrete sense is, in Arabic, post-classical only. The classical sense is abstract 'dominion.' The corresponding words in Hebrew and Aramaic have, as usual, sh or s. Thus sholdtn in Daniel (e.g. vi. 26—"in the whole dominion of my kingdom") is exactly the same word. The concrete word, corresponding to sultdn in its post-classical sense, is shalldt, which is applied to Joseph in Gen. xliii. 6—"governor." So Saladin (Yüsuf Salâh-ad-din) was not the first Joseph who was sultan of Egypt. ["In Arabia it is a not uncommon proper name; and as a title it is taken by a host of petty kingslets. The Abbaside Caliphs (as Al-Wásik . . .) formerly created these Sultans as their regents. Al Tâ'i bîllah (A.D. 974) invested the famous Sabuktagin with the office . . . Sabuktakgin's son, the famous Mahmid of the Ghazanvite dynasty in 1002, was the first to adopt 'Sultan' as an independent title some 200 years after the death of Harîn-al-Rashid." (Burton, Arab Nights, i. 188.)] SUMATRA.

a. n.p. This name has been applied to the great island since about A.D. 1400. There can be no reasonable doubt that it was taken from the very similar name of one of the maritime principalities upon the north coast of the island, which seems to have originated in the 13th century. The seat of this principality, a town called Samudra, was certainly not far from Pasei, the Parem of the early Portuguese writers, the Passir of some modern charts, and probably lay near the inner end of the Bay of Telo Samawe (see notes to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 276 seqq.). This view is corroborated by a letter from C. W. J. Wenninger (Bijdragen tot de Taal-Land-en Volkenkunde van Nederlandsch Indie, ser. iv. vol. 6. (1882), p. 298) from which we learn that in 1881 an official of Netherlands India, who was visiting Pasei, not far from that place, and on the left bank of the river (we presume the river which is shown in maps as entering the Bay of Telo Samawe near Pasei) came upon a kampung, or village, called Samudra. We cannot doubt that this is an indication of the site of the old capital.

The first mention of the name is probably to be found in Samara, the name given in the text of Marco Polo to one of the kingdoms of this coast, intervening between Basina, or Parem, and Dagroian or Dragoian, which last seems to correspond with Perir. This must have been the position of Samudra, and it is probable that it has disappeared accidentally from Polo's Samara. Malay legends give trivial stories to account for the etymology of the name, and others have been suggested; but in all probability it was the Skt. Samudra, the 'sea.' [See Miscellaneous Papers relating to Indo-China, 2nd ser. ii. 50; Leyden, Malay Annals, 65.] At the very time of the alleged foundation of the town a kingdom was flourishing at Dwara Samudra in S. India (see DOOR SUMMUND). The first authentic occurrence of the name is probably in the Chinese annals, which mention, among the Indian kingdoms which were prevailed on to send tribute to Kublai Khan, that of Sumatola. The chief of this State is called in the Chinese record "Tu-han-pu-ti" (Pauthier, Marc Pol, 605), which seems to exactly represent the Malay words Tuan-Pati, 'Lord Ruler.'

We learn next from Ibn Batuta that at the time of his visit (about the middle of the 14th century) the State of Sumatra, as he calls it, had become important and powerful in the Archipelago; and no doubt it was about that time or soon after, that the name began to be applied by foreigners to the whole of the great island, just as Lamori had been applied to the same island some centuries earlier, from Lāmbri, which was then the State and port habitually visited by ships from India. We see that the name was so applied early in the following century by Nicolo Conti, who was in those seas apparently c. 1420-30, and who calls the island Shamatha. Fra Mauro, who derived much information from Conti, in his famous World-Map, calls the island Isola Shamotra or Taprobane. The confusion with Taprobane lasted long.

When the Portuguese first reached those regions Pedir was the leading State upon the coast, and certainly no State known as Samudra or Sumatra then continued to exist. Whether the city continued to exist, even in decay, is obscure. The Ain, quoted below, refers to the "port of Sumatra," but this may have been based on old information. Valentijn seems to recognise the existence of a place called Samudra or Sumotara, though it is not entered in his map. A famous mystic theologian who flourished under the great King of Achin, Iskandar Muda, and died in 1630, bore the name of Shamsuddin Shamattrani, which seems to point to a place called Shamatra as his birthplace. And a distinct mention of "the island of Samatra" as named from "a city of this northern part." occurs in the so-called "Voyage which Juan Serano made when he fled from Malaccia," in 1512, published by Lord Stanley of Alderley at the end of his translation of Barbosa. This man, on leaving Pedir and "going down the coast, says: "I drew towards the south and south-east direction, and reached to another country and city which is called Samatra," and so on. Now this indicates the position in which the city of Sumatra must really have been, if it continued to exist. But, though this passage is not, all the rest of the narrative seems to be mere plunder from Varthema. Unless, indeed, the plunder was the other way; for there is reason to believe that Varthema never went east of Malabar.

There is, however, a like intimation in a curious letter respecting the Portuguese discoveries, written from Lisbon in 1515, by a German, Valentino Moravia (the same probably who published a Portuguese version of Marco Polo, at Lisbon, in 1502) and who shows an extremely accurate conception of Indian geography. He says: "The greatest island is that called by Marco Polo the Venetian Java Minor, and at present it is called Sumotra from a port of the said island" (see in De Gubernatis, Viaeg. Ital. 391).

It is probable that before the Portuguese epoch the adjoining States of Pasei and Sumatra had become united. Mr. G. Phillips, of the Consular Service in China, was good enough to send one of the present writers, when engaged on Marco Polo, a copy of an old Chinese chart showing the northern coast of the island, and this showed the town of Sumatra (Sumantala). It seemed to be placed in the Gulf of Pasei, and very near where Pasei itself still exists. An extract of a Chinese account "of about A.D. 1413" accompanied the map. This was fundamentally the same as that quoted below from Groeneveldt. There was a village at the mouth of the river called Tulu-mangkein (qu. Tulu-Samawe?). A curious passage also will be found below, extracted by the late M. Pauthier from the great Chinese Imperial Geography, which alludes to the disappearance of Sumatra from knowledge.

We are quite unable to understand the doubts that have been thrown upon the derivation of the name, given to the island by foreigners, from that of the kingdom of which we have been speaking (see the letter quoted above from the Bijdragen).

SUMATRA, s. Sudden squalls, precisely such as are described by Lockyer and the others below, and which are common in the narrow sea between the Malay Peninsula and the island of Sumatra, are called by this name.

1616.—"... it befell that the galliot of Miguel de Macedo was lost on the Ilha Grande of Malaca (!), where he had come to anchor, when a Samatra arose that drove him on the island, the vessel going to pieces, though the crew and most part of what she carried were saved."—Bocarro, Decada, 626.

1711.—"Frequent squalls ... these are often accompanied with Thunder and Lightning, and continue very fierce for Half an Hour, more or less. Our English Sailors call them Sumatras, because they always meet with them on the Coasts of this Island."—Lockyer, 56.

1726.—"At Malacca the streights are not above 4 Leagues broad; for though the opposite shore on Sumatra is very low, yet it may easily be seen on a clear Day, which is the Reason that the Sea is always as smooth as a Mill-pond, except it is ruffled with Squalls of Wind, which seldom come without Lightning, Thunder, and Rain, and though they come with great Violence, yet they are soon over, not often exceeding an Hour."—A. Hamilton, ii. 79, [ed. 1744].

1843.—"Sumatras, or squalls from the S. Westward, are often experienced in the S.W. Monsoon. ... Sumatras generally come off the land during the first part of the night, and are sometimes sudden and severe, accompanied with loud thunder, lightning, and rain."—Horsburgh, ed. 1843, ii. 215.
SUMJAO, v. This is properly the imp. of the H. verb sumuhānda, 'to cause to know, warn, correct,' usually with the implication of physical coercion. Other examples of a similar formation will be found under PUCKEROW.

[1826.—"... in this case they apply themselves to sumjao, the defendant."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 170.]

SUMPITAN, s. The Malay blowing-tube, by means of which arrows, often poisoned, are discharged. The weapon is discussed under SARBATANE. The word is Malay sumpitan, properly 'a narrow thing,' from sumpit, 'narrow, strait.' There is an elaborate account of it, with illustrations, in Ling Roth, Natives of Sarawak and Br. N. Borneo, ii. 184 seqq. Also see Scott, Malayan Words, 104 seqq.

[f. 1630.—"Sempitans." See under UPAS.

[1841.—"In advancing, the sumpitan is carried at mouth and elevated, and they will discharge at least five arrows to one compared with a musket."—Brooke, in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes, i. 261.

[1883.—"Their (the Samangs') weapon is the sumpitan, a blow-gun, from which poisoned arrows are expelled."—Miss Bird, The Golden Chersonese, 16.]

SUNDA, n.p. The western and most mountainous part of the island of Java, in which a language different from the proper Javanese is spoken, and the people have many differences of manners, indicating distinction of race. In the 16th century, Java and Sunda being often distinguished, a common impression grew up that they were separate islands; and they are so represented in some maps of the 16th century, just as some medieval maps, including that of Fra Mauro (1459), show a like separation between England and Scotland. The name Sunda is more properly indeed that of the people than of their country. The Dutch call them Sundanez (Soendanezen). The Sunda country is considered to extend from the extreme western point of the island to Cheribon, i.e. embracing about one-third of the whole island of Java. Hinduism appears to have prevailed in the Sunda country, and held its ground longer than in "Java," a name which the proper Javanese restrict to their own part of the island. From this country the sea between Sumatra and Java got from Europeans the name of the Straits of Sunda. Geographers have also called the great chain of islands from Sumatra to Timor "the Sunda Islands."

[Mr. Whiteway adds: "There was another Sunda near Goa, but above the Ghâts, where an offshoot of the Vijânyângara family ruled. It was founded at the end of the 16th century, and in the 18th the Portuguese had much to do with it, till Tippoo Sultan absorbed it, and the ruler became a Portuguese pensioner."]

1516.—"And having passed Samatara towards Java there is the island of Sunda, in which there is much good pepper, and it has a king over it, who they say desires to serve the King of Portugal. They ship thence many slaves to China."—Barbosa, 196.

1526.—"Duarte Coelho in a ship, along with the galeot and a foist, went into the port of Sunda, which is at the end of the island of Camatra, on a separate large island, in which grows a great quantity of excellent pepper, and of which there is a great traffic from this port to China, this being in fact the most important merchandise exported thence. The country is very abundant in provisions, and rich in groves of trees, and has excellent water, and is peopled with Moors who have a Moorish king over them."—Correa, iii. 92.

1553.—"Of the land of Jâla we make two islands, one before the other, lying west and east as if both on one parallel. ... But the Jacs themselves do not reckon two islands of Jaoa, but one only, of the length that has been stated ... about a third in length of this island towards the west constitutes Sunda, of which we have now to speak. The natives of that part consider their country to be an island divided from Java by a river, little known to our navigators, called by them Chiamo or Chenano, which cuts off right from the sea, all that third part of the land in such a way that when these natives define the limits of Java they say that on the west it is bounded by the Island of Sunda, and separated from it by this river Chiamo, and that on the east by the island of Bâle, and that on the north they have the island of Madura, and on the south the unexplored sea." &c.—Barros, IV. i. 12.

1554.—"The information we have of this port of Calapa, which is the same as Gunda, and of another port called Boca, these two being 15 leagues one from the other, and Nunez, in Subsidios, 42.

"... there is a straight or narrow passage between Senvata and Iawa, called the straight of Sunda, of a place so called, lying not far from thence within the Ilo of Iawa... . The principall haunt in the Inland is Sunda Calapa,† whereof the straight beareth the name; in this place of Sūda there is much Pepper."—p. 34.

SUNDERBUNDS, n.p. The well-known name of the tract of intersecting creeks and channels, swampy islands, and jungles, which constitutes that part of the Ganges Delta nearest the sea. The limits of the region so-called are the mouth of the Hoogly on the west, and that of the Megna (i.e. of the combined great Ganges and Brahmaputra) on the east, a width of about 220 miles. The name appears not to have been traced in old native documents of any kind, and hence its real form and etymology remain uncertain. Sundaravana, 'beautiful forest'; Sundarī-vana, or -bon, 'forest of the Sundarī tree'; Chandra-ban, and Chandra-band, 'moon-forest' or 'moon-embankment'; Chanda-bhanda, the name of an old tribe of salt-makers; Chandra dip-ban from a large zamindary called Chandra-dip in the Bakarganj district at the eastern extremity of the Sunderbunds; these are all suggestions that have been made. Whatever be the true etymology, we doubt if it is to be sought in sundara or sundarī. [As to the derivation from the Sundarī tree which is perhaps most usually accepted, Mr. Beveridge (Man. of Bakarganj, 24, 167, 32) remarks that this tree is by no means common in many parts of the Bakarganj Sunderbunds; he suggests that the word means 'beautiful wood' and was possibly given by the Brahmans.] The name has never (except in one quotation below) been in English mouths, or in English popular orthography, Sunderbunds, but Sunderbunds, which implies (in correct transliteration) an original sandra or chandra, not sundara. And going back to what we conjecture may be an early occurrence of the name in two Dutch writers, we find this confirmed. These two writers, it will be seen, both speak of a famous Sandery, or Santry, Forest in Lower Bengal, and we should be more positive in our identification were it not that in Van der Broucke's map (1660) which was published in Valentijn's East Indies (1726) this Sandery Forest is shown on the west side of the Hoogly R., in fact about due west of the site of Calcutta, and a little above a place marked as Basanderi, located near the exit into the Hoogly of what represents the old Saraswati R., which enters the former at Sankrīl, not far below the Botanical Gardens, and 5 or 6 miles below Fort William. This has led Mr. Blochmann to identify the Sanderi Bosch with the old Mahall Basandhari which appears in the Ain as belonging to the Sirkār of Sulimānābād (Gladwin's Ayen, ii. 207, orig. i. 407; Jarrett, ii. 140; Blochm. in J.A.S.B. xliii. pt. i. p. 232), and which formed one of the original "xxiv. Pergunnas."* Undoubtedly this is the Basanderi of V. den Broucke's map; but it seems possible that some confusion between Basanderi and Bosch Sandery (which would be Sandarban in the vernacular) may have led the map-maker to misplace the latter. We should gather from Schulz† that he passed the Forest of Sandry about a Dutch mile below Sankral, which he mentions. But his statement is so nearly identical with that in Valentijn that we apprehend they have no separate value. Valentijn, in an earlier page, like Bernier, describes the Sunderbunds as the resort of the Arakan pirates, but does not give a name (p. 169).

1661.—"We got under sail again" (just after meeting the Arakan pirates) "in the morning early, and went past the Forest of Santry, so styled because (as has been credibly related) Alexander the Great with his mighty army was hindered by the strong rush of the ebb and flood at this place, from advancing further, and therefore had to turn back to Macedonin."—Walter Schult, 155.

c. 1666.—"And thence it is" (from piratical raids of the Mugs, &c.) "that at present there are seen in the mouth of the Ganges, so many fine Isles quite deserted, which were formerly well peopled, and where no other Inhabitants are found but wild Beasts, and especially Tygers."—Bernier, E.T. 54; [ed. Constable, 442].

1726.—"This (Bengal) is the land wherein they will have it that Alexander the Great, called by the Moors, whether Hindostanders or Persians, Sulthan Iskender, and in their historians Iskender Doucarnain, was . . . they can show you the exact place where King Porus held his court. The natives will prate much of this matter; for example, that in front of the Sanderie-Wood (Sanderie Bosch), which we show in the map, and which they call properly after him Iskenderie he was stopped by the great and rushing streams."—Valentijn, v. 179.

1728.—"But your petitioners did not arrive off Sunderbund Wood till four in the evening, when they rowed backward and forward for six days; with which labour and want of provisions three of the pets died."—Petition of Sheik Mahmud Ameer and others, to Govr. of Ft. St. Geo., in Wheeler, iii, 41.

1764.—"On the 11th Bhandan, whilst the Boats were at Kerma in Soonderbund, a little before daybreak, Captain Ross arose and ordered the Manjee to put off with the Budgerow . . ."—Native Letter regarding Murder of Captain John Ross by a Native Crew. In Long, 383. This instance is an exception to the general remark made above that the English popular orthography has always been Sander, and not Soonder-bunds.

1786.—"If the Jelimage be navigable we shall soon be in Calcutta; if not, we must pass a second time through the Sunderbans."—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii, 83.

"A portion of the Sunderbunds . . . for the most part overlaid by the tide, as indicated by the original Hindoo name of Chunderbund, signifying mounds, or offspring of the moon."—James Grant, in App. to Fifth Report, p. 260. In a note Mr. Grant notices the derivation from "Soondery wood," and "Soonder-ban," "beautiful wood," and proceeds: "But we adhere to our own etymology rather . . . above all, because the richest and greatest part of the Sunderbunds is still comprised in the ancient Zemindarry pergannah of Chunder-deep, or lunar territory."

1792.—"Many of these lands, what is called the Sundra bunds, and others at the mouth of the Ganges, if we may believe the history of Bengal, was formerly well inhabited."—Forrest, V. to Morgui, Pref. p. 5.

1793.—"That part of the delta bordering on the sea, is composed of a labyrinth of rivers and creeks, . . . this tract known by the name of the Woods, or Sunderbunds, is in extent equal to the principality of Wales."—Rennell, Mem. of Map of Hind., 3rd ed., p. 359.

1853.—"The scenery, too, exceeded his expectations; the terrible forest solitude of the Sunderbunds was full of interest to an European imagination."—Oakfield, i. 38.

[1833.—"Across a deep ravine . . . his Lordship erected a neat sangah, or mountain bridge of pines."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 117.

[1871.—"A sunga bridge is formed as follows: on either side the river piers of rubble masonry, laced with cobble-stones of timber, are built up; and into these are inserted stout poles, one above the other in successively projecting tiers, the interstices between the latter being filled up with cross-beams," &c.—Harcourt, Himalayan Districts of Kooloo, p. 67 seq.]

SUNGTARA, s. Pers. sontara. The name of a kind of orange, probably from Cyntra. See under ORANGE a quotation regarding the fruit of Cyntra, from Abulfeda.

c. 1526.—"The Sengtereel . . . is another fruit. . . . In colour and appearance it is like the citron (Tiranji), but the skin of the fruit is smooth."—Baber, 328.

c. 1590.—"Sirkar Silhet is very mountainous. . . . Here grows a delicious fruit called Soomtara (suntara) in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form."—Ayyen, by Gladwin, ii. 10; [Jarrett (ii. 124) writes Suntarah].

1793.—"The people of this country have infinitely more reason to be proud of their oranges, which appear to me to be very superior to those of Silhet, and probably indeed are not surpassed by any in the world. They are here called 'Santitha,' which I take to be a corruption of Sengterrah, the name by which a similar species of orange is known in the Upper Provinces of India."—Kirkpatrick's Nepal, 129.

1835.—"The most delicious oranges have been procured here. The rind is fine and thin, the flavour excellent; the natives call them 'cintra.'"—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 99.

SUNN, s. Beng. and Hind. san, from Skt. sana; the fibre of the Crotalaria juncea, L. (N.O. Leguminosae); often called Bengal, or Country, hemp. It is of course in no way kindred to true hemp, except in its economic use. In the following passage from the Ain, the reference is to the Hibiscus cannabinus (see Watt, Econ. Diet. ii. 597).

"c. 1590.—"Hemp grows in clusters like a nosegay. . . . One species bears a flower like the cotton-shrub, and this is called in Hindostan, sun-pan. It makes a very soft rope."—Ayen, by Gladwin, ii. 89; in Blockmann (i. 87) Patsan.

1838.—"Sunn . . . a plant the bark of which is used as hemp, and is usually sown around cotton fields."—Playfair, Taleif-tereef, 96.

[SUNNEE, SOONNEE, s. Ar. sunnî, which is really a Pers. form and stands for that which is expressed by the Ar. Ahlu-Sunnah, 'the people of the Path,' a 'Traditionist.' The term applied to the large Mahomedan sect who acknowledge the first four Khalifahs to have been the rightful descendants of the Prophet, and are thus opposed to the Sheeas. The latter are much less numerous than the former, the proportion being, according to Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's estimate, 15 millions Shias to 145 millions of Sunnis.

[c. 1590.—"The Mahomedans (of Kashmîr) are partly Sundies,...and others of the sects of Aly and Noorbukshy; and they are frequently engaged in wars with each other."—Ayen, by Gladwin, ii. 125; ed. Jarrett, ii. 352.

[1623.—"The other two . . . are Sonni, as the Turks and Moghul."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 162.

[1812.—"A fellow told me with the gravest face, that a lion of their own country would never hurt a Sheyah . . . but would always devour a Sunni."—Moriel, Journey through Persia, 62.]

SUNNUD, s. Hind. from Ar. sanad. A diploma, patent, or deed of grant by the government of office, privilege, or right. The corresponding Skt.—H. is kawsana.

[c. 1590.—"A paper authenticated by proper signatures is called a sunnud . . . ."—Ayen, by Gladwin, i. 214; ed. Blockmann, i. 253.]

1738.—"They likewise brought sunnuds, or the commission for the nabobship."—Orme, Hist., ed. 1808, ii. 284.

1759.—"That your Petitioners, being the Bramins, &c. . . . were permitted by Sunnud from the President and Council to collect daily alms from each shop or doocan (Doocaun) of this place, at 5 cowries per diem."—In Long, 184.

1776.—"If the path to and from a House . . . be in the Territories of another Person, that Person, who always hath passed to and fro, shall continue to do so, the other Person aforesaid, though he hath a Right of Property in the Ground, and hath an attested Sunnud thereof, shall not have Authority to cause him any Let or Molestation."—Halhed, Code, 100-101.

1799.—"I enclose you sunnuds for pension for the Killadar of Chittledroog."—Wellington, i. 45.

1800.—"I wished to have traced the nature of landed property in Soondah . . . by a chain of Sunnuds up to the 8th century."—Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 249.

1809.—"This sunnud is the foundation of all the rights and privileges annexed to a Jageer (Jagheer)."—Harrington's Analysis, ii. 410.

SUNYÁSEE, s. Skt. sunyâsî, lit. 'one who resigns, or abandons,' scil. 'wordly affairs'; a Hindu religious mendicant. The name of Sunyásee was applied familiarly in Bengal, c. 1760-75, to a body of banditti claiming to belong to a religious fraternity, who, in the interval between the decay of the imperial authority and the regular establishment of our own, had their head-quarters in the forest-tracts at the foot of the Himalaya. From these they used to issue periodically in large bodies, plundering and levying exactions far and wide, and returning to their asylum in the jungle when threatened with pursuit. In the days of Nawab Mir Kásim 'Ali (1760-64) they were bold enough to plunder the city of Dacca; and in 1766 the great geographer James Rennell, in an encounter with a large body of them in the territory of Koch (see COOCH) Bihār, was nearly cut to pieces. Rennell himself, five years later, was employed to carry out a project which he had formed for the suppression of these bands, and did so apparently with what was considered at the time to be success, though we find the depredators still spoken of by W. Hastings as active, two or three years later.

[c. 200 A.D. — "Having thus performed religious acts in a forest during the third portion of his life, let him become a Sannyasi for the fourth portion of it, abandoning all sensual affection."— Manu, vi. 33.]

[c. 1500.—"The fourth period is Sannyaśa, which is an extraordinary state of austerity that nothing can surpass. Such a person His Majesty calls Sannyāśī."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, iii. 275.]

1616.—"Sunt autem Sanasses apud illos Brachmanes quidam, sanctimonie opinione habentes, ab hominum silicet consortio semoci in solitudine degentes et nonumquid totī nudi corpus in publici produentes."—Jarric, Thes. i. 688.

1622.—"Some (an unlearned kind) are called Sannesas."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 549.

1651.—"The Sanyāsī are people who set the world and worldly joys, as they say, on one side. These are indeed more precise and strict in their lives than the foregoing."—Rogers, 21.

1674.—"Saniāde, or Saniasī, is a dignity greater than that of Kings."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Port. ii. 711.

1726.—"The San-yāsēs are men who, forsaking the world and all its fruits, take themselves to a very strict and retired manner of life."—Valentijin, Choro. 75.

1766.—"The Sanashy Faquirs (part of the same Tribe which plundered Dacca in Cossim Ally's Time*) were in arms to the number of 7 or 800 at the Time I was surveying Báár (a small Province near Botan), and had taken and plundered the Capital of that name within a few Coss of my route... I came up with Morrison immediately after he had defeated the Sanashyas in a pitched Battle... Our Escorte, which were a few Horse, rode off, and the Enemy with drawn Sabres immediately surrounded us. Morrison escaped unhurt, Richards, my Brother officer, received only a slight Wound, and fought his Way off; my Armenian Assistant was killed, and the Sepoy Adjutant much wounded. I was put in a Palankeen, and Morrison made an attack on the Enemy and cut most of them to Pieces. I was now in a most shocking Condition indeed, being deprived of the Use of both my Arms, a cut of a Sable (sic) had cut through my right Shoulder Bone, and laid me open for nearly a Foot down the Back, cutting thro' and wounding some of my Ribs. I had besides a Cut on the left Elbow which took off the Muscular part of the breadth of a Hand, a Stab in the Arm, and a large Cut on the head."

1767.—"A body of 5000 Sinnasses have lately entered the Sircar Sarong country; the Phousdar sent two companies of Sepoys after them, under the command of a serjeant... the Sinnasses stood their ground, and after the Sepoys had tired away their ammunition, fell on them, killed and wounded near 80, and put the rest to flight."—Letter to President at Ft. Williams, from Thomas Rumbold, Chief at Patna, dd. April 20, in Long, p. 526.

1773.—"You will hear of great disturbances committed by the Sinnasses, or wandering Fackeers, who annually infest the provinces about this time of the year, in pilgrimage to Juggernaut, going in bodies of 1000 and sometimes even 10,000 men."—Letter of Warren Hastings, dd. February 2, in Gleig, i. 292.

1774.—"The history of these people is curious. They... rove continually from place to place, recruiting their numbers with the healthiest children they can steal. Thus they are the stoutest and most active men in India. Such are the Sanasses, the gypsies of Hindostan."—Do. do., dd. August 25, in Gleig, 308-4. See the same vol., also pp. 284, 296-7-8, 395.

1826.—"Being looked upon with an evil eye by many persons in society, I pretended to bewail my brother's loss, and gave out my intention of becoming a Sannyase, and retiring from the world."—Pandwrang Hazi, 394 ; [ed. 1873, ii. 267; also i. 189].

SUPÁRA, n.p. The name of a very ancient port and city of Western India; in Skt. Sūrāraka,* popularly Supíra. It was near Washi (Bagesin of the Portugese—see (1) Bassein)—which was for many centuries the chief city of the Konkan, where the name still survives as that of a well-to-do town of 1700 inhabitants, the channel by which vessels in former days reached

* Williams (Skt. Dict. s.v.) gives Sūrāraka as "the name of a mythical country"; but it was real enough. There is some ground for believing that there was another Sūrāraka on the coast of Orissa, Ṣūrāra of Ptolemy. it from the sea being now dry. The city is mentioned in the Mahâbhârata as a very holy place, and in other old Sanskrit works, as well as in cave inscriptions at Kârli and Nâsik, going back to the 1st and 2nd centuries of the Christian era. Excavations affording interesting Buddhist relics, were made in 1882 by Mr. (now Sir) J. M. Campbell (see his interesting notice in Bombay Gazetteer, xiv. 314-342; xvi. 125) and Pundit Indrajâi Bhagwanlal. The name of Supâra is one of those which have been plausibly connected, through Sophir, the Coptic name of India, with the Ophir of Scripture. Some Arab writers call it the Sofâla of India.

Bo. Geog. Soc. vii. 140.

SUPREME COURT. The designation of the English Court established at Fort William by the Regulation Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III. c. 68), and afterwards at the other two Presidencies. Its extent of jurisdiction was the subject of acrimonious controversies in the early years of its existence; controversies which were closed by 21 Geo. III. c. 70, which explained and defined the jurisdiction of the Court. The use of the name came to an end in 1862 with the establishment of the 'High Court,' the bench of which is occupied by barrister judges, judges from the Civil Service, and judges promoted from the native bar.

The Charter of Charles II., of 1661, gave the Company certain powers to administer the laws of England, and that of 1853 to establish Courts of Judicature. That of Geo. I. (1726) gave power to establish at each Presidency Mayor's Courts for civil suits, with appeal to the Governor and Council, and from these, in cases involving more than 1000 pagodas, to the King in Council. The same charter constituted the Governor and Council of each Presidency a Court for trial of all offences except high treason. Courts of Requests were established by charter of Geo. II., 1753. The Mayor's Court at Madras and Bombay survived till 1797, when (by 37 Geo. III. ch. 142) a Recorder's Court was instituted at each. This was superseded at Madras by a Supreme Court in 1801, and at Bombay in 1823.
SURA, s. Toddy (q.v.), i.e. the fermented sap of several kinds of palm, such as coco, palmyra, and wild date. It is the Skt. sura, 'vinous liquor,' which has passed into most of the vernaculars. In the first quotation we certainly have the word, though combined with other elements of uncertain identity, applied by Cosmas to the milk of the coco-nut, perhaps making some confusion between that and the fermented sap. It will be seen that Linschoten applies sura in the same way. Bluteau, curiously, calls this a Caffre word. It has in fact been introduced from India into Africa by the Portuguese (see Ann. Marit. iv. 293).

1874. — "The Argell" (i.e. Nargil, or nargeela, or coco-nut) "is at first full of very sweet water, which the Indians drink, using it instead of wine. This drink is called Rhonee-sura, * and is exceedingly pleasant." —Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., cixvi.

[1554. — "Cura." See under ARRACK.]

1563. — "They grow two qualities of palm-tree, one kind for the fruit, and the other to give cura." —Garcia, f. 67.

1573. — "Sura, which is, as it were, vino mosto." — Aceros, 100.

1598. — "... in that sort the pot in short space is full of water, which they call Sura, and is very pleasant to drink, like sweet wine, and somewhat better." —Linschoten, p. 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 48].

1609—10. — "... Good country and fertile...abounding with Date Trees, whence they draw a liquor, called Tarree (Todd) or Sure. ..." —W. Finch, in Puchta, i. 436.

1643. — "A fio is bois forre mes mariniers de telle sorte que peu s’en falut qu’ils ne rennussessent notre almaine ou batteau: Ce breuvage estoit du sura, qui est du vin fait de palmes." —Moqnet, Voyages, 252.

c. 1650. — "Nor could they drink either Wine, or Surry, or Strong Water, by reason of the great Imposts which he laid upon them." —Tavernier, E.T. ii. 80; [ed. Ball, i. 343].

1653. — "Les Portugais appelent ce tari ou vin des Indes, Soure... de cette liqueur le singe, et la grande chasse-souris... sont extrêmement amateurs, aussi bien que les Indiens Mansulmans (sic), Parisis, et quelque tribus d’Indou... " —De la Boullage-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 263.

SURA, n.p. In English use the name of this city is accepted Surett; but the name is in native writing and parlance generally Sàrth. In the Atn, however (see below), it is written Sàrat; also in Sàdik Isfahâni (p. 106). Surat was taken by Akbar in 1573, having till then remained a part of the falling Mahommedan kingdom of Guzerat. An English factory was first established in 1608-9, which was for more than half a century the chief settlement of the English Company in Continental India. The transfer of the Chiefs to Bombay took place in 1687.

We do not know the origin of the name. Various legends on the subject are given in Mr. (now Sir J.) Campbell’s Bombay Gazetteer (vol. ii.), but none of them have any probability. The ancient Indian Sàuràshtra was the name of the Peninsula of Guzerat or Kattywar, or at least of the maritime part of it. This latter name and country is represented by the differently spelled and pronounced Sàruth (see SURAT). Sir Henry Elliot and his editor have repeatedly stated the opinion that the names are identical. Thus: "The names ‘Surat’ and ‘Sàruth’ are identical, both being derived from the Sankrit Sàuràshtra; but as they belong to different places a distinction in spelling has been maintained. ‘Surat’ is the city; ‘Sàruth’ is a prînt or district of Kattivar, of which Junágarh is the chief town" (Elliot, v. 356; see also 197). Also: "The Sankrit Sàuràshtra and Gurjjara survive in the modern names Surat and Guzerat, and however the territories embraced by the old terms have varied, it is hard to conceive that Surat was not in Sàuràshtra nor Guzerat in Gurjjara. All evidence goes to prove that the old and modern names applied to the same places. Thus Ptolemy’s Surestrone comprises Surat..." (Dowson (iv) ibid. i. 359). This last statement seems distinctly erroneous. Surat is in Ptolemy’s Δúρεη, not in Σεβοραςήρη, which represents, like Sàuràshtra, the peninsula. It must remain doubtful whether there was any connection between the names, or the resemblance was accidental. It is possible that continental Surat may have originally had some name implying its being the place of passage to Sàuràshtra or Sàrath.

Surat is not a place of any antiquity. There are some traces of the existence of the name ascribed to the 14th century, in passages of uncertain value in certain native writers. But it only came to notice as a place of any importance about the very end of the 15th century, when a rich Hindu trader, Gopi by name, is stated to have established himself on the spot, and founded the town. The way, however, in which it is spoken of by Barbosa previous to 1516 shows that the rise of its prosperity must have been rapid.

[Surat in English slang is equivalent to the French Rafiot, in the sense of "no great shakes," an adulterated article of inferior quality (Barrère, s.v. Rafiot). This perhaps was accounted for by the fact that "until lately the character of Indian cotton in the Liverpool market stood very low, and the name 'Surats,' the description under which the cotton of this province is still included, was a byword and a general term of contempt" (Berar Gazetteer, 226 seq.).]

1510.—"Don Afonso" (de Noronha, nephew of Albuquerque) "in the storm not knowing whither they went, entered the Gulf of Cambay, and struck upon a shoal in front of Currate. Trying to save themselves by swimming or on planks many perished, and among them Don Afonso."—Correa, ii. 29.

1516.—"Having passed beyond the river of Reynel, on the other side there is a city which they call Curate, peopled by Moors, and close upon the river; they deal there in many kinds of wares, and carry on a great trade; for many ships of Malabar and other parts sail thither, and sell what they bring, and return loaded with what they choose."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 280.

1525.—"The corja (Corge) of cotton cloths of Churate, of 14 yards each, is worth... 250 f edors."—Lembrança, 45.

1528.—"Heytor da Silveira put to sea again, scouring the Gulf, and making war everywhere with fire and sword, by sea and land; and he made an onslaught on Currate and Reynel, great cities on the sea-coast, and sacked them, and burnt part of them, for all the people fled, they being traders and without a garrison. . . ."—Correa, iii. 277.

1553.—"Thence he proceeded to the bar of the river Tapy, above which stood two cities the most notable on that gulf. The first they call Surat, 3 leagues from the mouth, and the other Reiner, on the opposite side of the river and half a league from the bank. . . . The latter was the most sumptuous in buildings and civilisation, inhabited by warlike people, all of them Moors inured to maritime war, and it was from this city that most of the foists and ships of the King of Cambay's fleet were furnished. Surat again was inhabited by an unwarlike people whom they call Ban- yans, folk given to mechanic crafts, chiefly to the business of weaving cotton cloths."—Barros, IV. iv. 8.

1564.—"So saying they quitted their rowing-benches, got ashore, and started for Surat."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 83.

1573.—"Next day the Emperor went to inspect the fortress. . . During his inspection some large mortars and guns attracted his attention. Those mortars bore the name of Sulaiman, from the name of Sulaimán Sultan of Turkey. When he made his attempt to conquer the ports of Gujurát, he sent these . . . with a large army by sea. As the Turks . . . were obliged to return, they left these mortars. . . The mortars remained upon the sea-shore, until Khudáwand Khan built the fort of Surat, when he placed them in the fort. The one which he left in the country of Súrath was taken to the fort of Junágarh by the ruler of that country."—Tabbád-at-Akbári, in Elliot, v. 350.

c. 1590.—"Surat is among famous ports. The river Tapti runs hard by, and at seven coss distance joins the salt sea. Râmúr on the other side of the river is now a port dependent on Surat, but was formerly a big city. The ports of Khandevi and Balsär are also annexed to Surat. Fruit, and especially the ananás, is abundant. . . . The sections of Zarasht, emigrant from Fars, have made their dwelling here; they revere the Zhand and Pambah and erect their dakhnas (or places for exposing the dead). . . . Through the carelessness of the agents of Government and the commandants of the troops (sipah-salárdán, Sipah Salar), a considerable tract of this Sírkár is at present in the hands of the Frank, e.g. Daman, Sanján (St. John's), Tátrámúr, Málím, and Basái (see (1) Basseín), that are both cities and forts."—Aín, orig. i. 483; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 243].

1688.—"Within a League of the Road we entred into the River upon which Surat is seated, and which hath on both sides a very fertile soil, and many fair gardens, with pleasant Country-houses, which being all white, a colour which it seems the Indians are much in love with, afford a noble prospect amidst the greenness whereby they are encompassed. But the River, which is the Tapte . . . is so shallow at the mouth of it, that Barks of 70 or 80 Tun can hardly come into it."—Mandelslo, p. 12.

1690.—"Suratt is reckoned the most famous Emport of the Indian Empire, where all Commodities are vendible. . . . And the River is very commodious for the Importation of Foreign Goods, which are brought up to the City in Hoes and Yachts, and Country Boats."—Owington, 218.

1779.—"There is some report that he (Gen. Goddard) is gone to Bender Souret . . . but the truth of this God knows."—Seir Mutaq. iii. 328.
Sûrath. more properly Sôrath, and Sôreth, n.p. This name is the legitimate modern form and representative of the ancient Indian Saurashtra and Greek Syrastrenê, names which applied to what we now call the Kattywar Peninsula, but especially to the fertile plains on the sea-coast. ["Sûrashtra, the land of the Sus, afterwards Sanskritized into Saurashtra the Goodly Land, preserves its name in Sôrath the southern part of Kâthiâvâda. The name appears as Sûrashtra in the Mahâbhârata and Pânini's Ganaçâthâ in Rudradâman's (A.D. 150) and Skandagupta's (A.D. 456) Gîrnâ inscriptions, and in several Valabhi copper-plates. Its Prâkrit form appears as Sûratha in the Nâsk inscription of Gotamiputra (A.D. 150) and in later Prâkrit as Sûrâsthâ in the Tirthakalpa of Jînapra-bhasuri of the 13th or 14th century. Its earliest foreign mention is perhaps Strabo's Saraostus and Pliny's Orotura" (Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 6)]. The remarkable discovery of one of the great inscriptions of Asoka (n.c. 250) on a rock at Gîrnâ, near Junâgarh in Saurashtra, shows that the dominion of that great sovereign, whose capital was at Pataliputra (Pâlmisâbra) or Patna, extended to this distant shore. The application of the modern form Sûrath or Sôrath has varied in extent. It is now the name of one of the four prânts or districts into which the peninsula is divided for political purposes, each of these prânts containing a number of small States, and being partly managed, partly controlled by a Political Assistant. Sôrath occupies the south-western portion, embracing an area of 5,220 sq. miles. c. A.D. 80-90.—"Taîmât tâ mēn mevê- gêa tâ 'Svthâ svorôlonta 'Abirô kalêîta, tâ dé parâbalâsia Sûrâsthrâni."—Periplus, § 41. c. 150.—"Sûrasthrâni, * * * Varhdáêma pûlîs . . . Sûrâs t'rá kōmî . . . Mvngvîlwvôsn épmpîrôn . . . " Ptolemy, VII. i. 2-3. "Piîmîn ū mēn parâ tâ loîntîn mērō tîs 'Indhô pâsâ kalêîta koînôs mēn . . . 'Indoskîlôs. * * * * * * kai ū parî tîn 'Kánthî kîlîpôn . . . Sûrasthrâni."—Ibid. 55.

Sûrath, Calyan, Chouli (?), Malabar. c. 640.—"En quittant le royaume de Fu-la-pi (Vallabhi), il fit 500 li à l'ouest, et arriva au royaume de Sou-la-tch'a (Sourâchtra) . . . Comme ce royaume se trouve sur le chemin de la mer occidentale, tous les habitans profitent des avantages qu'offre la mer; ils se livrent au négocé, et à un commerce d'échange."—Pisouen-Thang, in Pél. Bouddh., iii. 164-165.

1516.—"Passing this city and following the sea-coast, you come to another place which has also a good port, and is called Sûrath Mangalor," and here, as at the other, put in many vessels of Malabar for horses, grain, cloths, and cottons, and for vegetables and other goods prized in India, and they bring hither coco-nuts, Jagara (Jaggery), which is sugar that they make drink of, emery, wax, cardamoms, and every other kind of spice, a trade in which great gain is made in a short time."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 296.

1573.—See quotation of this date under preceding article, in which both the names Sûrât and Sûrath, occur.

1584.—"After his second defeat Muzaffar Gujjarât retreated by way of Champâni, Birpar, and Jilâlawar, to the country of Sûrath, and rested at the town of Gondal, 12 kos from the fort of Junâgarh. . . He gave a lac of Mahmâdîs and a jewelled dagger to Amin Khân Ghori, ruler of Sûrath, and so won his support."—Tabâkî-i-Akbari, in Elitool, v. 437-438.

1590.—"Sîrâr Cafh Sûrât (Sûrath) was formerly an independent territory, the chief was of the Ghelot tribe, and commanded 50,000 cavalry, and 100,000 infantry. Its length from the port of Ghoge (Gogo) to the port of Arommy (Arâmârî) measures 125 cosë; and the breadth from Sindehar (Sîrdhâr), to the port of Diu, is a distance of 72 cosë."—Ayeen, by Gladwin, ii. 73; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 243].

1616.—"7 Soreth, the chief city, is called Janagar; it is but a little Province, yet very rich; it lies upon Gzurat; it hath the Ocean to the South."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 354.

Sûrkunda. s. Hind. sarkândâ, [Skt. sâra, 'reed-grass,' kânda, 'joint, section']. The name of a very tall reed-grass, Saccharum Sara, Roxb., perhaps also applied to Saccharum procerum, Roxb. These grasses are often tall enough in the riverine plains of Eastern Bengal greatly to overtop a tall man standing in a how on the back of a tall elephant.

It is from the upper part of the flower-bearing stalk of surkunda that sirky (q.v.) is derived. A most intelligent visitor to India was led into a curious mistake about the name of this grass by some official, who ought to have known better. We quote the passage. — "The story about the main branch of a river channel probably rests on no better foundation.

1875.—"As I drove yesterday with ——, I asked him if he knew the scientific name of the tall grass which I heard called tiger-grass at Ahmedabad, and which is very abundant here (about Lahore). I think it is a saccharum, but am not quite sure. 'No,' he said, 'but the people in the neighbourhood call it Sikunder's Grass, as they still call the main branch of a river 'Sikunder's channel.' Strange, is it not?—how that great individuality looms through history."—Grant Duff, Notes of an Indian Journey, 105.

Suroose, s. Pers. sar-posh, 'head-cover,' [which again becomes corrupted into our Tarboosh (tarbush), and 'Tarbrush' of the wandering Briton]. A cover, as of a basin, dish, hooka-bowl, &c.

1829.—"Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke; a thief having purloined your silver chelam (see CHILLUM) and suroose."—Mem. of John Shipk, ii. 159.

Surrapurda, s. Pers. sardaparda. A canvas screen surrounding royal tents or the like (see CANAUT).

1404.—"And round this pavilion stood an enclosure, as it were, of a town or castle made of silk of many colours, inlaid in many ways, with battlements at the top, and with cords to strain it outside and inside, and with poles inside to hold it up. And there was a gateway of great height forming an arch, with doors within and without made in the same fashion as the wall . . . and above the gateway a square tower with battlements: however fine the said wall was with its many devices and artifices, the said gateway, arch and tower, was of much more exquisite work still. And this enclosure they call Zala-parda."—Clavijo, s. cxvi.

C. 1590.—"The Sarapardah was made in former times of coarse canvas, but his Majesty has now caused it to be made of carpeting, and thereby improved its appearance and usefulness."—An, i. 54.

But in the Mahrratta provinces it has a special application to grants of land, or rather assignments of revenue, for special objects, such as keeping up a contingent of troops for service; to civil officers for the maintenance of their state; or for charitable purposes.

1893.—"It was by accident I discovered the deed for this tenure (for the support of troops), which is termed serinjam. The Pundit of Dhar shewed some alarm; at which I smiled, and told him that his master had now the best tenure in India. . ." — Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 103.

Surrinjaumee, Gram, s. Hind. gram-saranjami; Skt. grāma, 'a village,' and saranjām (see SURREINJAUUM); explained in the quotation.

1767.—"Gram-serenjamme, or peons and pykes stationed in every village of the province to assist the farmers in the collections, and to watch the villages and the crops on the ground, who are also responsible for all thefts within the village they belong to . . . SUTLEDGE. 878

SUTTEE.

The rite of widow-burning; i.e. the burning of the living widow along with the corpse of her husband, as practised by people of certain castes among the Hindus, and eminently by the Rajputs.

The word is properly Skt. satī, 'a good woman,' 'a true wife,' and thence-specially applied, in modern vernaculars of Sanskrit parentage, to the wife who was considered to accomplish the supreme act of fidelity by sacrificing herself on the funeral pile of her husband. The application of this substantive to the suicidal act, instead of the person, is European. The proper Skt. term for the act is sahagamana, or 'keeping company,' [saha-marana, 'dying together'].* A very long series of quotations in illustration of the practice, from classical times downwards, might be given. We shall present a selection.

We should remark that the word (satī or suttee) does not occur, so far as we know, in any European work older than the 17th century. And then it only occurs in a disguised form (see quotation from P. Della Valle).

The term mastī which he uses is probably mahā-satī, which occurs in Skt. Dictionaries ('a wife of great virtue'). Della Valle is usually eminent in the correctness of his transliterations of Oriental words. This conjecture of the interpretation of mastī is confirmed, and the traveller himself justified, by an entry in Mr. Whitworth's Dictionary of a word Mastī-kalā used in Canara for a monument commemorating a satī. Kalā is stone and mastī = mahā-satī. We have not found the term exactly in any European document older than Sir C. Malet's letter of 1787, and Sir W. Jones's of the same year (see below).

Suttee is a Brahmanical rite, and there is a Sanskrit ritual in existence (see Classified Index to the Tanjore MSS., p. 1350). It was introduced into Southern India with the Brahman civilisation, and was prevalent there chiefly in the Brahmanical Kingdom of Vijayanagar, and among the Mahrattas. In Malabar, the most primitive part

* But it is worthy of note that in the Island of Bali one manner of accomplishing the rite is called Satia (Skt. satī), 'truth,' from sat, whence also satī. See Crawford, II. of Ind. Arch., ii. 248, and Ewertich, in Verhandelingen van het Batav. Genootschap, xxii. 10.

In the following passage the great French geographer has missed the Sutlej:

1753.—"Les cartes qui ont précédé celles que j'ai composées de l'Arie, ou de l'Inde... ne marquent aucune rivière entre l'Hyphasis, ou Hypasis, dernier des fleuves qui se rendent dans l'Indus, et le Genné, qui est le Jomanes de l'Antiquité.... Mais la marche de Timur a indiqué dans cette intervalle deux rivières, celle de Kekher et celle de Panipat. Dans un ancien itinéraire de l'Inde, que Pline nous a conservé, on trouve entre l'Hyphasis et le Jomanes une rivière sous le nom d'Hesidrus à égale distance d'Hyphasis et de Jomanes, et qu'on a tout lieu de prendre pour Kekher."

—D'Anville, p. 47.

c. 1020.—"The Sultan... crossed in safety the Sihun (Indus), Jelam, Chandrāda, Ubra (Rāvi), Bah (Biyāth), and Sataludr..."—Al-Ubit, in Elliot, ii. 41.

c. 1050. —"They all combine with the Satlader below Mūltān, at a place called Panjnad, or 'the junction of the five rivers.'"—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 48. The same writer says: "(The name) should be written Shataludr. It is the name of a province in Hind. But I have ascertained from well-informed people that it should be Sataludr, not Shataludr" (sic).—Ibid. p. 52.

c. 1310.—"After crossing the Panjāb, or five rivers, namely, Sind, Jelam, the river of Lohāwar, Satlūt, and Biyah...".—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 36.

c. 1380.—"The Sultan (Firoz Shāh)... conducted two streams into the city from two rivers, one from the river Juinia, the other from the Sutlej."—Tārikh-i-Firoz-Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 390.

c. 1450.—"In the year 756 H. (1355 A.D.) the Sultan proceeded to Dī-boldur, and conducted a stream from the river Satlādar, for a distance of 40 kos as far as Jhajjar."—Tārikh-i-Mubārak Shāhī, in Elliot, iv. 8.

c. 1582. —"Letters came from Lahore with the intelligence that Ibrahim Husain Mirza had crossed the Satiada, and was marching upon Dī-boldūr."—Tābaqat-i-Akbārī, in Elliot, v. 358.

c. 1590. —"Sūhā Dībātī. In the 3rd climate. The length (of this Sūhāh) from Palwāl to Lohāhāna, which is on the bank of the river Satlāj, is 165 Kārūkh."—Āṯn., orig. i. 513; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 278].

1793.—"Near Moultan they unite again, and bear the name of Setliage, until both the substance and name are lost in the Indus."—Rennell, Memoir, 102.

In the following passage the great French geographer has missed the Sutlej:

1753.—"Les cartes qui ont précédé celles que j'ai composées de l'Arie, ou de l'Inde... ne marquent aucune rivière entre l'Hyphasis, ou Hypasis, dernier des fleuves qui se rendent dans l'Indus, et le Genné, qui est le Jomanes de l'Antiquité.... Mais la marche de Timur a indiqué dans cette intervalle deux rivières, celle de Kekher et celle de Panipat. Dans un ancien itinéraire de l'Inde, que Pline nous a conservé, on trouve entre l'Hyphasis et le Jomanes une rivière sous le nom d'Hesidrus à égale distance d'Hyphasis et de Jomanes, et qu'on a tout lieu de prendre pour Kekher."—D'Anville, p. 47.

* But it is worthy of note that in the Island of Bali one manner of accomplishing the rite is called Satia (Skt. satī), 'truth,' from sat, whence also satī. See Crawford, II. of Ind. Arch., ii. 248, and Ewertich, in Verhandelingen van het Batav. Genootschap, xxii. 10.
of S. India, the rite is forbidden (Andacharaniranya, v. 26). The cases mentioned by Teixeira below, and in the Lettres Édifiantes, occurred at Tanjore and Madura. A (Mahratta) Brahman at Tanjore told one of the present writers that he had to perform commemorative funeral rites for his grandfather and grandmother on the same day, and this indicated that his grandmother had been a sati.

The practice has prevailed in various regions besides India. Thus it seems to have been an early custom among the heathen Russians, or at least among nations on the Volga called Russians by Mas'udi and Ibn Fozlhan. Herodotus (Bk. v. ch. 5) describes it among certain tribes of Thracians. It was in vogue in Tonga and the Fiji Islands. It has prevailed in the island of Bali within our own time, though there accompanying Hindu rites, and perhaps of Hindu origin,—certainly modified by Hindu influence. A full account of Suttee as practised in those Malay Islands will be found in Zollinger's account of the Religion of Sassak in J. Ind. Arch. ii. 166; also see Friedrich's Bali as in note preceding. [A large number of references to Suttee are collected in Frazer, Pausanias, iii. 198 sqq.]

In Diodorus we have a long account of the rivalry as to which of the two wives of Keteus, a leader of the Indian contingent in the army of Eumenes, should perform suttee. One is rejected as with child. The history of the other terminates thus:

B.C. 317.—"Finally, having taken leave of those of the household, she was set upon the pyre by her own brother, and was regarded with wonder by the crowd that had run together to the spectacle, and heroically ended her life; the whole force with their arms thrice marching round the pyre before it was kindled. But she, laying herself beside her husband, and even at the violence of the flame giving utterance to no unbecoming cry, stirred pity indeed in others of the spectators, and in some excess of eulogy; but not what there were some of the Greeks who reproached such rites as barbarous and cruel. . . ."—Diod. Sic. Bibl. xix. 33-34.

c. B.C. 30.

"Felix Eois lex funeris una maritis Quos Aurora susa rubra colorat equis; Namque ubi mortifer acta est fax ultima dececta
Uxorum funis stat pia turba cornis;
Et certamen habet leti, quae viva sequatur
Conjugium; pudor est non licuisse mori.

Ardent victrices; et flammmae pectora praebent; Impomuntque suis ora perusta viris."

c. B.C. 20.—"He (Aristobulus) says that he had heard from some persons of wives burning themselves voluntarily with their deceased husbands, and that those women who refused to submit to this custom were disgraced."—Strabo, xv. 62 (E.T. by Hamilton and Falconer, iii. 112).

c. 851.—"All the Indians burn their dead. Serendib is the furthest out of the islands independent upon India. Sometimes when they burn the body of a King, his wives cast themselves on the pile, and burn with him; but it is at their choice to abstain."—Rel. Iran, Relation, &c. i. 50.

c. 1200.—"Hearing the Raja was dead, the Parnari became a sati—dying she said—The son of the Jadavati will rule the country, may my blessing be on him!"—Chand. Bardai, in Ind. Ant. i. 227. We cannot be sure that sati is in the original, as this is a condensed version by Mr. Beames.

c. 1298.—"Many of the women also, when their husbands die and are placed on the pile to be burnt, do burn themselves along with the bodies."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 17.

c. 1322.—"The idolaters of this realm have one detestable custom (that I must mention). For when any man dies they burn him; and if he leave a wife they burn her alive with him, saying that she ought to go and keep her husband company in the other world. But if the woman have sons by her husband she may abide with them, an she will."—Odorie, in Cathay, &c., i. 79.

"Also in Zampa or Champa: "When a married man dies in this country his body is burned, and his living wife along with it. For they say that she should go to keep company with her husband in the other world also."—Ibid. 97.

c. 1328.—"In this India, on the death of a noble, or of any people of substance, their bodies are burned; and when their wives follow them alive to the fire, and for the sake of worldly glory, and for the love of their husbands, and for eternal life, burn along with them, with as much joy as if they were going to be wedded. And those who do this have the higher repute for virtue and perfection among the rest."—Fr. Jordania, 20.

c. 1348.—"The burning of the wife after the death of her husband is an act among the Indians recommended, but not obligatory. If a widow burns herself, the members of the family get the glory thereof, and the fame of fidelity in fulfilling their duties. She who does not give herself up to the flames puts on coarse raiment and abides with her kindred, wretched and despised for having failed in duty. But she is not compelled to burn herself." (There follows an interesting account of instances witnessed by the traveller.)—Ibn Battuta, ii. 193.

c. 1450.—"In Madia vero Indi mortui comburuntur, cunque his, ut plurimum vivae uxores unius varo matrimonii conventio. Prior ex lege uritur, etiam quae unica est. Sumunt autem et aliae uxores quaedam eo pacto, ut morte funus suæ exornet, isque hauer parvus apud eos honos ducitur ... submissio igne uxorati cultu inter tubas tibicinasque et cantus, et ipsa psallentis more alacris rogum magnó comitato circuit. Astat interea eor sacrificia ... hortandæ snudens, Cum circumferent ilia saepius ignem propo suggestum consistit, vetesque exuens, loto de more prius corpore, tume sindonem alabam induita, ad exhortationem dicentis in ignem proslit."—N. Conti, in Poggius de Var. Port, iv.

c. 1520.—"There are in this Kingdom (the Deccan) many heathen, natives of the country, whose custom it is that when they die they are burnt, and their wives along with them; and if these will not do it they kindred. And as it happens oft times that they are unwilling to do it, their Brum kinsfolk persuade them thereto, and this in order that such a fine custom should not be broken and fall into oblivion."—Sommarini de Genti, in Rannario, i. f. 329.

"In this country of Camboja ... when the King dies, the lords voluntarily burn themselves, and so do the King's wives at the same time, and so also do other women on the death of their husbands."—Ibid. f. 336.

1522.—"They told us that in Java Major it was the custom, when one of the chief men died, to burn his body; and then his principal wife, adorned with garlands of flowers, has herself carried in a chair by four men ... comforting her relations, who are afflicted because she is going to burn herself with the corpse of her husband ... saying to them, 'I am going this evening to sup with my dear husband and to sleep with him this night.' ... After again consoling them (she) casts herself into the fire and is burned. If she did not do this she would not be looked upon as an honourable woman, nor as a faithful wife."—Pigafetta, B.T. by Lord Stanley of A., 154.

c. 1686.—Cesare Federici notices the rite as peculiar to the Kingdom of "Beznezerar" (see BISNAGAR): "vidi cose strane e bestiali di quella gentilità; vanno prima-mente abbruscare i corpi morti così d'huomini come di donne nobili; e si l'huomo è maritato, la moglie è obligata ad abbruscare vivando vivo corpo del marito."—Orig. ed. p. 36. This traveller gives a good account of a Suttee.

1583.—"In the interior of Hindustan it is the custom when a husband dies, for his wife willingly and cheerfully to cast herself into the flames (of the funeral pile), although she may not have lived happily with him. Occasionally love of life holds her back, and then her husband's relations assemble, light the pile, and place her upon it, thinking that she should preserve the honour and character of the family. But since the country had come under the rule of his gracious Majesty [Akbar], inspectors had been appointed in every city and district, who were to watch carefully over these two cases, to discriminate between them, and to prevent any woman being forcibly burnt."—Abul Fazl, Akbar Namak, in Elliot, vi. 69.

1583.—"Among other sights I saw one I may note as wonderful. When I landed (at Negapatam) from the vessel, I saw a pit full of kindled charcoal; and at that moment a young and beautiful woman was brought by her people on a litter, with a great company of other women, friends of hers, with great festivity, she holding a mirror in her left hand, and a lemon in her right hand ..."—and so forth.—G. Balbi, f. 82e. 83.

1586.—"The custom of the country (Java) is, that whenever the King doeth die, they take the body so dead and burn it, and preserve the ashes of him, and within five days yeal after; the wines of the said King so dead, according to the custom and use of their country, every one of them goe together to a place appointed, and the chief of the women which was nearest to him in accompt, hath a ball in her hand, and throweth it from her, and the place where the ball resteth, thither they goe all, and turne their faces to the Eastward, and every one with a dagger in their hand (which dagger they call a crise (see CREASE), and is as sharpe as a razar), stab themselves in their owne blood, and fall a-groueling on their faces, and so ende their days."—T. Candish, in Hakt. iv. 338. This passage refers to Blambang at the east end of Java, which till a late date was subject to Bali, in which such practices have continued to our day. It seems probable that the Hindo rite here came in contact with the old Polynesian practices of a race kindred which prevailed e.g. in Fiji, quite recently. The narrative referred to below under 1633, where the victims were the slaves of a deceased queen, points to the latter origin. W. Humbold thus alludes to similar passages in old Javanese literature: "Thus we may reckon as one of the finest episodes in the Brata Yuda, the story how Satya Wati, when she had sought out her slain husband among the dead, surrounded him with the breasts on the battlefield, stabs herself by his side with a dagger."—Kawi-Sprache, i. 89 (and see the whole section, pp. 87-95).

[c. 1590. — "When he (the Rajah of Asham) dies, his principal attendants of both sexes voluntarily bury themselves alive in his grave."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 118.]

1598.—The usual account is given by Linschoten, ch. xxxvi., with a plate; [Hak. Soc. i. 249].

[c. 1610.—See an account in Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 394.]

1611.—"When I was in India, on the death of the Naïque (see NAIK) of Maduré, a country situated between that of Malabar and that of Choromandel, 400 wives of his burned themselves along with him."—Teixeira, i. 9.

1620.—"The author ... when in the territory of the Karnákit ... arrived in company with his father at the city of Southern Mathura (Madura), where, after a few days, the ruler died and went to hell. The chief had 700 wives, and they all threw themselves at the same time into the fire."—Muhammad Sharif Hanoft, in Elliot, vii. 139.

1623.—"When I asked further if force was ever used in these cases, they told me that usually it was not so, but only at times among persons of quality, when some one had left a young and handsome widow, and there was a risk either of her desiring to marry again (which they consider a great scandal) or of a worse mishap,—in such a case the relations of her husband, if they were very strict, would compel her, even against her will, to burn ... a barbarous and cruel law indeed! But in short, as regarded Giaccama, no one exercised either compulsion or persuasion; and she did the thing of her own free choice; both her kindred and herself exulting in it, as in an act magnificent (which in sooth it was) and held in high honour among them. And when I asked about the ornaments and flowers that she wore, they told me this was customary as a sign of the joyousness of the Marí (Marí is what they call a woman who gives herself up to be burnt upon the death of her husband)."—P. della Valle, i. 671; [Hak. Soc. ii. 275, and see ii. 266 seq.]

1633.—"The same day, about noon, the queen's body was burnt without the city, with two and twenty of her female slaves; and we consider ourselves bound to render an exact account of the barbarous ceremonies practised in this place on such occasions as we were witness to. ..."—Narrative of a Dutch Mission to Bali, quoted by Crawford, H. of Ind. Arch., ii. 244-253, from Prevost. It is very interesting, but too long for extract.

1650.—"They say that when a woman becomes a Suttee, that is burns herself with the deceased, the Mahayana parsons all the sins committed by the wife and husband and that they remain a long time in paradise; nay if the husband were in the infernal regions, the wife by this means draws him to thence and takes him to paradise. ... Moreover the Suttee, in a future birth, returns not to the female sex ... but she who becomes not a Sutee, and passes her life in widowhood, is never emancipated from the female state. ... It is however criminal to force a woman into the fire, and equally to prevent her who voluntarily devotes herself."—Dabistán, ii. 75-76.

c. 1650-60.—Tavernier gives a full account of the different manners of Suttee, which he had witnessed often, and in various parts of India, but does not use the word. We extract the following:

1648.—"... there fell of a sudden so violent a Shower, that the Priests, willing to get out of the Rain, thrust the Woman all along into the Fire. But the Shower was so vehement, and endured so long, that the Fire was quench'd, and the Woman was not burn'd. About midnight she arose, and went and knock'd at one of her Kinsmen's Houses, where Father Zenan and many Hollander saw her, looking so gaily and grinning, that it was enough to give scar'd them; however the pain she endur'd did not so far terrifie her, but that three days after, accompany'd by her Kindred, she went and was burn'd according to her first intention."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 84; [ed. Baill. i. 219].

Again:

"In most places upon the Coast of Coromandel, the Women are not burn'd with their decess'd Husbands, but they are buried alive with them in holes, which the Bramins make a foot deeper than the tallness of the man and woman. Usually they choose a Sandy place; so that when the man and woman are both let down together, all the Company with Baskets of Sand fill up the hole above half a foot higher than the surface of the ground, after which they jump and dance upon it, till they believe the woman to be still'd."—Ibid. 171; [ed. Baill. ii. 216].

1667.—Bernier also has several highly interesting pages on this subject, in his "Letter written to M. Chapelan, sent from Chirjas in Persia." We extract a few sentences: "Concerning the Women that have actually burn'd themselves, I have so often been present at such dreadful spectacles, that at length I could endure no more to see it, and I retain still some honour when I think on't. ... The Pile of Wood was presently all on fire, because store of Oyl and Butter had been thrown upon it, and I saw at the time that the Flames that the Fire took hold of the Cloaths of the Woman ... All this I saw, but observ'd not that the Woman was at all disturb'd; yea it was said, that she had been heard to pronounce with great force through two words, Pir, Tera, to signify, according to the Opinion of those who hold the Souls Transmigration, that this was the 5th time she had burn'd herself with the same Husband, and that there remain'd but two times for perfection; as if she had at that time this Remembrance, or some Prophetical Spirit."—E.T. p. 99; [ed. Constable, 306 seq.].
1677.—Suttee, described by A. Bassing, in Valentijn v. (Ceylon) 300.

1713.—“Ce fut cette année de 1710, que mourut le Prince de Marava, âgé de plus de quatre-vingt-ans; ses femmes, en nombre de quarante sept, se brouillèrent avec le corps du Prince.” (details follow).—Père Martin (of the Madura Mission), in Lett. Edif. ed. 1781, tom. xii., pp. 123 seqq.

1727.—“I have seen several burned several Ways...I heard a Story of a Lady that had received Addresses from a Gentleman who afterwards deserted her, and her Relations died shortly after the Marriage...and as the Fire was well kindled...she eapied her former Admirer, and beckned him to come to her. When he came she took him in her Arms, as if she had a Mind to embrace him; but being stronger than he, she carried him into the Fire and burnt him in her Arms, where they were both consumed, with the Corpse of her Husband.”—A. Hamilton, i. 275; [ed. 1744, i. 280].

“The Country about (Calcutta) being overspread with Pagansins, the Custom of Wives burning themselves with their deceased Husbands, is also practised here. Before the Mogul’s War, Mr. Channock went one time with his Ordinary Guard of Soldiers, to see a young Widow act that tragical Catastrophe, but he was so smitten with the Widow’s Beauty, that he sent his Guards to take her by Force from her Executioners, and conducted her to his own Lodgings. They lived lovingly many Years, and had several Children; at length she died, after he had settled in Calcutta, but instead of converting her to Christianity, she made him a Proselyte to Paganism, and the only part of Christianity that was remarkable in him, was burying her decently, and he built a Tomb over her, where all his Life after her Death, he kept the anniversary Day of her Death by sacrificing a Cook on her Tomb, after the Pagan Manner.”—Ibid. [ed. 1744], ii. 6-7. [With this compare the curious lines described as an Epitaph on “Joseph Townsend, Pilot of the Ganges” (5 ser. Notes & Queries, i. 466 seqq.)]

1774.—“Here (in Bali) not only women often kill themselves, or burn with their deceased husbands, but men also burn in honour of their deceased masters.”—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 170.

1778.—“Soon after I and my conductor had quitted the house, we were informed the suttee (for that is the name given to the person who so devotes herself) had passed.”—Sir C. Malet, in Partly. Papers of 1821, p. 1 (“Hindoo Widows”).

“My Father, said he (Pundit Rhadacunta), died at the age of one hundred years, and my mother, who was eighty years old, became a sati, and burnt herself to expiate sins.”—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii. 120.

1792.—“In the course of my endeavours I found the poor suttee had no relations at Poona.”—Letter from Sir C. Malet, in Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 394; [2nd ed. ii. 28, and see i. 178, in which the previous passage is quoted].

1808.—“These proceedings (Hindu marriage ceremonies in Guzerat) take place in the presence of a Brahmin...And farther, now the young woman vows that her affections shall be fixed upon her Lord alone, not only in all this life, but will follow in death, or to the next, that she will die, that she may burn with him, through as many transmigrations as shall secure their joint immortal bliss. Seven successions of suttees (a woman seven times born and burning, thus, as often) secure to the loving couple a seat among the gods.”—R. Drummond.

1809.—“O sight of misery! You cannot hear her cries...their sound In that wild dissonance is drowned...But in her face you see The supplication and the agony...See in her swelling throat the desperate strength That with vain effort struggles yet for life; Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife, Now wildly at full length, Towards the crowd in vain for pity spread, They force her on, they bind her to the dead.”—Kekhma, i. 12.

In all the poem and its copious notes, the word suttee does not occur.

[1815.—“In reference to this mark of strong attachment (of Sati for Siva), a Hindoo widow burning with her husband on the funeral pile is called suttee.”—Ward, Hindoos, 2nd ed. ii. 25.]

1828.—“After having bathed in the river, the widow lighted a brand, walked round the pile, set it on fire, and then mounted cheerfully; the flame caught and blazed up instantly; she sat down, placing the head of the corpse on her lap, and repeated several times the usual form, ‘Ram, Ram, Suttee; Ram, Ram, Suttee.’”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 91-92.

1829.—“Regulation XVII.

“A Regulation for declaring the practice of Suttee, or of burning or burying alive the widows of Hindoos, illegal, and punishable by the Criminal Courts.”—Passed by the G.-G. in C., Dec. 4.

1839.—“Have you yet heard in England of the horrors that took place at the funeral of that wretched old Ranjeet Singh? Four wives, and seven slave-girls were burnt with him; not a word of remonstrance from the British Government.”—Letters from Madras, 278.

1843.—“It is lamentable to think how long after our power was firmly established in Bengal, we, grossly neglecting the first and plainest duty of the civil magistrate, suffered the practices of infanticide and suttee to continue unchecked.”—Macaulay’s: Speech on Gales of Somnauth.
SWALLOW, SWALLOE. 883  SWAMY-HOUSE.

1856.—"The pile of the sutee is unusually large; heavy cart-wheels are placed upon it, to which her limbs are bound, or sometimes a canopy of massive logs is raised above it, to crush her by its fall. . . . It is a fatal omen to hear the sutee's groan; therefore as the fire springs up from the pile, there rises simultaneously with it a deafening shout of 'Victory to Umbâl! Victory to Ranchor!'; and the horn and the hard rattling drum sound their loudest, until the sacrifice is consumed."—Râs Mâlâ, ii. 435; [ed. 1878, p. 691].

[1870.—A case in this year is recorded by Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 665.]

1871.—"Our bridal finery of dress and feast too often proves to be no better than the Hindu woman's 'bravery,' when she comes to perform sutee."—Cornhill Mag. vol. xxiv. 675.

1872.—"La coutume du suicide de la Satti n'en est pas moins fort ancienne, puisque déjà les Grecs d'Alexandrie la trouvèrent en usage chez un peuple au moins du Penjâb. Le premier témoignage brahmanique qu'on en trouve est celui de la Brihaddevatâ qui, peut-être, remonte tout aussi haut. A l'origine elle paraît avoir été propre à l'aristocratie militaire."—Barth, Les Religions de l'Inde, 39.

SWALLOW, SWALLOE, s. The old trade-name of the sea-slug, or tripang (q.v.). It is a corruption of the Bugi (Makassar) name of the creature, swâvâlî (see Crawford's Malay Dict.; [Scott, Malayan Words, 107]).

1783.—"I have been told by several Buggesses that they sail in their Paduakan to the northern parts of New Hol. . . . to gather Swallow (Biche de Mer), which they sell to the annual China junk at Macassar."—Forrest, V. to Mervy, 83.

SWALLY, SWALLY MARINE, SWALLY HOLE, n.p. Swâvâlî, the once familiar name of the roadstead north of the mouth of the Tapti, where ships for Surat usually anchored, and discharged or took in cargo. It was perhaps Ar. savâhâl, 'the shores'? (?). [Others suggest Skt. Svâlvâya, 'abode of Siva.]

[1615.—"The Osianer proving so leaky through the worm through the foulness of the sea-water at Swally."—Foster, Letters, iv. 22. Also see Birdwood, Report on Old Recs. 209.]

1623.—"At the beach there was no kind of vehicle to be found; so the Captain went on foot to a town about a mile distant called Sohali. . . . The Franks have houses there for the goods which they continually despatch for embarkation."—P. della Valle, ii. 503.

1675.—"As also passing by . . . eight ships riding at Surat River's Mouth, we then came to Swally Marine, where were flying the Colours of the Three Nations, English, French, and Dutch . . . who here land and ship off all Goods, without molestation."—Fryer, 82.

1677.—"The 22d of February 1671 from Swally hole the Ship was despatched alone."—Ibid. 217.

1690.—"In a little time we happily arriv'd at Suulabar, and the Tide serving, came to an Anchor very near the Shoal."—Ovington, 163.

1727.—"One Season the English had eight good large Ships riding at Swally . . . the Place where all Goods were unloaded from the Shipping, and all Goods for Exportation were there shipp'd off."—A. Hamilton, i. 106; [ed. 1743].

1841.—"These are sometimes called the inner and the outer sands of Swallow, and are both dry at low water."—Horburgh's India Directory, ed. 1841, i. 474.

SWAMY, SAMMY, s. This word is a corruption of Skt. sudâmin, 'Lord.' It is especially used in S. India, in two senses: (a) a Hindu idol, especially applied to those of Siva or Subrmanyan; especially, as Sammy, in the dialect of the British soldier. This comes from the usual Tamil pronunciation sâmi. (b) The Skt. word is used by Hindus as a term of respectful address, especially to Brahmins.

1755.—"Towards the upper end there is a dark repository, where they keep their Swanme, that is their chief god."—Ives, 70.

1794.—"The gold might for us as well have been worshipped in the shape of a Sawny at Juggernaut."—The Indian Observer, p. 167.

1838.—"The Government lately presented a shawl to a Hindu idol, and the Government officer . . . was ordered to superintend the delivery of it . . . so he went with the shawl in his tonjon, and told the Brahmins that they might come and take it, for that he would not touch it with his fingers to present it to a Swamy."—Letters from Madras, 183.

d.—

1516.—"These people are commonly called Jogues (see JOGEE), and in their own speech they are called Zoame, which means Servant of God."—Barbosa, 99.

1615.—"Tune ad suos conversus: Eia Brachmanes, inquit, quid vobis videtur! Illi mirabandii nihil praeter Suami, Suami, id est Dominge, Domine, retuluntur."—Jarric, Thea., i. 664.

SWAMY-HOUSE, SAMMY-HOUSE, s. An idol-temple, or pagoda. The "Sammy-house" of the Delhi ridge in 1857 will not soon be forgotten.

1760. — "The French cavalry were advancing before their infantry; and it was the intention of Collandi that his own should wait until they came in a line with the flank-fire of the field-pieces of the "Swamy-house." — Orme, iii. 443.

1829. — "Here too was a little detached Swamee-house (or chapel) with a lamp burning before a little idol." — Mem. of Col. Mountain, 99.

1857. — "We met Wilby at the advanced post, the 'Sammy House,' within 600 yards of the Bastion. It was a curious place for three brothers to meet in. The view was charming. Delhi is as green as an emerald just now, and the Jumma Musjid and Palace are beautiful objects though held by infidels." — Letters written during the Siege of Delhi, by Hervey Greated, p. 112.

SWAMY JEWELRY. s. A kind of gold and silver jewelry, made chiefly at Trichinopoly, in European shapes covered with grotesque mythological figures.

1880. — "In the characteristic Swami work of the Madras Presidency the ornamentation consists of figures of the Punic gods in high relief, either beaten out from the surface, or affixed to it, whether by soldering, or wedging, or screwing them on." — Birdwood, Industr. Arts, 152.

SWAMY-PAGODA. s. A coin formerly current at Madras; probably so called from the figure of an idol on it. Milburn gives 100 Swamy Pagodas = 110 Star Pagodas. A "three swami pagoda" was a name given to a gold coin bearing on the obverse the effigy of Chenna Keswam Swami (a title of Krishna) and on the reverse Lakshmi and Rukmini (C.P.B.).

SWATCH. s. This is a marine term which probably has various applications beyond Indian limits. But the only two instances of its application are both Indian, viz., "the Swatch of No Ground," or elliptically "The Swatch," marked in all the charts just off the Ganges Delta, and a space bearing the same name, and probably produced by analogous tidal action, off the Indus Delta. [The word is not to be found in Smyth, Sailor's Word-book.]

1726. — In Valentijn's first map of Bengal, though no name is applied there is a space marked "no ground with 60 raam (fathoms) of line."

1863. — (Ganges). "There is still one other phenomenon. . . . This is the existence of a great depression, or hole, in the middle of the Bay of Bengal, known in the charts as the 'Swatch of No Ground.'" — Ferguson, on "Recent Changes in the Delta of the Ganges, Qy. Jour. Geol. Soc., Aug. 1863.

1877. — (Indus). "This is the famous Swatch of no ground where the lead falls at once into 200 fathoms." — Burton, Sind Revisited, 21.

[SWETT APPLE, s. An Anglo-Indian corruption of sítáphal, 'the fruit of Sítá, the Musk Melon, Fr. Potiron. Cucurbita moschata (see CUSTARD-APPLE).]

SWEET OLEANDER. s. This is in fact the common oleander, Nerium odorum, Ait.

1880. — "Nothing is more charming than, even in the upland valleys of the Mahratta country, to come out of a wood of all outlandish trees and flowers suddenly on the dry winter bed of some mountain stream, grown along the banks, or on the little islets of verdure in mid (shingle) stream, with clumps of mixed tamarisk and lovely blooming oleander." — Birdwood, MS. 9.

SWEET POTATO. s. The root of Batatas edulis, Choisy (Convolvulus Batatas, L.), N.O. Convolvulaceae; a very palatable vegetable, grown in most parts of India. Though extensively cultivated in America, and in the W. Indies, it has been alleged in various books (e.g. in Eng. Cyclop. Nat. Hist. Section, and in Drury's Useful Plants of India), that the plant is a native of the Malay islands. The Eng. Cyc. even states that batatas is the Malay name. But the whole allegation is probably founded in error. The Malay names of the plant, as given by Crawford, are Kalelek, Ubi Java, and Ubi Kastila, the last two names meaning 'Java yam,' and 'Spanish yam,' and indicating the foreign origin of the vegetable. In India, at least in the Bengal Presidency, natives commonly call it shakarkan, P. — Ar., literally 'sugar-candy,' a name equally suggesting that it is not indigenous among them. And in fact when we turn to Oviedo, we find the following distinct statement:

"Batatas are a staple food of the Indians, both in the Island of Spannuola and in the others . . . and a ripe Batata properly dressed is just as good as a marchpane twist of sugar and almonds, and better indeed. . . . When Batatas are well ripened, they are often carried to Spain, i.e., if the voyage be a quiet one; for if there be delay they get spoilt at sea. I myself have carried them from this city of S. Domingo to the city of Avila in Spain, and although they did not arrive as good as they should be, yet they were thought a great deal of, and reckoned a singular and precious kind of fruit."—In Ramusio, iii. f. 134.

It must be observed however that several distinct varieties are cultivated by the Pacific islanders even as far west as New Zealand. And Dr. Bretschneider is satisfied that the plant is described in Chinese books of the 3rd or 4th century, under the name of Kan-chu (the first syllable =‘sweet’). See B. on Chin. Botan. Words, p. 13. This is the only good argument we have seen for Asiatic origin. The whole matter is carefully dealt with by M. Alph. De Candolle (Origine des Plantes cultivées, pp. 43-45), concluding with the judgment: "Les motifs sont beaucoup plus forts, ce me semble, en faveur de l'origine américaine."

The "Sanskrit name" Ruktaloo, alleged by Mr. Piddington, is worthless. Alu is properly an escalent Arum, but in modern use is the name of the common potato, and is sometimes used for the sweet potato. Ruktalū, more commonly rat-alūg, is in Bengal the usual name of the Yam, no doubt given first to a highly-coloured kind, such as Dioscorea purpurea, for rakt-or rat-alū means simply ‘red potato’; a name which might also be well applied to the batatas, as it is indeed, according to Forbes Watson, in the Deccan. There can be little doubt that this vegetable, or fruit as Oviedo calls it, having become known in Europe many years before the batata, the latter robbed it of its name, as has happened in the case of brazil-wood (q.v.). The batata is clearly the ‘potato’ of the fourth and others of the following quotations. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 117 seqq.]

1519.—"At this place (in Brazil) we had refreshment of victuals, like fowls and meat of calves, also a variety of fruits, called batata, pigne (pine-apples), sweet, of singular goodness. . . ."—Pigafetta, E.T. by Lord Stanley of A., p. 43.

1540.—"The root which among the Indians of Spannuola Island is called Batata, the negroes of St. Thomé (C. Verde group) called Ignane, and they plant it as the chief staple of their maintenance; it is of a black colour, i.e. the outer skin is so, but inside it is white, and as big as a large turnip, with many branches; it has the taste of a chestnut, but much better."—Voyage to the I. of San Tomè under the Equinoctial, Ramusio, i. 117v.

c. 1550.—"They have two other sorts of roots, one called batata. . . . They generate windiness, and are commonly cooked in the embers. Some say they taste like almond cakes, or sugared chestnuts; but in my opinion chestnuts, even without sugar, are better."—Girol. Benzonii, Hak. Soc. 86.

1558.—"Wee met with sixteene or seventee sayles of Canoes full of Sauages, who came off to Sea vnto vs, and brought with them in their Boates, Plantans, Cocos, Potato-roots, and fresh fish."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candiake, Purchas, i. 86.

1600. — The Batatas are somewhat redder of colour, and in forme almost like Inam瓜 (see YAM), and taste like Earth-nuts."—In Purchas, ii. 957.

1615.—"I took a garden this day, and planted it with Pottatos brought from the Liquea, a thing not yet planted in Japan. I must pay a boy, or 5 shillings sterling, per annum for the garden."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 11.

1645.—". . . batata; c'est une racine comme naïneux, mais plus longue et de couleur rouge et jaune: cela est de tresbon goust, mais si l'on en mange souvent, elle degoutte fort, et est assez venteuse."—Miquel, Voyages, 83.

1764.—"There let Potatos mantle o'er the ground, Sweet as the cane-juice is the root they bear."—Grainer, Bk. iv.

SYCE, s. Hind. from Ar. sæis. A groom. It is the word in universal use in the Bengal Presidency. In the South horse-keeper is more common, and in Bombay a vernacular form of the latter, viz. ghordawódă (see GORAWALLAH). The Ar. verb, of which sæis is the participle, seems to be a loan-word from Syriac, sawəši, 'to coax.' [1759.—In list of servants' wages: "Syce, Rs. 2."—In Long, 182.]

1779.—"The bearer and scise, when they returned, came to the place where I was, and laid hold of Mr. Ducarell. I took hold of Mr. Sheey and carried him up. The bearer and scise took Mr. Ducarell out. Mr. Keeble was standing on his own house looking, and asked, 'What is the matter!'
The bearer and scise said to Mr. Keeble, ‘These gentlemen came into the house when my master was out.’—Evidence on Trial of Grand v. Francis, in ‘Echoes of Old Calcutta,’ 230.

1810.—‘The Syce, or groom, attends but one horse.’—Williamson, V.M. i. 254.

c. 1858?—

‘Tandis que les cains veillent les chiens rodeurs.’

Lecote de Liéste.

SYCEE, s. In China applied to pure silver bullion in ingots, or shoes (q.v.). The origin of the name is said to be si (pron. at Canton sai and set) = se, i.e. ‘fine silk’; and we are told by Mr. Giles that it is so called because, if pure, it may be drawn out into fine threads. [Linschoten (1598) speaks of: ‘Peeces of cut silver, in which sort they pay and receive all their money’ (Hak. Soc. i. 132).]

1711.—‘Formerly they used to sell for Sisee, or Silver full fine; but of late the Method is alter’d.’—Lockyer, 135.

SYRAS, CYRUS. See under CYRUS.

SYRIAM, n.p. A place on the Pegu R., near its confluence with the Rangoon R., six miles E. of Rangoon, and very famous in the Portuguese dealings with Pegu. The Burmese form is Than-lyeng, but probably the Talaing name was nearer that which foreigners give it. [See Burma Gazetteer, ii. 672. Mr. St John (J. R. As. Soc., 1894, p. 151) suggests the Mwn word sarang or siring, ‘a swinging cradle.’] Syriam was the site of an English factory in the 17th century, of the history of which little is known. See the quotation from Dalrymple below.

1587.—‘To Cirion a Port of Pegu come ships from Mecca with woollen Cloth, Scarlets, Velvets, Opium, and such like.’—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 383.

1600.—‘I went thither with Philip Brito, and in fifteen days arrived at Sirian the chief Port in Pegu. It is a lamentable spectacle to see the bankes of the Rivers set with infinite fruit-bearing trees, now over-whelmed with ruins of gilded Temples, and noble edifices; the ways and fields full of skulls and bones of wretched Peguans, killed or famished, and cast into the River in such numbers that the multitude of carkasses prohibiteth the way and passage of ships.’—The Jesuit Andrew Boves, in Purchas ii. 1748.

c. 1606.—‘Philip de Brito issued an order that a custom-house should be planted at Serian (Serito), at which duties should be paid by all the vessels of this State which went to trade with the kingdom of Pegu, and with the ports of Martavan, Tayav, Tenasserim, and Juncalon. . . . Now certain merchants and shipowners from the Coast of Coromandel refused obedience, and this led Philip de Brito to send a squadron of 6 ships and galliots with an imposing and excellent force of soldiers on board, that they might cruise on the coast of Tenasserim, and compel all the vessels that they met to come and pay duty at the fortress of Serian.’—Bocarro, 135.

1695.—‘4th. That the Old house and Ground at Syrian, formerly belonging to the English Company, may still be continued to them, and that they may have liberty of building dwelling-houses, and warehouses, for the securing their Goods, as shall be necessary, and that more Ground be given them, if what they formerly had been not sufficient.’ Petition presented to the K. of Burma at Ava, by Ed. Fleetwood; in Dalrymple, O.R. ii. 374.

1726.—Zierjang (Syriam) in Valletina, Choro., kc., 127.

1727.—‘About 60 Miles to the Eastward of China Backaar (see CHINA-BUCKER) is the Bar of Syrian, the only port now open for Trade in all the Pegu Dominions. . . . It was many Years in Possession of the Portuguese, till by their Insolence and Pride they were obliged to quit it.’—A. Hamilton, ii. 51-52; [ed. 1744].

SYUD, s. Ar. saiyid, ‘a lord.’ The designation in India of those who claim to be descendants of Mahommed. But the usage of Saiyid and Sharif varies in different parts of Mahommedan Asia. [‘As a rule (much disputed) the Sayyid is a descendant from Mahommed through his grand-child Hasan, and is a man of the pen; whereas the Sharif derives from Husayn and is a man of the sword’ (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 209).]

1404.—‘On this day the Lord played at chess, for a great while, with certain Zaytes; and Zaytes they call certain men who come of the lineage of Mahomad.’—Clavijo, § civv. (Markham, p. 141-2).

1869.—‘11 y a dans l’Inde quatre classes de musulmans : les Saiyids ou descendants de Mahomet par Huçain, les Schakthas ou Arabes, nommés vulgairement Maures, les Pathans ou Afgans, et les Mogols. Ces quatre classes ont chacune tourné à la religion de saints personnages, qui sont souvent designés par ces dénominations, et par d’autres spécialement consacrés à chacune d’elles, telles que Mir pour les Saiyids, Khán pour les Pathans, Mirzā, Beg, Agā, et Khājā pour les Mogols.’—Garcín de Tassy, Religion Mus. dans l’Inde, 22.
TABASHEER. 887

TABASHEER, s. 'Sugar of Bamboo.' A siliceous substance sometimes found in the joints of the bamboo, formerly prized as medicine, [also known in India as Bânslochan or Bânskupâr]. The word is Pers. tabâshir, but that is from the Skt. name of the article, tvakkshira, and tvakkshiro. The substance is often confused, in name at least, by the old Materia Medica writers, with spodîum, and is sometimes called ispodio di cauma. See Ces. Federici below. Garcia De Orta goes at length into this subject (f. 193 seqq.). [See SUGAR.]

c. 1150.—"Tanah (misswritten Bánah) est une jolie ville située sur un grand golfe. . . . Dans les montagnes environnantes croissent le . . . kanae et le . . . tabâshir . . . Quant au têbachir, on le falsifie en le mélangeant avec de la cendre d'ivoire; mais le véritable est celui qu'on extrait des racines du roseau dit . . . al Sharqui."—Édriâ, i. 179.

1563. — "And much less are the roots of the cane tabaxer; so that according to both the translations Avicena is wrong; and Averrois says that it is charcoal from burning the canes of India, whence it appears that he never saw it, since he calls such a white substance charcoal."—Garcia, f. 195v.

c. 1570.—"Il Spodio si congela d'acqua in alcune canne, e io n'ho trovato assai nel Pegg Quando facendo fabricar la mia casa."—Ces. Federici, in Ramazizi, iii. 397.

1578.—"The Spodium or Tabaxir of the Persians . . . was not known to the Greeks."—Acosta, 295.

c. 1580.—"Spodium Tabaxir vocant, quo nomine vulgus pharmacoceporum Spodium factitium, quippe metallicum, intelligunt. At eruditiores viri eo nomine lacrymam quandam, ex caudice arboris procerae in India nascentis, albicantem, odoratam, facultatis refrigeratoriae, et cor maxime roborantis iidem intelligunt."—Prosper Alpinus, Rerum Ægyptiarum, Lib. III. vii.

1598.—". . . these Mambus have a certain Matter with them, which is (as it were) the pith of it, the Indians call it Sugar Mambu, which is as much as to say, as Sugar of Mambu, and is a very deep Medicinal thing much esteemed, and much sought for by the Arabians, Persians, and Moores, that call it Tabaxir."—Lin- schoten, p. 104; [Hak. Soc. ii. 56].

1837. — "Allied to these in a botanical point of view is Saccharum officinarum, which has needlessly been supposed not to have yielded saccharum, or the substance known by this name to the ancients; the same authors conjecturing this to be Tabasheer . . . Considering that this substance is pure silex, it is not likely to have been arranged with the honeys and described under the head of sêkharum meliton."—Royle in the Ant. of Hindoo Medicine, p. 83. This confirms the views expressed in the article SUGAR.

1854.—"In the cavity of these cylinders water is sometimes secreted, or, less commonly, an opaque white substance, becoming opaline when wetted, consisting of a flinty secretion, of which the plant divests itself, called Tabasheer, concerning the optical properties of which Sir David Brewster has made some curious discoveries."—Engl. Cyc. Nat. Hist. Section, article Bamboo.

TABBY. s. Not Anglo-Indian. A kind of watered silk stuff; Sp. and Port. tabi, Ital. tabino, Fr. tabis, from Ar. attâtîbî, the name said to have been given to such stuffs from their being manufactured in early times in a quarter of Baghdad called al-attâbîyâ; and this derived its name from a prince of the Omairiad family called Attâbî. [See Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 371.]

12th cent.—"The 'Attâbîyâ . . . here are made the stuffs, called 'Attâbîyâ, which are silks and cottons of divers colours."—Ibn Jubair, p. 227. [c. 1220.—"Attabî." See under Suc- lat.

TABOOT. s. The name applied in India to a kind of shrine, or model of a Mahommedan mausoleum, of flimsy material, intended to represent the tomb of Husain at Kerbela, which is carried in procession during the Moharram (see Herklots, 2nd ed. 119 seqq., and Garcia de Tassy, Rel. Musulm. dans l'Inde, 36). [The word is Ar. tabût, 'a wooden box, coffin.' The term used in N. India is tâ'tîya (see Tazeeja).]

1856.—"There is generally over the vault in which the corpse is deposited an oblong monument of stone or brick (called 'tar-keebeh') or wood (in which case it is called 'taboot')."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., 5th ed. i. 290.

TACK-RAVAN, s. A litter carried on men's shoulders, used only by royal personages. It is Pers. takht-ravân, 'travelling-throne.' In the Hindi of Behar the word is corrupted into tartarwán.

[c. 1660.—"... several articles of Chinese and Japan workmanship; among which were a pately and a tack-ravan, or travelling throne, of exquisite beauty, and much admired."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 128; in 370, tact-ravan.

[1753.—"Mahommed Shah, emperor of Hindostan, seated in a royal litter (tahkt revan, which signifies a moving throne) issued from his camp..."—Hanway, iv. 169.]

TAEL, s. This is the trade-name of the Chinese ounce, viz., \(\frac{1}{16}\) of a catty (q.v.); and also of the Chinese money of account, often called "the ounce of silver," but in Chinese called liang. The standard liang or tael is, according to Dr. Wells Williams, =579.84 grs. troy. It was formerly equivalent to a string of 1000 tsien, or (according to the trade-name) cash (q.v.). The China tael used to be reckoned as worth 6s. 6d., but the rate really varied with the price of silver. In 1879 an article in the Fortnightly Review puts it at 5s. 7\(\frac{3}{4}\)d. (Sept. p. 362); the exchange at Shanghai in London by telegraphic transfer, April 13, 1885, was 4s. 9\(\frac{1}{2}\)d.; [on Oct. 3, 1901, 2s. 7\(\frac{3}{4}\)d.]. The word was apparently got from the Malays, among whom tail or tael is the name of a weight; and this again, as Crawfurd indicates, is probably from the India tola (q.v.). [Mr. Pringle writes: "Sir H. Yule does not refer to such forms as tahe (see below), taies (plural in Fryer's New Account, p. 210, sub Machau), Taye (see quotation below from Saris), tayes (see quotation below from Mocquet), or tae, and taeyes (Philip's translation of Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 149). These probably come through the medium of the Portuguese, in which the final \(l\) of the singular tael is changed into \(s\) in the plural. Such a form as tais might easily suggest a singular wanting the final \(s\), and from such a singular French and English plurals of the ordinary type would in turn be fashioned" (Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 126).]

The Chinese scale of weight, with their trade-names, runs: 16 taels = 1 catty, 100 catties = 1 pecul = 133\(\frac{1}{2}\) lbs. avoird. Milburn gives the weights of Achin as 4 copangs (see KOPANG) = 1 mace, 5 mace = 1 mayam, 16 mayam = 1 tale (see Tael). 5 tales = 1 buncal, 20 buncals = 1 catty, 200 catties = 1 bahar; and the catty of Achin as = 2 lbs. 1 oz. 13 dr. Of these names, mace, tale and bahar (qq.v.) seem to be of Indian origin, mayam, bangkal, and kati Malay.

1540. — "And those three junkes which were then taken, according to the assertion of those who were aboard, had contained in silver alone 200,000 taels (taeis), which are in our money 300,000 cruzados, besides much else of value with which they were freighted."—Pinto, cap. xxxv.

1598.—"A Tael is a full ounce and a halfe Portingale weight."—Linschoten, 44; [Hak. Soc. i. 149].

TAHSEELDAR, s. The chief (native) revenue officer of a subdivision (tahsil, conf. Per Gunnah, Talook) of a district (see ZILLAH). Hind. from Pers. tahšildar, and that from Ar. taksil, 'collection.' This is a term of the Mahommedan administration which we have adopted. It appears by the quotation from Williamson that the term was formerly employed in Calcutta to designate the cash-keeper in a firm or private establishment, but this use is long obsolete.
TALAING.

[Possibly there was a confusion with talaiddar, a cashier.]

[1772.—"Talaiddar, or Sezwan, an officer employed for a monthly salary to collect the revenues."—Glossary, in Verelst, View of Bengal, s.v.]

1799.—"He (Tipoo) divided his country into 37 Provinces under Dewans (see DEWAUN), and he subdivided these again into 1025 inferior districts, having each a Tisheldar."—Letter of Munro, in Life, i. 215.

1808.—"...he continues to this hour teshildar of the petty pergunnah of Sheapore."—Fifth Report, 583.

1810.—"...the sircar, or tusseelard (cash-keeper) receiving one key, and the master retaining the other."—Williamson, V.M. i. 209.

TAILOR-BIRD, s. This bird is so called from the fact that it is in the habit of drawing together "one leaf or more, generally two leaves, on each side of the nest, and stitches them together with cotton, either woven by itself, or cotton thread picked up; and after putting the thread through the leaf, it makes a knot at the end to fix it" (Jerdon). It is Orthotomos longicauda, Gmelin (sub-fam. Drymoicinæ).

[1813.—"Equally curious in the structure of its nest, and far superior (to the baya) in the variety and elegance of its plumage, is the tailor-bird of Hindostan" (here follows a description of its nest). —Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. i. 38.]

1883.—"Clear and loud above all sounds the to-Whee, to-Whee, to-Whee of the tailor-bird, a most plain-looking little greenish thing, but a skilful workman and a very Beaconsfield in the matter of keeping its own counsel. Aided by its industrious spouse, it will, when the monsoon comes on, spin cotton, or steal thread from the dryrizz, and sew together two broad leaves of the laurel in the pot on your very door-step, and when it has warmly lined the bag so formed it will bring up therein a large family of little tailors."—Tribes on My Frontier, 145.

TAJ, s. Pers. taj, a crown. The most famous and beautiful mausoleum in Asia; the Taj Mahal at Agra, erected by Shah Jahán over the burial-place of his favourite wife Mumtáz-i- Mahal ("Ornament of the Palace") Banû Begam.

1663.—"I shall not stay to discourse of the Monument of Êkbar, because whatever beauty is there, is found in a far higher degree in that of Taj Mahale, which I am now going to describe to you...judge whether I had reason to say that the Mausoleum, or Tomb of Taj MEHALE, is something worthy to be admired. For my part I do not yet well know, whether I am somewhat infected still with Indianisme; but I must needs say, that I believe it ought to be reckoned amongst the Wonders of the World..."—Bernier, E.T. 94-96; [ed. Constable, 293].

1665.—"Of all the Monuments that are to be seen at Agra, that of the Wife of Cha-Johan is the most magnificent; she caus'd it to be set up on purpose near the Taismacan, to which all strangers must come, that they should admire it. The Tasmacan [...] a Place of the Taj [...] is a great Bazar, or Market-place, comprised of six great courts, all encompass'd with Portico's; under which there are Warehouses for Merchants. [...] The monument of this Begum or Sultaness, stands on the East side of the City...I saw the beginning and com pleating of this great work, that cost two and twenty years labour, and 20,000 men always at work."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 50; [ed. Balli, i. 109].

1856.—"But far beyond compare, the glorious Taj, Seen from old Agra's towering battlements, And mirrored clear in Jumna's silent stream; Sun-lighted, like a pearly diadem Set royal on the melancholy brow Of withered Hindostan; but, when the moon Dims the white marble with a softer light, Like some queened maiden, veiled in dainty lace, And waiting for her bridegroom, stately, pale, But yet transcendent in her loveliness," The Banyan Tree.

TALAING, n.p. The name by which the chief race inhabiting Pegu (or the Delta of the Irrawadi) is known to the Burmese. The Talaings were long the rivals of the Burmese, alternatingly conquering and conquered, but the Burmese have, on the whole, so long predominated, even in the Delta, that the use of the Talaing language is now nearly extinct in Pegu proper, though it is still spoken in Martaban, and among the descendants of emigrants into Siamese territory. We have adopted the name from the Burmese to designate the race, but their own name for their people is Môn or Màm (see MONE).

Sir Arthur Phayre has regarded the name Talaing as almost undoubtedly a form of Telinga. The reasons given are plausible, and may be briefly stated in two extracts from his Essay On the History of Pegu (J. As. Soc. Beng., vol. xlii. Pt. i.): "The names given in the histories of Tha-htan and Pegu to the first Kings of those cities are Indian; but they cannot be accepted as historically true. The countries from which the Kings are said to have derived their origin... may be recognised as Karnāta, Kalinga, Venga and Vīzianagaram... probably mistaken for the more famous Vijayanagar... The word Talingāna never occurs in the Pegun histories, but only the more ancient name Kalinga" (op. cit. pp. 32-33). "The early settlement of a colony or city for trade, on the coast of Rāmānya by settlers from Talingāna, satisfactorily accounts for the name Talaing, by which the people of Pegu are known to the Burmese and all peoples of the west. But the Peguans call themselves by a different name... Mun, Mwun, or Mon" (ibid. p. 34).

Prof. Forchhammer, however, who has lately devoted much labour to the study of Talaing archaeology and literature, entirely rejects this view. He states that prior to the time of Alompra's conquest of Pegu (middle of 16th century) the name Talaing was entirely unknown as an appellation of the Muns, and that it nowhere occurs in either inscriptions or older palm-leaves, and that by all nations of Further India the people in question is known by names related to either Mun or Pegu. He goes on: "The word 'Talaing' is the term by which the Muns acknowledged their total defeat, their being vanquished and the slaves of their Burmese conqueror. They were no longer to bear the name of Muns or Peguans. Alompra stigmatized them with an appellation suggestive at once of their submission and disgrace. Talaing means" (in the Mun language) "one who is trodden under foot, a slave."... Alompra could not have devised more effective means to extirpate the national consciousness of a people than by burning their books, forbidding the use of their language, and by substituting a term of abject reproach for the name under which they had maintained themselves for nearly 2000 years in the marine provinces of Burma. The similarity of the two words 'Talaing' and 'Telingana' is purely accidental; and all deductions, historical or etymological... from the resemblance... must necessarily be void ab initio" (Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma, Pt. ii. pp. 11-12, Rangoon, 1884).

Here we leave the question. It is not clear whether Prof. F. gives the story of Alompra as a historical fact, or as a probable explanation founded on the etymology. Till this be clear we cannot say that we are altogether satisfied. But the fact that we have been unable to find any occurrence of Talaing earlier than Symes's narrative is in favour of his view.

Of the relics of Talaing literature almost nothing is known. Much is to be hoped from the studies of Prof. Forchhammer himself.

There are linguistic reasons for connecting the Talaing or Mun people with the so-called Kolarian tribes of the interior of India, but the point is not yet a settled one. [Mr. Baines notes coincidences between the Mon and Munda languages, and accepts the connection of Talaing with Telinga (Census Report, 1891, i. p. 128).]

1795.—"The present King of the Birmans... has abrogated some severe penal laws imposed by his predecessors on the Talien, or native Peguans. Justice is now impartially distributed, and the only distinction at present between a Birman and a Talien, consists in the exclusion of the latter from places of public trust and power."—Symes, 183.

TALAPOIN, s. A word used by the Portuguese, and after them by French and other Continental writers, as well as by some English travellers of the 17th century, to designate the Buddhist monks of Ceylon and the Indo-Chinese countries. The origin of the expression is obscure. Monseigneur Pallegoix, in his Desc. du Royaume Thaï ou Siam (ii. 23) says: "Les Européens les ont appelés tala- poins, probablement du nom de l’éventail qu’ils tiennent à la main, lequel s’appelle talapat, qui signifie feuille de palmier." Childers gives Talapannam, Pali, 'a leaf used in writing, &c.' This at first sight seems to have nothing to support it except similarity of sound; but the quotations from Pinto throw some possible light, and afford probability to this origin, which is also accepted by Koeppen (Rel. des Buddh. i. 331 note), and by Bishop Bigandet (J. Ind. Archip. iv. 220). [Others, derive it from Peguan Talapoin, tala (not tala), 'lord,' 'poir,' 'wealth.'] doubt that it takes its name from Skt. tala, 'the palmyra' (see TALIPOT), it being the original practice for women to wear this leaf dipped in saffron-water (Mad. Gloss, s.v. Logan, Malabar, i. 134).] The Indian word appears to occur first in Abraham Rogerius, but the custom is alluded to by early writers, e.g. Gouvea, Synodo, f. 43v.

1651. — "So the Bridesgroom takes this Tali, and ties it round the neck of his bride."—Rogerius, f. 45v.

1672.—"Among some of the Christians there is another evil custom, that they for the greater tightening and fast-making of the marriage bond, allow the Bridesgroom to tie a Tali or little band round the Bride's neck; although in my time this was as much as possible denounced, seeing that it is a custom derived from Heathenism."—Baldaeus, Zeylon (German), 408.

1674.—"The bridegroom attaches to the neck of the bride a line from which hang three little pieces of gold in honour of the three gods: and this they call Tale; and it is the sign of being a married woman."—Varia y Susa, Asia Port., ii. 707.

1726.—"And on the betrothal day the Tale, or bride's betrothal band, is tied round her neck by the Brahman ... and this she must not untie in her husband's life."—Valentijn, Chor. 51.

[1813.—"... the talii, which is a ribbon with a gold head hanging to it, is held ready; and, being shown to the company, some prayers and blessings are pronounced; after which the bridegroom takes it, and hangs it about the bride's neck."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 312.]

TALIPOT, TARRYAR, s. A watchman (S. India). Tam. talayyari, [from talas, 'head,' a chief watchman].

1680.—"The Peons and Tarryars sent in quest of two soldiers who had deserted ... returned with answer that they could light of them, whereupon the Peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona's intercession they were taken in again and fined each one month's pay, and to repay these they forthcoming them at Battee (see BATTA); also the Pedda Naigu was fined in like manner for his Tarryars."—Fort St. Geo. Consns., Feb. 10. In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1878, No. III. p. 3.

1693.—"Taliars and Peons appointed to watch the Black Town. ..."—In Wheeler, i. 267.

TALIPOT. s. The great-leaved fan-palm of S. India and Ceylon, Corypha umbraculifera, L. The name, from Skt. tala-pattra, Hind. talpat, 'leaf of the tala tree,' properly applies to the leaf of such a tree, or to the smaller leaf of the palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis), used for many purposes, e.g. for slips to write on, to make fans and umbrellas, &c. See OLLAH, PALMYRA, TALAPOIN. Sometimes we find the word used for an umbrella, but this is not common. The quotation from Jordanus, though using no name, refers to this tree. [Arrian says: "These trees were called in Indian speech tala, and there grew on them, as there grows at the tops of the palm-trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool" (Indika, vii.).]

c. 1328.—"In this India are certain trees which have leaves so big that five or six men can very well stand under the shade of one of them."—Fr. Jordanas, 29-30.

c. 1430.—"These leaves are used in this country for writing upon instead of paper, and in rainy weather are carried on the head as a covering, to keep off the wet. Three or four persons travelling together can be covered by one of these leaves stretched out." And again: "There is also a tree called tal, the leaves of which are extremely large, and upon which they write."—N. CONTI, in India in the XV. Cent., 7 and 13.

1672. — "Talpets or sunshades."—Baldaeus, Dutch ed., 102.

1681.—"There are three other trees that must not be omitted. The first is Taliopoi. ..."—Knox, 15.

..."(They the priests) have the honour of carrying the Taliopoi with the broad end over their heads foremost; which none but the King does."—Ibid. 74. [See TALAPOIN.]

1803.—"The taliopoi tree ... affords a prodigious leaf, impenetrable to sun or rain, and large enough to shelter ten men. It is a natural umbrella, and is of as eminent service in that country as a great-coat tree would be in this. A leaf of the taliopoi-tree is a tent to the soldier, a parasol to the traveller, and a book to the scholar."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed. ii. 15.
TALISMAN.

1874.—“... dans les embrasures... s'étaient des bananiers, des talipots...”

-Franz, Souvenirs d'un Couyque, ch. iv.

1881.—“The lofty head of the talipot palm... the proud queen of the tribe in Ceylon, towers above the scrub on every side. Its trunk is perfectly straight and white, like a slender marble column, and often more than 100 feet high. Each of the fans that compose the crown of leaves covers a semi-circle of from 12 to 16 feet radius, a surface of 150 to 200 square feet.”—Haeckel’s Visit to Ceylon, E.T. p. 129.

TALISMAN, s. This word is used by many medieval and post-medieval writers for what we should now call a moollah, or the like, a member of the Mahomedan clergy, so to call them. It is doubtless the corruption of some Ar. term, but of what it is not easy to say. Qu. talâmîza, ‘disciples, students’? [See Burton, Ar. Nights, ix. 165.] On this Prof. Robertson Smith writes: “I have got some fresh light on your Talisman.

“W. Bedwell, the father of English Arabists, in his Catalogue of the Chapters of the Turkish Alkoran, published (1615) along with the Mohammedis Imposturiae, and Arabian Trudyman, has the following, quoted from Postellus de Orbis Concordia, i. 13: ‘Hæc precatio (the fátihâ) illis est communis ut nobis dominica; et ita quibusdam ad battalogiam usque recitatur ut centies idem, aut duo aut tria vocabula repetant dicendo, Al-hamdu lilîlah, hamdu lilîlah, hamdu lilîlah, et cetera ejus vocabula eodem modo. Ídque facit in publicâ oratione Taalima, id est sacrificulus, pro his qui negligenter orant ut aiunt, ut ea repititione suppleat eorum erroribus... Quidam medio in campo tam assiduè, ut defessi considunt; alií circumgirando corpus, etc.

“Here then we have a form without the s, and one which from the vowels seem to be télîma, ‘a very learned man.’ This, owing to the influence of the guttural, would sound in modern pronunciation nearly as Taalima. At the same time télîma is not the name of an office, and prayers on behalf of others can be undertaken by any one who receives a mandate, and is paid for them; so it is very possible that Postellus, who was an Arabic scholar, made the pointing suit his idea of the word meant, and that the real word is talâmi, a shortened form, recognised by Jawhari, and other lexicographers, of talâmîdîh, ‘disciples.’ That students should turn a penny by saying prayers for others is very natural.” This, therefore, confirms our conjecture of the origin.

TÀLOOK, s. This word, Ar. ta’al’uk, from root ‘alak, ‘to hang or depend,' has various shades of meaning in different parts of India. In S. and W. India it is the subdivision of a district, presided over as regards revenue matters by a tahseeldar. In Bengal it is applied to tracts of proprietary land, sometimes not easily distinguished from Zemindaries, and sometimes subordinate to or dependent on Zemindars. In the N.W. Prov. and Oudh the ta’al’uk is an estate the profits of which are divided between different proprietors, one being supe-

TAMARIND, s. The pod of the tree which takes its name from that product, Tamarindus indica, L., N.O. Leguminosae. It is a tree cultivated throughout India and Burma for the sake of the acid pulp of the pod, which is laxative and cooling, forming a most refreshing drink in fever. The tree is not believed by Dr. Brandis to be indigenous in India, but is supposed to be so in tropical Africa. The origin of the name is curious. It is Ar. tamar-ul-Hind, 'date of India,' or perhaps rather in Persian form, tamar-ul-Hindi. It is possible that the original name may have been thammar, 'fruit' of India, rather than tamar, 'date.'

I have made many inquiries as to Tamarind fish, and found that the white pomfret, where it is taken, appears to be the best for making the preparation."

TAMBERANEE, s. Malayål, tamburān, 'Lord; God, or King.' It is a title of honour among the Nairs, and is also assumed by Saiva monks in the Tamil countries. [The word is derived from Mal. tamar, 'one's own,' purdn, 'lord.' The junior male members of the Malayāli Rāja's family, until they come of age, are called Tambēn, and after that Tamburān. The female members are similarly styled Tambattti and Tamburatti (Logan, Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.).]

1510.—"Dice l'altro Tamarai: zoe Per Dio! L'altro respōde Tamarani: zoe Per Dio."—Varthema, ed. 1517, f. 43.

1610.—"They (the Nairs) call the King in their language Tambiraine, meaning 'God.'—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 357."

TANA, TANNA, n.p. Thāna, a town on the Island of Saisette on the strait ('River of Tana') dividing that island from the mainland and 20 m. N.E. of Bombay, and in the early Middle Ages the seat of a Hindu kingdom of the Konkan (see CONCAN), as well as a seaport of importance. It is still a small port, and is the chief town of the District which bears its name.

c. 1020.—"From Dhar southwards to the river Nerbudda, nine; thence to Mahat-des . . . eighteen; thence to Konkan, of which the capital is Tana, on the seashore, twenty-five parasangs."—Al-Birānī, in Elliot, i. 60. [c. 1150.—"Tanah," miswritten Banah. See under TABASHEER.]

1298.—"Tana is a great Kingdom lying towards the West. . . There is much traffic here, and many ships and merchants frequent the place."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 27.

1321.—"After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday in Thana of India, I baptised about 90 persons in a certain city called Parocco, ten days' journey distant therefrom, and I have since baptised more than twenty, besides thirty-five who were baptised between Thana and Supara (Supara)."

—Letter of Friar Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

c. 1523.—"And having thus embarked I passed over in 28 days to Tana, where for the faith of Christ four of our Minor Friars had suffered martyrdom . . . The land is under the dominion of the Saraceney. . . . "—Fr. Odoric, Ibid. i. 57-58.

TAMAIRD-FISH, s. This is an excellent zest, consisting, according to Dr. Balfour, of white pomfret, cut in transverse slices, and preserved in tamarinds. The following is a note kindly given by the highest authority on Indian fish matters, Dr. Francis Day:

"My account of Tamarind fish is very short, and in my Fishes of Malabar as follows:

"'The best Tamarind fish is prepared from the Seer fish (see SEEER-FISH), and from the Lates calcarifer, known as Cockup in Calcutta; and a rather inferior quality from the Polyemons (or Roe-ball, to which genus the Mango-fish belongs), and the more common from any kind of fish.' The above refers to Malabar, and more especially to Cochín. Since I wrote my Fishes of Malabar 1516.—"25 leagues further on the coast is a fortress of the before-named king, called Tana-Mayambu" (this is perhaps rather Bombay).—Barboza, 93.

1529.—"And because the norwest winds blew strong, winds contrary to his course after going a little way he turned and anchored in sight of the island, where were stationed the foists with their captain-in-chief Alixa, who seeing our fleet in motion put on his ears and assembled at the River of Tana, and when the wind came round our fleet made sail, and anchored at the mouth of the River of Tana, for the wind would not allow of its entering."—Correa, ii. 290.

1673.—"The Chief City of this Island is called Tanaw; in which are Seven Churches and Colleges, the chiefest one of the Paulistins (see PAULIST). . . . Here are made good Stuff s of Silk and Cotton."—Fryer, 73.

TANA, THANA, s. A Police station. Hind. thaná, thanád, [Skt. sthána, 'a place of standing, a post']. From the quotation following it would seem that the term originally meant a fortified post, with its garrison, for the military occupation of the country; a meaning however closely allied to the present use.

C. 1640-50.—"Thána means a corps of cavalry, matchblockmen, and archers, stationed within an enclosure. Their duty is to guard the roads, to hold the places surrounding the Thánah, and to despatch provisions (nasad, see RUSSUD) to the next Thánah."—Padisháh námah, quoted by Blochmann, in ATV, i. 345.

TANADAR, THANADAR, s. The chief of a police station (see TANA), Hind. thanádár. This word was adopted in a more military sense at an early date by the Portuguese, and is still in habitual use with us in the civil sense.

1516.—In a letter of 4th Feb. 1515 (i.e. 1516), the King Don Manoel constitutes João Machado to be Tanadar and captain of land forces in Goa.—Arch. Port. Orient. Fase. 5, 1-3.

1519.—"Senhor Duarte Pereira; this is the manner in which you will exercise your office of Tanadar of this Isle of Tycoari (i.e. Goa), which the Senhor Capitão will now charge you with."—Ibid. p. 35.

C. 1548.—"In Ayacu is a great mosque (miyáyuta), which is occupied by the tenadars, but which belongs to His Highness; and certain petayas, (yards?) in which bate (paddy) is collected, which also belong to His Highness."—Tombo in Subsidios, 216.

1602.—"So all the force went aboard of the light boats, and the Governor in his bastard-galley entered the river with a grand clangour of music, and when he was in mid-channel there came to his galley a boat, in which was the Tanadar of the City (Dabul), and going aboard the galley presented himself to the Governor with much humility, and begged pardon of his offences. . . ."—Couto, IV. i. 9.

[1813.—"The third in succession was a Tándar, or petty officer of a district. . . ."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 5.]

TANGA. s. Mahr. tánk, Turki tanga. A denomination of coin which has been in use over a vast extent of territory, and has varied greatly in application. It is now chiefly used in Turkestan, where it is applied to a silver coin worth about 71/6d. And Mr. W. Erskine has stated that the word tanga or tanka is of Chagatai Turki origin, being derived from tang, which in that language means 'white' (H. of Baber and Humayun, i. 546).

Though one must hesitate in differing from one usually so accurate, we must do so here. He refers to Josafa Barbaru, who says this, viz. that certain silver coins are called by the Minergians tetari, by the Greeks aspri, by the Turks akcha, and by the Zaga-tais tengh, all of which words in the respective languages signify 'white.' We do not however find such a word in the dictionaries of either Vambéry or of Pavet de Courteille;—the latter only having tangah, 'fer-blanc.' And the obvious derivation is the Skt. tanka, 'a weight (of silver) equal to 4 māshas . . . a stamped coin.' The word in the forms tāka (see TUCKA) and tanga (for these are apparently identical in origin) is, "in all dialects, laxly used for money in general" (Wilson).

In the Lahore coinage of Mahmūd of Ghaznī, a.h. 418-419 (a.d. 1027-28), we find on the Skt. legend of the reverse the word tanka in correspondence with the ādirham of the Arabverse (see Thomas, Pathan Kings, p. 49). Tanka or Tanga seems to have continued to be the popular name of the chief silver coin of the Delhi sovereigns during the 13th and first part of the 14th centuries, a coin which was substantially the same with the rupee (q.v.) of later days. In fact this application of the word in the form tāka (see TUCKA) is usual in Bengal down to our own day. Ibn Batuta indeed, who was in India in the time of Mahommed Tughlak, 1333—1343 or thereabouts, always calls the gold coin then current a tanka or dinár of gold. It was, as he repeatedly states, the equivalent of 10 silver dinârs. These silver dinârs (or rupees) are called by the author of the Masâlik-al-Abstr (c. 1340) the "silver tankâ of India." The gold and silver tankâ continue to be mentioned repeatedly in the history of Perâz Shâh, the son of Mahommed (1351-1388), and apparently with the same value as before. At a later period under Sikandar Buhlool (1488-1517), we find black (or copper) tankas, of which 20 went to the old silver tankâ.

We cannot say when the coin, or its name rather, first appeared in Turkestan.

But the name was also prevalent on the western coast of India as that of a low denomination of coin, as may be seen in the quotations from Linshoten and Grose. Indeed the name still survives in Goa as that of a copper coin equivalent to 60 reis or about 2d. And in the 16th century also 60 reis appears from the papers of Gerson da Cunha to have been the equivalent of the silver tankâ of Goa and Bassein, though all the equations that he gives suggest that the rei may have been more valuable then.

The denomination is also found in Russia under the form dengi. See a quotation under COPECCK, and compare PARDÃO.

c. 1335.—"According to what I have heard from the Shaikh Mubarak, the red lak (see LACK) contains 100,000 gold tankâs, and the white lak 100,000 (silver) tankâs. The golden tankâ, called in this country the red tankâ, is equivalent to three mithâls, and the silver tankâ is equivalent to 8 haathkâns dirhams, this dirham being of the same weight as the silver dirham current in Egypt and Syria."—Masâlik-al-Abstr, in Not. et Ets. xiii. 211.

c. 1340.—"Then I returned home after sunset and found the money at my house. There were 3 bags containing in all 6293 tankâs, i.e. the equivalent of the 55,000 dinârs (of silver) which was the amount of my debts, and of the 12,000 which the sultan had previously ordered to be paid me, after of course deducting the tenth part according to Indian custom. The value of the piece called tankâ is 2½ dinârs in gold of Barbary."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 426. (Here the gold tanka is spoken of.)

c. 1370.—"Sultán Firoz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tankâ, and the silver tanka," &c.—Târikh-i-Firoz Shâh, in Elliot, iii. 387.

1404.—"... yna sua moneda de plata que llaman Tangaes."—Clavijo, f. 46b.
1516.—"... a round coin like ours, and with Moorish letters on both sides, and about the size of a fiton (see PANAM) of Calicut, ... and its worth 55 maravedis; they call these tanga, and they are of very fine silver."—Barbosa, 45.

TANK, TANYAN. 898

TANK.

TANK, s. A reservoir, an artificial pond or lake, made either by excavation or by damming. This is one of those perplexing words which seem to have a double origin, in this case one Indian, the other European.

As regards what appears to be the Indian word, Shakespeare gives: "Tânk'h (in Guzerat), an underground reservoir for water." [And so Platts.] Wilson gives: "Tânken or tâken, Mahr. ... Tânkh (said to be Guzer-áthi)." A reservoir of water, an artificial pond, commonly known to Europeans in India as a Tank. Tânnî, Guz. A reservoir of water; a small well." R. Drummond, in his Illustrations of Guzerattee, &c., gives: "Tanka (Mah.) and Tankoo (Guz.) Reservoirs, constructed of stone or brick or lime, of larger and lesser size, generally inside houses. ... They are almost entirely covered at top, having but a small aperture to let a pot or bucket down." ... "In the towns of Bikaner," says Tod, "most families have large cisterns or reservoirs called Tankas, filled by the rains" (Rajputana, ii. 202). Again, speaking of towns in the desert of Mârwar, he says; "they collect the rain water in [1816.—"The Tanjore Pill, it is said, is made use of with great success in India against the bite of mad dogs, and that of the most venomous serpents." — Asiatic Journal, ii. 381.]

TANGUN, TANYAN, s. Hind. tânghan, tângan; apparently from Tibetan r'Tanâñ, the vernacular name of this kind of horse (r'Ta, 'horse'). The strong little pony of Bhûtân and Tibet.

c. 1590.—"In the confines of Bengal, near Kuch [Bahár], another kind of horses occurs, which rank between the gât (see GOONT) and Turkish horses, and are called Tânghan: they are strong and powerful."—Asia, i. 183.

1774.—"That for the possession of the Chittranâta Prattee, the Deb Râja shall pay an annual tribute of five Tângan Horses to the Honorable Company, which was the acknowledgment paid to the Deb Râja."—Treaty of Peace between the H.E.I. and the Rajah of Boottan, in Aitchison's Treaties, i. 144.

"We were provided with two Tângun ponies of a mean appearance, and were prejudiced against them unjustly. On better acquaintance they turned out patient, sure-footed, and could climb the Monument."—Bogle's Narrative, in Markham, 17.

1768.—"... had purchased 35 Jhâwh or young elephants, of 8 or 9 years old, 60 Tânkun, or ponies of Manilla and Fugu."—H. of Hydvr Nâth, 383.

"... small horses brought from the mountains on the eastern side of Bengal. These horses are called Tânyans, and are mostly pyebald."—Hodges, Travels, 31.

1782.—"To be sold, a Phaeton, in good condition, with a pair of young Tanyan Horses, well broke."—India Gazette, Oct. 26.

1793.—"As to the Tânguns or Tânyans, so much esteemed in India for their hardiness, they come entirely from the Upper Tibet, and notwithstanding their make, are so sure footed that the people of Nepal ride them without fear over very steep mountains, and along the brink of the deepest precipices."—Kirkpatrick's Nepaul, 135.

1854.—"These animals, called Tanghan, are wonderfully strong and enduring; they are never shod, and the hoof often cracks. ... The Tibetans give the foals of value messes of pig's blood and raw liver, which they devour greedily, and it is said to strengthen them wonderfully; the custom is, I believe, general in Central Asia."—Hooker, Himalayan Journals, 1st ed. ii. 131.
reservoirs called Tanka, which they are obliged to use sparingly, as it is said to produce night blindness” (ii. 300). Again, Dr. Spilsbury (J.A.S.B. ix. pt. 2, 891), describing a journey in the Neruddha Basin, cites the word, and notes; “I first heard this word used by a native in the Betio district; on asking him if at the top of Bowergurth there was any spring, he said No, but there was a Tanka or place made of pukka (stone and cement) for holding water.” Once more, in an Appendix to the Report of the Survey of India for 1881-1882, Mr. G. A. MacGill, speaking of the rain cisterns in the driest part of Rajputana, says: “These cisterns or wells are called by the people tůnkás” (App. p. 12). See also quotation below from a Report by Major Strahan. It is not easy to doubt the genuineness of the word, which may possibly be from Skt. tātāga, tātā, tātāka, ‘a pond, pool, or tank.’

Fr. Paolinó, on the other hand, says the word tanque used by the Portuguese in India was Portoghese corrotta, which is vague. But in fact tanque is a word which appears in all Portuguese dictionaries, and which is used by authors so early after the opening of communication with India (we do not know if there is an instance actually earlier) that we can hardly conceive it to have been borrowed from an Indian language, nor indeed could it have been borrowed from Guzerat and Rajputána, to which the quotations above ascribe the vernacular word. This Portuguese word best suits, and accounts for that application of tank to large sheets of water which is habitual in India. The indigenous Guzeratí and Mahráti word seems to belong rather to what we now call a tank in England; i.e. a small reservoir for a house or ship. Indeed the Port. tanque is no doubt a form of the Lat. stagnum, which gives It. stagno, Fr. old estang and esun, mod. étang, Sp. estanque, a word which we have also in old English and in Lowland Scotch, thus:

1589.—“They had in them stangés or pondes of water full of fish of sundrie sortes.”—Parkes’s Mendoza, Hak. Soc. ii. 46.

c. 1785.—

“I never drank the Muses’ stank, Castalia’s burn and a’ that;
But there it streams, and richly reams,
My Helicon I ca’ that.”—Burns.

It will be seen that Pyrard de Laval uses estang, as if specifically, for the tank of India.

1498.—“And many other saints were there painted on the walls of the church, and these wore diadems, and their por- traiture was in a divers kind, for their tears were so great that they stood an inch beyond the mouth, and every saint had 4 or 5 arms, and below the church stood a great tanque wrought in cut stone like many others that we had seen by the way.”

—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 57.

“Some the Captain Major ordered Nicolas Coelho to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was, and he found in the said island (Anchedíva) a building, a church of great ashlar work which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones which stood in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found just beyond the church a tanque of wrought ashlar in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanque of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship Berrie.”

—Ibid. 95.

1510.—“Early in the morning these Pagans go to wash at a tank, which tank is a pond of still water (ad uno Tancho il qual Tancho è una fusa d’acqua morta).”

—Varthena, 149.

“Near to Calicutt there is a temple in the midst of a tank, that is, in the middle of a pond of water.”—Ibid. 175.

1553.—“In this place where the King (Bahdúr Sháh) established his line of battle, on one side there was a great river, and on the other a tank (tanque) of water, such as they are used to make in those parts. For as there are few streams to collect the winter’s waters, they make these tanks (which might be more properly called lakes), all lined with stone. They are so big that many are more than a league in compass.”

—Barros, IV, vi. 5.

c. 1610.—“Son logis estoit esloigné près d’yne lieue du palais Royal, situé sur vn estang, et basty de pierres, ayant bien demy lieué de tour, comme rous les autres estangs.”—Pyrard de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 262; [Hak. Soc. i. 367].

[1615.—“I rode early... to the tanke to take the ayre.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 78.]

1616.—“Besides their Rivers... they have many Ponds, which they call Tankes.”

—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1638.—“A very faire Tanke, which is a square pit paved with gray marble.”—W. Bruton, in Hakl. v. 60.

1643.—“... a standing water or Tanek.

...”—Van Twisit, Gen. Beachr. 11.

1672.—“Outside and round about Suratte, there are elegant and delightful houses for recreation, and stately cemeteries in the usual fashion of the Moors, and also divers Tanks and reservoirs built of hard and solid stone.”—Baldewes, p. 12.

1673.—“Within a square Court, to which a stately Gate-house makes a Passage, in the middle whereof a Tank vaulted. . . .” —Fryer, 27.

1754.—“The post in which the party intended to halt had formerly been one of those reservoirs of water called tanks, which occur so frequently in the arid plains of this country.”—Orme, i. 354.

1799.—“One crop under a tank in Mysore or the Carnatic yields more than three here.” —T. Munro, in Life, i. 241.

1809.—

“Water so cool and clear, The peasants drink not from the humble well.

Nor tanks of costliest masonry dispense To those in towns who dwell, The work of kings in their beneficence.”

Kehama, xii. 6.

1883.—“. . . all through sheets* 124, 125, 126, and 131, the only drinking water is from ‘tanks,’ or from ‘todas.’ The former are circular pits puddled with clay, and covered in with wattle and daub domes, in the top of which are small trap doors, which are kept locked; in these the villages store rain-water; the latter are small and somewhat deep ponds dug in the valleys where the soil is clayey, and are filled by the rain; these latter of course do not last long, and then the inhabitants are entirely dependent on their tanks, whilst their cattle migrate to places where the well-water is fit for use.”—Report on Cent. Ind. and Rajputana Topogr. Survey (Bickaneer and Jeysalmir). By Major C. Strachan, R.E., in Report of the Survey in India, 1882-83, App. p. 4. [The writer in the Rajputana Gazeteer (Bikanir) (i. 152) calls these covered pits kwad, and the simple excavations sârv.]

TANOR, n.p. An ancient town and port about 22 miles south of Calicut. There is a considerable probability that it was the Tyndis of the Periplus. It was a small kingdom at the arrival of the Portuguese, in partial subjection to the Zamorin. [The name is Malayal. Tânrî, tanni, the tree Terminalis blerica, sârv, village.]

1516.—“Further on . . . are two places of Moors 5 leagues from one another. One is called Paravanor, and the other Tanor, and inland from those towns is a lord to whom they belong; and he has many Nairs, and sometimes he rebels against the King of Calicut. In these towns there is much shipping and trade, for these Moors are great merchants.”—Barrosa, Hak. Soc. 153.

1521.—“Cotate was a great man among the Moors, very rich, and lord of Tanor, who carried on a great sea-trade with many ships, which trafficked all about the coast of India with passes from our Governors, for he only dealt in wares of the country; and thus he was the greatest possible friend of the Portuguese, and those who went to his dwelling were entertained with the greatest honour, as if they had been his brothers. In fact for this purpose he kept houses fitted up, and both cots and bedsteads furnished in our fashion, with tables and chairs and casks of wine, with which he regaled our people, giving them entertainments and banquets, insomuch that it seemed as if he were going to become a Christian . . . .” —Correa, ii. 675.

1528.—“And in the year (a.H.) 935, a ship belonging to the Franks was wrecked off Tanor. . . . Now the Ray of that place affording succour to the crew, the Zamorin sent a messenger to him demanding of him the surrender of the Franks who composed it, together with such parts of the cargo of the ship as had been saved, but that chieftenant having refused compliance with this demand, a treaty of peace was entered into with the Franks by him; and from this time the subjects of the Ray of Tanor traded under the protection of the passes of the Franks.”—Tohfa-ul-Mujahidain, B.T. 124-125.

1553.—“For Lopo Soares having arrived at Cochin after his victory over the Zamorin, two days later the King of Tanor, the latter’s vassal, sent (to Lopo) to complain against the Zamorin by ambassadors, begging for peace and help against him, having fallen out with him for reasons that touched the service of the King of Portugal.”—Barros, i. vii. 10.

1727.—“Four leagues more southerly is Tannore, a Town of small Trade, inhabited by Mahometans.”—A. Hamilton, i. 322; [ed. 1744].

TAPPAUL, s. The word used in S. India for ‘post,’ in all the senses in which dawk (q.v.) is used in Northern India. Its origin is obscure. C. P. Brown suggests connection with the Fr. étape (which is the same originally as the Eng. staple). It is sometimes found in the end of the 18th century written toppa or tappy. But this seems to have been derived from Telugu clerks, who sometimes write toppâ as a singular of toppâlu, taking the latter for a plural (C.P.B.). Wilson appears to give the word a southern origin. But though its use is confined to the South and West, Mr. Beames assigns to it an Aryan origin: “toppa ‘post-office,’ i.e. place where the letters are stamped, tappal 'letter-post' (tappal + alja = 'stamping-house'), connecting it radically with tapa 'a coop; tapna 'to tap; flatten; beat down; tapak 'a sledge hammer; tipna 'to press,' &c. [with which Platt's agrees.]

1799.—'You will perceive that we have but a small chance of establishing the tappal to Poonah.'—Wellington, i. 50.

1800.—'The Tappal does not go 50 miles a day.'—T. Munro, in Life, i. 214.

1809.—'Requiring only two sets of bearers I knew I might go by tappaul the whole way to Seringapatam.'—Ed. Valentina, i. 355.

TAPTEE R., n.p. Tāpil; also called Tapī, [Skt. Tapī, 'that which is hot']. The river that runs by the city of Surat.

[1538.—'Tapī.' See under GODAVERY.]

c. 1690.—'Surat is . . . watered with a sweet River named Tappee (or Tindo), as broad as the Thames at Windsor.'—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1688, p. 36.

1813.—'The sacred groves of Pulparra are the general resort for all the Yogeess (Joge), Senasseses (Sunyasee), and Hindoo pilgrims . . . the whole district is holy, and the Tappee in that part has more than common sanctity.'—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 286; [2nd ed. i. 184, and compare i. 176].

'Tappee or Tappy.'—Ibid. 244;

[2nd ed. i. 146].

TARA, TARE, s. The name of a small silver coin current in S. India at the time of the arrival of the Portuguese. It seems to have survived longest in Calicut. The origin we have not traced. It is curious that the commonest silver coin in Sicily down to 1860, and worth about 4½d., was a tari, generally considered to be a corruption of dīrhem. I see Sir Walter Elliot has mooted this very question in his Coins of S. India (p. 138). [The word is certainly Malayāl. tāram, defined in the Madras Gloss. as 'a copper coin, value 1½ pies.' Mr. Gray in his note to the passage from Pyrard de Laval quoted below, suggests that it took its name from tāra, 'a star.'] 1412.—'They cast (at Vijayanagar), in pure silver a coin which is the sixth of the fanam, which they call tar.'—Abdurrazzk, in India in the XV. Cent. 26.

1506.—(The Viceroy, D. Francisco D'Almeida, wintering his fleet in Cochin. 'As the people were numerous they made quite a big town with a number of houses covered with upper stories of timber, and streets also where the people of the country set up their stalls in which they sold plenty of victuals, and cheap. Thus for a vinten of silver you got in change 20 silver coins that they called taras, something like the scale of a sardine, and for such coin they gave you 12 or 15 figs, or 4 or 5 eggs, and for a single vinten 3 or 4 fowls, and for one tara fish enough to fill two men's bellies, or rice enough for a day's victuals, dinner and supper too. Bread there was none, for there was no wheat except in the territory of the Moors.'—Correa, i. 624.

1510.—The King of Narsinga (or Vija-yanagar) "coins a silver money called tare, and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small ones of silver, there go 16 to a fanom."—Varthema, 150.

[i. 1610.—'Each man receives four tarents, which are small silver coins, each of the value of one-sixteenth of a larin.'—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 344. Later on (i. 412) he says '16 tarens go to a Phanan'].

1673.—(at Calicut). 'Their coin admits no Copper; Silver Tarre, 28 of which make a Fanam, passing instead thereof.'—Fryer, 55.

'Calicut.'

'Tarens are the peculiar Coin, the rest are common to India.'—Ibid. 207.

1727.—'Calicut . . . coins are 10. Tar to a Fanam, 4½ Panamas to a Ruppee.'—A. Hamilton, ii. 318; [ed. 1744].

1737.—'We are to allow each man 4 measures of rice and 1 tar per diem.'—Agreement in Logan, Malabar, iii. 95, and see "tarrs" in iii. 192. Mr. Logan (vol. iii. Gloss. s.v.) defines the tara as equal to 2 pies.

TARE AND TRET. Whence comes this odd firm in the books of arithmetic? Both partners apparently through Italy. The first Fr. tare, It. tara, from Ar. taraha, 'to reject,' as pointed out by Dozy. Tret is alleged to be from It. tritare, 'to crumble or grind,' perhaps rather from trito, 'ground or triturated.' [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) derives it from Fr. traité, 'a draught,' and that from Lat. tractus, trahere, 'to draw.']

TAREGA, s. This represents a word for a broker (or person analogous to the hong merchants of Canton in former days) in Pegu, in the days of its prosperity. The word is from S. India. We have in Tel. taraga, 'the occupation of a broker'; Tam. taragari, 'a broker.'

1568.—'Sono in Peguotto sensari del Re che si chiamano Tarege li quali sono obligati di far vendere tutte le mercantie... per il prezzo corrente."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 395.

1583.—"... e so fosse alcuno che a tempo del pagamento per non pagare si absentasse dalla città, o si ascondesse, il Tarreca è obligato pagar per lui... I Tarreche così si demandano i sensari."—G. Balbi, t. 107 v., 108.

1587.—"There are in Pegu eight Brokers, whom they call Tarreche, which are bound to sell your goods at the price they be Worth, and you give them for their labour two in the hundred: and they be bound to make your debt good, because you sell your marchandises vpon their word."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 393.

TARIFF, s. This comes from Ar. *tārīf, tārīfā, 'the making known.' Dozy states that it appears to be comparatively modern in Spanish and Port., and has come into Europe apparently through Italian.

[1591.—"So that helping your memorie with certain Tablei or Tarifas made of purpose to know the numbers of the soldiers that are to enter into ranke."—Garrard, Art Warre, p. 224 (Stanf. Dict.).

[1617.—"... a brief Taregh of Persia."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 462.]

TAROUK, TAROUP, n.p. Burm. Tarûk, Tarûp. This is the name given by the Burmese to the Chinese. Thus a point a little above the Delta of the Irawadi, where the invading army of Kublai Khan (c. 1285) is said to have turned back, is called Tarûk-mau, or Chinese Point. But the use of this name, according to Sir A. Phayre, dates only from the Middle Ages, and the invasion just mentioned. Before that the Chinese, as we understand him, are properly termed Tsôn; though the coupled names Tarûk and Taret, which are applied in the chronicles to early invaders, "may be considered as designations incorrectly applied by later copyists." And Sir A. Phayre thinks Tarûk is a form of Tûrk, whilst Taret is now applied to the Manchus. It seems to us probable that Tarûk and Taret are probably meant for 'Turk and Tartar' (see H. of Burm., pp. 8, 11, 56). [Mr. Scott (Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 193) suggests a connection with the Teru or Tero State, which developed about the 11th century, the race having been expelled from China in 778 a.d.]

TASHREEF, s. This is the Ar. tashrif, 'honouring'; and thus "con-ferring honour upon anyone, as by paying him a visit, presenting a dress of honour, or any complimentary donation" (Wilson). In Northern India the general use of the word is as one of ceremonial politeness in speaking of a visit from a superior or from one who is treated in politeness as a superior; when such an one is invited to 'bring his tashrif,' i.e. 'to carry the honour of his presence,' 'to condescend to visit.'—The word always implies superiority on the part of him to whom tashrif is attributed. It is constantly used by polite natives in addressing Europeans. But when the European in return says (as we have heard said, through ignorance of the real meaning of the phrase), 'I will bring my tashrif,' the effect is ludicrous in the extreme, though no native will betray his amusement. In S. India the word seems to be used for the dress of honour conferred, and in the old Madras records, rightly or wrongly, for any complimentary present, in fact a honorarium. Thus in Wheeler we find the following:

1674.—"He (Lingapa, naik of Poona-malee) had, he said, carried a tasheriff to the English, and they had refused to take it. . . ."

1680.—"It being necessary to appoint one as the Company's Chief Merchant (Verona being deceased), resolved Bern Pedda Vincatadry, do succeed and the Tasherriffs be given to him and the rest of the principal Merchants, viz., 3 yards Scarlet to Pedda Vincatadry, and 2½ yards each to four others. . . ."

"The Governor being informed that Verona's young daughter was melancholy and would not eat because her husband had received no Tasheriff, he also is Tasheriff with 2½ yards Scarlet cloth."—Fort St. Geo. Consns., April 6. In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1873, p. 15.

1685.—"Gopall Pundit having been at great charge in coming hither with such a numerous retinue . . . that we may engage him . . . to continue his friendship, to attain some more and better privileges there (at Cuddalore) than we have as yet—It is ordered that he with his attendants be Tasheriff as followeth" (a list of presents follows).—In Wheeler, i. 148. [And see the same phrase in Pringle, Diary, &c., i. 11.]

TATTOO, and abbreviated, TAT, s. A native-bred pony. Hind. *taṭā, [which Platts connects with Skt. tāra, 'passing over'].

c. 1324.—"Tughlak sent his son Mahommed to bring Khurra back. Mahommed seized the latter and brought him to his father mounted on a tatt, i.e. a pack-horse."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 207.

1784.—"On their arrival at the Choutiya they found a miserable dooley and 15 tattoo horses."—In Seton-Kerr, i. 15.

1785.—"We also direct that strict injunctions be given to the baggage department, for sending all the lean Tattoos, bullocks, &c., to grass, the rainy season being now at hand."—Tippoo's Letters, 105.

1804.—"They can be got for 25 rupees each horseman upon an average; but, I believe, when they receive only this sum they must tattoo... From 30 to 35 rupees each horse is the sum paid to the best horsemen."—Wellington, iii. 174.

1808.—"These tout, hoos are a breed of small ponies, and are the most useful and hardly little animals in India."—Broughton's Letters, 156; [ed. 1892, 117].

1810.—"Every servant... goes share in the tattoo... which conveys his luggage."—Williamson, V.M. i. 311.

1824.—"Tattoos. These are a kind of small, cat-hammed, and ill-looking ponies; but they are hardy and walk faster than oxen."—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. ii.

1826.—"... when I mounted on my tattoo, or pony, I could at any time have commanded the attendance of a dozen grooms, so many pressed forward to offer me their services."—Pandurang Hati, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 29].

[1830.—"Monting our tatts, we were on the point of proceeding homewards..."
—Oriental Sport. Mag., ed. 1873, i. 437.]

c. 1831.—"... mon tattoo est fort au dessous de la taille d'un arabe..."—Jacquemont, Correspond. i. 347.

c. 1840.

"With its bright brass patent axles, and its little hog-maned tatta, and its ever jetty harness, which was always made by Watts..."

A few lines in honour of the late Mr. Simms, in Parker's Book Ponjis, 1851, ii. 215.

1853.—"... Smith's plucky proposal to run his notable tat, Pickles."—Oakfield, i. 94.

1875.—"You young Gentlemen rode over on your tatt, I suppose? The Subaltern's tat—that is the name, you know, they give to a pony in this country—is the most useful animal you can imagine."—The Dilemma, ch. ii.

TATTY, s. Hind. tatti and tatti, [which Platt's connects with Skt. tāttṛa, 'a thread, the warp in a loom']. A screen or mat made of the roots of fragrant grass (see CUSCUS) with which door or window openings are filled up in the season of hot winds. The screens being kept wet, their fragrant evaporation as the dry winds blow upon them cools and refreshes the house greatly, but they are only efficient when such winds are blowing. See also THERMANTIDOTE. The principle of the tatty is involved in the quotation from Dr. Fryer, though he does not mention the grass-mats.

c. 1685.—"... or having in lieu of Cellarage certain Kus-Kaunya, that is, little Houses of Straw, or rather of odoriferous Roots, that are very neatly made, and commonly placed in the midst of a Parterre... so that the Servants may easily with their Pompion-bottles, water them from without."—Bernier, E.T. 79; [ed. Constable, 247].

1673.—"They keep close all day for 3 or 4 Months together... repelling the Heat by a coarse wet Cloath, continually hanging before the chamber-windows."—Fryer, 47.

[1789.—The introduction of tatties into Calcutta is mentioned in a letter from Dr. Campbell, dated May 10, 1789:—"We have had very hot winds and delightful cool houses. Everybody uses tatties now... Tatties are however dangerous when you are obliged to leave them and go abroad, the heat acts so powerfully on the body that you are commonly affected with a severe catarrh."—In Carey, Good Old Days, i. 80.]

1808.—"... now, when the hot winds have set in, and we are obliged to make use of tatties, a kind of screens made of the roots of a coarse grass called Kus."—Broughton's Letters, 110; [ed. 1892, p. 83].

1809.—"Our style of architecture is by no means adapted to the climate, and the large windows would be insufferable, were it not for the tatties which are easily applied to a house one story high."—Ed. Valentina, i. 104.

1810.—"During the hot winds tats (a kind of mat), made of the root of the koosa grass, which has an agreeable smell, are placed against the doors and windows."—Maria Graham, 125.

1814.—"Under the roof, throughout all the apartments, are iron rings, from which the tatties or screens of sweet scented grass, were suspended."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 392].

1828.—"An early breakfast was over; the well watered tatties were applied to the windows, and diffused through the apartment a cool and refreshing atmosphere which was most comfortably contrasted with the white heat and roar of the fierce wind without."—The Kuzilbash, i. 11.

TAUT, s. Hind. ṭāṭ, [Skt. trṛtra, 'defence, or tantrī, 'made of threads']. Sackcloth.

[c. 1810.—"In this district (Dinajpoor) large quantities of this cloth (Tat or Choti) are made..."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 851.]

1820.—"... made into coarse cloth taut, by the Brinjaries and people who use TAVOY. n.p. A town and district of what we call the Tenasserim Province of B. Burma. The Burmese call it Dha-wé; but our name is probably adopted from a Malay form. The original name is supposed to be Siamese. [The Burmah Gazetteer (ii. 681) gives the choice of three etymologies: 'landing place of bamboo'; from its arms (dha, 'a sword', way, 'to buy'); from Hu-way, taken from a cross-legged Buddha.]

1553.—"The greater part of this tract is mountainous, and inhabited by the nation of Brammats and Jangomas, who interpose on the east of this kingdom (Pegu) between it and the great kingdom of Siam; which kingdom of Siam borders the sea from the city of Tavay downwards."—Barros, III. iii. 4.

1583.—"Also some of the rich people in a place subject to the Kingdom of Pegu, called Tavae, where is produced a quantity of what they call in their language Calain, but which in our language is called Calaia (see Calay), in summer leave their houses and go into the country, where they make some sheds to cover them, and there they stop three months, leaving their usual dwellings with food in them for the devil, and this they do in order that in the other nine months he may give them no trouble, but rather be propitious and favourable to them."—G. Balli, f. 125.

1587.—"... Hand of Tav, from which cometh great store of Tinne which serveth all India."—R. Fick, in Hatl. ii. 395.

1695.—"10th. That your Majesty, of your wonted favour and charity to all distresses, would be pleased to look with Eyes of Pity, upon the poor English Captive, Thomas Brown, who is the only one surviving of four that were accidentally drove into Taewy by Storm, as they were going for Atcheen about 10 years ago, in the service of the English Company."—Petition to the King of Burma, presented at Ava by Edward Fleetwood, in Dalrymple, Or. Repert. ii. 374.

TAWEEZ, s. Ar. ta'wiz, lit. 'praying for protection by invoking God, or by uttering a charm'; then 'an amulet or phylactery'; and, as in the quotation from Herklots, 'a structure of brick or stone-work over a tomb.'

1819.—"The Jemidar... as he is very superstitious, all his stud have turveez or charms..."—Lt.-Col. Fitzclarence, Journal of a Route across India, 144.

1896.—"Let her who doth this Taweez wear, Guard against the Gossin's snare." Pandawrung Hari, ed. 1873, i. 148.

1892.—"The generality of people have tombs made of mud or stone... forming first three square taweezes or platforms..."—Herklos, Qanoon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. 284.]

TAZEE, s. Pers. tāzī, 'invading, invader,' from tāz, 'running.'] A favourite variety of horse, usually of Indian breed. The word is also used of a variety of greyhound.

[c. 1590.—"Horses have been divided into seven classes... Arabs, Persian horses, Mujannas, Turkí horses, Yabus (see YABOO) and Janglas horses... The last two classes are also mostly Indian breed. The best kind is called Tāzi. ..."]—Ain, i. 234-5.

1839.—"A good breed of the Indian kind, called Tazeez, is also found in Bunnco and Daman..."—Elphinstone, Cautul, ed. 1842, i. 189.

1883.—"The 'Tazzies,' or greyhounds are not looked upon as unclean..."—Wills, Modern Persia, ed. 1891, p. 306.]

TAZEEA, n. A.—P.—H. ta'ziya, 'mourning for the dead.' In India the word is applied to the taboot, or representations, in flimsy material, of the tombs of Hussein and Hassan which are carried about in the Muharram (see MOHURRUM) processions. In Persia it seems to be applied to the whole of the mystery-play which is presented at that season. At the close of the procession the ta'ziyas must be thrown into water; if there be no sufficient mass of water they should be buried. [See Sir L. Pelly, The Miracle Play of Hasan and Husain.]

The word has been carried to the W. Indies by the coolies, whose great festival (whether they be Mahomedans or Hindus) the Muharram has become. And the attempt to carry the Tazeas through one of the towns of Trinidad, in spite of orders to the contrary, led in the end of 1884 to a sad catastrophe. [Mahomedean Lascars have an annual celebration at the London Docks.]

1809.—"There were more than a hundred Taziyas, each followed by a long train of Fuqueers, dressed in the most extravagant manner, beating their breasts... such of the Mahatta Surdars as are not Brahmins frequently construct Taziyas at their own tents, and expend large sums of money upon them."—Broughton, Letters, 72; [ed. 1892, 55].
1869. — "En lisant la description ... de ces fêtes on croira souvent qu'il s'agit de fêtes hindous. Telle est par exemple la solennité du ta'zia ou devél, établie en commémoration du martyre de Huçâin, laquelle est semblable en bien de points à celle du Durga-pujâ. ... Le ta'ziya dure dix jours comme le Durga-pujâ. Le dixième jour, les Hindous précipitent dans la rivière la statue de la déesse au milieu d'une foule immense, avec un grand appareil et au son de mille instruments de musique; la même chose a lieu pour les représentations du tombeau de Huçâin."—Garçin de Tassy, Rel. Musulm. p. 11.

"I therefore pray thee, Renny, dear, That thou wilt give me With cream and sugar soft'ned well, Another dish of tea"—and so on. Johnsoniana, ed. Bosewell, 1835, ix. 194.

The change must have taken place between 1720 and 1750, for about the latter date we find in the verses of Edward Moore:

"One day in July last at tea, And in the house of Mrs. P."
The Trial of Sarah, &c.

[But the two forms of pronunciation seem to have been in use earlier, as appears from the following advertisement in The Gazette of Sept. 9, 1658 (quoted in 8 ser. N. & Q. vi. 266): "That excellent, and by all Physicians approved, China Drink, called by the Chinese Toha, by other nations Tay, alias Tee, is sold at the Sultaness Head, a coffee house in Sweetings Rents by the Royal Exchange, London." And in Zedler's Lexicon (1745) it is stated that the English write the word either Tee or Tea, but pronounce it Tey, which seems to represent our modern pronunciation. ["Strange to say, the Italians, however, have two names for tea, cia and te, the latter, of course, is from the Chinese word te, noticed above, while the former is derived from the word cha. It is curious to note in this connection that an early mention, if not the first notice, of the word in English is under the form cha (in an English Glossary of A.D. 1671); we are also told that it was once spelt tch'a—both evidently derived from the Cantonese form of the word: but 13 years later we have the word derived from the Fokieneese te, but borrowed through the French and spelt as in the latter language the; the next change in the word is early in the following century when it drops the French spelling and adopts the present form of tea, though the Fokieneese pronunciation, which the French still retain, is not dropped for the modern pronunciation of the now wholly Anglicised word tea till comparatively lately. It will thus be seen that we, like the Italians, might have had two forms of the word, had we not discarded the first, which seemed to have made but little lodgement with us, for the second"] (Bull, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 583 seq.)]
Dr. Bretschneider states that the Tea-shrub is mentioned in the ancient Dictionary Rh-ya, which is believed to date long before our era, under the names Kìa and K‘u-tu (K‘u- = "bitter"), and a commentator on this work who wrote in the 4th century A.D. describes it, adding "From the leaves can be made by boiling a hot beverage." (On Chinese Botanical Works, &c., p. 13.)

But the first distinct mention of tea-cultivation in Chinese history is said to be a record in the annals of the T‘ang Dynasty under A.D. 793, which mentions the imposition in that year of a duty upon tea. And the first western mention of it occurs in the notes of the Arab traders, which speak not only of tea, but of this fact of its being subject to a royal impost. Tea does not appear to be mentioned by the medieval Arab writers upon Materia Medica, nor (strange to say) do any of the European travellers to Cathay in the 13th and 14th centuries make mention of it. Nor is there any mention of it in the curious and interesting narrative of the Embassy sent by Shâh Rukh, the son of the great Timur, to China (1419-21).* The first European work, so far as we are aware, in which tea is named, is Ramusio's (posthumous) Introduction to Marco Polo, in the second volume of his great collection of Navigationi e Viaggi. In this he repeats the account of Cathay which he had heard from Hajji Mahommed, a Persian merchant who visited Venice. Among other matters the Hajji detailed the excellent properties of Chiaï-Catas (i.e. Pers. Chā- i-Khitā, 'Tea of China'), concluding with an assurance that if these were known in Persia and in Europe, traders would cease to purchase rhubarb, and would purchase this herb instead, a prophecy which has been very substantially verified. We find no mention of tea in the elaborate work of Mendoza on China. The earliest notices of which we are aware will be found below. Milburn gives some curious extracts from the E.I. Co.'s records as to the early importation of tea into England. Thus, 1666, June 30, among certain "rarety", chiefly the production of China, provided by the Secretary of the Company for His Majesty, appear:

"224 lbs. of thea at 50s. per lb. =£56 17 6
For the two cheefe persons that attended his Majesty, thea...
6 15 6"

In 1667 the E.I. Co.'s first order for the importation of tea was issued to their agent at Bantam: "to send home by these ships 100lb, weight of the best tey that you can get."

The first importation actually made for the Co. was in 1669, when two canisters were received from Bantam, weighing 143½ lbs. (Milburn, ii. 531.) [The earliest mention of tea in the Old Records of the India Office is in a letter from Mr. R. Wickham, the Company's Agent at Firando, in Japan, who, writing, June 27, 1615, to Mr. Eaton at Micaos, asks for "a pt. of the best sort of chaw" (see Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 26, where the early references are collected).]

A.D. 851.—"The King (of China) reserves to himself... a duty on salt, and also on a certain herb which is drunk infused in hot water. This herb is sold in all the towns at high prices; it is called sâlk. It has more leaves than the ratôvâh (Medicago sativa recens) and something more of aroma, but its taste is bitter. Water is boiled and poured upon this herb. The drink so made is serviceable under all circumstances."—Relation, &c., trad. par Reinaud, i. 40.

c. 1545.—"Moreover, seeing the great delight that I above the rest of the party took in this discourse of his, he (Chaggi Memet, i.e. Hajji Mahommed) told me that all over the country of Cathay they make use of another plant, that is of its leaves, which is called by those people Chiaï Catas; it is produced in that district of Cathay which is called Cahanfu. It is a thing generally used and highly esteemed in all those regions. They take this plant whether dry or fresh, and boil it well in water, and of this decoction they take one or two cups on an empty stomach; it removes fever, headache, stomach-ache, pain in the side or joints; taking care to drink it as hot as you can bear; it is good also for many other ailments which I can't now remember, but I know gout was one of them. And if any one chance to feel his stomach oppressed by overmuch food, if he will take a little of this decoction he will in a short time have digested it. And thus it is so precious and highly esteemed that every one going on a journey takes it with him,

* Mr. Major, in his Introduction to Perke's Mendoza for the Hak. Soc. says of this embassy, that at their halt in the desert 12 marches from Su-chan, they were regaled "with a variety of strong liquors, together with a pot of Chinese tea." It is not stated by Mr. Major whence he took the account; but there is nothing about tea in the translation of M. Quatremére (Not. et Ext. xiv. pt. 1), nor in the Persian text given by him, nor in the translation by Mr. Behatsek in the Ind. Ant. ii. 75 seqq.
and judging from what he said these people would at any time gladly swap a sack of rhubarb for an ounce of Chiai Catia. These people of Cathay say (he told us) that if in our country, and in Persia, and the land of the Franks, it was known, merchants would no longer invest their money in "Rauend Chini as they call rhubarb."—Ramusio, Navigazioni, vi. f. 15.

c. 1560. "Whatsoever person or persons come to any mans house of quality, he hath a custome to offer him in a fine basket one Porceleane... with a kinde of drinke which they call cha, which is somewhat bitter, red, and medicinal, which they are wont to make with a certayne concoction of herbes."—Da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 150.

1565. 1626. "They use much the powder of a certaine Herbe called Chia, of which they put as much as a Wether-sheld may containe into a dish of Porcelane, and drinke it with hot wate."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 587.

1631. "Dur. You have mentioned the drink of the Chinese called Thee; what is your opinion thereof?... Bont. The Chinese regard this beverage almost as something sacred... and they are not thought to have fulfilled the rites of hospitali-ty to you than you have served you with it, just like the Mahometans with their Caveh (see COFFEE). It is of a drying quality, and banishes sleep; it is beneficial to asthma and wheezing patients."—Jac. Bontius, Hist. Nat. et Med. Ind. Or. Lib. i. Dial. vi. p. 11.

1638. "Dans les assemblies ordinaires (à Sourat) que nous faisions tous les iours, nous en prenions que du Thë, dont l'vsage est fort commum par toutes les Indes."—Mandelslo, ed. Paris, 1659, p. 113.

1658. "Non mirum est, multos etiam nunc in illo errore versari, quasi diversae speciei plantae essent The et Tsia, cum e contra eadem sit, cujos deoctum Chinesis-bus The, Iaponenses Tsia nomen andiit; licet borum Tsia, ob magnum con-tributionem et coctionem, nigrum The ap-pellatur."—Bontius Hist. Nat. Pisonis Annot. p. 87.

1660. (September) "28th. I did send for a cup of tea (a China drink) of which I never had drank before."—Peppis's Diary. [Both Ld. Braybrooke (4th ed. i. 110) and Wheatley (i. 249) read teo, and give the date as Sept. 25.]

1667. (June) "28th. Home and there find my wife making of tea; a drink which Mr. Pelling, the Potticary, tells her is good for her cold and defluxions."—Ibid. [Wheatley, vi. 398].

1672. "There is among our people, and particularly among the womankind a great abuse of Thee, not only that too much is drunk... but this is also an evil custom to drink it with a full stomach; it is better and more wholesome to make use of it when the process of digestion is pretty well finished... It is also a great folly to use sugar candy with Thee."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 178. (This author devotes five columns to tea, and its use and abuse in India).

1677. "Planta dictur Chia, vel... Ciâ,... cujos usus in Chinae clavis nescius in Europae quoque paulatim esse insinuare attentat... Et quamvis Turcarum Cave (see COFFEE) et Mexicarnorum Ciococata eundem præstent effectum, Ciâ tamen, quam nonnulli quoque Te vocant, ea multum superat... etc.—Kircher, China Illustr. 150.

"Maer de Ciâ, (of Thee) sonder achtung op eenijt tijt te hebben, is novit schadelijk."—Vermeulen, 30.

1683. "Lord Russell... went into his chamber six or seven times in the morning, and prayed by himself, and then came out to Tillotson and me; he drunk a little tea and some sherry."—Burnet, Hist. of Own Time, Oxford ed. 1629, ii. 375.

1693. "Venus her Myrtle, Phoebus has his Bays; Tea both excels which She vouchsafes to praise, The best of Queens, and best of Herbs we owe..."—Queen Catherine.
To that bold Nation which the Way did show
To the fair Region where the Sun does rise, Whose rich Productions we so justly prize.”—Waller.

1690.—“... Of all the followers of Mahomet ... none are so rigidly Abstemious as the Arabians of Muscat, ... For Tea and Coffee, which are judg'd the privileg'd Liquors of all the Mahometans, as well as Turks, as those of Persia, India, and other parts of Arabia, are condemned by them as unlawful...”—Ovington, 427.

1726.—“I remember well how in 1681 I for the first time in my life drank thee at the house of an Indian Chaplain, and how I could not understand how sensible men could think it a treat to drink what tasted no better than hay-water.”—Valentijn, v. 190.

1789.—“And now her vase a modest Naiad fills With liquid crystal from her pebbly rills; Piles the dry cedar round her silver urn, (Bright climbs the blaze, the cracking faggots burn), Culls the green herb of China's envy'd bowers, In gaudy cups the steaming treasure pours; And sweetly smiling, on her bended knee, Presents the fragrant quintessence of Tea.”

Darwin, Botanic Garden, Loves of the Plants, Canto ii.

1844.—“The Polish word for tea, Herbata, signifies more properly 'herb,' and in fact there is little more of the genuine Chinese beverage in the article itself than in its name, so that we often think with longing of the delightful Russian Tshai, genuine in word and fact.”—J. I. Kohl, Austria, p. 444.

The following are some of the names given in the market to different kinds of tea, with their etymologies.

1. (TEA), BOHEA. This name is from the Wu-i (dialectically Bū-b) Shan Mountains in the N.W. of Fuh-kien, one of the districts most famous for its black tea. In Pope's verse, as Crawford points out, Bohea stands for a tea in use among fashionable people. Thus:

“To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea,
To muse, and spill her solitary tea.”

Epistle to Mrs Teresa Blount.

[The earliest examples in the N.E.D. carry back the use of the word to the first years of the 18th century.]

1711.—“There is a parcel of extraordinary fine Bohea Tea to be sold at 26s. per Pound, at the sign of the Barber's Pole, next door to the Brazier's Shop in Southampton Street in the Strand.”—Adv. in the Spectator of April 2, 1711.

1711.—“Oh had I rather unadmired remained On some lone isle or distant northern land;
Where the glist chariots never mark the way,
Where none learn ombre, none e'er taste bohea.”

Belinda, in Rape of the Lock, iv. 153.

The last quotation, and indeed the first also, shows that the word was then pronounced Bohia. At a later date Bohea sank to be the market name of one of the lowest qualities of tea, and we believe it has ceased altogether to be a name quoted in the tea-market. The following quotations seem to show that it was the general name for "black-tea."

1711.—“Bohea is of little Worth among the Moors and Gentooos of India, Arrabs and Persians... that of 45 Tale (see TAEL) would not fetch the Price of green Tea of 10 Tale a Pecull.”—Lockyer, 116.

1721.—“Where Indus and the double Ganges flow,
On odorif'rous plains the leaves do grow,
Chief of the treat, a plant the boast of fame,
Sometimes called green, Bohea's the greater name.”

Allan Ramsay's Poems, ed. 1800, i. 213-14.

1726.—“... anno 1670 and 1680 there was knowledge only of Boey Tea and Green Tea, but later they speak of a variety of other sorts... Congo... Pego... Tongue, Rosmaryn Tea, rare and very dear.”—Valentijn, iv. 14.

1727.—“In September they strip the Bush of all its Leaves, and, for Want of warm dry Winds to cure it, are forced to lay it on warm Plates of Iron or Copper, and keep it stirring gently, till it is dry, and that Sort is called Bohea.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 289; [ed. 1744, ii. 288].

But Zedler's Lexicon (1745) in a long article on Thee gives Thee Bohea as "the worst sort of all." The other European trade-names, according to Zedler, were Thee-Peco, Congo which the Dutch called the best, but Thee Cancho was better still and dearer, and Chaucan best of all.

2. (TEA) CAMPOY, a black tea also. Kam-pui, the Canton pron. of the characters Kien-pei, "select-dry (over a fire)."

3. (TEA) CONGOU (a black tea). This is Kang-lu (tè) the Amoy pronunciation of the characters Kung-fu, 'work or labour.' [Mr. Pratt (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 26) writes: "The N.E.D.-
under Congou derives it from the standard Chinese Kung-fu (which happens also to be the Cantonese spelling); ‘the omission of the f,’ we are told, ‘is the foreigner’s corruption.’ It is nothing of the kind. The Amoy name for this tea is Kong-hu, so that the omission of the f is due to the local Chinese dialect.”

4. HYSON (a green tea). This is He- (hei and ai in the south) -ch’un, ‘bright spring,’ [which Mr. Ball (Things Chinese, 586) writes yu-t’sin, ‘before the rain’], characters which some say formed the hong name of a tea-merchant named Le, who was in the trade in the district of Hu-ning (S.W. of Hang-chau) about 1700; others say that He-chun was Le’s daughter, who was the first to separate the leaves, so as to make what is called Hyson. [Mr. Ball says that it is so called, “the young hyson being half-opened leaves plucked in April before the spring rains.”]

c. 1772.—

“And Venus, goddess of the eternal smile, Knowing that stormy brows but ill become Fair patterns of her beauty, hath ordained Celestial Tea;—a fountain that can cure
The ills of passion, and can free from frowns."

* * * * *

To her, ye fair! in adoration bow!
Whether at blushing morn, or dewy eve,
Her smoking cordials greet your fragrant board With Hyson, or Bohea, or Congou crown’d.”

R. Ferguson, Poems.

5. OOLONG (bl. tea). Wu-hung, ‘black dragon’; respecting which there is a legend to account for the name. “A black snake (and snakes are sometimes looked upon as dragons in China) was coiled round a plant of this tea, and hence the name.” (Ball, op. cit. 586).]

6. PEKOE (do.). Pak-ho, Canton pron. of characters poch-hao, ‘whitedown.’

7. POUCHONG (do.). Pao-chung, ‘fold-sort.’ So called from its being packed in small paper packets, each of which is supposed to be the produce of one choice tea-plant. Also called Padre-souchong, because the priests in the Wu-i hills and other places prepare and pack it.

1781.—“Les Nations Européennes retirent de la Chine des thées connus sous les noms de thé bouy, thé vert, et thé saothon.” — Sonnerat, ii. 249.

9. TWANKAY (green tea). From Tun-k’i, the name of a mart about 15 m. S.W. of Hwei-chau-fu in Nga-nhwei. Bp. Moule says (perhaps after W. Williams?) from Tun-ki, name of a stream near Yen-shan-fu in Chi-kiang. [Mr. Pratt (loc. cit.) writes; “The Amoy Tun-ke is nearer, and the Cantonese Tun-kei nearer still, its second syllable being absolutely the same in sound as the English. The Twankay is a stream in the E. of the province of Nga-nhui, where Twankay tea grows.”] Twankay is used by Theodore Hook as a sort of slang for ‘tea.’

10. YOUNG HYSON. This is called by the Chinese Yu-i-t’sien, ‘rain-before,’ or ‘Yu-before,’ because picked before Kuh-yu, a term falling about 20th April (see HYSON above). According to Giles it was formerly called, in trade, Ugain, which seems to represent the Chinese name. In an “Account of the Prices at which Teas have been put up to Sales, that arrived in England in 1784, 1785” (MS. India Office Records) the Teas are (from cheaper to dearer):—

“Bohea Tea.
Congou.
Souchong.

Hyson.”

TEA-CADDY, s. This name, in common English use for a box to contain tea for the daily expenditure of the household, is probably corrupted, as Crawfurd suggests, from catty, a weight of 1½ lb. (q.v.). A ‘catty-box,’ meaning a box holding a catty, might easily serve this purpose and lead to the name. This view is corroborated by a quotation which we have given under caddy (q.v.) A friend adds the remark that in his youth ‘Tea-caddy’ was a Londoner’s name for Harley Street, due to the number of E.I. Directors and proprietors supposed to inhabit that district.
TEAPOY. 910  TEAK.

TEAPOY, s. A small tripod table. This word is often in England imagined to have some connection with tea, and hence, in London shops for japanned ware and the like, a teapoy means a tea-chest fixed on legs. But this is quite erroneous. Tripāṭi is a Hindu-stāni, or perhaps rather an Anglo-Hindustāni word for a tripod, from Hind. ṭin, 3, and Pers. pāḍ, 'foot.' The legitimate word from the Persian is sipāṭi (properly tikṣhapaya), and the legitimate Hindi word tirpad or tripad, but tripāṭi or tepoy was probably originated by some European in analogy with the familiar charpoy (q.v.) or 'four-legs,' possibly from inaccuracy, possibly from the desire to avoid confusion with another very familiar word sepoj, seapoy. [Platts, however, gives tripāṭi as a regular Hind. word, Skt. tri-pāḍ-ikā.] The word is applied in India not only to a three-legged table (or any very small table, whatever number of legs it has), but to any tripod, as to the tripod-stands of surveying instruments, or to trestles in carpentry. Tikṣhapaya occurs in 'Ali of Yezd's history of Timur, as applied to the trestles used by Timur in bridging over the Indus (Eliot, iii. 482). A teapoy is called in Chinese by a name having reference to tea; viz. Chi-čh'ērh. It has 4 legs.

[c. 1809.—"(Dinajpoor) Sepaya, a wooden stand for a lamp or candle with three feet."
—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 945.]

1844. —"'Well, to be sure, it does seem odd—very odd;'—and the old gentleman chuckled,—'most odd to find a person who don't know what a tepoy is. . . . Well, then, a tepoy or timpoy is a thing with three feet, used in India to denote a little table, such as that just at your right.'"  "'Why, that table has four legs,' cried Peregrine.

"'It's a tepoy all the same,' said Mr. Havethelacks."—Peregrine Pulteney, i. 112.

TEAK, s. The tree, and timber of the tree, known to botanists as Tec-tona grandis, L., N.O. Verbenaceae. The word is Malayāl. tekka, Tam. tekku. No doubt this name was adopted owing to the fact that Europeans first became acquainted with the wood in Malabar, which is still one of the two great sources of supply; Pegu being the other. The Skt. name of the tree is śāka, whence the modern Hind. name saqūn or saqūn and the Mahr. sāg. From this last probably was taken sāj, the name of teak in Arabic and Persian. And we have doubtless the same word in the sāgaľāna of the Periplus, one of the exports from Western India, a form which may be illustrated by the Mahr. adj. sāgalī, 'made of the teak, belonging to teak.' The last fact shows, in some degree, how old the export of teak is from India. Teak beams, still undecayed, exist in the walls of the great palace of the Sassanid Kings at Selencia or Ctesiphon, dating from the middle of the 6th century. [See Birdwood, First Letter Book, Intro. XXIX.] Teak has continued to recent times to be imported into Egypt. See Forskal, quoted by Royle (Hindūs Medicine, 128). The gopher-wood of Genesis is translated sāj in the Arabic version of the Penta-teuch (Royle). [It was probably cedar (see Encycl. Bibl. s.v.).]

Teak seems to have been hardly known in Gangetic India in former days. We can find no mention of it in Baber (which however is indexless), and the only mention we can find in the Ain, is in a list of the weights of a cubic yard of 72 kinds of wood, where the name "Sāgūn" has not been recognised as teak by the learned translator (see Blochmann's E.T. i. p. 228).

C. A.D. 80.—"In the innermost part of this Gulf (the Persian) is the Port of Apo-logos, lying near Pasine Charax and the river Euphrates.

"Sailing past the mouth of the Gulf, after a course of 6 days you reach another port of Persia called Omana. Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza, to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers and beams of teak (Sāguh saγαλανων καὶ δικαύων), and horns and spars of shisham (see SISSOO) (saγαλανων), and of ebony. . . ."—Peripl. Maris Eryther. § 35-36.

C. 800.—(under Harūn al Rashīd) "Fāzīl continued his story . . . I heard loud wailing from the house of Abdallah . . . they told me he had been struck with the javām, that his body was swollen and all black. . . . I went to Rashīd to tell him, but I had not finished when they came to say Abdallah was dead. Going out at once I ordered them to hasten the obsequies. . . . I myself said the funeral prayer. As they let down the bier a slip took place, and the bier and earth fell in together; an intolerable stench arose . . . a second slip took place. I then called for planks of teak (sāj). . . ."—Quotation in Mas'ūdī, Prairies d'Or, vi. 298-299.

C. 880.—"From Kol to Sindān, where they collect teak-wood (sāj) and cane, 18 far-sakhs."—Ibn Khurudhdah, in J. As. S. VI. tom. v. 284.

c. 940.—"... The teak-tree (sāj). This tree, which is taller than the date-palm, and more bulky than the walnut, can shelter under its branches a great number of men and cATTLE, and you may judge of its dimensions by the logs that arrive, of their natural length, at the depôts of Basra, of Trâk, and of Egypt. ..."—Mag‘ât‘i, iii. 12.

Before 1200. — Abu‘l-dhaili the Sindian, describing the regions of Hind, has these verses:

* * * *

"By my life! it is a land where, when the rain falls, Jacinths and pears spring up for him who wants ornaments. There too are produced musk and cam- pfer and cambergía and agila,

And ivory there, and teak (al-sâj) and aloeswood and sandal. ..."

Quoted by Kazvinî, in Gildemeister, 217-218.

The following order, in a King’s Letter to the Goa Government, no doubt refers to Pegu teak, though not naming the particular timber:

1597.—"We enjoin you to be very vigilant not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegu, nor from that of Achem (see ACHEEN), and you must arrange how to treat this matter, particularly with the King of Achem."—In Archiv. Port. Orient. fase, ii. 669.

1602.—"... It was necessary in order to appease them, to give a promise in writing that the body should not be removed from the town, but should have public burial in our church in sight of everybody; and with this assurance it was taken in solemn procession and deposited in a box of teak (teca), which is a wood not subject to decay. ..."—Suasa, Oriente Conquist. (1710), ii. 285.

[... Of many of the roughest thickets of bamboos and of the largest and best wood in the world, that is teca."—Couto, Dec. VII. Bk. vi. ch. 6. He goes on to explain that all the ships and boats made either by Moors or Gentiles since the Portuguese came to India, were of this wood which came from the inexhaustible forests at the back of Damaun.]

1631.—Bontius gives a tolerable cut of the foliage, &c., of the Teak-tree, but writing in the Archipelago does not use that name, describing it under the title "Quercus Indica, Kâti Malais dicta."—Linn. vi. s. 18. On his Rheedos, whose plate of the tree is, as usual, excellent (Hortus Malabaricus, iv. tab. 27), observes justly that the teak has no resemblance to an oak-tree, and also that the Malay name is not Kâti but Jati; Kâti seems to be a mistake of some kind growing out of Kayu-jati, 'Teak-wood.'

1644.—"Hâ nestas terras de Damam muita e boa madeira de Teca, a milhor de toda a India, e tambem de muyta parte do mundo, porque com ser muy facil de laurar he perduravel, e particularmente na hte tocando agoa."—Boearro, MS.

1675.—"At Cock-crow we parted hence and observed that the Sheds here were round thatched and lined with broad Leaves of Teke (the Timber Ships are built with) in Fashion of a Bee-hive."—Fryer, 142.

1727.—"Gunvwee is next, where good Quantities of Teak Timber are cut, and exported, being of excellent Use in building of Houses or Ships."—A. Hamilton, i. 178; [ed. 1744].

1744. — "Tecka is the name of costly wood which is found in the Kingdom of Martaban in the East Indies, and which never decays."—Zeiller, Uniœ. Lexicon, s.v.

1759.—"They had endeavoured to burn the Teak Timbers also, but they lying in a suumpy place, could not take fire."—Capt. Alves, Report on Loss of Negrais, in Dalrymple, i. 348.

1760.—"As to the wood it is a sort called Teak, to the full as durable as oak."—Grose, i. 108.

1777.—"Experience hath long since shown, that ships built with oak, and joined together with wooden trunnels, are by no means so well calculated to resist the extremes of heat and damp, in the tropical latitudes of Asia, as the ships which are built in India of tekewood, and bound with iron spikes and bolts."—Price’s Tracts, i. 191.

1793.—"The teek forests, from whence the marine yard at Bombay is furnished with that excellent species of ship-timber, lie along the western side of the Gait mountains ... on the north and north-east of Basseen. ... I cannot close this subject without remarking the unpardonable negligence we are guilty of in delaying to build teak ships of war for the service of the Indian seas."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. 260.

[1800.—"Tayca, Tectona Robusta."—Buchanán, Myano, i. 26.]

TEAK. 911.

TEE, s. The metallic decoration, generally gilt and hung with tinkling bells, on the top of a dagoba in Indo-Chinese countries, which represents the chatras [chatttras] or umbrellas which in ancient times, as royal emblems, crowned these structures. Burnt. h'ti, 'an umbrella.'

1800.—"... In particular the Tee, or umbrella, which, composed of openiron-work, 朝鲜的山峰，已被沉没。" —Symes, i. 193.

1855.— "... gleaming in its white plaster, with numerous pediments and tall central spire, we had seen it (Gaudapasi Temple at Pugan) from far down the Irrawaddy rising like a dim vision of Milan Cathedral... It is cruciform in plan... exhibiting a massive basement with porches, and rising above in a pyramidal gradation of terraces, crowned by a spire and htee. The latter has broken from its stays at one side, and now leans over almost horizontally..." —Yule, Mission to Ava, 1858, p. 42.

1876.— "... a feature known to Indian archaeologists as a Tee..." —Ferguson, Ind. and East. Archit. 64.

TEEK, adj. Exact, precise, punctual; also parsimonious, [a meaning which Platts does not record]. Used in N. India. Hind. thik.

[1843.—"They all feel that the good old rule of right (teek), as long as a man does his duty well, can no longer be relied upon." —G. W. Johnson, Stranger in India, i. 290.]

[1878.—"... it is necessary to send an explanation to the magistrate, and the return does not look so thik' (a word expressing all excellence)." —Life in the Mofussil, i. 253.]

TEERUT, TEERTHA, s. Skt. and Hind. tirth, tirtha. A holy place of pilgrimage and of bathing for the good of the soul, such as Hurdwar, or the confluence at Praag (Allahabad).

[1823.—"The Gentiles call it Ramtirth, that is, Holy Water." —P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 205.]

C. 1790.—"Au temple l'enfant est reçue par les devadashies (Deva-dasi) des mains de ses parens, et après l'avoir baignée dans le tirtha on étang du temple, elles lui mettent des vêtements neuvs..." —Haugfer, ii. 114.

[1858.—"He then summoned to the place no less than three cores and half, or thirty millions and half of teeruts, or angols (sic) who preside over each of his special place of religious worship." —Steevan, Journey through Oudh, ii. 4.]

TEHR, TAIR, &c., s. The wild goat of the Himalaya; Hemitragus jemlaicus, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 509]. In Nepal it is called jhâral. (See SURROW).

TEJPAT, s. Hind. tejpât, Skt. tejpâtra, 'pungent leaf.' The native name for malabathrum.

1838.—"Last night as I was writing a long description of the tez-pât, the leaf of the cinnamon-tree, which humbly pickles beef, leaving the honour of crowning heroes to the *Laurus nobilis. ..." —Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 278.

1872.— Tejpât is mentioned as sold by the village shopkeeper, in Govinda Samanta, i. 223.

(1) TELINGA, n.p. Hind. Tilangâ, Skt. Tâlanga. One of the people of the country east of the Deccan, and extending to the coast, often called, at least since the Middle Ages, Telingâna or Telangâna, sometimes Teling or Telang. Though it has not, perhaps, been absolutely established that this came from a form Trilingâ, the habitual application of Tri-Kâlingâ, apparently to the same region which in later days was called Telinga, and the example of actual use of Trilingâ, both by Ptolemy (though he carries us beyond the Ganges) and by a Tibetan author quoted below, do make this a reasonable supposition (see Bp. Caldwell's Dravidaian Grammar, 2nd ed. Introd. pp. 30 seqq., and the article Kling in this book).

A. D. C. 150.—"*Teliyaputtak, to kal Teli*ya-gna Varhelio... k. t. n." —Ptolemy, vi. 2, 23.

1309.—"On Saturday the 10th of Sha'bân, the army marched from that spot, in order that the pure tree of Islam might be planted and flourish in the soil of Telang, and the evil tree which had struck its roots deep, might be torn up by force... When the blessed canopy had been fixed about a mile from Arangal (Warangal, N.E. of Hyderabad), the tents around the fort were pitched so closely that the head of a needle could not get between them." —Amîr Khwûrî, in Elliot, iii. 80.

1321.—"In the year 721 H. the Sultan (Ghiyâs-ad-dîn) sent his eldest son, Ungh Khân, with a canopy and an army against Arangal and Telang." —Zia-ud-dîn Barnâ, ibid. 231.

C. 1335.—"For every mile along the road there are three dâsâlî (post stations) and so the road continues for six months' marching, till one reaches the countries of Teling and Ma'bar." —Ibn Battutâ, iii. 192.

In the list of provinces of India under the Sultan of Delhi, given by Shîhâb-ad-dîn Dimishkî, we find both Talang and Talanj, probably through some mistake. —Not. et Ext. Pt. i. 170-171.

C. 1590.—"Shûba Berâr... Its length from Batelâ (or Patîlâ) to Bairagarh is 200 evrak (or laps); its breadth from Bidar to Hindia is 180. On the east of Bairagarh it marches with Bastar; on the north with Hindia; on the south with Telingâna; on the west with Mahkarabad..." —Atî (orig.) i. 476; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 225; and see 230, 237].
TELINGA.

1608.—"In the southern lands of India since the day when the Turushkas (Turks, i.e. Mahomedans) conquered Magadh, many abodes of Learning were founded; and though they were considered, the continuance of instruction and exercism was without interruption, and the Pandit who was called the Son of Men, dwelt in Kalinga, a part of Trilinga."—Tarandhâ's II. of Buddhion (Germ. ed. of Schiefner), p. 264. See also 116, 158, 166.

c. 1614.—"Up to that time none of the zamindârs of distant lands, such as the Râjâ of Tiliang, Pegu, and Malabar, had ventured upon disobedience or rebellion."—Firishâ, in Elliot, vi. 549.

1793.—"Tellunga, of which Wargollang was the capital, comprehended the tract lying between the Kistnah and Godavery Rivers, and east of Visiapour. . . ."—Rennell's Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [exil.]

(2) TELINGA, s. This term in the 18th century was frequently used in Bengal as synonymous with sepoy, or a native soldier disciplined and clothed in quasi-European fashion, [and is still commonly used by natives to indicate a sepoy or armed policeman in N. India], no doubt because the first soldiers of that type came to Bengal from what was considered to be the Telinga country, viz. Madras.

1758.—". . . the latter commanded a body of Hindu soldiers, armed and accoutred and disciplined in the European manner of fighting; I mean those soldiers that are become so famous under the name of Telingas."—Seîr Mutâquhînî, ii. 92.

c. 1760.—". . . Sepoys, sometimes called Tellingas."—Grose, in his Glossary, see vol. i. xiv.

1760.—"300 Telingees are run away, and entered into the Beerboom Rajah's service."—In Long, 235; see also 226, 237, and (1701) p. 255, "Tellingers."

c. 1765.—"Somro's force, which amounted to 15 or 16 field-pieces and 6000 or 7000 of those foot soldiers called Talinghas, and which are armed with flint muskets, and accoutred as well as disciplined in the Frenghi or European manner."—Seîr Mutâquhînî, iii. 254.

1786.—". . . Gardi (see GARDEE), which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India, save Bengal . . . where they are stiled Talingas, because the first Sipahees that came in Bengal (and they were imported in 1757 by Colonel Clive) were all Talingas or Telougous born . . . speaking hardly any language but their native. . . ."—Note by Tr. of Seîr Mutâquhînî, ii. 93.

c. 1805.—"The battalions, according to the old mode of France, were called after the names of cities and forts. . . . The Talingas, composed mostly of Hindoos, from Oude, were disciplined according to the old English exercise of 1750. . . ."—Sketch of the Regular Corps, &c., in Service of Native Princes, by Major Lewis Ferdinand Smith, p. 50.

1827.—"You are a Sahib Angrezie . . . I have been a Telinga . . . in the Company's service, and have eaten their salt. I will do your errand."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1833.—"We have heard from natives whose grandfathers lived in those times, that the Oriental portions of Clive's army were known to the Bengalis of Nuddea as Telingas, because they came, or were supposed to have accompanied him from Telingana or Madras."—Saty. Review, Jan. 29, p. 120.

TELOOGOO, n.p. The first in point of diffusion, and the second in culture and copiousness, of the Dravidian languages of the Indian Peninsula. It is "spoken all along the eastern coast of the Peninsula, from the neighbourhood of Pulicat" (24 m. N. of Madras) "where it supersedes Tamil, to Chicacole, where it begins to yield to the Oriya (see ORIYA), and inland it prevails as far as the eastern boundary of the Maratha country and Mysore, including within its range the 'Ceded Districts' and Kurnool (see KURNOO), a considerable part of the territories of the Nizam . . . and a portion of the Nâgâpur country and Gûvânâ." (Bp. Caldwell's Dravid. Gram. Introd. p. 29). Telugu is the name given to the language of the people themselves (other forms being, according to Bp. Caldwell, Telunga, Telinga, Tailinga, Tenugu, and Tenungu), as the language of Telingâna (see TELINGA (1)). It is this language (as appears in the passage from Fryer) that used to be, perhaps sometimes is, called Gentoo at Madras. [Also see BADEGA.]

1673.—"Their Language they call generally Gentu . . . the peculiar name of their speech is Telinga."—Fryer, 35.

1783.—"The Telinga language is said to be in use, at present, from the River Pennar in the Carnatic, to Orissa, along the coast, and inland to a very considerable distance."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [exil.]

TEMBOOL, Betel-leaf. Skt. tām-bālā, adopted in Pers. as tāṃbāl, and in Ar. al-tambal. [It gives its name to the Tambolis or Tamolis, sellers of betel in the N. Indian bazaars.]

1298.—"All the people of this city, as well as the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain leaf called Tambul. . . ."—Marco Polo, ii. 358.

1498.—"And he held in his left hand a very great cup of gold as high as a half almude pot . . . into which he spat a certain herb which the men of this country chew for solace, and which herb they call atambar."—Rôteiro de V. da Gama, 59.

1510.—"He also eats certain leaves of herbs, which are like the leaves of the sour orange, called by some tamboli."—Varthema, 110.

1563.—"Only you should know that Aiicenna calls the betre (Betel) tambul, which seems a word somewhat corrupted, since everybody pronounces it tambul, and not tambul."—Garcia, f. 37h.

Teناسريرم, n.p. A city and territory on the coast of the Peninsula of Further India. It belonged to the ancient kingdom of Pegu, and fell with that to Ava. When we took from the latter the provinces east and south of the Delta of the Irawadi, after the war of 1824-26, these were officially known as "the Martaban and Tenasserim Province," or often as "the Tenasserim Province." We have the name probably from the Malay form Tanassari. We do not know to what language the name originally belongs. The Burmese call it Ta-nen-tha-rw.["The name Tenasserim (Malay Tanah-sari), 'the land of happiness or delight,' was long ago given by the Malays to the Burma province, which still keeps it, the Burmese corruption being Tanang-sari" (Gray, on Pyrrad de Laval quoted below).]

1442.—"The inhabitants of the shores of the Ocean come thither (to Hormuz) from the countries of Chin (China), Javah, Bangala, the cities of Zirbâd (q.v.), of Tenasori, of Sokotara, of Shahrinao (see SARNAU), of the isles of Diwah Malah (Maldives).—"Abdul-razzâk, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 420.

1498.—"Tenasar is peopled by Christians, and the King is also a Christian . . . in this land is much brassy, which makes a fine vermilion, as good as the grain, and it costs 1½ ducats the baar (bahar), equal to 4 kanaros. This place, though on the coast, is on the mainland. The King is a Gentile; and thence come pepper, cinnamon, galanga, camphor that is eaten, and camphor that is not eaten . . . This is indeed the first mart of spices in India."—Leonardo Cù Messer, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. p. 23.

1510.—"The city of Ternassari is situated near the sea, &c."—Varthema, 196. This adventurer's account of Tenasserim is an imposture. He describes it by implication as in India Proper, somewhere to the north of Coromandel.

1516.—"And from the Kingdom of Pegu as far as a city which has a seaport, and is named Tanassery, there are a hundred leagues . . ."—Barbosa, 188.

1568.—"The Pilot told vs that we were by his altitude not farre from a citie called Tanassary, in the Kingdom of Pegu."—C. Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 359. See Lancaster, c. 1590.—"In Kambayat (Cambay) a Nâkhuda (Nacoda) gets 800 R. . . in Pegu and Dannahsri, he gets half as much again as in Cambay."—Āhn, i. 281.

[1593.—"Betweene two Islanndes the coast runneth inwards like a bow, wherein lyeth the towne of Tanassarien."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 103. In the same page he writes of Tanassaria.]

1608.—"The small quantities they have here come from Tanasserye."—Dawers, Letters, i. 22.

[c. 1610.—"Some Indians call it (Ceylon) Tenassirin, signifying land of delights, or earthly paradise."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 140, with Gray's note (Hak. Soc. quoted above.)

1727.—"Mr. Samuel White was made Shavbandaar (Shabunder) or Custom-Master at Merjee (Mergui) and Tanacerin, and Captain Williams was Admiral of the King's Navy."—A. Hamilton, ii. 64; [ed. 1744].

1758.—"Tenassaram . . ."—Forrest V. to Mergui, 4.

Terai, Terye. s. Hind. *tarti, moist (land) from tar, 'moist' or 'green.' [Others, however, connect it with tara, talo, 'beneath (the Himalaya).'] The term is specially applied to a belt of marshy and jungly land which runs along the foot of the Himalaya north of the Ganges, being that zone in which the moisture which has sunk into the talus of porous material exudes. A tract on the south side of the Ganges, now part of Bhágalpûr, was also formerly known as the Jungle-terry (q.v.).

1759.—"Holloua, though standing very little below the-level of Cheeria Ghat's top is nevertheless comprehended in the Turry or Turryani of Nepal ... Turryani properly signifies low marshy lands, and is sometimes applied to the flats lying below the hills in the interior of Nepal, as well as the low tract bordering immediately on the Company's northern frontier."—Kirkpatrick's Nepal (1811), p. 40.

1824.—"Mr. Boulderson said he was sorry to learn from the raja that he did not consider the unhealthy season of the Terrai yet over ... I asked Mr. B. if it were true that the monkeys forsok these woods during the unwholesome months. He answered that not the monkeys only, but everything which had the breath of life instinctively desert them from the beginning of April to October. The tigers go up to the hills, the antelopes and wild hogs make incursions into the cultivated plain ... and not so much as a bird can be heard or seen in the frightful solitude."—Heber, ed. 1844, 250-251.

[The word is used as an adj. to describe a severe form of malarial fever, and also a sort of double felt hat, worn when the sun is not so powerful as to require the use of a sola topee.

[1879.—"Remittent has been called Jungle Fever, Terrai Fever, Bengal Fever, &c., from the locality in which it originated. ..."—Moore, Family Med. for India, 211.]

[1880.—"A Terrai hat is sufficient for a Collector."—Ali Baba, 85.]

THAKOOR, s. Hind. thákur, from Skt. thakkura, 'an idol, a deity.' Used as a term of respect, Lord, Master, &c., but with a variety of specific applications, of which the most familiar is as the style of Rajpút nobles. It is also in some parts the honorific designation of a barber, after the old fashion which styles a tailor khálífa (see CALEFFA); a bhíshíti, jamá-där (see JEMADAR); a sweeper, mehtar. And in Bengal it is the name of a Brahman family, which its members have Anglicised as Tagore, of whom several have been men of character and note, the best known being Dwirkanáth Tagore, "a man of liberal opinions and enterprising character" (Wilson), who died in London in 1840.

[e. 1610.—"The nobles in blood (in the Maldives) add to their name Tacourou."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 217.

[1798.—"The Thacur (so Rajput chieftains are called) was naked from the waist upwards, except the sacrificial thread or scarf on his shoulders and a turban on his head."—L. de Colebrooke, 462.

[1811.—"After the sons have gone to their respective offices, the mother changing her clothes retires into the thakurghar (the place of worship), and goes through her morning service, ..."—S. C. Bose, The Hindoos as they are, 13.]

THERMANTIDOTE, s. This learned word ("heat-antidote") was applied originally, we believe, about 1830-32 to the invention of the instrument which it designates, or rather to the application of the instrument, which is in fact a winnowing machine fitted to a window aperture, and incased in wet tatties (q.v.), so as to drive a current of cooled air into a house during hot, dry weather. We have a dim remembrance that the invention was ascribed to Dr. Spilsbury.

1831.—"To the 21st of June, this oppressive weather held its sway; our only consolation grapes, iced-water, and the thermantidote, which answers admirably, almost too well, as on the 22d. I was laid up with rheumatic fever and lumbago, occasioned ... by standing or sleeping before it."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 208.

[Mrs Parkes saw for the first time a thermantidote at Cawnpore in 1830. —Ibid. i. 134.]

1840.—"... The thermometer at 112° all day in our tents, notwithstanding tatties, phermanticolotes; and every possible invention that was likely to lessen the stifling heat."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Ranjjet Singh, 132.

1853.—"... then came punkahs by day, and next punkahs by night, and then tatties, and then therm-antidotes, till at last Mr. May came round again, and found the unhappy Anglo-Indian world once more surrounded with all the necessary but uncomfortable sweltering panoply of the hot weather."—Oakfield, i. 263-4.

1878.—"They now began (c. 1840) to have the benefit of thermantidotes, which however were first introduced in 1831; the name of the inventor is not recorded."—Calcutta Rev. exxiv. 718.

1880.—"... low and heavy punkahs swing overhead; a sweet breathing of wet khaskhas grass comes out of the therm-antidote."—Sir Ali Baba, 112.

THUG, s. Hind. thag, Mahr. thák, Skt. sthaga, 'a cheat, a swindler.' And this is the only meaning given and illustrated in R. Drummond's Illustrations of Guzeratter, &c. (1808). But it has acquired a specific meaning, which cannot be exhibited more precisely or tersely than by Wilson:

* This book was printed in England, whilst the author was in India; doubtless he was innocent of this quaint error.
"Latterly applied to a robber and assassin of a peculiar class, who sallying forth in a gang ... and in the character of wayfarers, either on business or pilgrimage, fall in with other travellers on the road, and having gained their confidence, take a favourable opportunity of strangling them by throwing their handkerchiefs round their necks, and then plundering them and burying their bodies." The proper specific designation of these criminals was phânsîgar or phânsigar, from phânsi, 'a noose.' According to Mackenzie (in As. Res. xiii.) the existence of gangs of these murderers was unknown to Europeans till shortly after the capture of Seringapatam in 1799, when about 100 were apprehended in Bangalore. But Fryer had, a century earlier, described a similar gang caught and executed near Surat. The Phânsîgars (under that name) figured prominently in an Anglo-Indian novel called, we think, "The English in India," which one of the present writers read in early boyhood, but cannot now trace. It must have been published between 1826 and 1830.

But the name of Thug first became thoroughly familiar not merely to that part of the British public taking an interest in Indian affairs, but even to the mass of Anglo-Indian society, through the publication of the late Sir William Sleeman's book "Rama-seena; or a Vocabulary of the peculiar language used by the Thugs, with an Introduction and Appendix, descriptive of that Fraternity, and of the Measures which have been adopted by the Supreme Government of India for its Suppression," Calcutta, 1836; and by an article on it which appeared in the Edinburgh Review, for Jan. 1837, (lxiv. 357). One of Col. Meadows Taylor's Indian romances also, Memoirs of a Thug (1839), has served to make the name and system familiar. The suppression of the system, for there is every reason to believe that it was brought to an end, was organised in a masterly way by Sir W. (then Capt.) Sleeman, a wise and admirable man, under the government and support of Lord William Bentinck. [The question of the Thugs and their modern successors has been again discussed in the Quarterly Review, Oct. 1901.]

C. 1865.—"Les Voleurs de ce pays-là sont les plus adroits du monde; ils ont l'usage d'un certain lasso à noeud coulant, qu'ils savent jeter si subtilement au col d'un homme, quand ils sont à sa portée, qu'ils ne le manquent jamais; on sorte qu'en un moment ils l'étranglent ..." —Thevenot, v. 123.

1783.—"They were Fifteen, all of a Gang, who used to lurk under Hedges in narrow Lanes, and as they found Opportunity, by a Device of a Weight tied to a Cotton Bow-string made of Guts, ... they used to throw it upon Passengers, so that winding it about their Necks, they pulled them from their Beasts and dragging them upon the Ground strangled them, and possessed themselves of what they had ... they were sentenced to Less Taluowns, to be hang'd; whereof being delivered to the Catecal or Sheriff's Men, they led them two Miles with Ropes round their Necks to some Wild Date-trees: In their way thither they were careful, and went singing, and smocking Tobacco ... as jolly as if going to a Wedding; and the Young Lad now ready to be tied up, boasted, That though he were not 14 Years of Age, he had killed his Fifteen Men ..."—Fryer, 97.

1785.—"Several men were taken up for a most cruel method of robbery and murder, practised on travellers, by a tribe called phânsîgars, or stranglers ... under the pretence of travelling the same way, they enter into conversation with the strangers, share their sweetmeats, and pay them other little attentions, until an opportunity offers of suddenly throwing a rope round their necks with a slip-knot, by which they dexterously contrive to strangle them on the spot."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 13; [2nd ed. ii. 397].

1808.—"Phansees. A term of abuse in Guzerat, applied also, truly, to thieves or robbers who strangle children in secret or travellers on the road." —R. Drummond, Illustrations, s. v.

1820.—"In the more northern parts of India these murderers are called Thugs, signifying deceivers."—As. Res. xiii. 250.

1823.—"The Thugs are composed of all castes. Mahometans even are admitted; but the great majority are Hindus; and among these the Brahmins, chiefly of the Bundelcund tribes, are in the greatest numbers, and generally direct the operations of the different bands." —Malcolm, Central India, ii. 187.

1831.—"The inhabitants of Jubbulpore were this morning assembled to witness the execution of 25 Thugs. ... The number of Thugs in the neighbouring countries is enormous; 115, I believe, belonged to the party of which 25 were executed, and the remainder are to be transported; and report says there are as many in Saugor Jail."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 201-202.

1843.—"It is by the command, and under the special protection of the most powerful goddesses that the Thugs join themselves to the unsuspecting traveller, make friends with him, slip the noose round his neck, plunge their knives in his eyes, hide him in the earth, and divide his money and baggage."—Macaulay, Speech on Gates of Samnonath.

1874.—"If a Thug makes stragling of travellers a part of their religion, we do not allow him the free exercise of it."—W. Newman, in Fortnightly Rev., N.S. xv. 181.

[Tavernier writes: "The remainder of the people, who do not belong to either of these four castes, are called Pauzecour." This word Mr. Ball (ii. 185) suggests to be equivalent to either pariah or phansisgar. Here he is in error. Pauzecour is really Stk. Puncha-Gauda, the five classes of northern Brahmans, for which see Wilson, (Indian Caste, ii. 124 seqq.).]

TIBET, n.p. The general name of the vast and lofty table-land of which the Himalaya forms the southern marginal range, and which may be said roughly to extend from the Indus elbow, N.W. of Kashmir, to the vicinity of Sining-fu in Kansuh (see SLING) and to Tatsienlu on the borders of Szechuen, the last a distance of 1800 miles. The origin of the name is obscure, but it came to Europe from the Mahommedans of Western Asia; its earliest appearance being in some of the Arab Geographies of the 9th century.

Names suggestive of Tibet are indeed used by the Chinese. The original form of these (according to our friend Prof. Terrien de la Coupérie) was Tu-pot; a name which is traced to a prince so called, whose family reigned at Liang-chau, north of the Yellow R. (in modern Kansuh), but who in the 5th century was driven far to the south-west, and established in eastern Tibet a State to which he gave the name of Tu-pot, afterwards corrupted into Tu-poh and Tu-fan. We are always on ticklish ground in dealing with derivations from or through the Chinese. But it is doubtless possible, perhaps even probable, that these names passed into the western form Tibet, through the communication of the Arabs in Turkistan with the tribes on their eastern border. This may have some corroboration from the prevalence of the name Tibet, or some proximate form, among the Mongols, as we may gather both from Carpinii and Rubruck in the 13th century (quoted below), and from Sanang Setzen, and the Mongol version of the Bodhiksar several hundred years later. These latter write the name (as represented by I. J. Schmidts), Tibet and Tobot.

[c. 590.—"Tobbat." See under INDIA.] 851.—"On this side of China are the countries of the Taghazghaz and the Khâ-kân of Tibtât; and that is the termination of China on the side of the Turks."—Relation, &c., tr. par Reinard, pt. i. p. 60.

c. 880.—"Quand un étranger arrive au Tibet (al-Tibbat), il éprouve, sans pouvoir s'en rendre compte, un sentiment de gaîté et de bien être qui persiste jusqu'au départ."— Ibn Khurâdâbâd, in J. As. Ser. vi. tom. v. 522.

c. 910.—"The country in which lives the goat which produces the musk of China, and which produces the musk of Tibetbat are one and the same; only the Chinese get into their hands the goats which are nearest their side, and the people of Tibet bat do likewise. The superiority of the musk of Tibetbat over that of China is due to two causes; first, that the musk goat on the Tibbat side of the frontier finds aromatic plants, whilst the tracts on the Chinese side only produce plants of a common kind."—Relation, &c., pt. 2, pp. 114-115.

c. 930.—"This country has been named Tibetbat because of the establishment there of the Himyarites, the word thabat signifying to fix or establish oneself. That etymology is the most likely of all that have been proposed. And it is thus that D'Bal, son of Ali-al-Khuza'I, vaunts this fact in a poem, in which when disputing with Al-Kumair he exalts the descendants of Kaftan above those of Niziar, saying:

"Tis they who have been famous by their writings at the gate of Merv, And who were writers at the gate of Chin,

'Tis they who have bestowed on Samarck the name of Shamr, And who have transported thither the Tibetans" (Al-Tubbatisn)."—J. de Mas'udi, i. 352.

c. 976.—"From the sea to Tibetbat is 4 months' journey, and from the sea of Fars to the country of Kanauj is 3 months' journey."—Ibn Hakabal, in Eliot, i. 33.

* This refers to an Arab legend that Samarkand was founded in very remote times by Tobba' al-Akbar, Himyarite King of Yemen. (see e.g. Edrisi, by Janbert, ii. 139), and the following: "The author of the Treatise on the Figure of the Earth says on this subject: "This is what was told me by Abu-Bakr-Dimashi—"I have seen on the great gate of Samarkand an iron tablet bearing an inscription, which, according to the people of the place, was engraved in Himyarite characters, and as an old tradition related, had been the work of "Tobba.""—Shahbuddin Dimashi, in Nat. et Ext. xiii. 254.
c. 1020.—"Bhútesar is the first city on the borders of Tibet. There the language, costume, and appearance of the people are different. Thence to the top of the highest mountain, of which we spoke . . . is a distance of 20 parasangs. From the top of it Tibet looks red and Hind black."—Al-Birúni, in Elliot, i. 57.

1075.—"Toó móghún, diáfora étó elían; ón ó krepítov wýnna étan dé yó̄l poiýo μódr wóv τούτο̄u τóu Xoráaλ ἀναπολοκτούα, ληγομένη εν τούτα μετάτα. ἔτει δε τήν χρόνων ὑπόσκευων τούτου δε ἰπτον ἀπό τῆς Ἰνδίας μετακομιζόμενον μέτει δε ἐπί το λευκότερον καὶ τούτου πολῶν ὑπόσκευος ἀπό τῶν Σίνων ἀγάμους πάντες δε ἐν ὀμφαλῳ ἀπογνωμίζω ἵνα τῶν μονοκέρωτως μέγατον ἤμουν δοράκος."—Symeon Seth, quoted by Bochart, Hieros. III. xxxvi.

1165.—"This prince is called in Arabic Sultan-al-Fars-al-Kábar . . . and his empire extends from the banks of the Shat-al-Arab to the City of Samarkand . . . and reaches as far as Tibet, in the forests of which country that quadruped is found which yields the musk."—Rabbi Benjamin, in Wright's Early Travels, 106.

c. 1200.—
"He went from Hindustan to the Tibet-land . . . From Tibet he entered the boundaries of Chin."

1253.—"Post istos sunt Tibet homines solentes comedere parentes suos defunctos, ut causa pietatis non facerent alium se sepulchrum eis nisi visce sua."—Rubrug. in Recueil de Voyages, &c. iv. 289.

1298.—"Tebet est une grandissime provence que lengoies ont par elles, et sunt ydres . . . Il sunt main grant laironz . . . il sunt mau custumès; il ont grandissmes chez main que sunt grant come asnes et sunt mort bien a prendre bestes sauvages."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text. ch. cvi.

1350.—"Passando questa provincia grande perveniv a un altro grand regno che si chiama Tibet, ch'ene ne confini d'India ed e tutta al gran Cane . . . la gente di questa contrada dimora in tende che sono fatte di felt ri neri. La principale cittade è fatta tutta di pietre bianche e nere, e tutte le vie lastricate. In questa cittade dimora il Atassi (Abassi?) che viene a dire in nostro modo il Papa."—Fr. Odorico, Palatine MS., in Cathay, &c. App. p. lxi.

c. 1340.—"The said mountain (Karachi, the Himilaya) extends in length a space of 3 months' journey, and at the base is the country of Thabbit, which has the antelope which give musk."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 438-489.

TICAL, s. This (tikal) is a word which has long been in use by foreign traders to Burma, for the quasi-standard weight of (uncoined) current silver, and is still in general use in B. Burma as applied to that value. This word is by the Burmese themselves called kyat, and is the hundredth part of the vis (q.v.), being thus equivalent to about 1½ rupee in value. The origin of the word tikál is doubtful. Sir A. Phayre suggests that possibly it is a corruption of the Burmese words ta-kyat, "one kyat." On the other hand perhaps it is more probable that the word may have represented the Indian taká (see TUCKA). The word is also used by traders to Siam. But there likewise it is a foreign term; the Siamese word being bat. In Siam the tikal is according to Crawford a silver coin, as well as a weight equivalent to 225½ grs. English. In former days it was a short cylinder of silver bent double, and bearing two stamps, thus half-way between the Burmese bullion and proper coin.*

[1554.—"Ticals." See MACAO b. Also see VISS.]

1585.—"AIIertendosi che vna bise di peso δ per 40 once Venetiane, e ogni bise = teccali cento, e vn sito val teccali 25, e vn aboco val teccali 12½."—G. Balbi (in Pegu), f. 108.

[1615.—"Cloth to the value of six cattes (Catty) less three tiggalls."—Foster, Letters, iv. 107.]

1639.—"Four Ticals make a Tayl (Tael)."—Mandelslo, E.T. ii. 130.]

1688.—"The proportion of their (Siamese) Money to ours is, that their Tical, which weighs no more than half a Crown, is yet worth three shillings and three half-pence."—La Louvègre, E.T. p. 72.

1737.—"Pegu Weight. 1 Piece is . . . 39 ou. Troy, or 1 Piece . . . 100 Téculs. 140 Pécus . . . a Bahaar (see BAHAR). The Bahaar is 3 Pecul China."—A. Hamilton, ii. 317 [ed. 1744].

c. 1759.—". . . a dozen or 20 fowls may be bought for a Tical (little more than 3 d a Crown)."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 121."

* [Col. Temple notes that the pronunciation has always been twofold. At present in Burma it is usual to pronounce it like tickle, and in Siam like tacak. He regards it as certain that it comes from taká through Taluing and Peguan t'ke.]
TIFFIN.

1775.—Stevens, New and Complete Guide to E.I. Trade, gives "Pegu weight:
100 moe = 1 Tual (read Tical).
100 tual (Ticals) = 1 Catty.
5 oz. = 5 dr. avr.
150 vis = 1 candy."
And under Siam:
"80 Tuals (Ticals) = 1 Catty.
50 Catties = 1 Peoul."
1738.—"The merchandise is sold for tee-calls, a round piece of silver, stamped and weighing about one rupee and a quarter."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, p. vii.

TICCA, and vulg. TICKER, adj.
This is applied to any person or thing engaged by the job, or on contract. Thus a ticca garry is a hired carriage, a ticca doctor is a surgeon not in the regular service but temporarily engaged by Government. From Hind. thika, thikah, 'hire, fare, fixed price.'

[1813.—"Teecka, hire, fare, contract, job."—Gloss. to Fifth Report, s. v.]
1827.—"A Rule, Ordinance and Regulation for the good Order and Civil Government of the Settlement of Fort William in Bengal, and for regulating the number and fare of Teeka Palankeens, and Teeka Bearers in the Town of Calcutta . . . registered in the Supreme Court of Judicature, on the 27th June, 1827."—Bengal Regulations of 1827.
1878.—"Leaving our servants to jaber over our heavier baggage, we got into a ticca gharry, 'hired trap,' a bit of civilization I had hardly expected to find so far in the Mofussil."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 94.

[TICKA, s. Hind. tikā, Skt. tilaka, a mark on the forehead made with coloured earth or unguents, as an ornament, to mark sectarian distinction, accession to the throne, at betrothal, &c; also a sort of spangle worn on the forehead by women. The word has now been given the additional meaning of the mark made in vaccination, and the tikāvalā Sāhib is the vaccination officer.

[c. 1796.—"... another was sent to Kutch to bring thence the tikā . . . ."—Mir Hussein Ali, Life of Tipu, 251] 1832.—"In the centre of their foreheads is a teeka (or spot) of lamp-black."—Herklots, Qamoon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. 139.
[c. 1878.—"When a sudden stampede of the children, accompanied by violent yells and sudden falls, has taken place as I entered a village, I have been informed, by way of apology, that it was not I whom the children feared, but that they supposed that I was the Tikawala Sáhib."—Panjab Gazetteer, Rohtak, p. 9.]

TICKY-TOCK. This is an unmeaning refrain used in some French songs, and by foreign singing masters in their scales. It would appear from the following quotations to be of Indian origin.

1755.—"These gentry (the band with nautch-girls) are called Tickytaw boys, from the two words Tick and Taw, which they continually repeat, and which they chant with great vehemence."—Ives, 75.
1833.—"Each pair of boys then, having privately arranged to represent two separate articles . . . comes up to the captains, and one of the pair says dik dik, daun daun, which apparently has about as much meaning as the analogous English nursery saying, 'Dickory, dickory dock.'"—Panjab Gazetteer, Hoshíarpur, p. 36.

[TIER-CUTTY, s. This is Malayal. tiyarr-kattí, the knife used by a Tiyan or toddy-drawer for scarifying the palm-trees. The Tiyan caste take their title from Malayal. tiyyan, which again comes from Malayal. tivu, Skt. dvípa, 'island,' and derive their name from their supposed origin in Ceylon.

1792.—"12 Tier Cutties."—Account, in Logan, Madabar, 1819.
1793.—"The negadee (naqdi, 'cash-payment') on houses, banksauls (see BANK-SHALL), Tiers' knives."—Ibid. 1799, 324.

TIFFIN, s. Luncheon, Anglo-Indian and Hindustani, at least in English households. Also to Tiff, v. to take luncheon. Some have derived this word from Ar. tafánum, 'diversion, amusement,' but without history, or evidence of such an application of the Arabic word. Others have derived it from Chinese ch'í-lín, 'eatrice,' which is only an additional example that anything whatever may be plausibly resolved into Chinese monosyllables. We believe the word to be a local survival of an English colloquial or slang term. Thus we find in the Lexicon Balataionicum, compiled originally by Capt. Grose (1785): "Tiffing, eating or drinking out of meal-times," besides other meanings. Wright (Dict. of Obsolete and Provincial English) has: "Tiff, s. (1) a draught of liquor, (2) small beer;" and Mr. Davies (Supplemental English Glossary) gives some quotations both of this substantive and of a verb "to tiff," in the sense of 'take off a draught.'
We should conjecture that Grose's
To Tiffin, v. in the sense of taking off a draught.

1812.—
"He tiff'd his punch and went to rest."

Combe, Dr. Syntax, i. Canto v.
(This is quoted by Mr. Davies.)

Tiffin (the Indian substantive).

1807.—"Many persons are in the habit of sitting down to a repast at one o'clock, which is called tiffin, and is in fact an early dinner."—Cordier's Eleon., i. 53.

1810.—"The (Mohammedan) ladies, like ours, indulge in tiffin's (slight repasts), it being delicate to eat but little before company."—Williamson, V. M. i. 352.

" (published 1812) "The dinner is scarcely touched, as every person eats a hearty meal called tiffin, at 2 o'clock, at home."—Maria Graham, 29.

1811.—"Gertrude was a little unfortunate in her situation, which was next below Mrs. Fashionist, and who . . . detailed the delights of India, and the routine of its day; the changing linen, the curry-combing . . . the idleness, the dissipation, the sleeping and the necessity of sleep, the gay tiffin's, were all delightful to her in reciting . . ."—The Countess and Gertrude, or Modes of Discipline, by Laetitia Maria Hawkins, ii. 12.

1824.—"The entreaty of my friends compelled me to remain to breakfast and an early tiffin . . ."—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iii.

C. 1832.—"Reader! I, as well as Pliny, had an uncle, an East Indian uncle . . . everybody has an Indian uncle . . . He is not always so orientally rich as he is reputed; but he is always orientally munificent. Call upon him at any hour from two till five, he insists on your taking tiffin; and such a tiffin! The English corresponding term is luncheon: but how meagre a shadow is the European meal to its glowing Asiatic cousin."—De Quincey, Casuistry of Roman Meals, in Works, iii. 259.

1847.—"'Come home and have some tiffin, Dobbin,' a voice cried behind him, as a pudgy hand was laid on his shoulder . . . But the Captain had no heart to go a-feasting with Joe Sedley."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, i. 238.

1850.—"A vulgar man who enjoys a champagne tiffin and swindles his servants . . . may be a pleasant companion to those who do not hold him in contempt as a vulgar knave, but he is not a gentleman."—Sir C. Napier, Foreiessed Address.

1853.—"This was the ease for the prosecution. The court now adjourned for tiffin."—Oakfield, i. 319.

1882.—"The last and most vulgar form of 'nobbings' the press is well known as the luncheon or tiffin trick. It used to be confined to advertising tradesmen and hotel-keepers, and was practised on newspaper reporters. Now it has been practised on a loftier scale."—Saty. Rec., March 25, 357.

Sense was a modification of this one, that his "tiffin" was a participial noun from the verb to tiff, and that the Indian tiffin is identical with the participial noun. This has perhaps some corroboration both from the form "tiffin" used in some earlier Indian examples, and from the Indian use of the verb "to Tiff." [This view is accepted by Prof. Skeat, who derives tiff from Norweig. tev, 'a drawing in of the breath, sniff,' teva, 'to sniff' (Concise Dic. s.v.; and see 9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 425, 460, 506; v. 13.)] Rumphius has a curious passage which we have tried in vain to connect with the present word; nor can we find the words he mentions in either Portuguese or Dutch Dictionaries. Speaking of Teddy and the like he says:

"Hominem autem qui eas (potiones) colligunt ac praeparant, dicuntur Portuguese nomine Tifardes, atque opus ipsum Tifvar; nostratibus Belgis tyfferen" (Herb. Amb. Boinense, i. 5).

We may observe that the comparatively late appearance of the word tiffin in our documents is perhaps due to the fact that when dinner was early no lunch was customary. But the word, to have been used by an English novelist in 1811, could not then have been new in India.

We now give examples of the various uses:

Tiffin, s. In the old English senses (in which it occurs also in the form tip, and is probably allied to tipple and tippy); [see Prof. Skeat, quoted above].

(1) For a draught:
1758.—"Monday . . . Seven. Returned to my room. Made a tiff of warm punch, and to bed before nine."—Journal of a Senior Fellow, in the Iler, No. 33.

(2) For small beer:
1694.—
"... make waste more prodigal
Than when our beer was good, that John may float
To Styx in beer, and lift up Charon's boat
With wholesome waves: and as the conduits ran
With claret at the Coronation,
So let your channels flow with single tiff,
For John I hope is crown'd...."

On John Davison, Butler of Christ Church, in Bishop Corbet's Poems, ed. 1807, pp. 207-8.
TO TIFF, in the Indian sense.

1803.—“He hesitated, and we were interrupted by a summons to tiff at Floyer’s. After tiffin Close said he should be glad to go.”—Elphinston, in Life, i. 116.

1814.—“We found a pool of excellent water, which is scarce on the hills, and laid down to tiff on a full soft bed, made by the grass of last year and this. After tiffing I was cold and unwell.”—Ibid. p. 288.

Tiffin here is a participle, but its use shows how the noun tiffin would be originally formed.

1816.—“The huntsman now informed them all They were to tiff at Bobb’ry Hall.

Mounted again, the party starts, Upsets the hackeries and carts, Hammers (see HUMMAUL) and palanquins and doolies, Dobbies (see DHOBY) and burrawas (?) and coolies.”

The Grand Master, or Adventures of Que Hae, by Quiz (Canto viii.).

[Burrawa is probably H. bharua, ‘a pander.’]

1829.—“I was tiffing with him one day, when the subject turned on the sagacity of elephants. . . .”—John Shipp, ii. 267.

1859.—“Go home, Jack. I will tiff with you to-day at half-past two.”—J. Lang, Wanderings in India, p. 16.

The following, which has just met our eye, is bad grammar, according to Anglo-Indian use:

1885.—“Look here, RANDOLPH, don’t you know,” said Sir PEEL, . . . ‘Here you’ve been gallivanting through India, riding on elephants, and tiffining with Rajahs. . . .”

—Punch, Essence of Parliament, April 25, p. 204.

TIGER, s. The royal tiger was apparently first known to the Greeks by the expedition of Alexander, and a little later by a live one which Seleucus sent to Athens. The animal became, under the Emperors, well known to the Romans, but fell out of the knowledge of Europe in later days, till it again became familiar in India. The Greek and Latin tigris, tigra, is said to be from the old Persian word for an arrow, tigra, which gives the modern Pers. (and Hind.) tkir.*

Pliny says of the River Tigris: “a celeri tate Tigris incipit vocari. Ita appellant Medi sagittam” (vi. 27). In speaking of the animal and its “velocitatis trem dendoa,” Pliny evidently glances at this etymology, real or imaginary. So does Pausanias probably, in his remarks on its colour. [This view of the origin of the name is accepted by Schrader (Prehist. Ant. of the Aryan Peoples, E.T. 250), who writes: “Nothing like so far back in the history of the Indo-Europeans does the lion’s dreadful rival for supremacy over the beasts, the tiger, go. In India the songs of the Rigveda have nothing to say about him; his name (vagyhrā) first occurs in the Atharvaveda, i.e. at a time when the Indian immigration must have extended much farther towards the Ganges; for it is in the reeds and grasses of Bengal that we have to look for the tiger’s proper home. Nor is he mentioned among the beasts of prey in the Avesta. The district of Hycrania, whose numerous tigers the later writers of antiquity speak of with especial frequency, was then called Vehrkanu, ‘wolf-land. It is, therefore, not improbable . . . that the tiger has spread in relatively late times from India over portions of W. and N. Asia.”]

c. B.C. 325.—“The Indians think the Tiger (7ov t'gyva) a great deal stronger than the elephant. Nearchus says he saw the skin of a tiger, but did not see the beast itself, and that the Indians assert the tiger to be as big as the biggest horse; whilst in swiftness and strength there is no creature to be compared to him. And when he engages the elephant he springs on its head, and easily throttles it. Moreover, the creatures which we have seen and call tigers are only jackals which are dappled, and of a kind bigger than ordinary jackals.”—Arrian, Indica, xv. We apprehend that this big dappled jackal (660) is meant for a hyaena.

c. B.C. 322.—“In the island of Tylos . . . there is also another wonderful thing they say . . . for there is a certain tree, from which they cut sticks, and these are very handsome articles, having a certain varie-gated colour, like the skin of a tiger. The wood is very heavy; but if it is struck against any solid substance it shivers like a piece of

to the Zend root tikhsh, Skt. tij, ‘to sharpen.’

The Persian word tīr, ‘an arrow,’ may be of the same origin, since its primitive form appears to be tigra, from which it seems to come by elision of the g, as the Skt. tīr, ‘arrow,’ comes from tīra for tigra, where s seems to have taken the place of g. From the word tigra . . . seem also to be derived the usual names of the river Tigris, Pers. Dizkha, Ar. Dīlah.” (Vüllers, s. v. tīr).
pottery."—Theophrastus, H. of Plants, Bk. v. c. 4.

c. B.C. 321.—"And Ulpianus . . . said: 'Do we anywhere find the word used a masculine, τών τίγροι; I for I know that Philemon says thus in his Neeaea:

'4. We've seen the tigress (τήρια τίγρησι) that Seleucus sent us;

Are we not bound to send Seleucus back
Some beast in fair exchange?"—In Athenaeus, xiii. 57.

c. B.C. 320.—"According to Megasthenes, the largest tigers are found among the Prasii, almost twice the size of lions, and of such strength that a tame one led by four persons seized a mule by its hinder leg, overpowered it, and dragged it to him."—Strabo, xv. ch. 1, § 57 (Hamilton and Falconer's E.T. iii. 97).

c. B.C. 19.—"And Augustus came to Samos, and again passed the winter there . . . and all sorts of embassies came to him; and the Indians who had previously sent messages professing friendship, now sent to make a solemn treaty, with presents, and among other things including tigers, which were then seen for the first time by the Romans; and if I am not mistaken by the Greeks also."—Dio Cassius, iv. 9. [See Merivale, Hist. Romana, ed. 1865, iv. 176.]

c. B.C. 19.—

. . . duris genuit te cautibus horrens Caucasus, Hyrcanaeque admorunt ubera

c. A.D. 70.—"The Emperor Augustus . . . in the yeere that Q. Tubero and Fabius Maximus were Consuls together . . . was the first of all others that shewed a tame tygrie within a cage: but the Emperor Claudius foure at once. . . Tygres are bred in Hircania and India: this beast is most dreadful for incomparable swiftness."

—Pliney, by Ph. Holland, i. 204.

c. 80-90.—"Wherefore the land is called Dachanabades (see DECCAN), for the South is called Dachanos in their tongue. And the land that lies in the interior above this towards the East embraces many tracts, some of them of deserts or of great mountains, with all kinds of wild beasts, panthers and tigers (τίγρεις) and elephants, and immense serpents (δράκων) and hyenas (κοκκοράς) and cyanophelae of many species, and many and populous nations till you come to the Ganges."—Periplus, § 50.

c. A.D. 180.—"That beast again, in the talk of Ctesias about the Indians, which is alleged to be called by them Martichora (Marti-chora), and by the Greeks Ndrorphaegus (Man-eater), I am convinced is really the tiger (τίγρις). The story that he has a triple range of teeth in each jaw, and sharp prickles at the tip of his tail which he shoots at those who are at a distance, like the arrows of an archer,—I don't believe it to be true, but only to have been generated by the excessive fear which the beast inspires. They have been wrong also about his colour,—no doubt when they see him in the bright sunlight he takes that colour and looks red; or perhaps it may be because of his going so fast, and because even when not running he is constantly darting from side to side; and then (to be sure) it is always from a long way off that they see him."—Pausanias, xix. xxii. 4. [See Frazer's tr. i. 470; v. 86. Martichora is here Pers. mardumkhwir, 'eater of men.]*

1238.—"Enchore sachies ce le Grant Sire a bien leopars asez que tuit sont bon da chacer et da prendre bestes, . . . il ha posors lyons grandisims, greignors asez que cele de Babilonie. Il sunt de mout biais poil et de mout biais color, car il sunt tout verges por lome, noir et vermil eblance. Il sunt afaits a prandre serpens sauages et les beut sauages, et orses et asnes sauages et cerf et cavirois et autres bestes."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text, ch. xxii. Thus Marco Polo can only speak of this huge animal, striped black and red and white, as of a Lion. And a medieval Bestiary has a chapter on the Tigre which begins: "Une Beste est qui est apelle Tigre, c'est une maniere de serpent..."—Cahier et Martin, Mélanges d'Asiologie, ii. 140.

1474.—"This Indiane while there came in certain men sent from a Prince of India, with certain strange beasts, the first whereof was a leone ledde in a chayne by one that had skyll, which they call in their languaige Babureth. She is like unto a lynesse; but she is reddie coloured, streaked all over with black strykes; her face is reddde with certaine white and blakke spotses, the bealy white, and tayled like the lyn: seemingy to be a marvailouse fiers beast."—Joshua Barbero, Hak. Sec. pp. 63-54. Here again is an excellent description of a tiger, but that name seems unknown to the traveller. Babureth is in the Ital. original Baburth, Pers. bahr, a tiger.

1553.—". . . Beginning from the point of Chingapura and all the way to Pullo cambi-lam, i.e. the whole length of the Kingdom of Malaca . . . there is no other town with a name except this City of Malaca, only some havens of fishermen, and in the interior a very few villages. And indeed the most of these wretched people sleep at the top of the highest trees they can find, for up to a height of 20 palms the tigers can seize them at a leap; and if anything saves the poor people from these beasts it is the bonfires they keep burning at night, which the tigers are much afraid of. In fact these are so numerous that many come into the city itself at night in search of prey. And it has happened, since we took this trip, that a tiger leapt into a garden surrounded by a good high timber fence, and lifted a beam of wood with three slaves who were laid by the heels, and with these made a clean leap over the fence."—Barros, II. vi. 1. Lest I am doing the great historian wrong as to this Munchausen-like story, I give the original: "E já aconteceu . . . saltar hum tigre em hum quintal cercado de madeira bem alto, e levou hum homem de madeira com tres (tres !) esvazos que estavam prezos nelle, com os quae saltou de claro em claro per cima da cerca." 1553.—"We also escaped the peril of the multitude of tigers which infest those tracts" (the Pegu delta) 'and prey on whatever they can get at. And although we were on that account anchored in midstream, nevertheless it was ascertained that the ferocity of these animals was such that they would press even into the water to seize their prey.'—Gasparo Balbi, f. 94v.

1566.—"We went through the wilderness because the right way was full of thieves, when we passed the country of Gouver, where we found but few Villages, but almost all Wilderness, and saw many Buffes, Swine, and Deere, Grasse longer than a man, and very many Tigres.'—R. Fitch, in Purchas, ii. 1736.

1675.—"Going in quest whereof, one of our Soldiers, a Youth, killed a Tigre-Royal; it was brought home by 30 or 40 Combiez (Koonbee), the Body tied to a long Bamboo; the Tail extended. . . . it was a Tigre of the Biggest and Noblest Kind, Five Feet in Length beside the Tail, Three and a Half in Height, it was of a light Yellow, streaked with Black, like a Tabby Cat . . . the Visage Fierce and Majestic, the Teeth gnashing. . . ."—Frazer, 176.

1683.—"In ye afternoon they found a great Tiger, one of ye black men shot a barbed arrow into his Buttock. Mr. Frenchfeld and Capt. Raynes alighted off their horses and advanced towards the thicket where ye Tiger lay. The people making a great noise, ye Tiger flew out upon Mr. Frenchfeld, and he shot him with a brace of Bullets into ye breast: at which he made a great noise, and returned again to his den. The Black Men seeing of him wounded fell upon him, but the Tiger had so much strength as to kill 2 men, and wound a third, before he died. At Night ye Ragaie sent me the Tiger.'—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 66-67.

1754.—"There was a Charter granted to the East India Company. Many Disputes arose about it, which came before Parliament; all Arts were used to corrupt or delude the Members; among others a Tyger was baited with Sowemony, on the Day the great Question was to come on. This was such a Novelty, that several of the Members were drawn off from their Attendance, and absent on the Division. . . ."—A Collection of Letters relating to the E.I. Company, &c. (Tract). 1754, p. 13.

1869.—"Les tigres et les léopards sont considérés, autant par les Hindous que par les musulmans, comme étant la propriété des Pâris (see PARIS): aussi les natures du pays ne sympathisent pas avec les Européens pour la chasse du tigre.'—Garcia de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 24.

1872.—"One of the Frontier Battalion soldiers approached me, running for his life. . . . This was his story:—'Sahib, I was going along with the letters . . . which I had received from your highness . . . a great tiger came out and stood in the path. Then I feared for my life; and the tiger stood, and I looked at each other. I had no weapon but my kukri (Kookry) . . . and the Government letters. So I said, 'My lord Tiger, here are the Government letters, the letters of the Honourable Companny Bahadur . . . and it is necessary for me to go on with them.' The tiger never ceased looking at me, and when I had done speaking he growled, but he never offered to get out of the way. On this I was much more afraid, so I kneeled down and made obeisance to him; but he did not take any more notice of that either, so at last I told him I should report the matter to the Sahib, and I threw down the letters in front of him, and came here as fast as I was able. Sahib, I now ask for your justice against that tiger.'"—I.t. Col. T. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 444.

TINCALL, s. Borax. Pers. tinkar, but apparently originally Skt. tankana, and perhaps from the people so called who may have supplied it, in the Himālaya—Tāγγανα of Ptolemy. [Mr. Atkinson (Himalayan Gaz. ii. 357) connects the name of this people with that of the tanguṇi pony.]

1525.—"Tymquall, small, 60 tangas a maund."—Lemmrança, 50.

1563.—"It is called borax and chrisocola; and in Arabic tinkar, and so the Guzeratis call it."—Garric, f. 78v.

c. 1590.—"Having reduced the Ḩvaral to small bits, he adds to every man of it 1 ṣer of tangār (borax) and 3 ṣers of pounded natrum, and kneads them together.'—Āṭin, i. 26.

[1757.—"A small quantity of Tutengegg (Toutagne), Tinkal and Japan Copper was also found here. . . ."—Ives, 105.]

TINDAL, s. Malayāl. tāndal, Telugu. tāndalu, also in Mahr. and other vernaculars tāndal, tāndail, which Platts connects with tāndā, Skt. tantr, 'a line of men,' but the Madras Gloss. derives the S. Indian forms from Mal. tandyu, 'an ear,' walli, 'to pull.'] The head or commander of a body of men; but in ordinary specific application a native petty officer of lascars, whether on board ship (boatswain) or in the ordnance department, and sometimes the head of a gang of labourers on public works.

c. 1348.—"The second day after our arrival at the port of Kailukari this princess invited the nakhkodah (Nacoda) or owner of the ship, the bardai (see CRANNY) or clerk, the merchants, the persons of distinction, the tandil. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 250. The Moorish traveller explains the word as mukaddam (Mocuddum, q.v.) al-rajal, which the French translators render as 'général des pistons," but we may hazard the correction of "Master of the crew."

1590. - "In large ships there are twelve classes. 1. The Nākkudā, or owner of the ship. 2. The Sēvaru, or chief of the khudācis (see CLASSY) or sailors. . . ." - Tobacco.

1673. - "The Captain is called Nuquedah, the boatswain Tindal. . . ." - Fryer, 107.

1758. - "One Tindal, or Corporal of Las- cars." - Orme, ii. 399.

[1826. - "I desired the tindal, or steersman to answer, 'Bombay.'" - Pandurong Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 157.]

TINNEVELLY, n.p. A town and district of Southern India, probably Tiru-nel-ēlu, 'Sacred Rice-hedge.' [The Madras Gloss. gives 'Sacred Paddy-village.'] The district formed the southern part of the Madura territory, and first became a distinct district about 1744, when the Madura Kingdom was incorporated with the territories under the Nawab of Arcot (Caldwell, H. of Tinnevelly).

TIPARRY, s. Beng. and Hind. tīpārī, teypāri, the fruit of Physalis peruviana, L., N.O. Solanaceae. It is also known in India as 'Cape gooseberry,' [which is usually said to take its name from the Cape of Good Hope, but as it is a native of tropical America, Mr. Ferguson (8 ser. N. & Q. xii. 106) suggests that the word may really be capε or cap, from the peculiarity of its structure noted below.] It is sometimes known as 'Brazil cherry.' It gets its generic name from the fact that the inflated calyx encloses the fruit as in a bag or bladder (φόσα). It has a slightly acid gooseberry flavour, and makes excellent jam. We have seen a suggestion somewhere that the Bengali name is connected with the word teiparā, 'inflated,' which gives its name to a species of tetradon or globe-fish, a fish which has the power of dilating the oesophagus in a singular manner. The native name of the fruit in N.W. India is mak or mako, but tīpārī is in general Anglo-Indian use. The use of an almost identical name for a gooseberry-like fruit, in a Polynesian Island (Kingsmill group) quoted below from Wilkes, is very curious, but we can say no more on the matter.

1845. - "On Makin they have a kind of fruit resembling the gooseberry, called by the natives teiparu; this they pound, after it is dried, and make with molasses into cakes, which are sweet and pleasant to the taste." - U.S. Expedition, by C. Wilkes, U.S.N., v. 81.

TIPPO SAHIB, n.p. The name of this famous enemy of the English power in India was, according to C. P. Brown, taken from that of Tipā Sultan, a saint whose tomb is near Hyderabad. [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, i. 522, ed. 1869), says that the tomb is at Arcot.]

TIRKUT, s. Foresail. Sea Hind. from Port. triquette (Roebuck).

TIVAN, n.p. Malayāl. Tiyan, or Tīvan, pl. Tiyar or Tivar. The name of what may be called the third caste (in rank) of Malabar. The word signifies 'islander,' [from Mal. tivu, Skt. dvīpa, 'an island']; and the people are supposed to have come from Ceylon (see TIER CUTTY).

1510. - "... The third class of Pagans are called Tiva, who are artizans." - Varthema, 142.

1516. - "The cleanest of these low and rustic people are called Tivas (read Tivas), who are great labourers, and their chief business is to look after the palm-trees, and gather their fruit, and carry everything . . . for hire, because there are no draught cattle in the country." - Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 395.

[1800. - "... All Tirs can eat together, and intermarry. The proper duty of the cast is to extract the juice from palm-trees, to boil it down to Jaggery (Jaggery), and to distil it into spirituous liquors; but they are also very diligent as cultivators, porters, and cutters of firewood." - Buchanan, Myares, ii. 415; and see Logan, Malabar, i. 110, 142.]

TOBACCO, s. On this subject we are not prepared to furnish any elaborate article, but merely to bring together a few quotations touching on the introduction of tobacco into India and the East, or otherwise of interest.

[c. 1550. - "... Abū Kir would carry the cloth to the market-street and sell it, and with its price buy meat and vegetables and tobacco. . . ." - Burton, Arab. Nights, vii. 210. The only mention in the Nights and the insertion of some scribe.]

"It has happened to me several times, that going through the provinces of Guatemala and Nicaragua I have entered the house of an Indian who had taken this herb, which in the Mexican language is called tabacco, and immediately perceived the sharp fetid smell of this truly diabolical and smoking smoke. I was obliged to go away in haste, and seek some other place."

—Gioviano Benzoni. Hak. Soc. p. 81. [The word tobacco is from the language of Hayti, and meant, first, the pipe, secondly, the plant, thirdly, the sleep which followed its use (Mr. J. Platt, 9 ser. N. & Q. viii. 322.)]

1585. — "Et hi" (viz. Ralph Lane and the first settlers in Virginia) "reduces Indicam illam plantam quam Tabaccam vocant et Nicotiam, qua contra cruditates ab Indis edociti, usi erant, in Angliam primit, quod suam, intulissent. Ex illo sano tempore usum cepit esse cereberrimo, et magno pretio, dum quam plurimi graveolentem illius fumum, alii lascivientes, alii valetudini consulent, per tubulum testaceum inexpeliri aviditate passim hauriunt, et mox e marinibus effluent; adeo ut tabernae Tabaccanae non minus quam cervisiariae et vinarine passim per oppida habeantur. Ut Anglorum corpora (quod salus ille dixit) qui hac plantâ tontopere decetantur in Barbarorum naturam degenerasse videantur; quam ilidem quibus Barbari decetantur et sanari se posse credant." — G. Camdeni, Annot. Rerum Anglicanum... regn. Elisabetha, ed. 1717, ii. 449.

1592. — "Into the woods thence forth in haste she went To seeke for hearbes that mote him remedy; For shee of herbes had great intendment, Taught of the Nymphe which from her infancy Her nourse had in true Nobility: This whether yt divine Tobacco were, Or Panaxiaca, or Polycony, Shew found, and brought it to her patient deare Who al this while lay blouding out his hart-blood neare." — The Faerie Queen, III. v. 32.

1597. — "His Lordship" (E. of Essex at Villapanza) "made no answer, but called for tobacco, seeming to give but small credit to this alarm; and so on horseback, with these noblemen and gentlemen on foot beside him, took tobacco, whilst I was telling his Lordship of the men I had sent forth, and the order I had given them. Within some quarter of an hour, we might hear a good round volley of shot betwixt the 30 men I had sent to the chapel, and the enemy, which made his Lordship cast his pipe from him, and listen to the shooting." — Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, p. 62.

1598. — "Cob. Ods me I marle what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this rough tobacco. It is good for nothing but to choke a man, and fill him full of smoke and embers: there were four died out of one house last week with taking of it, and two more the bell went for yesternight; one of them they say will never sace it; he voiced a bushel of soot yesterday upward and downward... its little better than rats-bane or rosaker." — Every Man in his Humour, III. 2.

1604. — "Oct. 19. Demise to Tho. Lane and Ph. Bold of the new Import of 6s. 6d., and the old Custom of 2d. per pound on tobacco." — Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, James I., p. 159.

1604 or 1605. — "In Bijaïpore I had found some tobacco. Never having seen the like in India, I brought some with me, and prepared a handsome pipe of jewel work. His Majesty (Akbar) was enjoying himself after receiving my presents, and asking me how I had collected so many strange things in so short a time, when his eye fell upon the tray with the pipe and its appendances: he expressed great surprize, and examined the tobacco, which was made up in pipefuls; he inquired what it was, and where I had got it. The Nawab Khân-i-Azam replied: 'This is tobacco, which is well known in Mecca and Medina, and this doctor has brought it as a medicine for your Majesty.' His Majesty looked at it, and ordered me to prepare and take him a pipeful. He began to smoke it, when his physician came and said he should not do it. His Majesty..." (omitting much that is curious). "As I had brought a large supply of tobacco and pipes, I sent some to several of the nobles, while others sent to ask for some; indeed all, without exception, wanted some, and the practice was introduced. After that the merchants began to sell it, so the custom of smoking spread rapidly." — Asad Beg, in Elliot, vi. 165-167.

1610. — "The Turkes are also incredible takers of Opium... carrying it about with them both in peace and in warre; which they say expelleth all feares, and makes them courageous; but I rather think giddily headed... And perhaps for the self same cause they also delight in Tobacco; they take it through reeds that have lioyned unto them great heads of wood to containe it: I doubt not but lately taught them, as brought them by the English: and were it not sometimes lookt into (for Moral Bassa not long since commanded a pipe to be thrust through the nose of a Turk, and so to be led in derision through the Citie,) no question but it would prove a principall commodity. Nevertheless they will take it in corners, and are so ignorant therein, that that which in England is not saleable, doth passe here amongst them for most excellent." — Sandys, Journey, 96.

1615. — "Il tabacco ancora usano qui" (at Constantinople) "di pigliar in conversazione per gusto: ma io non ho voluto mai prvarme, e ne avera cognizione in Italia che molti ne pigliano, ed in particolare il signore cardinal Crescenzi qualche volta per medicamento insegnatogli dal Signor don Virgilio Orsino, che primo di tutti, se io non fallo, gli anni addietro lo portò in Roma d'Inghiltiera." — P. della Valle, i. 76.

1616. — "Such is the miraculous omnipotence of our strong tasted Tobacco, as it cures at sorts of diseases (which neuer any drugge could do before) in all persons and at all times... It cures the gout in the feet and (which is miraculous) in that very instant when the smoke thereof, as light, flies vp into the head, the virtue thereof, as heavy, runs down to the little toe. It helps all sorts of agues. It refreshes a weary man, and yet makes a man hungry. Being taken when they go to bed, it makes one sleepe soundly, and yet being taken when a man is sleepe and drousie, it will, as they say, awake his braine, and quicken his understanding. . . . O omnipotent power of Tobacco! And if it could by the smoke thereof chase out devils, as the smoke of Tobias fish did (which I am sure could smell no strongerl) it would serve for a precious Relicke, both for the Superstitious Priests, and the insolent Puritans, to cast out devils withall."—K. James I., Counter-blast to Tobacco, in Works, pp. 219-220.

1617.  "As the smoking of tobacco (tambakū) had taken very bad effect upon the health and mind of many persons, I ordered that no one should practise the habit. My brother Shīh 'Abbūs, also being aware of its evil effects, had issued a command against the use of it in Iran. But Khān-i-Ālam was so much addicted to smoking, that he could not abstain from it, and often smoked."—Memoirs of Jahāngīr, in Not. v. 501. See the same passage rendered by Blochmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 164.

1623.  "Incipt nostro seculo in immensis crescere usus tobacco, atque afficit homines occulta quidem delectatione, ut qui illi semel assueti sint, difficile postea abstinent."—Bacon, H. Vitae et Mortis, in B. Montague's ed. x. 189.

We are unable to give the date or Persian author of the following extract (though clearly of the 17th century), which with an introductory sentence we have found in a fragmentary note in the handwriting of the late Major William Yule, written in India about the beginning of last century.*

"Although Tobacco be the produce of an European Plant, it has nevertheless been in use by our Physicians medicinally for some time past. Nay, some creditable People even have been friendly to the use of it, though from its having been brought sparingly in the first instance from Europe, its rarity prevented it from coming into general use. The Culture of this Plant, however, became speedily almost universal, within a short period after its introduction into Hindostaun; and the produce of it rewarded the Cultivator far beyond every other article of Husbandry. This became more especially the case in the reign of Shah Jehan (commenced A.H. 1037) when the Practice of Smoking pervaded all Ranks and Classes within the Empire. Nobles and Beggars, Pious and Wicked, Devotees and Free-thinkers, poets, historians, rhetoricians, doctors and patients, high and low, rich and poor, all! all seemed intoxicated with a decided preference over every other luxury, may even often over the necessities of life. To a stranger no offering was so acceptable as a Whiff, and to a friend one could produce nothing half so grateful as a Chillum. So rooted was the habit that the confirmed Smoker would abstain from Food and Drink rather than relinquish the gratification he derived from inhaling the Fumes of this deleterious Plant! Nature recoils at the very idea of touching the Salivas of another Person, yet in the present instance our Tobacco smokers pass the moistened Tube from one mouth to another without hesitation on the one hand, and it is received with complacency on the other! The more acrid the Fumes so much the more grateful to the Palate of the Connoisseur. The Smoke is a Collyrium to the Eyes, whilst the Fire, they will tell you, supplies to the Body the waste of radical Heat. Without doubt the Hookah is a most pleasing Companion, whether to the Wayworn Traveller or to the solitary Hermit. It is a Friend in whose Bosom we may repose our most confidential Secrets; and a Counsellor upon whose advice we may rely in our most important Concerns. It is an elegant Ornament in our private Apartments: it gives joy to the Beholder in our public Houses by the Music of its sound puts the warbling of the Nightingale to Shame, and the Fragrance of its Perfume brings a Blush on the Cheek of the Rose. Life in short is prolonged by the Fumes inhaled at each inspiration, whilst every expiration of them is accompanied with extatic delight. . . ."—(cetera desunt).

c. 1760.  "Tambakū. It is known from the Madāsir-i-Rahimī that the tobacco came from Europe to the Dakhin, and from the Dakhin to Upper India, during the reign of Akbar Shāh (1586-1605), since which time it has been in general use."—Bahdr-ī-Ajam, quoted by Blochmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 164.

1878.  "It appears from Miss Bird's Japan that tobacco was not cultivated in that country till 1605. In 1612 and 1615 the Shogun prohibited both culture and use of tabako. — See the work, i. 276-77. [According to Mr. Chamberlain (Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 402) by 1651 the law was so far relaxed that smoking was permitted, but only out-of-doors.]

TOBRA, s. Hind. tobrā, which, according to Platts, is Skt. protha, 'nose of a horse,' inverted. The leather nose-bag in which a horse's feed is administered. "In the Nerbudda valley, in Central India, the women wear a profusion of toe-rings, some standing up an inch high. Their shoes are consequently curiously shaped, and are called tobrās." (M.-Gen. R. H.)
Keatinge). As we should say, ‘buckets.’ [The use of the nosebag is referred to by Sir T. Herbert (ed. 1634): “The horses (of the Persians) feed usually of barley and chopt-straw put into a bag, and fastened about their heads, which implies the manger.” Also see TURA.]

1808.—“... stable-boys are apt to serve themselves to a part out of the poor beasts allowance; to prevent which a thrifty housewife sees it put into a tobra, or mouth bag, and spits thereon to make the Hostler lose to and leave it alone.”—Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

1875.—“One of the horsemen dropped his tobra or nose-bag.”—Drew, Junimo, 240.]

TODDY, s. A corruption of Hind. tārī, i.e. the fermented sap of the tār or palmrya, Skt. tāla, and also of other palms, such as the date, the coco-palm, and the Caryota urens; palm-wine. Toddy is generally the substance used in India as yeast, to leaven bread. The word, as is well known, has received a new application in Scotland, the immediate history of which we have not traced. The tāla-tree seems to be indicated, though confusedly, in this passage of Megasthenes from Arrian:

c. B.C. 320.—“Megasthenes tells us ... the Indians were in old times nomadic ... were so barbarous that they wore the skins of such wild animals as they could kill, and subsisted (?) on the bark of trees; that these trees were called in the Indian speech tala, and that there grew on them as there grows at the tops of the (date) palm trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool.”—Arrian, Indica, vii., tr. by McCrindle.

c. 1330.—“... There is another tree of a different species, which ... gives all the year round a white liquor, pleasant to drink, which tree is called tari.”—Fr. Jordanus, 16.

[1654.—“There is in Gujarat a tree of the palm-tribe, called tari agadji (millet tree). From its branches cups are suspended, and when the cut end of a branch is placed into one of these vessels, a sweet liquid, something of the nature of arrack, flows out in a continuous stream ... and presently changes into a most wonderful wine.”—Travels of Sidi Ali Reis, trans. A. Vambery, p. 29.]

1609-10. — “Tarree.” See under SURA.

1611.—“Palmiti Wine, which they call Taddy.”—N. Douanton, in Purchas, i. 298.

1614.—“A sort of wine that distilleth out of the Palmetto trees, called Tadie.”—Foster, Letters, iii. 4.]

1615.—“... And then more to glad yee Weele have a health to al our friends in Tadee.”—Verses to T. Coryat, in Crudities, iii. 47.

1623.—“... on board of which we stayed till nightfall, entertaining with conversation and drinking tari, a liquor which is drawn from the cacao-nut trees, of a whitish colour, a little turbid, and of a somewhat rough taste, though with a blending in sweetness, and not unpleasant, something like one of our vini piccanti. It will also intoxicate, like wine, if drunk over freely.”—P. della Valle, ii. 530; [Hak. Soc. i. 62.]

[1634.—“The Toddy-tree is like the Date of Palm; the Wine called Toddy is got by wounding and piercing the Tree, and putting a Jar or Pitcher under it, so as the Liquor may drop into it.”—Sir T. Herbert, in Harris, i. 408.]

1648.—“... The country ... is planted with palmito-trees, from which a sap is drawn called Terry, that they very commonly drink.”—Van Twist, 12.

1653.—“... le tari qui est le vin ordinaire des Indes.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, 246.

1673.—“The Natives singing and roaring all Night long; being drunk with Toddy, the Wine of the Cocoe.”—Fryer, 53.

1686.—“Besides the Liquor or Water in the Fruit, there is also a sort of Wine drawn from the Tree called Toddy, which looks like Whiskey.”—Dampier, i. 293.

1705.—“... cette liqueur s'appelle tari.”—Luillier, 43.

1710.—This word was in common use at Madras.—Wheeler, ii. 125.

1750.—“J. Was vor Leute trincken Taddy? C. Die Soldaten, die Land Portugiesen, die Parreier (see PARIAH) und Schifferleute trincken diesen Taddy.”—Madras, oder Fort St. George, &c., Halle, 1750.

1857.—“It is the unfermented juice of the Palmrya which is used as food: when allowed to ferment, which it will do before midday, if left to itself, it is changed into a sweet, intoxicating drink called ‘kal’ or toddy.”—Ib. Childwell, Lectures on Timevelly Mission, p. 33.

“... “The Rat, returning home full of Toddy, said, If I meet the Cat, I will tear him in pieces.”—Ceylon Proverb, in Ind. Antiq. i. 59.

Of the Scotch application of the word we can find but one example in Burns, and, strange to say, no mention in Jameson’s Dictionary:
TOMAUN, s. A Mongol word, signifying 10,000, and constantly used in the histories of the Mongol dynasties for a division of an army theoretically consisting of that number. But its modern application is to a Persian money, at the present time worth about 7s. 6d. [In 1899 the exchange was about 53 crans to the £1; 10 Crans = 1 tumân.] Till recently it was only a money of account, representing 10,000 dinârs; the latter also having been in Persia for centuries only a money of account, constantly degenerating in value. The tomann in Fryer’s time (1677) is reckoned by him

TOODDY-BIRD. s. We do not know for certain what bird is meant by this name in the quotation. The nest would seem to point to the Baya, or Weaver-bird (Plocus Baya, Blyth): but the size alleged is absurd; it is probably a blunder. [Another bird, the Artamus fuscus, is, according to Balfour (Cycl. s.v.) called the toddy shrike.]

[1873.—“For here is a Bird (having its name from the Tree it chuses for its Sanctuary, the toddy-tree). . . .”—Fryer, 76.]

c. 1750-60.—“It is in this tree (see PALMYRA, BRAB) that the toddy-birds, so called from their attachment to that tree, make their exquisitely curious nests, wrought out of the thinnest reeds and filaments of branches, with an inimitable mechanism, and are about the bigness of a partridge (?) The birds themselves are of no value. . . .”—Grose, i. 48.

TOODDY-CAT, s. This name is in S. India applied to the Paradoxurus Musanga, Jerdon: [the P. niger, the Indian Palm-Civet of Blanford (Mammalia, 106).] It infests houses, especially where there is a ceiling of cloth (see CHUTT). Its name is given for its fondness, real or supposed, for palm-juice.

[TOKO, s. Slang for ‘a thrashing.’ The word is improper. Of Hind. toknd, ‘to censure, blame,’ and has been converted into a noun on the analogy of bunnow and other words of the same kind.

[1823.—“Toko for yam—Yams are food for negroes in the W. Indies . . . and if, instead of receiving his proper ration of these, blackee gets a whip (toco) about his back, why ‘he has caught toco’ instead of yam.”—John Bee, Slang Dict.

[1867.—“Toko for Yam. An expression peculiar to negroes for crying out before being hurt.”—Smyth, Sailor’s Word-Book, s.v.] as equal to £3, 6s. 8d. P. della Valle’s estimate 60 years earlier would give about £4, 10s. 0d., and is perhaps loose and too high. Sir T. Herbert’s valuation (5 x 13s. 8d.) is the same as Fryer’s. In the first and third of the following quotations we have the word in the Tartar military sense, for a division of 10,000 men:

c. 1340. — “Ces deux portions réunies formaient un total de 800 tomans, dont chacun vaut 10,000 dinars courants, et le dinar 6 dirhems.”—Shikháuddin, Masalád-al Aşgár, in Not. et Extrs. xiii. 194.

c. 1347. — “I was informed... that when the Rān assembled his troops, and called the array of his forces together, there were with him 100 divisions of horse, each composed of 10,000 men, the chief of whom was called Amīr Tuman, or lord of 10,000.”—Ibn Batútá, iv. 299-300.

A form of the Tartar word seems to have passed into Russian:

c. 1559.—“One thousand in the language of the people is called Twiceze; likewise ten thousand in a single word Tma: twenty thousand Duwetma: thirty thousand Tifma.”—Herbeestín, Della Moscovia, Ramsíus, i. 159.

[c. 1590.—In the Sárbár of Kandahár “eighteen dinars make a tuman, and each tuman is equivalent to 800 dánis. The tuman of Khurasán is equal in value to 30 nares and the tuman of Irák to 40.”—Aín, ed. Jarrett, ii. 393-94.]

1619.—“L’ambasciadore Indiano... ordinò che donasse a tutti un tomano, cioè dieci zecchini per uno.”—P. della Valle, ii. 22.

c. 1630.—“But how miserable so ere it seems to others, the Persian King makes many happy harvests; filling every yeare his insatiable coffers with above 350,000 Tomans (a Toman is five markes sterlin).”

—Sir T. Herbert, p. 225.

[c. 1665.—In Persia “the abási is worth 4 sháshis, and the tóman 50 abábis or 200 sháshis.”—Pére-Martier, ed. Bal. i. 24.]

1677. — “Receipt of Custom (at Gombroon) for which he pays the King yearly Twenty-two thousand Thomands, every Thomand making Three pound and a Noble in our Accompot, Half which we have a Right to.”—Fryer, 222.

1711. — “Camels, Houses, &c., are generally sold by the Tomand, which is 200 Shahees or 50 Abasses; and they usually reckon their Estates that way; such a man is worth so many Tomands, as we reckon by Pounds in England.”—Lockyer, 229.

[1858.—“Girwur Singh, Tomandar, came up with a detachment of the special police.”—Sleeman, Journey through Oudh, ii. 17.]

TOMAUN.

TOM-TOM.

TOMBACK, s. An alloy of copper and zinc, i.e. a particular modification of brass, formerly imported from Indo-Chinese countries. Port. tambaca, from Malay tâmbaga and tâmbaga, ‘copper,’ which is again from Skt. tâmyraka and tâmra.

1602.—“Their drummes are huge pannes made of a metal called Tombaga, which makes a most hellish sound.”—Scott, Discourse of Iawa, in Purchas, i. 180.

1690.—“This Tombac is a kind of Metal, whose scarcity renders it more valuable than Gold... ‘Tis thought to be a kind of natural Compound of Gold, Silver, and Brass, and in some places the mixture is very Rich, as at Borneo, and the Molucces, in others more alloyed, as at Siam.”—Ovington, 510.

1759.—“The Productions of this Country (Siam) are prodigious quantities of Grain, Cotton, Benjamin... and Tombanck.”—In Dalrymple, i. 110.

TOM-TOM, s. Tam-tam, a native drum. The word comes from India, and is chiefly used there. Forbes (Rās-Malā, ii. 401) [ed. 1878, p. 665] says the thing is so called because used by criers who beat it tám-tám, ‘place by place,’ i.e. first at one place, then at another. But it is rather an onomatopeia, not belonging to any language in particular. In Ceylon it takes the form tamattama, in Tel. tappeta, in Tam. tambattam; in Malay it is tin-toin, all with the same meaning. [When badminton was introduced at Satara natives called it Tamtam phul khel, tam-tam meaning ‘battle-dore,’ and the shuttlecock looked like a flower (phul). Tommy Atkins promptly turned this into “Tom Foot” (Calcutta Rev. xcv. 346.) In French the word tamtam is used, not for a drum of any kind, but for a Chinese gong (q.v.). M. Littré, however, in the Supplement to his Dict., remarks that this use is erroneous.

1693. — “It is ordered that to-morrow morning the Choutry Justices do cause the TomTom to be beat through all the Streets of the Black Town...”—In Wheeler, i. 298.

1711. — “Their small Pipes, and TomToms, instead of Harmony made the Discord the greater.”—Lockyer, 295.

1755.—In the Calcutta Mayor’s expenses we find:

“Tom Tom, R. 1 1 0.”—In Long, 56.

1784.—“You will give strict orders to the Zemindars to furnish Oil and Mushaus, and TomToms and Pikemen, &c., according to custom.”—Ibid. 391.
TONGA. 930

1770.—"... An instrument of brass which the Europeans lately borrowed from the Turks to add to their military music, and which is called a tam" (!).—Abbé Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 30.

1789.—"An harsh kind of music from a tom-tom or drum, accompanied by a loud rustic pipe, sounds from different parties throughout the throng..."—Mynheer, Narrative, 73.

1804.—"I request that they may be hanged; and let the cause of their punishment be published in the bazar by beat of tom-tom."—Wellington, iii. 186.

1824.—"The Maharrats in my vicinity kept up such a confounded noise with the tamtams, cymbals, and pipes, that to sleep was impossible."—Seeley, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iv.

1836.—For the use of the word by Dickens, see under GUM-GUM.

1880.—"In the (Times) of the 19th of April we are told that 'Syud Mohamed Padshah has repulsed the attack on his fort instigated by certain moollahs of tonga dák.'... Is the relentless tonga a region of country or a religious organization?... The original telegram appears to have contemplated a full stop after 'certain moollahs.' Then came an independent sentence about the tonga dák working admirably between Peshawur and Jellalabad, but the sub-editor of the Times, interpreting the message referred to, made sense of it in the way we have seen, associating the ominous mystery with the moollahs, and helping out the other sentence with some explanatory ideas of his own."—Pioneer Mail, June 10.

1881.—"Bearing in mind Mr. Framji's extraordinary services, notably those rendered during the mutiny, and... that he is crippled for life... by wounds received while gallantly defending the mail tonga cart in which he was travelling, when attacked by dacoits..."—Letter from Bombay Govt. to Govt. of India, June 17, 1881.

TONGA, s. A kind of light and small two-wheeled vehicle, Hind. tāngā, [Skt. tamanga, 'a platform']. The word has become familiar of late years, owing to the use of the tonga in a modified form on the roads leading up to Simla, Darjeeling, and other hill-stations. [Tavernier speaks of a carriage of this kind, but does not use the word :

[c. 1665. —"... They have also, for travelling, small, very light, carriages which contain two persons; but usually one travels alone... to which they harness a pair of oxen only. These carriages, which are provided, like ours, with curtains and cushions, are not slung,..."—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 44.]

1874.—"The villages in this part of the country are usually superior to those in Poona or Sholapur, and the people appear to be in good circumstances,... The custom too, which is common, of driving light Tongas drawn by ponies or oxen points to the same conclusion."—Settlement Report of Nāsik.

1879.—"A tongha dák has at last been started between Rajpore and Dehra. The first tongha took only 5½ hours from Rajpore to Saharunpore."—Pioneer Mail.

TOMJON, and vulg. TOMJOHN, s. A sort of sedan or portable chair. It is (at least in the Bengal Presidency) carried like a palankin by a single pole and four bearers, whereas a jompon (q.v.), for use in a hilly country, has two poles like a European sedan, each pair of bearers bearing it by a stick between the poles, to which the latter are slung. We cannot tell what the origin of this word is, nor explain the etymology given by Williamson below, unless it is intended for thēmjāṅgh, which might mean 'support-thigh.' Mr. Platts gives as forms in Hind. tāmjāṁ and thēmjāṅ. The word is perhaps adopted from some trans-gangetic language. A rude contrivance of this kind in Malabar is described by Col. Welsh under the name of a 'Tellicherry chair' (ii. 40).

'1804.—"I had a tonjon, or open palanquin, in which I rode.'—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 283.

1810.—"About Dacca, Chittagong, Tipperah, and other mountainous parts, a very light kind of conveyance is in use, called a taum-jaun, i.e. 'a support to the feet.'"—Williamson, V. M., i. 322-23.

"Some of the party at the tents sent a tonjon, or open chair, carried like a palankeen, to meet me."—Maria Graham, 168.

1827.—"In accordance with Lady D'Oyly's earnest wish I go out every morning in her tonjin."—Diary of Mrs. Fenton, 100.

1829.—"I had been conveyed to the hill in Hanson's tonjon, which differs only from a palanquin in being like the body of a gig with a head to it."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 88.

1832.—". . . I never seat myself in the palankeen or thonjaun without a feeling bordering on self-reproach. . . ."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 320.

1839.—"He reined up his ragged horse, facing me, and dancing about till I had passed; then he dashed past me at full gallop, wheeled round, and charged my tonjon, bending down to his saddlew, pretending to throw a lance, showing his teeth, and uttering a loud quack!"—Letters from Madras, 200.

1849.—"We proceeded to Navabgunge, the minister riding out with me, for some miles, to take leave, as I sat in my tonjon."—Steevan, Journey through Oudh, i. 2.

TOOLSY. s. The holy Basil of the Hindus (Ocimum sanctum, L.), Skt. tulasi or tulasi, frequently planted in a vase upon a pedestal of masonry in the vicinity of Hindu temples or dwellings. Sometimes the ashes of deceased relatives are preserved in these domestic shrines. The practice is alluded to by Fr. Odoric as in use at Tana, near Bombay (see Cathay, i. 59, c. 1322); and it is accurately described by the later ecclesiastical quoted below. See also Ward's Hindoos, ii. 203. The plant has also a kind of sanctity in the Greek Church, and a character for sanitary value at least on the shores of the Mediterranean generally.

[c. 1650.—"They who bear the tulasi round the neck . . . they are Vaishnavas, and sanctify the world."—Bhakta Malâ, in H. H. Wilson's Works, i. 41.]

1672.—"Almost all the Hindus . . . adore a plant like our Basilico gentile, but of more pungent odour. . . . Every one before his house has a little altar, girt with a wall half an ell high, in the middle of which they erect certain pedestals like little towers, and in these the shrub is grown. They recite their prayers daily before it, with repeated prostrations, sprinklings of water, &c. There are also many of these maintained at the bathing-places, and in the courts of the pagodas."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 300.

1673.—"They plaster Cow-dung before their Doors; and so keep themselves clean, having a little place or two built up a Foot Square of Mud, where they plant Catan- mak, or (by them called) Tulce, which they worship every Morning, and tend with Diligence."—Fryer, 199.

1842.—"Veneram a planta chamada Tulosse, por dizerem ê do pateo dos Deoses, e por isso ê confirm no pateu de suas casas, e todas as manhãs lhe vão tributar veneração."—Annees Maritimos, iii. 453.

1872.—"At the head of the ghât, on either side, is a sacred tulasi plant . . . placed on a high pedestal of masonry."—Govinda Samanta, i. 18.

The following illustrates the esteem attached to Toolsy in S. Europe:

1885.—"I have frequently realised how much prized the basil is in Greece for its mystic properties. The herb, which they say grew on Christ's grave, is almost worshipped in the Eastern Church. On St. Basil's day women take sprigs of this plant to be blessed in church. In returning home they cast some on the floor of the house, to secure luck for the ensuing year. They eat a little with their household, and no sickness, they maintain, will attack them for a year. Another bit they put in their cupboard, and firmly believe that their embroideries and silk tenament will be free from the visitations of rats, mice, and moths, for the same period."—J. T. Bent, The Cyclades, p. 328.

TOOMONGONG, s. A Malay title, especially known as borne by one of the chiefs of Johor, from whom the Island of Singapore was purchased. The Sultans of Johor are the representatives of the old Mahommedan dynasty of Malacca, which took refuge in Johor, and the adjoining islands (including Bintang especially), when expelled by Albuquerque in 1511, whilst the Tunanggang was a minister who had in Peshwa fashion appropriated the power of the Sultan, with hereditary tenure: and this chief now lives, we believe, at Singapore. Crawford says: "The word is most probably Javanese; and in Java is the title of a class of nobles, not of an office" (Malay Dic]. s.v.)

1774.—"Paid a visit to the Sultan . . . and Pangaram Toomongong . . ."—Diary TOON, TOON-WOOD.

of J. Herbert, in Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, ii. 438.

[1830.—“This (Dopâti), however, is rather a title of office than of mere rank, as these governors are sometimes Tumâng-gunge, Angebâs, and of still inferior rank.” —Raffles, Java, 2nd ed. i. 299.]

1854.—“Singapore had originally been purchased from two Malay chiefs; the Sultan and Tumâng-gong of Johore. The former, when Sir Stamford Raffles entered into the arrangement with them, was the titular sovereign, whilst the latter, who held an hereditary office, was the real ruler.” —Cavenagh, Reminis. of an Indian Official, 273.

TOON, TOON-WOOD, s. The tree and timber of the Cedrela Toona, Roxb. N.O. Meliaceae. Hind. tun, tun, Skt. tunna. The timber is like a poor mahogany, and it is commonly used for furniture and fine joiner’s work in many parts of India. It is identified by Bentham with the Red Cedar of N.S. Wales and Queensland (Cedrela australis, F. Mueller). See Brandis, Forest Flora, 73. A sp. of the same genus (C. sinensis) is called in Chinese ch’un, which looks like the same word.

[1798.—The tree first described by Sir W. Jones, As. Res. iv. 283.]

1810.—“The toon, or country mahogany, which comes from Bengal...” —Maria Graham, 101.

1837.—“Rosellini informs us that there is an Egyptian harp at Florence, of which the wood is what is commonly called E. Indian mahogany (Athenæum, July 22, 1837). This may be the Cedrela Toona.” —Royle’s Hindu Medicine, 30.

TOORKAY, s. A Turki horse, i.e. from Turkestan. Marco Polo uses what is practically the same word for a horse from the Turcoman horse-breeders of Asia Minor.

1298.—“... the Turcomans... dwell among mountains and down where they find good pasture, for their occupation is cattle-keeping. Excellent horses, known as Turquans, are reared in their country...” —Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 2.

[c. 1590.—“The fourth class (Turki) are horses imported from Turânb; though strong and well formed, they do not come up to the preceding (Arabs, Persian, Mughals).” —Avn, i. 294.

[1663.—“If they are found to be Turki horses, that is from Turkistan or Tartary, and of a proper size and adequate strength, they are branded on the thigh with the King’s mark. ...” —Bernier, ed. Constable, 243.]

1678.—“Four horses bought for the Company—Pagodas.

One young Arab at ... 160
One old Turkey at ... 40
One old Atchein at ... 20
One of this country at ... 20

240.”

1782.—“Wanted one or two Tanyans (see TANGUN) rising six years old, Wanted also a Bay Toorkay, or Bay Tuzzi (see TAZEE) Horse for a Buggy...” —India Gazette, Feb. 9.

... “To be disposed of at Ghyrettly... a Buggy, almost new... a pair of uncommonly beautiful spotted Toorkays.” —Ib. March 2.

TOOTNAGUE, s. Port. tutenaga. This word appears to have two different applications. a. A Chinese alloy of copper, zinc, and nickel, sometimes called ‘white copper’ (i.e. peh-tung of the Chinese). The finest qualities are alleged to contain arsenic.* The best comes from Yunnan, and Mr. Joubert of the Garnier Expedition, came to the conclusion that it was produced by a direct mixture of the ores in the furnace (Voyage d’Exploration, ii. 160). b. It is used in Indian trade in the same loose way that spelter is used, for either zinc or pewter (peh-yuen, or ‘white lead’ of the Chinese). The base of the word is no doubt the Pers. tutti-ndga, Skt. tuttha, an oxide of zinc, generally in India applied to blue vitriol or sulphate of copper, but the formation of the word is obscure. Possibly the last syllable is merely an adjective affix, in which way nâk is used in Persian. Or it may be nâga in the sense of lead, which is one of the senses given by Shakespeare. In one of the quotations given below, tutenague is confounded with calin (see CALAY). Mooden Sheriff gives as synonyms for zinc, Tam. tuttandgam ([tuttandgam]), Tel. tuttandgam ([tuttandgam]), Mahr. and Guz. tutti-nâga. Sir G. Staunton is curiously wrong in supposing (as his mode of writing seems to imply) that tutenague is a Chinese word. [The word has been finally corrupted in

* St. Julien et P. Champion, Industries Anciennes et Modernes de l’Empire Chinois, 1869, p. 75. Wells Williams says: “The peh-tung argentum, or white copper of the Chinese, is an alloy of copper 40:4, zinc 25:4, nickel 31:6, and iron 25:6, and occasionally a little silver; and these proportions are nearly those of German silver.” —Middle Kingdom, ed. 1883, ii. 19.

1727.—"Most of the Spunge in China had pernicious Qualities because the Sub- terraneous Grounds were stored with Minerals, as Copper, Quicksilver, Allom, Toottenague, &c."—A. Hamilton, ii. 223; [ed. 1744, ii. 222, for "Spunge" reading "Springe."]

1750.—"A sort of Cash made of Toote- nague is the only Currency of the Country."—Some Ac. of Cochín China, by Mr. Robert Kirsch, in Dalrympie, Or. Rep. i. 245.

[1757.—Speaking of the freemen enrolled at Nottingham in 1757, Bailey (Annals of Nottinghamshire, iii. 1236) mentions as one of them William Tutin, buckle-maker, and then goes on to say: "It was a son of this latter person who was the inventor of that beautiful composite white metal, the introduction of which created such a change in numerous articles of ordinary table service in England. This metal, in honour of the inventor, was called Tutin; which word, by one of the most absurd perversions of language ever known, became transferred into 'Tooth and Egg,' the name by which it was almost uniformly recognised in the shops."—Quoted in 2 ser. N. & Q. x. 144.]

1780.—"At Quedah, there is a trade for calin (see CALAY) or tutenage . . . to export to different parts of the Indies."—Dunn, New Directory, 5th ed. 338.

1797.—"Tu-te-nag is, properly speaking, zinc, extracted from a rich ore or calamine; the ore is powdered and mixed with charcoal dust, and placed in earthen jars over a slow fire, by means of which the metal rises in form of vapour, in a common distilling apparatus, and afterwards is condensed in water."—Staunton's Acct. of Lord Macartney's Embassy, 4to ed. ii. 540.

TOPAZ, TOPASS, &c., s. A name used in the 17th and 18th centuries for dark-skinned or half-caste claimants of Portuguese descent, and Christian profession. Its application is generally, though not universally, to soldiers of this class, and it is possible that it was originally a corruption of Pers. (from Turkish) top-chi, 'a gunner.' It may be a slight support to this derivation that Italians were employed to cast guns for the Zamorin at Calicut from a very early date in the 16th century, and are frequently mentioned in the annals of Correa between 1503 and 1510. Various other etymologies have however been given. That given by Orme below (and put forward doubtfully by Wilson) from topi, 'a hat,' has a good deal of plausibility, and even if the former etymology be the true origin, it is probable that this one was often in the minds of those using the term, as its true connotation. It may have some corroboration not only in the fact that Europeans are to this day often spoken of by natives (with a shade of disparagement) as Topoewalas (q.v.) or 'Hat-men,' but also in the pride commonly taken by all persons claiming European blood in wearing a hat; indeed Fra Paolino tells us that this class call themselves gente de chapeo (see also the quotation below from Ovington). Possibly however this was merely a misrendering of topaz from the assumed etymology. The same Fra Paolino, with his usual fertility in error, propounds in another passage that topaz is a corruption of do-bhadiya, 'two-tongued' (in fact is another form of Dubash, q.v.), viz. using Portuguese and a debased vernacular (pp. 50 and 144). [The Madras Gloss, assumes Mal. topâshi—to be a corruption of dubash.] The Topaz on board ship is the sweeper, who is at sea frequently of this class.

1602.—"The 12th ditto we saw to sa- ward another Champaigne (Sampan) wherein were 20 men, Mestícios (see MUSTES) and Toupaz."—Van Spilbergen's Voyage, p. 34, pub. 1648.

[1672.—"Toepasses." See under MADRAS.]

1673.—"To the Fort then belonged 300 English, and 400 Topazes, or Portuguese Firemen."—Fryer, 66. In his glossarial Index he gives "Topazes, Musketeers."

1680.—"It is resolved and ordered to entail about 100 Topasses, or Black Portuguese, into pay."—In Wheeler, i. 121.

1686.—"It is resolved, as soon as English soldiers can be provided sufficient for the garrison, that all Topasses be disbanded, and no more entertained, since there is little dependence on them."—In dito, 159.

1690.—"A Report spread abroad, that a Rich Moor Ship belonging to one Abdal Ghaford, was taken by Hat-men, that is, in their (the Moors) Dialect, Europeans."—Ovington, 411.

1705.—"... Topasses, qui sont des gens du pays qu'on élève et qu'on habilé à la Françoise, lesquels ont esté instruits dans la Religion Catholique par quelques uns de nos Missionnaires."—L'Uiller, 45-46.

1711.—"The Garrison consists of about 250 Soldiers, at 91 Fanhams, or ii. 2s. 6d. per Month, and 200 Topasses, or black Mungrel Portuguese, at 50, or 52 Fanhams per Month."—Lockyer, 14.

1727.—"Some Portuguese are called Topasses... will be served by none but Portuguese Priests, because they indulge them more and their Villany."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 326.

1745.—"Les Portugais et les autres Catholiques qu'on nomme Mestices (see MUSTEES) et Topasses, également comme les naturels du Pays y viennent sans distinction pour assister aux Divins mystères."—Norbert, ii. 31.

1747.—"The officers upon coming in report their People in general behaved very well, and could not do more than they did with such a handful of men against the Force the Enemy had, being as they believe at least to be one thousand Europeans, besides Topasses, Coffrees (see CAFFER), and Seapoy (see SEPOY), altogether about Two Thousand (2000)."—M.S. Consens. at Ft. St. David, March 1. (In India Office).

1749.—"600 effective Europeans would not have cost more than that Crowd of useless Topasses and Peons of which the Major Part of our Military has of late been composed."—In A Letter to a Proprietor of the E.I. Co. p. 57.

1753.—"The Topasses of which the major Part of the Garrison consisted, every one that knows Madras knows it to be a black, degenerate, wretched Race of the antient Portuguese, as proud and bigotted as their Ancestors, lazy, idle, and vittious withal, and for the most Part as weak and feeble in Body as base in Mind, not one in ten possessed of any of the necessary Requisites of a Soldier."—Ibid. App. p. 103.

1756.—"... in this plight, from half an hour after eleven till near two in the morning, I sustained the weight of a heavy man, with his knees on my back, and the pressure of his whole body on my head; a Dutch sergeant, who had taken his seat upon my left shoulder, and a Topaz bearing on my right."—Holwell's Narr. of the Black Hole, ed. 1758, p. 19.

1758.—"There is a distinction said to be made by you... which, in our opinion, does no way square with rules of justice and equity, and that is the exclusion of Portuguese topasses, and other Christian natives, from any share of the money granted by the Nawab."—Court's Letter, in Long, 133.

c. 1785.—"Topasses, black foot soldiers, descended from Portuguese marrying natives, called topasses because they wear hats."—Carveccio's Olive, iv. 564. The same explanation in Orme, i. 80.

1787.—"... Assuredly the mixture of Moornen, Rajahpoots, Gentoois, and Malabars in the same corps is extremely beneficial... I have also recommended the corps of Topasses or descendants of Europeans, who retain the characteristic qualities of their progenitors."—Col. Fullarton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1789.—"Topasses are the sons of Europeans and black women, or low Portuguese, who are trained to arms."—Munro, Narr. 32i.

1817.—"Topasses, or persons whom we may denominate Indo-Portuguese, either the mixed produce of Portuguese and Indian parents, or converts to the Portuguese, from the Indian, faith."—J. Mill, Hist. iii. 19.

TOPE, s. This word is used in three quite distinct senses, from distinct origins.

a. Hind. top, 'a cannon.' This is Turkish top, adopted into Persian and Hindustani. We cannot trace it further. [Mr. Platts regards T. top, as meaning originally 'a round mass,' from Skt. stūpa, for which see below.]

b. A grove or orchard, and in Upper India especially a mango-orchard. The word is in universal use by the English, but is quite unknown to the natives of Upper India. It is in fact Tam. tōppu, Tel. tōpu, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tam. togu, 'to collect,'] and must have been carried to Bengal by foreigners at an early period of European traffic. But Wilson is curiously mistaken in supposing it to be in common use in Hindustan by natives. The word used by them is bāgh.

c. An ancient Buddhist monument in the form of a solid dome. The word top is in local use in the N.W. Punjab, where ancient monuments of this kind occur, and appears to come from Skt. stūpa through the Pali or TOPE-KHANA.

Prakrit thūpo. According to Sir H. Elliott (i. 505), Stupa in Icelandic signifies ‘a Tower.’ We cannot find it in Cleasby. The word was first introduced to European knowledge by Mr. Elphinstone in his account of the Tope of Manikyala in the Rawul Pindi district.

[1857.—"Tope." See under TOPE-KHANA.]

[1894.—"The big gun near the Central Museum of Labor called the Zam-Zamah or Bhanjavanati tope, seems to have held much the same place with the Sikhs as the Malik-i-Maidān held in Bijapur."—Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 612.]

b.— 1673.—"... flourished pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocoes, Guavas."—Fryer, 40.

"The Country is Sandy; yet plentiful in Provisions; in all places, Tops of Trees."—Ibid. 41.

1747.—"The Topes and Walks of Trees in and about the Bounds will furnish them with firewood to burn, and Clay for Bricks is almost everywhere."—Report of a Council of War at Ft. St. David, in Consns. of May 5, MS. in India Office.

1754.—"A multitude of People set to the work finished in a few days an entrenchment, with a stout mud wall, at a place called Faquuire's Tope, or the grove of the Faquuire."—Orme, i. 273.

1799.—"Upon looking at the Tope as I came in just now, it appeared to me, that when you get possession of the bank of the Nullah, you have the Tope as a matter of course."—Wellingtion, Desp. i. 28.

1809.—"... behind that a rich country, covered with rice fields and topes."—Ld. Valentia, i. 557.

1814.—"It is a general practice when a plantation of mango trees is made, to dig a well on one side of it. The well and the tope are married, a ceremony at which all the village attends, and large sums are often expended."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 56.

C.—
[1839.—"Tope is an expression used for a mound or barrow as far west as Peshawer."—Elphinstone, Cautul, 2nd ed. i. 108.]

TOPE-KHANA, s. The Artillery, Artillery Park, or Ordnance Department, Turco-Pers. top-khāna, 'cannon-house' or 'cannon-department.' The word is the same that appears so often in reports from Constantinople as the Tophanah. Unless the traditions of Donna Tofana are historical, we are strongly disposed to suspect that Agua Tofana may have had its name from this word.

1857.—"The Toptchi. These are Gunners, called so from the word Tope, which in Turkish signifies a Cannon, and are in number about 1200, distributed in 52 Chambers; their Quarters are at Tophana, or the place of Guns in the Suburbs of Constantinople."—Rycart's Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 94.

1726.—"Isfandar Chan, chief of the Artillery (called the Daroger (see DAROGA) of the Topscanna)."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 276.

1765.—"He and his troops knew that by the treachery of the Tope Khonnah Droger (see DAROGA), the cannon were loaded with powder only."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c. i. 96.

TOPEE, s. A hat, Hind. toppi. This is sometimes referred to Port. topo, 'the top' (also tope, a 'top-knot,' and topete, a 'toupee'), which is probably identical with English and Dutch top, L. German toppy, Fr. topet, &c. But there is also a simpler Hind. word top, for a helmet or hat, and the quotation from the Roteiro Vocabulary seems to show that the word existed in India when the Portuguese first arrived. With the usual tendency to specialize foreign words, we find this word becomes specialized in application to the sola hat.

1498.—In the vocabulary ("Este he a linguagem de Calicaut") we have: "barrete (i.e. a cap): toppy."—Roteiro, 118.

The following expression again, in the same work, seems to be Portuguese, and to refer to some mode in which the women's hair was dressed: "Trazem em uma meirela umas topetes por signall que sao Christiào."—Ibid. 52.

1849.—"Our good friend Sol came down in right earnest on the waste, and there is need of many a fold of twisted muslin round the white topi, to keep off his importance."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 2.

1853.—"Topee, a solar helmet."—Wills, Modern Persia, 263.

TOPEEWALA, s. Hind. topiwăal, 'one who wears a hat,' generally a European, or one claiming to be so. Formerly by Englishmen it was habitually applied to the dark descendants of the Portuguese. R. Drummond says that in his time (before 1808) Topewala and Puggrwala were used in Guzerat and the Mahratta country for 'Europeans' and 'natives.' [The S. Indian form is Toppihăr.] The author of the Persian Life of Hydur Naik (Or. Tr. Fund, by Miles) calls Europeans Kalah-posh, i.e., "hat-wearers" (p. 85).

1803.—"The descendants of the Portugese . . . unfortunately the ideas of Christianity are so imperfect that the only mode they hit upon of displaying their faith is by wearing hats and breeches."—Sydney Smith, Works, 8d. ed. iii. 5.

[1826.—"It was now evident we should have to encounter the Topee walls."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 71.]

1874.—". . . you will see that he will not be able to protect us. All topiwálás . . . are brothers to each other. The magistrates and the judge will always decide in favour of their white brethren."—Govinda Samanta, ii. 211.

TORCULL, s. This word occurs only in Castanheda. It is the Malayalam tirú-kōyil, [Tam. tirú, Skt. śrī, 'holy' koṇiil, 'temple']. See i. 253, 254; also the English Trans. of 1852, f. 151. In fact, in the 1st ed. of the 1st book of Castanheda turcoll occurs where pagode is found in subsequent editions. [Tricalore in S. Arcot is in Tam. Tirukkoṭyilār, with the same meaning.]

TOSHACONNA, s. P.—H. tosha-khdna. The repository of articles received as presents, or intended to be given as presents, attached to a government-office, or great man's establishment. The tosha-khdna is a special department attached to the Foreign Secretariat of the Government of India.

[1616.—"Now indeed the atashckanno was become a right stage."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 300.]

[1742.—". . . the Treasury, Jewels, toshíkh-khanna . . . that belonged to the Emperor. . . ."—Fraser, H. of Nadir Shah, 178.]

1799.—"After the capture of Seringapatam, and before the country was given over to the Raja, some brass swamies (q.v.), which were in the toshèkhanā were given to the brahmins of different pagodas, by order of Macleod and the General. The prize-agents require payment for them."—Wellington, i. 56.

[1885.—"When money is presented to the Viceroy, he always 'remits' it, but when presents of jewels, arms, stuffs, horses, or other things of value are given him, they are accepted, and are immediately handed over to the tósh khana or Government Treasury . . ."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 75.]

TOSTDAUN, s. Military Hind. tosdàn for a cartouche-box. The word appears to be properly Pers. toshadán, 'provision-holder,' a wallet.

[1841.—"This last was, however, merely 'tos-dán kee awooz'—a cartouch-box report—as our sepucys oddly phrase a vague rumour."—Society in India, ii. 223.]

TOFY, s. Tam. totti, Canar. tôliga, from Tam. tondu, 'to dig,' properly a low-caste labourer in S. India, and a low-caste man who in villages receives certain allowances for acting as messenger, &c., for the community, like the gorayt of N. India.

1730.—"Il y a dans chaque village un homme de service, appélé Totti, qui est chargé des impositions publiques."—Lett. Edifi. xiii. 371.

[1883.—"The name Totty being considered objectionable, the same officers in the new arrangements are called Juléars (see TALLIAR) when assigned to Police, and Vettions when employed in Revenue duties."—Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 211.]

TOUCAN, s. This name is very generally misapplied by Europeans to the various species of Hornbill, formerly all styled Buceros, but now subdivided into various genera. Jerdon says: "They (the hornbills) are, indeed, popularly called Toucans throughout India; and this appears to be their name in some of the Malayan isles; the word signifying 'a worker,' from the noise they make." This would imply that the term did originally belong to a species of hornbill, and not to the S. American Rhamphastes or Zygodyctyle. Tukang is really in Malay a 'craftsman or artificer'; but the dictionaries show no application to the bird. We have here, in fact, a remarkable instance of the coincidences which often justly perplex etymologists, or would perplex them if it were not so much their habit to seize on one solution and despise the others. Not only is tukang in Malay 'an artificer,' but, as Willoughby tells us, the Spaniards called the real S. American toucan 'carpintero' from the noise he makes. And yet there seems no doubt that Toucan is a Brazilian name for a Brazilian bird. See the quotations, and especially Thévet's, with its date.

The Toucan is described by Oviedo (c. 1535), but he mentions only the name by which "the Christians" called it,—in Ramusio's Italian Picotto (I Bottico; Sommario, in Ramusio, iii. f. 60). [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) gives only the Brazilian derivation.
The question is still further discussed, without any very definite result, save that it is probably an imitation of the cry of the bird, in N. & Q. 9 ser. vii. 486; viii. 22, 67, 85, 171, 250.]

1556. — "Sur la coste de la marine, la plus frequete marchandise est le plumage d‘vn oysseu, qu‘ils appellent en leur langue Toucan, lequel descrivons sommairement puis qu‘il vient a propos. C‘est oysseu est de la grandeur d‘vn pigeon. ... Au reste c‘est oysseu est merveilleusement difforme et monstrueux, ayant le bec plus gros et plus long quasi que le reste du corps." — Les Singularitez de la France Antarctiques, autrement nommee Amerique, ... Par T. André Thevet, Natif d‘Angoulême, Paris, 1558, f. 91.

See also (1599) Adrovandus, Ornitholog. lib. xii. cap. 19, where the word is given toucham.

Here is an example of misapplication to the Hornbill, though the latter name is also given:

1885. — "Soopah (in N. Canara) is the only region in which I have met with the toucan or great hornbill. ... I saw the comical looking head with its huge aquiline beak, regarding me through a fork in the branch; and I account it one of the best shots I ever made, when I sent a ball ... through the head just at its junction with the handsome orange-coloured helmet which surmounts it. Down came the toucan with outspread wings, dead apparently; but when my pen Manoel raised him by the thick muscular neck, he fastened his great claws on his hand, and made the wood resound with a succession of roars more like a bull than a bird." — Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, &c. pp. 37-38.

TOWLEEA, s. Hind. tanliya, ‘a towel.’ This is a corruption, however, not of the English form, but rather of the Port. toalha (Panjab N. & Q., 1885, ii. 117).

TRAGA, s. [Molesworth gives "S. trâga, Guz. trâgu"]; trâga does not appear in Monier-Williams’s Skt. Dict., and Wilson queries the word as doubtful. Dr. Grierson writes: "I cannot trace its origin back to Skt. One is tempted to connect it with the Skt. root trei, or trd, ‘to protect,’ but the termination gâ presents difficulties which I cannot get over. One would expect it to be derived from some Skt. word like trâka, but no such word exists."] The extreme form of dhurna (q.v.), among the Râjputs and connected tribes, in which the complainant presents himself, or some member of his family, to torture or death, as a mode for bringing vengeance on the oppressor. The tone adopted by some persons and papers at the time of the death of the great Charles Gordon, tended to imply their view that his death was a kind of traga intended to bring vengeance on those who had sacrificed him. [For a case in Greece, see Pausanias, X. i. 6. Another name for this self-sacrifice is Chanâ, which is perhaps Skt. candâ, ‘passionate’ (see Malcolm, Cent. India, 2nd ed. ii. 137). Also compare the jûhar of the Râjputs (Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 74). And for Kûr, see As. Res. iv. 357 seqq.]

1813. — "Every attempt to levy an assessment is succeeded by the Tarakaw, a most horrid mode of murdering themselves and each other." — Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 61; [2nd ed. i. 378; and see i. 214].

1819. — For an affecting story of Traga, see Macnwardo, in Bo. Lit. Soc. Trans. 1. 251.

[TRANKEY, s. A kind of boat used in the Persian Gulf and adjoining seas. All attempts to connect it with any Indian or Persian word have been unsuccessful. It has been supposed to be connected with the Port. trîncador, a sort of flat-bottomed coating vessel with a high stern, and with trînquart, a herring-boat used in the English Channel. Smyth (Sailor’s Word-book, s.v.) has: "Trankeh or Trankies, a large boat of the Gulf of Persia." See N. & Q. 8 ser. vii. 167, 376.]

[1554. — "He sent certain spies who went in Terranquins dressed as fishermen who caught fish inside the straits." — Couto, Dec. VI. Bk. x. ch. 20.

[1750. — "... he remained some years in obscurity, till an Arab trankey being driven in there by stress of weather, he made himself known to his countrymen. ..." — Gros, 1st ed. 25.

[1758. — "Taghi Khan ... soon after embarked a great number of men in small vessels." In the note Terranquins. — Hanswy, iv. 181.]
TRANQUEBAR, n.p. A seaport of S. India, which was in the possession of the Danes till 1807, when it was taken by England. It was restored to the Danes in 1814, and purchased from them, along with Serampore, in 1845. The true name is said to be Tarangambadi, 'Sea-Town' or 'Wave-Town'; so the Madras Gloss; but in the Man. (ii. 216) it is interpreted 'Street of the Telegu people.'

1610.—"The members of the Company have petitioned me, that inasmuch as they were to reside to God in their establishment at Negapatam, both among Portuguese and natives, and that there is a settlement of newly converted Christians who are looked after by the catechumens of the parish (freguezia) of Trangabar."—King's Letter, in Livros das Monções, p. 285.

[1683-4.—'This Morning the Portuguese ship that came from Vizagapatam Sailed hence for Trangambard.'—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 16.]

TRAVANCORE, n.p. The name of a village south of Trevandrum, from which the ruling dynasty of the kingdom which is known by the name has been called. The true name is said to be Thiruvidān-kōdu, shortened to Thiruvānkoḍu. [The Madras Gloss gives Thiruvitān kōr, tiru, Skt. ४्र, 'the goddess of prosperity,' vāzhū, 'to reside,' kēr, 'part.]

[1514.—'As to the money due from the Raja of Travancor. ...'—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 270.]

1553.—"And at the place called Travancor, where this Kingdom of Coulam terminates, there begins another Kingdom, taking its name from this very Travancor, the king of which our people call the Roy Grande, because he is greater in his dominion, and in the state which he keeps, than those other princes of Malabar; and he is subject to the King of Narsinga."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1609.—"The said Governor has written to me that most of the kings adjacent to our State, whom he advised of the coming of the rebels, had sent replies in a good spirit, with expressions of friendship, and with promises not to admit the rebels into their ports, all but him of Travancor, from whom no answer had yet come."—King of Spain's Letter, in Livros das Monções, p. 257.

TRIBENY, n.p. Skt. tri-veṇi, 'threefold braid'; a name which properly belongs to Prayāga (Allahābād), where the three holy rivers, Ganges, Jumna, and (unseen) Sarasvati are considered to unite. But local requirements have instituted another Tribeni in the Ganges Delta, by bestowing the name of Jumna and Sarasvati on two streams connected with the Hugli. The Bengal Tribeni gives name to a village, which is a place of great sanctity, and to which the melas or religious fairs attract many visitors.

1682.—"... if I refused to stay there he would certainly stop me again at Trippany some miles further up the River."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 38.]

1705.—"... pendant la Lune de Mars ... il arrive la Fête de Tripigny, c'est un Dieu enfermé dans une manière de petite Mosquée, qui est dans le milieu d'une tres-grande plaine ... au bord du Gange."—Luillier, 69.

1753.—"Au-dessous de Nudia, à Tripini, dont le nom signifie trois eaux, le Gange fait encore sortir du même côté un canal, qui par sa rentrée, forme une seconde ile renfermée dans la première."—D'Anville, 64.

TRICHIES, TRITCHIES, s. The familiar name of the cheroots made at Trichinopoly; long, and rudely made, with a straw inserted at the end for the mouth. They are (or were) cheap and coarse, but much liked by those used to them. Mr. C. P. Brown, referring to his etymology of Trichinopoly under the succeeding article, derives the word cheroot from the form of the name which he assigns. But this, like his etymology of the place-name, is entirely wrong (see CHEROOT). Some excellent practical scholars seem to be entirely without the etymological sense.

1876.—"Between whiles we smoked, generally Manillas, now supplanted by foul Dindigulis and fetid Trichies."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 7.

TRICHINOPOLY, n.p. A district and once famous rock-fort of S. India. The etymology and proper form of the name has been the subject of much difference. Mr. C. P. Brown gives the true name as Chiruta-palli, 'Little-Town.' But this may be safely rejected as mere guess, inconsistent with facts. The earliest occurrence of the name on an inscription is (about 1520) as Tiru-sēkula-palli, apparently 'Holy-rock-town.' In the Tevāram the place is said to be mentioned under the name of Sirapalli. Some derive it from Tri-siva-puram, ‘Three- head-town,’ with allusion to a ‘three-headed demon.’

[The Madras Gloss. gives Tiruchêinappalli, tiru, ‘holy,’ shina, ‘the plant cissampelos pareira, l. palli, ‘village.’]

1677.—“Tritchenapalli.”—A. Bassing, in Valentinij, v. (Ceylon), 300.

1741.—“The Maratas concluded the campaign by putting this whole Peninsula under contribution as far as C. Cumerim, attacking, conquering, and retaining the city of Tirukkerapali, capital of Madura, and taking prisoner the Nabab who governed it.”—Report of the Port. Viceroy, in Bosquejo das Possessões, &c., Documentos, ed. 1858, p. 19.

1753.—“Ces embouchures are in grand nombre, vü la division de ce fleuve en différents bras ou canaux, à remonter jusqu’à Tirishirapali, et à la pagode de Shringham.”—D’Aville, 115.

1761.—“After the battle Mahommed Ali Khan, son of the late nabob, fled to Truchinapoli, a place of great strength.”—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1761, p. 3.

TRINCOMALEE, n.p. A well-known harbour on the N.E. coast of Ceylon. The proper name is doubtful. It is alleged to be Tirukko-nâtha-malai, or Turanga-malai. The last (‘Sea-Hill’) seems conceived to fit our modern pronunciation, but not the older forms. It is perhaps Tri-konna-malai, for ‘Three-peak Hill.’ There is a shrine of Siva on the hill, called Trikoneśvara; [so the Madras Man. (ii. 216)].

1553.—“And then along the coast towards the north, above Baticolon, there is the kingdom of Triquinamale.”—Barros, II. ii. cap. 1.

1602.—“This Prince having departed, made sail, and was driven by the winds unknowing whither he went. In a few days he came in sight of a desert island (being that of Ceilon), where he made the land at a haven called Preaturé, between Triquinimal and the point of Jafanapatam.”—Codo, V. i. 5.

1672.—“Trinquenemale hath a surpassingly fine harbour, as may be seen from the draught thereof, yea one of the best and largest in all Ceylon, and better sheltered from the winds than the harbours of Belligamme, Gale, or Colombo.”—Baldeau, 413.

1675.—“The Cinghalas themselves oppose this, saying that they emigrated from another country . . . that some thousand years ago, a Prince of great piety, driven out of the land of Tanassery . . . came to land near the Hill of Tricoenmale with 1500 or 2000 men . . .”—Ruyklof van Goens, in Valentinij (Ceylon), 210.

1685.—“Triquinimale . . .”—Ribeyro, Fr. Tr. 9.

1726.—“Trinkenemale, properly Tricoenmale” (i.e. Trikunamale).—Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

“‘Trinkemale. . . .”—Ibid. 103.

1727.—“. . . that vigilant Dutchman was soon after them with his Fleet, and forced them to fight disadvantageously in Tranka-malaya Bay, wherein the French lost one half of their Fleet, being either sunk or burnt.”—A. Hamilton, i. 343, [ed. 1744].

1761.—“We arrived at Trincomale in Ceylone (which is one of the finest, if not ye best and most capacious Harbours in ye World) the first of November, and employed that and part of the ensuing Month in preparing our Ships for ye next Campaign.”—Ms. Letter of James Rennell, Jan. 31.

TRIPANG, s. The sea-slug. This is the Malay name, tripang, térıpang. See SWALLOW, and BÉCHE-DE-MER.

[1817.—“Bich de mat” is well known to be a dried sea-slug used in the dishes of the Chinese; it is known among the Malayan Islands by the name of Tripang . . .”—Rayfles, H. of Java, 2nd ed. i. 292.]

TRIPLICANE, n.p. A suburb of Fort St. George; the part where the palace of the “Nabob of the Carnatic” is. It has been explained, questionably, as Tiru-valli-kiđi, ‘sacred-creeper-tank,’ Seshagiri Sastri gives it as Tiru-alli-keni, ‘sacred lily, (Nymphæa rubra) tank,’ [and so the Madras Gloss, giving the word as Tiruvallikkâni.]

1674.—“There is an absolute necessity to go on fortifying this place in the best manner we can, our enemies at sea and land being within less than musket shot, and better fortified in their camp at Trivelicane than we are here.”—Fl. St. Geo. Conns. Feb. 2. In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1871, No. I. p. 28.

1679.—“The Didwan (Dewaun) from Conjeveram, who pretends to have come from Court, having sent word from Treplicane which unless the Governor would come to the garden by the river side to receive the Phyrmaund he would carry it back to Court again, answer is returned that it hath not been acustomary for the Governours to go out to receive a bare Phyrmaund except there come therewith a Serpow (see SEER-PAW) or a Tashiriff” (see TASHREEF).—Do., do., Dec. 2. Ibid. 1873, No. III. p. 40.

[1682-4.—“Triblicane, Treblicane, Tripivy.”—Diary Fl. St. Geo. ed. Pringle, i. 63 ; iii. 154.]

TRIVANDRUM, n.p. The modern capital of the State now known as Travancore (q.v.) Properly Tiruv-anantâ-puram, ‘Sacred Vishnu-Town.’
TRUMPÁK, n.p. This is the name by which the site of the native suburb of the city of Ormus on the famous island of that name is known. The real name is shown by Lt. Stiffe's account of that island (Geogr. Mag. i. 13) to have been Turán-bagh, 'Garden of Turūn,' and it was properly the palace of the old Kings, of whom more than one bore the name of Tūrūn or Tūrūn Shāh.

1507.—"When the people of the city saw that they were so surrounded, that from no direction could water be brought, which was what they felt most of all, the principal Moors collected together and went to the king desiring him earnestly to provide a guard for the pools of Turumbaque, which were at the head of the island, lest the Portuguese should obtain possession of them. . . ."—Comment. of Albuquerque, E.T. by Birch, i. 175.

"Meanwhile the Captain-Major ordered Afonso Lopes de Costa and João da Nova, and Manuel Teles with his people to proceed along the water's edge, whilst he with all the rest of the force would follow, and come to a place called Turumbaque, which is on the water's edge, in which there were some palm-trees, and wells of brackish water, which supplied the people of the city with drink when the water-boats were not arriving, as sometimes happened owing to a contrary wind."—Correa, i. 830.

1610.—"The island has no fresh water . . . only in Torumpaque, which is a piece of white salt clay, at the extremity of the island, there is a well of fresh water, of which the King and the Wazir take advantage, to water the gardens which they have there, and which produce perfectly everything which is planted."—Teixeira, Rel. de los Reyes de Hormuz, 115.

1682.—"Behind the hills, to the S.S.W. and W.S.W. there is another part of the island, lying over against the anchorage that we have mentioned, and which includes the place called Turumbaque . . . here one sees the ancient pleasure-house of the old Kings of Ormus, with a few small trees, and sundry date-palms. There are also here two great wells of water, called after the name of the place, 'The Wells of Turumbaque'; which water is the most wholesome and the freshest in the whole island."—Nieuhof, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 86.

TUAH, s. Malay tuan and tuwan, 'lord, master.' The word is used in the English and Dutch settlements of the Archipelago exactly as sahib is in India. [An early Chinese form of the word is referred to under SUMATRA.]

1553.—"Dom Paulo da Gama, who was a worthy son of his father in his zeal to do the King good service . . . equipped a good fleet, of which the King of Ugentana (see UJUNGTANAH) had presently notice, who in all speed set forth his own, consisting of 30 lançaras, with a large force on board, and in command of which he put a valiant Moor called Tuam-bâr, to whom the King gave orders that as soon as our force had quitted the fortress (of Malacca) not leaving enough people to defend it, he should attack the town of the Queleys (see KLING) and burn and destroy as much as he could."—Correa, iii. 486.

1583.—"For where this word Raja is used, derived from the kingly title, it attaches to a person on whom the King bestows the title, almost as among us that of Count, whilst the style Tuam is like our Dom; only the latter of the two is put before the person's proper name, whilst the former is put after it, as we see in the names of these two Javanese, Vitmuti Raja, and Tuam Colasear."—Barros, ii. vi. 3.

[1893.—". . . the coolly talked over the affairs of the Tuan Ingris (English gentleman) to a crowd of natives."—W. B. Worsfold, A Visit to Java, 145.]

TUCKÁVEE, s. Money advanced to a ryot by his superior to enable him to carry on his cultivation, and recoverable with his quota of revenue. It is Ar.—H. takóvi, from Ar. kāvi, 'strength,' thus literally 'a reinforcement.'

"A great many of them, who have now been forced to work as labourers, would have thankfully received tacaivy, to be repaid, by instalments, in the course of two or three years."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 188.

1880.—"When the Sirkar disposed of lands which reverted to it . . . it sold them almost always for a nazārāna (see NUZZER-ANA). It sometimes gave them gratis, but it never paid money, and seldom or ever advanced takāvi to the tenant or owner.”—Minutes of Sir T. Munro, i. 71. These words are not in Munro's spelling. The Editor has reformed the orthography.

TUCKEED, s. An official reminder. Ar.—H. takād, 'emphasis, injunction,' and verb takād karnā, 'to enjoin stringently, to insist.'

1862.—‘I can hardly describe to you my life—work all day, English and Persian, scores of appeals and session cases, and a continual irritation of tuckeed and offensive remarks...these take away all the enjoyment of doing one's duty, and make work a slavery.’—Letter from Col. J. R. Becher, in (unpublished) Memoir, p. 28.

TUCKIAH, s. Pers. tak&aacute;ya, literally 'a pillow or cushion'; but commonly used in the sense of a hut or hermitage occupied by a fakir or holy man.

1800.—‘He declared...that two of the people charged...had been at his tuckiah.’—Wellington, Desp. i. 78.

1847.—‘The centre of the wood was a Faqir's Talkīat (sic) or Place of Prayer, situated on a little mound.’—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, &c., ii. 47.

TULWAIR, s. Hind. talwar and tarvār, 'a sabre.' Williams gives Skt. taravāri and tarabālīka. ["Talwar is a general term applied to shorter or more or less curved side-arms, while those that are lighter and shorter still are often styled nimchās"] (Sir W. Elliot, in Ind. Antiq. xva. 29). Also see Eyerton, Handaibook, 138.

1799.—‘...Ahmood Sollay...drew his tolwa on one of them.’—Jackson, Journey from India, 49.

1829.—‘...the panchās huzār turwar Rohbordān, meaning the 'fifty thousand Rohoire swords,' is the proverbial phrase to denote the master of Maroo...’—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 179.

1853.—‘The old native officer who carried the royal colour of the regiment was cut down by a blow of a Sikh tulwar.’—Oakfield, ii. 78.

TUMASHA, s. An entertainment, a spectacle (in the French sense), a popular excitement. It is Ar. tamāshi, 'going about to look at anything entertaining.' The word is in use in Turkestan (see Schuyler, below).

1631.—‘Hic quoque meridiem prospriet, ut spectet Thamasham id est pugnas Elephantum Leonum Buffaloorum et aliarum ferarum...’—De Laet, De Imperio Magni Mogoliæ, 127. (For this quotation I am indebted to a communication from Mr. Archibald Constable of the Oudh and Rohilkund Railway.—Y.)

1673.—‘...We were discovered by some that told our Banyan...that two Englishmen were come to the Tomasia, or Sight...’—Fryer, 159.

1705.—‘Tamachars. Ce sont des réjouissances que les Gentils font en l'honneur de quelqu'unes de quelqu'un de divinitez.’—Luillier, Tab. des Matières.

1840.—‘Runjeet replied, 'Don't go yet; I am going myself in a few days, and then we will have burra tomacha.’’—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 120-121.

1876.—‘If you told them that you did not want to buy anything, but had merely come for tomasha, or amusement, they were always ready to explain and show you everything you wished to see.’—Schuyler's Turkistan, i. 176.

TUMLET, s. Domestic Hind. tamlet, being a corruption of tumbler.

TUMLOOK, n.p. A town, and anciently a sea-port and seat of Buddhist learning on the west of the Hooghly near its mouth, formerly called Tāmrālpith or -lipta. It occurs in the Mahābārata and many other Sanskrit words. "In the Dasa Kumāra and Vrihat Katha, collections of tales written in the 9th and 12th centuries, it is always mentioned as a great port of Bengal, and the seat of an active and flourishing commerce with the countries and islands of the Bay of Bengal, and the Indian Ocean" (Prof. H. H. Wilson, in J. R. As. Soc. v. 135). [Also see Cunningham, Auct. Geog. p. 504.]

c. 150.—"...καὶ πρὸς αὐτῷ τῷ ποιμάνι (𝑻𝒂ὔ𝒈𝒈 useDispatch) τοιὲς..." * * *

Πολυμυθόδωρος βασιλευὸς

Ταμμαλιπῆς..."

—Plotemy's Tables, Bk. VII. i. 73.

c. 410.—"From this, continuing to go eastward nearly 50 γῆθανες, we arrive at the Kingdom of Tamralipti. Here it is the river (Ganges) empties itself into the sea. Fah Hian remained here for two years, writing out copies of the Sacred Books. He then shipped himself on board a great merchant vessel."

c. 1070.—"...a merchant named Harshagupta, who had arrived from Tamralipti, having heard of that event, came TUMTUM. s. A dog-cart. We do not know the origin. [It is almost certainly a corr. of English tandem, the slang use of which in the sense of a conveyance (according to the Stanf. Dict.) dates from 1807. Even now English-speaking natives often speak of a dog-cart with a single horse as a tandem.]

1866.—"We had only 3 coss to go, and we should have met a pair of tuntums which would have taken us on."—Trevilyan, The Dakw Bungalow, 384.

1889.—"A G.B.T. cart once married a bathing-machine, and they called the child Tum-tum."—R. Kipling, The City of Dreadful Nights, 74.

TUNCA, TUNCW, &c., s. P.—H. tankhwa, pron. tankhā. Properly an assignment on the revenue of a particular locality in favour of an individual; but in its most ordinary modern sense it is merely a word for the wages of a monthly servant. For a full account of the special older uses of the word see Wilson. In the second quotation the use is obscure; perhaps it means the villages on which assignments had been granted.

1758.—"Roydoolub . . . has taken the discharge of the tuncaws and the arrears of the Nabob's army upon himself."—Orme, iii.; [ii. 361].

1760.—"You have been under the necessity of writing to Mr. Holwell (who was sent to collect in the tuncares) . . . The low men that are employed in the tuncares are not to be depended on."—The Narrative of the Prest. and Council of Ft. Wm., in Long, 233.

1778.—"These rescripts are called tuncaws, and entitle the holder to receive to the amount from the treasuries . . . as the revenues come in."—Orme, ii. 276.

1823.—"The Grassiiah or Rajpoor chiefs . . . were satisfied with a fixed and known tanka, or tribute from certain territories, one of which they had a real or pretended claim."—Macaulay, Cent. India, 2nd. ed. i. 385.

1851.—"The Sikh detachments . . . used to be paid by tankhwas, or assignments of the provincial collectors of revenue."—Edwardes, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 19.

TURA. s. Or. Turk. tāra. This word is used in the Autobiography of Baber, and in other Mahomedan military narratives of the 16th century. It is admitted by the translators of Baber that it is rendered by them quite conjecturally, and we cannot but think that they have missed the truth. The explanation of tāra which they quote from Meninski is "reticulatus," and combining this with the manner in which the quotations show these tāra to have been employed, we cannot but think that the meaning which best suits is 'a gabion.' Sir H. Elliot, in referring to the first passage from Baber, adopts the reading tābra, and says: "Tābras are nose-bags, but . . . Badāunī makes the meaning plain, by saying that they were filled with earth (Tārikh-i-Badāunī, f. 130). . . . The sacks used by Sher Shāh as temporary fortifications on his march towards Rājpūtdāna were tābras" (Elliot, vi. 469). It is evident, however, that Baber's tāras were no tobāras, whilst a reference to the passage (Elliot, iv. 405) regarding Sher Shāh shows that the use of bags filled with sand on that occasion was regarded as a new contrivance. The tābra of Badāunī may therefore probably be a misreading; whilst the use of gabions implies necessarily that they would be filled with earth.

1528.—(At the Battle of Pānpāit) "I directed that, according to the custom of Rūm, the gun-carriages should be connected together with twisted bull-hides as with chains. Between every two gun-carriages were 6 or 7 tūras (or breastworks). The matchlockmen stood behind these guns and tūras, and discharged their matchlocks. . . . It was settled, that as Pānpāit was a considerable city, it would cover one of our flanks by its buildings and houses while we might fortify our front by tūras . . ."—Baber, p. 304.
1528.—(At the siege of Chânderi) "overseers and pioneers were appointed to construct works on which the guns were to be planted. All the men of the army were directed to prepare türas and scaling-ladders, and to serve the türas which are used in attacking forts. . . ."—Ibid. p. 376. The editor's note at the former passage is: "The meaning (viz. 'breastwork') assigned to Tûra here, and in several other places is merely conjectural, founded on Petis de la Croix's explanation, and on the meaning given by Meninski to Tûr, viz. reticulatus. The Tûras may have been formed by the branches of trees, interwoven like basket-work . . . or they may have been covered defences from arrows and missiles . . ."

Again: "These Tûras, so often mentioned, appear to have been a sort of testudo, under cover of which the assailants advanced, and sometimes breached the wall. . . ."

TURAKA, n.p. This word is applied both in Mahratti and in Telugu to the Mahommedans (Turks). [The usual form in the inscriptions is Turushka (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 189).] Like this is Turâk (see TAROUK) which the Burmese now apply to the Chinese.

TURBAN, s. Some have supposed this well-known English word to be a corruption of the P.—H. sirband, 'head-wrap,' as in the following:

1727.—"I bought a few seerbunds and sumnookes there (at Cuttack) to know the difference of the prices."—A. Hamilton, i. 394 (see PIECE-GOODS).

This, however, is quite inconsistent with the history of the word. Wedgwood's suggestion that the word may be derived from Fr. turbin, 'a whelk,' is equally to be rejected. It is really a corruption of one which, though it seems to be out of use in modern Turkish, was evidently used by the Turks when Europe first became familiar with the Ottomans and their ways. This is set forth in the quotation below from Zedler's Lexicon, which is corroborated by those from Rycaut and from Galland, &c. The proper word was apparently dulband. Some modern Persian dictionaries give the only meaning of this as 'a sash.' But Meninski explains it as 'a cloth of fine white muslin; a wrapper for the head'; and Villiers also gives it this meaning, as well as that of a 'sash or belt.'* In doing so he quotes Shakespear's Dict., and marks the use as 'Hindustani-Persian.' But a merely Hindustani use of a Persian word could hardly have become habitual in Turkey in the 15th and 16th centuries. The use of dulband for a turban was probably genuine Persian, adopted by the Turks. Its etymology is apparently from Arab. dul, 'volvere,' admitting of application to either a girdle or a head-wrap. From the Turks it passed in the forms Tulipant, Tolliban, Turbant, &c., into European languages. And we believe that the flower tulip also has its name from its resemblance to the old Ottoman turban, [a view accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v. tulip, turban)].*

1487.—". . . tele bambagine assai che loro chiamano turbanti; tele assai colla salda, che lor chiamano sexe (sash). . . ."—Letter on presents from the Sultan to L. de' Medici, in Roscoe's Lorenzo, ed. 1825, ii. 371-72.

c. 1490.—"Estradiots sont gens comme Genetaires: vestuz, à pied et à cheval, comme les Turcs, sauf la teste, où ils ne portent ceste toille qu'ils appellent tolliban, et sont durs gens, et couchent dehors tout l'an et leurs chevaux."—Ph. de Commynes, Liv. VIII. ch. viii. ed. Dupont (1843), ii. 456. Thus given in Danett's translation (1595): "These Estradiots are soldiers like to the Turkes Ianizaries, and attired both on foote and on horsebacke like to the Turks, save that they weare not vpon their head such a great royle of linnen as the Turkes do called (sic) Tolliban."—p. 325.

1674.—“El Tanadar de un golpo cortó las repetidas bueletas del turbante a un Turco, y la cabeza asta la mitad, de que cayó muerto.”—Faria y Sousa, Asia Port. ii. 179-180.

1676.—“Mahamed Ali Beg returning into Persia out of India... presented Cha-Set the second with a Coco-nut about the bigness of an Austrich-egg... there was taken out of it a Turbant that had 60 cubits of calicut in length to make it, the cloath being so fine that you could hardly feel it.”—Twomey, E.T. p. 127; [ed. Ball, ii. 7].

1687.—In a detail of the high officers of the Sultan’s Court we find:

“5. The Tulbientar Aga, he that makes up his Turbant.”

A little below another personage (apparently) is called Tulbent-oqghlanı (“The Turban Page”)—Ricart, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 14.

1711.—“Their common Dress is a piece of blew Callico, wrap’d in a Rola round their Heads for a Turbat.”—Lockyer, 57.

1745.—“The Turks hold the Sultan’s Turban in honour to such a degree that they hardly dare touch it... but he himself has, among the servants of his privy chamber, one whose special duty it is to adjust his Turban, or head-tire, and who is thence called Tulbentar or Dulbentar Aga, or Dulbendar Aga, also called by some Dubbend Oghhanı, or Page of the Turban.”—Zedler, Universal Lexicon, s.v.

C. 1760.—“They (the Sepoys) are chiefly armed in the country manner, with sword and tare, and wear the Indian dress, the turbant, the cabay (Cabaya) or vest, and long drawers.”—Grose, i. 39.

1843.—“The mutiny of Vellore was caused by a slight shown to the Mahomedan turban; the mutiny of Bangalore by disrespect said to have been shown to a Mahomedan place of worship.”—Macaulay, Speech on Gates of Somanath.

TURKEY, s. This fowl is called in Hindustani pera, very possibly an indication that it came to India, perhaps first to the Spanish settlements in the Archipelago, across the Pacific, as the red pepper known as Chilli did. In Tamil the bird is called vad-kori, ‘great fowl.’ Our European names of it involve a complication of mistakes and confusions. We name it as if it came from the Levant. But the name turkey would appear to have been originally applied to another of the Pavo-nidae, the guinea-fowl, Meleagris of the ancients. Minshew’s explanations (quoted below) show strange confusions between the two birds. The French coq d’Inde or Dindon points only ambiguously to India, but the German Calecutische Hahn and the Dutch Kalkoen (from Calicuit) are specific in error as indicating the origin of the Turkey in the East. This misnomer may have arisen from the nearly simultaneous discovery of America and of the Cape route to Calicut, by Spain and Portugal respectively. It may also have been connected with the fact that Malabar produced domestic fowls of extraordinary size. Of these Ibn Batuta (quoted below) makes quaint mention. Zedler’s great German Lexicon of Universal Knowledge, a work published as late as 1745, says that these birds (turkeys) were called Calecutische and Indische because they were brought by the Portuguese from the Malabar coast. Dr. Caldwell cites a curious disproof of the antiquity of certain Tamil verses from their containing a simile of which the turkey forms the subject. And nave scholars, instead of admitting the anachronism, have boldly maintained that the turkey had always been found in India (Dravidian Gramm. 2nd ed. p. 137). Padre Paolino was apparently of the same opinion, for whilst explaining that the etymology of Calicut is "Castle of the Fowls," he asserts that Turkeys (Galli d'India) came originally from India; being herein, as he often is, positive and wrong. In 1615 we find W. Edwards, the E.I. Co.'s agent at Ajmir, writing to send the Mogul "three or four Turkey cocks and hens, for he hath three cocks but no hens" (Colonial Paper, E. i. c. 388). Here, however, the ambiguity between the real turkey and the guinea-fowl may possibly arise. In Egypt the bird is called Dik-Rum, 'fowl of Rum' (i.e. of Turkey), probably a rendering of the English term.

c. 1347.—"The first time in my life that I saw a China cock was in the city of Kaulam. I had at first taken it for an ostrich, and I was looking at it with great wonder, when the owner said to me, 'Pooh! there are cocks in China much bigger than that!' and when I got there I found that he had said no more than the truth."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 257.

1750-52.—"Some Germans call the turkeys Calcutta hens: for this reason I looked about for them here, and to the best of my remembrance I was told they were foreign."—Olof Torree, 199-200. We do not know whether the mistake of Calcutta for Calicut belongs to the original author or to the translator—probably to the proverbial traditore.

TURNEE, TUNNEE, s. An English supercargo, Sea-Hind., and probably a corruption of attorney. (Roebuck).

TURPAUL, s. Sea-Hind. A tarpaulin (ibid.). [The word (tarpaul) has now come into common native use.]

TUSSAH, TUSSER, s. A kind of inferior silk, the tissues of which are now commonly exported to England. Anglo-Indians generally regard the termination of this word in r as a vulgarism, like the use of solar for sola (q.v.); but it is in fact correct. For though it is written by Milburn (1813) tusha, and tusseh (ii. 158, 244), we find it in the Aín-i-Akbâri as tassar, and in Dr. Buchanan as tasar (see below). The term is supposed to be adopted from Skt. tassara, tussara, Hind. tasar, 'a shuttle'; perhaps from the form of the cocoon? The moth whose worm produced this silk is generally identified with Antheraea paphia, but Capt. Hutton has shown that there are several species known as tasar worms. These are found almost throughout the whole extent of the forest tracts of India. But the chief seat of the manufacture of stuffs, wholly or partly of tasar silk, has long been Bhagalpur on the Ganges. [See also Allen, Mon. on Silk Cloths of Assam, 1899; Yusuf Ali, Silk Fabrics of N.W.P., 1900.] The first mention of tasar in English reports is said to be that by Michael Atkinson of Jangipâr, as cited below in the Linnean Transactions of 1804 by Dr. Roxburgh (see Official Report on Sericulture in India, by J. Geoghegan, Calcutta, 1872), and the elaborate article in Watt, Écon. Dict. vi. pt. iii. 96 seqq.].

TUTICORIN, n.p. A sea-port of Tinnevelly, and long the seat of pearl-fishery, in Tamil Tuttukkudi, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tamil tattu, 'to scatter'; kudi, 'habitation']. According to Fra Paolo the name is Tutukodi, 'a place where nets are washed,' but he is not to be trusted. Another etymology alleged is from turu, 'a bush.' But see Bp. Caldwell below.

1544.—"At this time the King of Cape Comorin, who calls himself the Great King (see TRAVANCORE), went to war with a neighbour of his who was king of the places beyond the Cape, called Manaps and Tuttucorim inhabited by the Christians that were made there by Miguel Vaz, Vicar General of India at the time."—Correia, iv. 403.

1610.—"And the said Captain and Auditor shall go into residence every three years, and to him shall pertain all the temporal government, without any intermeddling therein of the members of the Company . . . nor shall the said members (religiosos) compel any of the Christians to remain in the island unless it is their voluntary choice to do so, and such as wish it may live at Tuttucorim."—King's Letter, in L. das Mompas, 386.

1851.—"The final n in Tuticorin was added for some such euphonic reason as turned Kochchi into Cochim and Kumari into Comorin. The meaning of the name Tuttukkudi is said to be 'the town where the wells get filled up'; from tattu (properly tarty, 'to fill up a well,' and kudi, 'a place of habitation, a town.' This derivation, whether the true one or not, has at least the merit of being appropriate. . . ."—Bp. Caldwell, Hist. of Tinnevelly, 75.

TYCONNA, TYEKANA, s. A room in the basement or cellaring, or dug in the ground, in which it has in some parts of India been the practice to keep the hottest part of the day during the hottest season of the year. Pers. tah-khdna, 'nether-house,' i.e. 'subterraneous apartment.' ['In the centre of the court is an elevated platform, the roof of a subterraneous chamber called a zeera zemos, whither travellers retire during the great heats of the summer" (Morier, Journey through Persia, &c., 81). Another name for such a place is sardabah (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 314).]
TYPHOON.

The Arabic word is ṭifān, which is used habitually in India for a sudden and violent storm. Lane defines it as meaning ‘an overpowering rain, . . . Noah’s flood,’ etc. And there can be little doubt of its identity with the Greek τυφῶν or τυφών. [But Burton (Ar. Nights, iii. 257) alleges that it is pure Arabic, and comes from the root ταύ, ‘going round.’] This word τυφῶν (the etymologists say, from τυφώ, ‘I raise smoke’) was applied to a demon-giant or Titan, and either directly from the etym. meaning or from the name of the Titan (as in India a whirlwind is called ‘a Devil or Pisachec’) to a ‘waterspout,’ and thence to analogous stormy phenomena. ‘Waterspout’ seems evidently the meaning of τυφῶν in the Meteorologica of Aristotle (γένεται μὲν οὖν τυφῶν . . . κ.τ.λ.) iii. 1; the passage is exceedingly difficult to render clearly); and also in the quotation which we give from Aulus Gellius. The word may have come to the Arabs either in maritime intercourse, or through the translations of Aristotle. It occurs (al-ṭifān) several times in the Koran; thus in sura, vii. 134, for a flood or storm, one of the plagues of Egypt, and in s. xxix. 14 for the Deluge.

Dr. F. Hirth, again (Journ. R. Geog. Soc. i. 260), advocates the quasi-Chinese origin of the word. Dr. Hirth has found the word Tai (and also with the addition of fung, ‘wind’) to be really applied to a certain class of cyclonic winds, in a Chinese work on Formosa, which is a re-issue of a book originally published in 1694. Dr. Hirth thinks Tai as here used (which is not the Chinese word ta or tai, ‘great,’ and is expressed by a different character) to be a local Formosan term; and is of opinion that the combination Tai-fung is “a sound so near that of typhoon as almost to exclude all other conjectures, if we consider that the writers using the term in European languages were travellers distinctly applying it to storms encountered in that part of the China Sea.” Dr. Hirth also refers to F. Mendes Pinto and the passages (quoted below) in which he says tufão is the Chinese name for such storms. Dr. Hirth’s paper is certainly worthy of much more attention than the

c. 1763.—“The throag that accompanied that minister proved so very great that the floor of the house, which happened to have a Tah-Quana, and possibly was at that moment under a secret influence, gave way, and the body, the Vizir, and all his company fell into the apartment underneath.”—Sei Mutagkerin, iii. 19.

1842.—“The heat at Jellalabad from the end of April was tremendous, 105° to 110° in the shade. Everybody who could so lived in underground chambers called ty-khanás. Broadfoot dates a letter ‘from my den six feet under ground.’”—Mrs. Mackenzie, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier’s Life, i. 288. [The same author in her Life in the Mission (i. 390) writes taikhana.]

TYphoon, s. A tornado or cyclone-wind; a sudden storm, a ‘nor'-wester’ (q.v.). Sir John Barrow (see Autobiog. 57) ridicules “learned anti-quarians” for fancying that the Chinese took typhoon from the Egyptian Typhon, the word being, according to him, simply the Chinese syllables, taph-fung, ‘Great Wind.’ His ridicule is misplaced. With a monosyllabic language like the Chinese (as we have remarked elsewhere) you may construct a plausible etymology, to meet the requirements of the sound alone, from anything and for anything. And as there is no evidence that the word is in Chinese use at all, it would perhaps be as fair a suggestion to derive it from the English “tough ’un.” Mr. Giles, who seems to think that the balance of evidence is in favour of this (Barrow’s) etymology, admits a serious objection to be that the Chinese have special names for the typhoon, and rarely, if ever, speak of it vaguely as a ‘great wind.’ The fact is that very few words of the class used by seafaring and trading people, even when they refer to Chinese objects, are directly taken from the Chinese language. E.g. Mandarin, paqoda, chop, cooly, tutemague;—none of these are Chinese. And the probability is that Vasco and his followers got the tufão, which our sailors made into toufoun and then into typhoon, as they got the monçao which our sailors made into monsoon, direct from the Arab pilots.

TUXALL, TAKSAUL. 947
scornful assertion of Sir John Barrow, but it does not induce us to change our view as to the origin of typhoon.

Observe that the Port. tufão distinctly represents tāfān and not vai-fung, and the oldest English form ‘tuffon’ does the same, whilst it is not by any means unquestionable that these Portuguese and English forms were first applied in the China Sea, and not in the Indian Ocean. Observe also Lord Bacon’s use of the word typhones in his Latin below; also that tāfān is an Arabic word, at least as old as the Koran, and closely allied in sound and meaning to υφός, whilst it is habitually used for a storm in Hindustani. This is shown by the quotations below (1810-1836); and Platts defines tāfān as “a violent storm of wind and rain, a tempest, a typhoon; a flood, deluge, inundation, the universal deluge” etc.; also tāfānī, “stormy, tempestuous... boisterous, quarrelsome, violent, noisy, riotous.”

Little importance is to be attached to Pinto’s linguistic remarks such as that quoted, or even to the like dropt by Couto. We apprehend that Pinto made exactly the same mistake that Sir John Barrow did; and we need not wonder at it, when so many of our countrymen in India have supposed hackery to be a Hindustani word, and when we find even the learned H. H. Wilson assuming tope (in the sense of ‘grove’) to be in native Hindustani use. Many instances of such mistakes might be quoted. It is just possible, though not we think very probable, that some contact with the Formosan term may have influenced the modification of the old English form tuffon into typhoon. It is much more likely to have been influenced by the analogies of monsoon, simoom; and it is quite possible that the Formosan mariners took up their (unexplained) vai-fung from the Dutch or Portuguese.

On the origin of the Ar. word the late Prof. Robertson-Smith forwarded the following note:

“The question of the origin of Tāfān appears to be somewhat tangled. Tufān, ‘whirlwind, waterspout’, connected with τυφός seems pure Greek; the combination in Baal-Zephon, Exod. xiv. 2, and Σφάνος, the northern one, in Joel, ii. 20, suggested by Hitzig, appears to break down, for there is no proof of any Egyptian name for Set corresponding to Typhon.

“On the other hand Tāfān, the deluge, is plainly borrowed from the Aramaic. Tāfān for Noah’s flood, is both Jewish, Aramaic and Syriac, and this form is not borrowed from the Greek, but comes from a true-Semitic root ṯāfā to overflow.

“But again, the sense of whirlwind is not recognised in classical Arabic. Even Dozy in his dictionary of later Arabic only cites a modern French-Arabic dictionary (Bochtor’s) for the sense, Tourbillion, trombe. Bistānī in the Mohāt el Mohāt does not give this sense, though he is pretty full in giving modern as well as old words and senses. In Arabic the root ṯāfā means ‘to go round,’ and a combination of this idea with the sense of sudden disaster might conceivably have given the new meaning to the word. On the other hand it seems simpler to regard this sense as a late loan from some modern form of νφός, typho, or tifon. But in order finally to settle the matter one wants examples of this sense of Tāfān.”

[Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) gives: “Sometimes claimed as a Chinese word meaning ‘a great wind’... but this seems to be a late mystification. In old authors the forms are tufion, tufsoon, tiphon, &c.—Arab. tāfān a hurricane, storm. Gk. νφός, better νφός, a whirlwind. The close accidental coincidence of these words in sense and form is very remarkable, as Whitney notes.”]

The close accidental coincidence of these words in sense and form is very remarkable, as Whitney notes.”

1575.—"But when we approach'd unto it (Cyprus), a Hurricane arose suddenly, and blew so fiercely upon us, that it wound our great sail round about our main Mast,... These Winds arise from a Wind that is called by the Greeks Typhon; and Pliny calleth it Vertex and Vortex; but as dangerous as they are, as they arise suddenly, so quickly are they laid again also."—Rosswoll's Travels, in Ray's Collection, ed. 1705, p. 320. Here the traveller seems to intimate (though we are not certain) that Typhon was then applied in the Levant to such winds; in any case it was exactly the tifan of India.

1602.—"This Junk seeking to make the port of Chineoet with a tremendous storm such as the natives call Tufao, a thing so overpowering and terrible, and bringing such violence, such earthquake as it were, that it appears as if all the spirits of the infernal world had got into the waves and seas, driving them in a whirl till their fury seems to raise a sound of flame, whilst in the space of one turning of the sand-glass the wind shall veeer round to every point of the compass, seeming to blow more furiously from each in succession.

"Such is this phenomenon that the very birds of heaven, by some natural instinct, know of its coming days beforehand, and are seen to take their nests down from the tree-tops and hide them in crevices of rock. Eight days before, the clouds also are seen to float so low as almost to graze men's heads, whilst in these days the seas seem beaten down as it were, and of a deep blue colour. And before the storm breaks forth, the sky exhibits a token well-known to all, a great object which seamen call the Ox-Eye (Olho de Bo) all of different colours, but so gloomy and appalling that it strikes fear in all who see it. And as the Bow of Heaven, when it appears, is the token of fair weather, and calm, so this seems to portend the Wrath of God, as we may well call such a storm."

"Prognostic of a Tuffoon on the Coast of China. By Antonio Pascal de Rosa, a Portuguese Pilot of Macao." c. 1810.—"(Mr. Martyn) "was with us during a most tremendous touffan, and no one who has not been in a tropical region can, I think, imagine what these storms are."—Mrs. Sherwood's Autobiog. 382.
1826.—"A most terrific toofaan . . . came on that seemed likely to tear the very trees up by the roots."—John Skipp, ii. 256.

"I thanked him, and enquired how this toofan or storm had arisen."—Pandurang Hart, [ed. 1873, i. 60].

1836.—"A hurricane has blown over since gunfire; clouds of dust are borne along upon the rushing wind; not a drop of rain; nothing is to be seen but the whirling clouds of the tafan. The old peoplen-tree means, and the wind roars in it as if the storm would tear it up by the roots."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 53.

1840.—"Slavers throwing overboard the Dead and Dying. Typhoon coming on. "'Aloft all hands, strike the topmasts and belay; Yon angry setting sun, and fierce-edge clouds Declare the Typhoon's coming &c. (Fallacies of Hope)."

J. M. W. Turner, in the R.A. Catalogue

Mr. Ruskin appears to have had no doubt as to the etymology of Typhoon, for the rain-cloud from this picture is engraved in Modern Painters, vol. iv. as "The Locks of Typhon." See Mr. Hamerton's Life of Turner, pp. 283, 291, 345.

Punch parodied Turner in the following imaginary entry from the R.A. Catalogue:

"34.—A Typhoon bursting in a Simoon over the Whirlpool of Maelstrom, Norway, with a ship on fire, an eclipse and the effect of a lunar rainbow."

1853.—" . . . pointing as he spoke to a dark dirty line which was becoming more and more visible in the horizon: "'By Jove, yes!' cried Stanton, 'that's a typhoon coming up, sure enough.'"—Oakfield, i. 122.

1859.—"The weather was sultry and unsettled, and my Jamadar, Ramdeen Te-warry . . . opined that we ought to make ready for the coming tuphan or tempest. . . . A darkness that might be felt, and that no lamp could illumine, shrouded our camp. The wind roared and yelled. It was a hurricane."—Lt. Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 62.

Compare the next quotation, from the same writer, with that given above from Couto respecting the Olho de Boi:

1885.—"The district was subject to cyclonic storms of incredible violence, fortunately lasting for a very short time, but which often caused much destruction. These storms were heralded by the appearance above the horizon of clouds known to the natives by the name of 'lady's eyebrows,' so called from their being curved in a narrow black-arched wisp, and these most surely foretold the approach of the tornado."—Ibid. 176.

TYRE, s. Tamil and Malayal. tayir. The common term in S. India for curdled milk. It is the Skt. dadhi. Hind. dahi of Upper India, and probably the name is a corruption of that word.

1626.—"Many reasoned with the Jesuits, and some held vaine Discourses of the Creation, as that there were seven seas; one of Salt water, the second of Fresh, the third of Honey, the fourth of Milk, the fifth of Tair (which is Cream beginning to sour). . . ."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 561.

1651.—"Tayer, dat is dicke Melch, die wie Saen nommen."—Rogerius, 138.

1672.—"Curdled milk, Tayer, or what we call Saur, is a thing very grateful to them, for it is very cooling, and used by them as a remedy, especially in hot fevers and smallpox, which is very prevalent in the country."—Baldaeus, Zeylon, 403.

1776.—"If a Bramin applies himself to commerce, he shall not sell . . . Camphire and other aromatics, or Honey, or Water, or Poison, or Flesh, or Milk, or Tyer (Sour Cream) or Ghee, or bitter Oils."—Rathee, Code, 41.

1782.—"Les uns en furent affligés pour avoir passé les nuits et dormi en plein air; d'autres pour avoir mangé du riz froid avec du Tair."—Sonnerat, i. 201.

[1800.—"The boiled milk, that the family has not used, is allowed to cool in the same vessel; and a little of the former day's tyre, or curdled milk, is added to promote its coagulation . . . ."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 14.]

1822.—"He was indeed poor, but he was charitable; so he spread 'before them a repast, in which there was no lack of ghee, or milk, or tyer."—The Gooroo Paramutan, E.T. by Babington, p. 50.

UJUNGTANAH, n.p. This is the Malay name (nearly answering to 'Land's End,' from Ujung, 'point or promontory,' and tanah, 'land') of the extreme end of the Malay Peninsula terminating in what the maps call Pt. Romania. In Godinho de Eредia's Declaracao de Malaca the term is applied to the whole Peninsula, but owing to the interchangeable use of u, UMBRELLA, s. This word is of course not Indian or Anglo-Indian, but the thing is very prominent in India, and some interest attaches to the history of the word and thing in Europe. We shall collect here a few quotations bearing upon this. The knowledge and use of this serviceable instrument seems to have gone through extraordinary eclipses. It is frequent as an accompaniment of royalty in the Nineveh sculptures; it was in general Indian use in the time of Alexander;

it occurs in old Indian inscriptions, on Greek vases, and in Greek and Latin literature; it was in use at the court of Byzantium, and at that of the Great Khan in Mongolia, in medieval Venice, and more recently in the semi-savage courts of Madagascar and Ashante. Yet it was evidently a strange object, needing particular description, to John Marignoli (c. 1350), Ruy Clavijo (c. 1404), Barbosa (1516),
John de Barros (1553), and Minshew
(1617). See also CHATTA, and SOM-ERERO.

UPAS, s. This word is now, like Juggernaut, chiefly used in English as a customary metaphor, and to indicate some institution that the speaker wishes to condemn in a compendious manner. The word upas is Javanese for poison; [Mr. Scott writes: "The Malay word upas, means simply 'poison.' It is Javanese hupas, Sundanese upas, Balinese hupas, 'poison.' It commonly refers to vegetable poison, because such are more common. In the Lampong language upas means 'sickness.'] It became familiar in Europe in connection with exaggerated and fabulous stories regarding the extraordinary and deadly character of a tree in Java, alleged to be so called. There are several trees in the Malay Islands producing deadly poisons, but the particular tree to which such stories were attached is one which has in the last century been described under the name of Antiris toxicaria, from the name given to the poison by the Javanese proper, viz. Antjar, or Anchar (the name of the tree all over Java), whilst it is known to the Malays and people of Western Java as Upas, and in Celebes and the Philippine Islands as Ipo or Hipo.
UPAS. 953 UPAS.

[According to Mr. Scott "the Malay name for the 'poison-tree,' or any poison-tree, is pōhun āras, pōhun āpas, represented in English by bohon-upas. The names of two poison-trees, the Javanese anchar (Malay also anchar) and chetik, appear occasionally in English books... The Sundanese name for the poison tree is buko onyko." It was the poison commonly used by the natives of Celebes and other islands for poisoning the small bamboo darts which they used (and in some islands still use) to shoot from the blow-tube (see SUMPITAN, SARBATANE).

The story of some deadly poison in these islands is very old, and we find it in the Travels of Friar Odoric, accompanied by the mention of the disgusting antidote which was believed to be efficacious, a genuine Malay belief, and told by a variety of later and independent writers, such as Nieuhof, Saar, Tavernier, Cleyer, and Kaempfer.

The subject of this poison came especially to the notice of the Dutch in connection with its use to poison the arrows just alluded to, and some interesting particulars are given on the subject by Bontius, from whom a quotation is given below, with others. There is a notice of the poison in De Bry, in Sir T. Herbert (whencesoever he borrowed it), and in somewhat later authors about the middle of the 17th century. In March 1666 the subject came before the young Royal Society, and among a long list of subjects for inquiry in the East occur two questions pertaining to this matter.

The illustrious Rumphius in his Herbarium Amboinense goes into a good deal of detail on the subject, but the tree does not grow in Amboyna where he wrote, and his account thus contains some ill-founded statements, which afterwards lent themselves to the fabulous history of which we shall have to speak presently. Rumphius however procured from Macassar specimens of the plant, and it was he who first gave the native name (Ip, the Macassar form) and assigned a scientific name, Arbor toxisaria.* Passing over with simple mention the notices in the appendix to John Ray's Hist. Plantarum, and in Valentijn (from both of which extracts will be found below), we come to the curious compound of the loose statements of former writers magnified, of the popular stories current among Europeans in the Dutch colonies, and of pure romantic invention, which first appeared in 1783, in the London Magazine. The professor author of this account was one Foersch, who had served as a junior surgeon in the Dutch East Indies.* This person describes the tree, called bohon-upas, as situated "about 27 leagues† from Batavia, 14 from Soura Karta, the seat of the Emperor, and between 18 and 20 leagues from Tinkjoe" (probably for Tyukjoe, i.e. Djokjo-Karta), "the present residence of the Sultan of Java." Within a radius of 15 to 18 miles round the tree no human creature, no living thing could exist. Condemned malefactors were employed to fetch the poison; they were protected by special arrangements, yet not more than 1 in 10 of them survived the adventure. Foersch also describes executions by means of the Upas poison, which he says he witnessed at Sura Karta in February 1776.

The whole paper is a very clever piece of sensational romance, and has impressed itself indelibly, it would seem, on the English language; for to it is undoubtedly due the adoption of that standing metaphor to which we have alluded at the beginning of this article. This effect may, however, have been due not so much directly to the article in the London Magazine as to the adoption of the fable by the famous ancestor of a man still more famous, Erasmus Darwin, in his poem of the Loves of the Plants. In that work not only is the essence of Foersch's story embodied in the verse, but the story itself is quoted at length in the notes. It is said that Darwin was warned of the worthlessness of the narrative, but was unwilling to rob his poem of so sensational an episode.

Nothing appears to be known of Foersch except that there was really a person of that name in the medical service in Java at the time indicated. In our article ANA ConDa we have adduced some curious particulars of analogy between the Anaconda-myth and the Upas-myth, and intimated a suspicion that the same hand may have had to do with the spinning of both yarns.

The extraordinary éclat produced by the Foerschian fables led to the appointment of a committee of the Batavian Society to investigate the true facts, whose report was published in 1789. This we have not yet been able to see, for the report is not contained in the regular series of the Transactions of that Society; nor have we found a refutation of the fables by M. Charles Coquebert referred to by Leschenault in the paper which we are about to mention. The poison tree was observed in Java by Deschamps, naturalist with the expedition of D'Entrecasteaux, and is the subject of a notice by him in the Annales de Voyages, vol. 1, which goes into little detail, but appears to be correct as far as it goes, except in the statement that the Anchar was confined to Eastern Java. But the first thorough identification of the plant, and scientific account of the facts was that of M. Leschenault de la Tour. This French savant, when about to join a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, was recommended by Jussieu to take up the investigation of the Upas. On first enquiring at Batavia and Samarang, M. Leschenault heard only fables akin to Foersch's romance, and it was at Sura Karta that he first got genuine information, which eventually enabled him to describe the tree from actual examination.

The tree from which he took his specimens was more than 100 ft. in height, with a girth of 18 ft. at the base. A Javanese who climbed it to procure the flowers had to make cuts in the stem in order to mount. After ascending some 25 feet the man felt so ill that he had to come down, and for some days he continued to suffer from nausea, vomiting, and vertigo. But another man climbed to the top of the tree without suffering at all. On another occasion Leschenault, having had a tree of 4 feet girth cut down, walked among its broken branches, and had face and hands besprinkled with the gum-resin, yet neither did he suffer; he adds, however, that he had washed immediately after. Lizards and insects were numerous on the trunk, and birds perched upon the branches. M. Leschenault gives details of the preparation of the poison as practised by the natives, and also particulars of its action, on which experiment was made in Paris with the material which he brought to Europe. He gave it the scientific name by which it continues to be known, viz. Antiaris toxicaria (N.O. Artocarpae).

M. Leschenault also drew the attention of Dr. Horsfield, who had been engaged in the botanical exploration of Java some years before the British occupation, and continued it during that period, to the subject of the Upas, and he published a paper on it in the Batavian Transactions for 1813 (vol. vii.). His account seems entirely in accordance with that of Leschenault, but is more detailed and complete, with the result of numerous observations and experiments of his own. He saw the Antiaris first in the Province of Poegar, on his way to Banyuwangi. In Blambangan (eastern extremity of Java) he visited four or five trees; he afterwards found a very tall specimen growing at Passaruwang, on the borders of Malang, and again several young trees in the forests of Japâra, and one near Onârang. In all these cases, scattered over the length of Java, the people knew the tree as anchor.

Full articles on the subject are to be found (by Mr. J. J. Bennet) in Horsfield's Plantae Javanicae Rariores, 1838-52, pp. 52 seqq., together with a figure of a flowering branch pl. xxiii.; and in Blume's Kumphia (Brussels, 1836), pp. 46 seqq., and pls. xxii., xxiii.; to both of which works we have been much indebted for guidance. Blume gives a drawing, for the truth of which he vouches, of a tall specimen of the trees. These he describes as "vastas, arduas, et a ceteris segregatas,"—solitary

* Leschenault also gives the description of another and still more powerful poison, used in a similar way to that of the Antiaris, viz. the tieute, called sometimes Upæs Raja, the plant producing which is a Styrænæ, and a creeper. Though, as we have said, the name Upæs is generic, and is applied to this, it is not the Upæs of English metaphor, and we are not concerned with it here. Both kinds are produced and prepared in Java. The Ipo (a form of Upæs) of Macassar is the Antiaris; the Ipo of the Borneo Dayaks is the Tieute.
and eminent, on account of their great longevity, (possibly on account of their being spared by the axe?), but not for any such reason as the fables allege. There is no lack of adjoining vegetation; the spreading branches are clothed abundantly with parasitical plants, and numerous birds and squirrels frequent them. The stem throws out 'wings' or buttresses (see Horsfield in the Bat. Trans., and Blume's Pl.) like many of the forest trees of Further India. Blume refers, in connection with the origin of the prevalent fables, to the real existence of exhalations of carboxic acid gas in the volcanic tracts of Java, dangerous to animal life and producing sterility around, alluding particularly to a paper by M. Loudoun (a Dutch official of Scotch descent), in the Edinburgh New Phil. Journal for 1832, p. 102, containing a formidable description of the Guwo Upas or Poison Valley on the frontier of the Pekalongan and Banyumas provinces. We may observe, however, that, if we remember rightly, the exaggerations of Mr. Loudoun have been exposed and ridiculed by Dr. Junghuhn, the author of "Java." And if the Foerch legend be compared with some of the particulars alleged by several of the older writers, e.g. Camell (in Ray), Valentijn, Spelman, Kaempfer, and Runphius, it will be seen that the basis for a great part of that putida commentatio, as Blume calls it, is to be found in them.

George Colman the Younger founded on the Foerschian Upas-myth, a kind of melodrama, called the Law of Java, first acted at Covent Garden May 11, 1822. We give some quotations below.¹

Lindley, in his Vegetable Kingdom, in a short notice of Antiaris toxicaria, says that, though the accounts are greatly exaggerated, yet the facts are notable enough. He says cloth made from the tough fibre is so acrid as to verify the Shirt of Nessus. My friend Gen. Maclagan, noticing Lindley's remark to me, adds: "Do you remember in our High School days (at Edinburgh) a grand Diorama called The Upas Tree? It showed a large wild valley, with a single tree in the middle, and illustrated the safety of approach on the windward side, and the desolation it dealt on the other."

c. 1631.—"I will now conclude; but I first must say something of the poison used by the King of Macassar in the Island of Celebes to envenom those little arrows which they shoot through blowing-tubes, a poison so deadly that it causes death more rapidly than a dagger. For one wounded ever so lightly, be it but a scratch bringing blood, or a prick in the heel, immediately begins to nod like a drunken man, and falls dead to the ground. And within half an hour of death this putrescent poison so corrupts the flesh that it makes it stink so much muce. And what seems still more marvellous, if a man (e.g.) be scratched in the thigh, or higher in the body, by another point which is not poisoned, and the still warm blood as it flows down to the feet be merely touched by one of these poisoned little arrows, swift as wind the pestilential influence ascends to the wound, and with the same swiftness and other effects snatches the man from among the living.

"19. Whether it be true, that the only Antidote hitherto known, against the famous and mortal Macasser-poison, is human ordure, taken inadvertently? And what substance that poison is made of?"—Phil. Trans. vol. ii. Anno 1667 (Proceedings for March 11, 1666, i.e. N.S. 1667), d. 417. 1682.—"The especial weapons of the Makassar soldiers, which they use against their enemies, are certain pointed arrowlets about a foot in length. At the foremost end these are fitted with a sharp, and pointed fish-tooth, and at the butt with a knob of spongy wood. The points of these arrows, long before they are to be used, are dipt in poison and then dried. This poison is a sap that drips from the bark of the branches of a certain tree, like resin, from pine-trees. The tree grows on the Island Makassar, in the interior, and on three or four islands of the Bugises (see BUGIS), round about Makassar. It is about the height of the common tree, and has leaves very similar. The fresh sap of this tree is a very deadly poison; indeed its virulence is incurable. The arrowlets prepared with this poison are not, by the Makassar soldiers, shot with a bow, but blown from certain blow-pipes (uit zekere spatten gespat); just as here, in the country, people shoot birds by blowing round pellets of clay. They can with these in still weather hit their mark at a distance of 4 rods. "They say the Makassars themselves know no remedy against this poison . . . for the poison presses swiftly into the blood and vital spirits, and causes a violent inflammation. They hold (however) that the surest remedy for this poison is . . . " (and so on, repeating the antidote already mentioned).—Joan Veithv's Zee en Land Reize, &c., pp. 217-218. 1683.—"Arbor Toxicaria, Ipo. "I have never yet met with any poison more horrible and hateful, produced by any vegetable growth, than that which is derived from this lacticent tree.

Moreover beneath this tree, and in its whole circumference to the distance of a stone-throw, no plant, no shrub, or herbage will grow; the soil beneath it is barren, blackened, and burnt as it were and the atmosphere about it is so polluted and poisoned that the birds which alight upon its branches become giddy and fall dead.  * all things perish which are touched by its emanations, insomuch that every animal shruns it and keeps away from it, and even the birds eschew flying by it. "No man dares to approach the tree without having his arms, feet, and head wrapped round with linen . . . for Death seems to have planted his foot and his throne beside this tree." (He then tells of a venemous basilisk with two feet in front and fiery eyes, a crest, and a horn, that dwelt under this tree). * * * "The Malays call it Cayit Upas, but in Makassar and the rest of Celebes it is called Ipo.

"It grows in desert places, and amid bare hills, and is easily discerned from afar, there being no other tree near it." * * *

—Rumphii, Herbarium Amboinense, ii. 263-265. 1685.—"I cannot omit to set forth here an account of the poisoned missiles of the Kingdom of Macassar, which the natives of that kingdom have used against our soldiers, bringing them to sudden death. It is extracted from the Journal of the illustrious and gallant admiral, H. Cornelius Spielman. . . . The natives of the kingdom in question possess a singular art of shooting arrows by blowing through canes, and winding with these, insomuch that if the skin be but slightly scratched the wounded die in a twinkling." (Then the old story of the only antidote). . . .

The account follows extracted from the Journal.

"There are but few among the Macassars and Bugis who possess the real knowledge needful for selecting the poison, so as to distinguish between what is worthless and what is highest quality. . . . From the princes (or Rajas) I have understood that the soil in which the trees affording the poison grow, for a great space round about produces no grass nor any other vegetable growth, and that the poison is properly a water or liquid, flowing from a bruise or cut made in the bark of those trees, oozing out as sap does from plants that afford milky juices. . . . When the liquid is being drawn from the wounded tree, no one should carelessly approach it so as to let the liquid touch his hands, for by such contact all the points become stiffened and contracted. For this reason the collectors make use of long bamboos, armed with sharp iron points. With these they stab the tree with great force, and so get the sap to flow into the canes, in which it speedily hardens."—Dn. Corn. Spielman ...

Having hastily picked up some vague information regarding the Upas, he carried it to Europe, where his notes were arranged, doubtless by a different hand, in such a form as by their plausibility and appearance of truth, to be generally credited. But though the account just mentioned has been demonstrated to be an extravagant forgery, the existence of a tree in Java, from whose sap a poison is prepared, equal in fatality, when thrown into the circulation, to the strongest animal poisons hitherto known, is a fact."—Horsfield, in Batavian Trans. vol. vii. art. x. pp. 2-4.

We therefore aim at the destruction of that system of ascendency, which, though it has been crippled and curtailed by former measures, yet still must be at some future time... It is still there like a tall tree of noxious growth, lifting its head to heaven, and darkening and poisoning the land as far as its shadow can extend; it is still there, gentlemen, and now at length the day has come when, as we hope, the axe has been laid to the root of that tree, and it nods and quivers from its top to its base..."—Mr. Gladstone's Speech at Wigan, Oct. 23.

One day, having been pitchforked together and burned, they were considered disposed of; but next morning the whole of his labourers awoke, to their intense alarm, afflicted with a painful eruption..." UPPER ROGER, s. This happy example of the Hobson-Jobson dialect occurs in a letter dated 1755, from Capt. Jackson at Syrian in Burma, which is given in Dalrymple's Oriental Repository, i. 192. It is a corruption of the Skt. ywa-raja, 'young King,' the Caesar or Heir-Apparent, a title borrowed from ancient India by most of the Indo-Chinese monarchies, and which we generally render in Siam as the 'Second King.'

URZ, URZEE, and vulgarly URJEE, s. P.—H. 'urz and 'urzi', from Ar. 'urz, the latter a word having an extraordinary variety of uses even for Arabic. A petition or humble representation either oral or in writing; the technical term for a request from an inferior to a superior; 'a siflication' as one of Sir Walter Scott's characters calls it. A more elaborate form is 'urz-dash, 'memorializing.' This is used in a very barbarous form of Hobson-Jobson below.

It is probable that the information concerning the Hindu religion and sacred books which was attained even in Europe by the end of the 16th century was greater than is commonly supposed, and greater than what we find in print would warrant us to assume. A quotation from San Román below illustrates this in a general way. And in a constitution of Gregory XV. dated January 31, 1623, there is mention of rites called Háiteres and Tándí, which doubtless represent the Vedic names Aitareya and Tádéya (see Norbert, i. 39). Lucena's allusion below to the "four parts" of Hindu doctrine must have reference to the Vedas, and his information must have come from reports and letters, as he never was in India. In course of time, however, what had been known seems to have been forgotten, and even Halhed (1776) could write about 'Beids of the Shaster!' (see Code, p. xiii.). This shows that though he speaks also of the 'Four Beids' (p. xxxi.) he had no precise knowledge.

In several of the earlier quotations of the word it will be seen that the form used is Vedam or Vedam. This is the Tamil form. And it became prevalent during the 18th century in France from Voltaire's having con-negnant. Et quid non miraculorum superesset ad convincendos orbis incolos, si mundum ex Scorpionis ovo conditum et progenitum terramque Tauri capiti impostam, et rerum primum fundamentis ex prioribus III. Vedae libris consstituted himself the advocate of a Sanskrit Poem, called by him l'Esour Vedam, and which had its origin in S. India. This was in reality an imitation of an Indian Purâna, composed by some missionary in the 17th century (probably by R. de' Nobili), to introduce Christian doctrines: but Voltaire supposed it to be really an ancient Indian book. Its real character was first explained by Sonnerat (see the Essay by F. W. Ellis, in As. Res. xi.). The first information regarding the real Vedas was given by Colebrooke in 1805 (As. Res. viii.). Orme and some authors of the 18th and early part of the 19th century write Bede, which represents the N. Indian vernacular form Bed. Both forms, Bed and Vedam, are known to Fleury, as we see below.

Z. Holwell, Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 2nd ed. i. 12. This gentleman also talks of the Bhades and the Vedam in the same line without a notion that the word was the same (see ibid. Pt. ii. 15, 1767).

c. 1770.—"The Bramin, bursting into tears, promised to pardon him on condition that he should swear never to translate the Bedas or sacred volumes. ...From the Ganges to the Indus the Vedam is universally received as the book that contains the principles of religion."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 41-42.

c. 1774.—"Si crede poi como infallibile che dai quattro suddette Bed, che in Malabar chiamano Vedam, Bramah medesimo ne ritirasse sei Sutrah, cioè scienze."—Della Tomba, 102.

1777.—"The word Ved, or Vedâ, signifies Knowledge or Science. The sacred writings of the Hindoos are so distinguished, of which there are four books."—G. Wilkins, in his Histapados, 298.

1778.—"The natives of Bengal derive their religion from a Code called the Shaster, which they assert to be the genuine scripture of Bramah, in preference to the Vedam."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 5.

1778.—"Ein indischer Brahman, geboren auf der Flur, Der nichts gelesen als den Wada der Natur."—Rückert, Weisheit der Baramanen, i. 1.

1782.—"...pour les rendre (les Pourvons) plus authentiques, ils ajoutèrent qu'ils étoient tirés du Vedam; ce que n'ettoit pas facile à vérifier, puisque depuis très long-temps les Vedams ne sont plus connus."—Sonnerat, ii. 21.

1789.—"Then Edmund begg'd his Rev'rend Master T'instruct him in the Holy Shaster. No sooner does the Scholar ask, Than Goonisham begins the task, Without a book he glibly reads Four of his own invented Bedes."—Simkin the Second, 145.

1791.—"Toute vérité ... est renfermée dans les quatre beths."—St. Pierre, Chamière Indienne.

1794-97.—"...or Hindoo Vedas taught."—Pursuits of Literature, 6th ed. 359.

VEDDAS, n.p. An aboriginal—or at least a forest—people of Ceylon. The word is said to mean 'hunters,' [Tam. vedu, 'hunting'].

1875.—"The Weddas (who call themselves Beddas) are all original inhabitants from old time, whose descent no one is able to tell."—Rijks van Goens, in Valentijs, Ceylon, 208.

1681.—"In this Land are many of these wild men they call Vaddahs, dwelling near no other Inhabitants. They speak the Chingalopes Language. They kill Deer, and dry the Flesh over the Fire ... their Food being only Flesh. They are very expert with their Bows. ... They have no Townes nor Houses, only live by the waters under a Tree."—Kloor, 61-62.

1770.—"The Bedas who were settled in the northern part of the island (Ceylon)
Vellard, s. This is a word apparently peculiar to the Island of Bombay, used in the sense which the quotation shows. We have failed to get any elucidation of it from local experience; but there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of the Port. vallado, 'a mound or embankment.' [It is generally known as 'Hornby's Vellard,' after the Governor of that name; but it seems to have been built about 1752, some 20 years before Hornby's time (see Douglas, Bombay and W. India, i. 140).]

1809. — "At the foot of the little hill of Sion is a causeway or vellard, which was built by Mr. Duncan, the present Governor, across a small arm of the sea, which separates Bombay from Salsette. The vellard was begun A.D. 1797, and finished in 1805, at an expense of 50,575 rupees." — Maria Graham, 8.

Vellore, n.p. A town, and formerly a famous fortress in the district of N. Arcot, 80 m. W. of Madras. It often figures in the wars of the 18th century, but is best known in Europe for the mutiny of the Sepoys there in 1806. The etym. of the name Vellur is unknown to us. Fra Paolino gives it as Velur, 'the Town of the Lance'; and Col. Branfill as 'Vēlur, from Vel, a benefit, benefaction.' [Cox-Stuart (Man. N. Arcot, ii. 417) and the writer of the Madras Gloss, agree in deriving it from Tam. vel, 'the babool tree, Acacia arabica,' and ār, 'village.]

Vendu-Master, s. We know this word only from the notifications which we quote. It was probably taken from the name of some Portuguese office of the same kind. [In the quotation given below from Owen it seems that the word was in familiar use at Johanna, and the context shows that his duty was somewhat like that of the chowdry, as he provided fowls, cattle, fruit, &c., for the expedition.]

1781. — From an advertisement in the India Gazette of May 17th it appears that there had been an euphemism for Auctioneer; [also see Husteed, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. p. 109].

"Mr. Donald ... begs leave to acquaint them that the Vendu business will in future be carried on by Robert Donald, and W. Williams." — India Gazette, July 28.

1783. — "The Governor-General is pleased to notify that Mr. Williamson as the Company's Vendu Master is to have the superintendence and management of all Sales at the Presidency." — In Selon-Karr, ii. 90. At pp. 107, 114, also are notifications of sales by "G. Williamson, Vendu Master."

[1823. — "One of the chiefs, a crafty old rogue, commonly known by the name of 'Lord Rodney' ... acted as captain of the port, interpreter, Vendu-Master and master of the ceremonies. ..." — Owen, Narrative of Voyages to explore the shores of Africa, &c., i. 179.]

Venetian, s. This is sometimes in books of the 18th and preceding century used for Sequins. See under Chick.

1542. — "At the bottom of the cargo (? côté), among the ballast, she carried 4 big guns (tiros), and others of smaller size, and 60,000 venetians in gold, which were destined for Coje Çafar, in order that with this money he should in all speed provide necessaries for the fleet which was coming." — Correa, iv. 250.

1752. — "At this juncture a gold mohur is found to be worth 14 Arcot Rupees, and a Venetian 4¼ Arcot Rupees." — In Long, p. 32.

Veranda. s. An open pillared gallery round a house. This is one of the very perplexing words for which at least two origins may be maintained, on grounds equally plausible. Besides these two, which we shall immediately mention, a third has sometimes been alleged, which is thus put forward by a well-known French scholar:

"Ce mot (veranda) n'est lui-même qu'une transcription inexacte du Persan barámdā, perche, terrasse, balcon." — C. Defrémery, in Revue Critique, 1869, 1st Sem. p. 64.

Plausible as this is, it may be rejected. Is it not, however, possible that barámdā, the literal meaning of which is 'coming forward, projecting,' may be a Persian 'striving after meaning,' in explanation of the foreign word which they may have borrowed?

Williams, again, in his Skt. Dict. (1872) gives 'varanda ... a veranda, a portico ...' Moreover Beames in his Comparative Grammar of Modern Aryan Languages, gives Sansk. barándā, 'portico,' Bengali bārānda, Hind. varānda, adding: "Most of our wiseacre literateurs (qué, littérateurs?) in Hindustan now-a-days consider this word to be derived from Pers. baramandah, and write it accordingly. It is, however, good Sanskrit” (i. 153).
Fortunately we have in Bishop Caldwell a proof that comparative grammar does not preclude good manners. Mr.
Beames was evidently in entire ignorance of the facts which render the origin of the Anglo-Indian word so curiously ambiguous; but we shall not call him the “wise-acre grammarian.”

Varanda, with the meaning in question, does not, it may be observed, belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works.*

Littre also gives as follows (1874):

Etym. Varandah, mot rapporté de l’Inde par les Anglais, est la simple dégénérance, dans les langues modernes de l’Inde, du Sansc. veranda, colonnade, de var, couvrir.”

That the word as used in England and in France was brought by the English from India need not be doubted. But either in the same sense, or in one closely analogous, it appears to have existed, quite independently, in Portuguese and Spanish; and the manner in which it occurs without explanation in the very earliest narrative of the adventure of the Portuguese in India, as quoted below, seems almost to preclude the possibility of their having learned it in that country for the first time; whilst its occurrence in P. de Alcala may leave no doubt on the subject.

origin, it may be Span. vara a rod, rail. Cf. L. urus, crooked.” (Concise Dict. s.v.).]

1498. — “E véo ter conmisco onde esta-vamos lançados, em huma varanda onde candlestick of brass that gave us light...”

And Correa, speaking of the same historical passage, though writing at a later date, says: “When the Captain-Major arrived, he was conducted through many courts and varandas (muitos patios e varandas) to a dwelling opposite that in which the king was...” — Correa, by Stanley, 193, compared with original Leindas, I. i. 98.

1605. — In Pedro de Alcala’s Spanish-Arabic Vocabulary we have:

Varandas — tárbyug,

Varandas assi gārgaya, gārgab.

Interpreting these Arabic words, with the assistance of Prof. Robertson Smith, we find that tárbyug is, according to Dozy (Supp. 1.
430), darbūs, itself taken from darbēṭśa (tṛnāṭīṭov, ‘a stair-railing, fireguard, balcony, &c.’; whilst gārgab stands for sorjāb, a variant (Abul W., p. 735, i.) of the commoner shorjāb, ‘a lattice, or anything lat-ticed,’ such as a window,—‘a balcony, a balustrade.’

1540.— “This said, we entred with her Ixxiii.), in Cogan, 102.

we have as a Malay word, “Baranda,

VERDURE, s. This word appears to have been used in the 18th century for vegetables, adapted from the Port, verduras.

1759.—Among minor items of revenue from duties in Calcutta we find:

"Verdure, fish pots, firewood 216 10 6."—In Long, 35.

[VERGE, s. A term used in S. India for rice lands. It is the Port. Vârsea, Varsiâ, Varjém, which Vieyra defines as "a plain field, or a piece of level ground, that is sowed and cultivated."

1749.—"... as well as vargem's lands as hortas" (see OART).—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 48.

1772.—"The estates and verges not yet assessed must be taxed at 10 per cent."—Govt. Order, ibid. i. 421.]

VETTVYER, s. This is the name generally used by the French for the fragrant grass which we call cuscus (q.v.). The word is Tamil vettiyer, [from vettyu, 'digging,' ver, 'root'].

1800.—"Europeans cool their apartments by means of wetted tarts (see TATTY) made of straw or grass, and sometimes of the roots of the watta vaerco, which, when wetted, exhales a pleasant but faint smell."—Heyne's Tracts, p. 11.

VIDANA, s. In Ceylon, the title of a village head man. "The person who conveys the orders of Government to the people" (Clough, s.v. vidân). It is apparently from the Skt. vadâna, "... the act of speaking... the mouth, face, countenance... the front, point," &c. In Javanese wadana (or wadono, in Jav. pronunciation) is "the face, front, van; a chief of high rank: a Javanese title" (Gravend, s.v.). The Javanese title is, we imagine, now only traditional; the Ceylonese one has followed the usual downward track of high titles; we can hardly doubt the common Sanskrit origin of both (see Athenaeum, April 1, 1882, p. 413, and May 13, ibid. p. 602). The derivation given by Alwis is probably not inconsistent with this.

1681.—"The Dissauvas (see DISSAVE) by these Jowrit vidani their officers do oppress and squeeze the people, by laying Mullets upon them... In Fine this officer is the Dissauva's chief Substitute, who orders and manages all affairs incumbent upon his master."—Knox, 51.

1726.—"Vidanis, the overseers of villages, who are charged to see that no inhabitant suffers any injury, and that the Land is sown betimes."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 11.

1756.—"Under each (chief) were placed different subordinate headmen, called Vidâna-Aratchies and Vidâns. The last is derived from the word (vidâna), 'commanding,' or 'ordering,' and means, as Clough (p. 647) defines it, the person who conveys the orders of the Government to the People."—J. de Almeis, in Ceylon Journal, 8, p. 237.
VIHARA, WIHARE, &c., s. In Ceylon a Buddhist temple. Skt. vihāra, a Buddhist convent, originally the hall where the monks met, and thence extended to the buildings generally of such an institution, and to the shrine which was attached to them, much as minister has come from monasterium. Though there are now no Buddhist vihāras in India Proper, the former wide diffusion of such establishments has left its trace in the names of many noted places; e.g. Bihār, and the great province which takes its name; Kuch Bihār; the Vihār water-works at Bombay; and most probably the City of Bokhārah itself. [Numerous ruins of such buildings have been unearthed in N. India, as, for instance, that at Sarnāth near Benares, of which an account is given by Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 121). An early use of the word (probably in the sense of a monastery) is found in the Mathura Jain inscription of the 2nd century, A.D. in the reign of Huvishka (ibid. iii. 39.)]

1831.—"The first and highest order of priests are the Tiramantes,* who are the priests of the Buddha God. Their temples are styled Vihāras. ... These ... only live in the Vihār, and enjoy great Revenues."—Knorr, Ceylon, 74.

[1821.—"The Malwattu and Asgirie wihares ... are the two heads of the Boodaical establishment in Ceylon."—Davy, An Account of the Interior of Ceylon, 369.]

1877.—"Twice a month, when the rules of the order are read, a monk who has broken them is to confess his crime; if it be slight, some slight penance is laid upon him, to sweep the court-yard of the vihāra, sprinkle the dust round the sacred bo-tree."—Rikys Davids, Buddhism, 189.

VISS, s. A weight used in S. India and in Burma; Tam. visi, 'division,' Skt. vihiṭa, 'distributed.' In Madras it was ½ of a Madras maund, and =31b. 2oz. avoirdupois. The old scale ran, 10 pagoda weights = 1 pullam, 40 pullams =1 viss, 8 viss = 1 maund (of 25lbs.), 20 maunds = 1 candy. In Burma the viss =100 tikals =31lbs. 5 5¼.

Viss is used in Burma by foreigners, but the Burmese call the weight peikttha, probably a corruption of visai.

* [The first part of this word is thera, Skt. sthavira. Hardy (E. Monachism, p. 11) says the superior priests were called tirmundāses, from Pall thero, 'an elder.'

1554.—"The baar (see BAHAR) of Pegun contains 120 bicas; each bica weighs 40 ounces; the biṣa contains 100 ticais; the ticai weighs 31 vihāras."—A. Nunes, 38.

1568.—"This Ganza goeth by weight of Byzæ ... and commonly a Byzæ of Ganza is worth (after our accoempt) half a ducat."—Caesar Frederike, in Itakl. ii. 367.

1626.—"In anno 1622 the Mine was shut up ... the comming of the Mogull's Embassadour to this King's Court, with his peremptory demand of a Vyse of the fairest diamonds, caused the cessation."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1003.

[1727.—"Vice." See under TICAL.

[1807.—"Visay." See under GARCE.]

1855.—"The King last year purchased 800,000 viss of lead, at 5 tikals (see TICAL) for 100 viss, and sold it at twenty tikals."—Fage, Mission to Ava, 258.

VIZIER, WUZEER, s. Ar.—H. waẓīr, 'a minister,' and usually the principal minister, under a (Mahomedan) prince. [In the Koran (cap. xx. 30) Moses says: "Give a waẓīr of my family, Ḥārūn (Aaron) my brother." In the Ain we have a distinction drawn between the Vakil, or prime minister, and the Vazīr, or minister of finance (ed. Blochmann, i. 527.)] In India the Nawâb of Oudh was long known as the Nawâb Waẓīr, the founder of the quasi-independent dynasty having been Šaʿdat 'Ali Khân, who became Šuḥdâr of Oudh, c. 1732, and was also Waẓīr of the Empire, a title which became hereditary in his family. The title of Nawâb Waẓīr merged in that of pâdshâh, or King, assumed by Ghâz̄i-ud-dîn Haidar in 1820, and up to his death still borne or claimed by the ex-King Wâjîd 'Ali Shah, under surveillance in Calcutta. As most titles degenerate, Waẓīr has in Spain become alguazil, 'a constable,' in Port. alvar, 'an alderman.'

[1612.—"Jeffer Basha Vizier and Viceroy of the Province."—Downers, Letters, i. 173.]

1614.—"Il primo visir, sopra ogni altro, che era allora Nasuh basiâ, genero del Gran Signore, venne ultimo di tutti, con grandissima e ben adorna cavalcata, enfin della quale andava egli solo con molta gravità."—P. della Valle (from Constantino- nope, i. 43.

[WACADASH, s. Japanese waki-zashi, 'a short sword.']

[1888.—“His wacadash or little cattan.”—Ibid. ii. 20.

1866.—“Well, young shaver, have you seen the horses? How is the Waler’s off foreleg?”—Trevelyen, Dewk Bungalow, 223.

1873.—“For sale, a brown Waler gelding,” &c.—Madras Mail, June 25.

WALI, s. Two distinct words are occasionally written in the same way.

(a) Ar. ṭawli. A Mahommedan title corresponding to Governor; [“the term still in use for the Governor-General of a Province as opposed to the Muḥādl, or district-governor. In E. Arabia the Wali is the Civil Governor as opposed to the Amir or Military Commandant. Under the Caliphate the Wali acted also as Prefect of Police (the Indian Faqīdār—see FOUDJAR), who is now called Zabīt.” (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 236)].

It became familiar some years ago in connection with Kandahar. It stands properly for a governor of the highest class, in the Turkish system superior to a Pasha. Thus, to the common people in Egypt, the Khedive is still the ṭawli.

1298.—“Whenever he knew of anyone who had a pretty daughter, certain ruffians of his would go to the father and say: ‘What say you? Here is this pretty daughter of yours; give her in marriage to the Bālīo Achmat’s (for they call him the Bālīo, or, as we should say, ‘the Viceregent’).’”—Marco Polo, i. 402.

1498.—“... e mandou hun homen que se chama Balle, o qual he como alquade.”—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 54.

1727.—“As I was one morning walking in the Streets, I met accidentally the Governor of the City (Muscat), by them called the Waały.”—A. Hamilton, i. 70; [ed. 1744, i. 71.]

[1753.—In Georgia. “Vali, a viceroy descended immediately from the sovereigns of the country over which he presides.”—Han-vey, iii. 28.]

b. Ar. wali. This is much used in some Mahommedan countries (e.g. Egypt and Syria) for a saint, and by a transfer for the shrine of such a saint. [“This would be a separate building like our family tomb and probably domed. ... Europeans usually call it ‘a little Wali’; or, as they write it, ‘Wely’; the contained for the container; the ‘Santon’ for the ‘Santon’s tomb’” (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 97.) See under PEER.

[c. 1590.—“The ascetics who are their repositories of learning, they style Wali, whose teaching they implicitly follow.”—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 119.]

1869.—“Quant au titre de pir (see PEER) ... it signifie proprement vieillard, mais il est pris dans cette circonstance pour désigner une dignité spirituelle équivalente à celle des Čađa Hindous ... Beaucoup de ces pirots sont à leur mort vénérés comme saints; de là le mot pe est synonyme de Wali, et signifie Saint aussi bien que ce dernier mot.”—García de Tassy, Rel. Mus. dans l’Inde, 23.

WALIA. s. This is a popular abridgment of Competition-walla, under which will be found remarks on the termination wāli, and illustrations of its use.

WANDEROO, s. In Ceylon a large kind of monkey, originally described under this name by Knox (Presbytes ursinus). The name is, however, the generic Singhalese word for a monkey (wanderu, wanda), and the same with the Hind. bandār, Skt. vānara. Remarks on the disputed identity of Knox’s wanderoo, and the different species to which the name has been applied, popularly, or by naturalists, will be found in Emerson Tenment, i. 129-130.

1651.—“Monkeys ... Some so large as our English Spaniel Dogs, of a darkish gray colour, and black faces, with great white beards round from ear to ear, which makes them show just like old men. There is another sort just of the same bigness, but differ in colour, being milk white both in body and face, having great beards like the others ... both these sorts do but little mischief. ... This sort they call in their language Wanderow.”—Knox, Hist. Rel. of the I. of Ceylon, 26.

[1803.—“The wanderow is remarkable for its great white beard, which stretches quite from ear to ear across its black face, while the body is of a dark grey.”—Percival, Acc. of the I. of Ceylon, 200.]

1810.—“I saw one of the large baboons, called here Wanderows, on the top of a coco-nut tree, where he was gathering nuts. ...”—Maria Graham, 97.
1874.—"There are just now some very remarkable monkeys. One is a Macaque... Another is the Wanderer, a fellow with a great mass of hair round his face, and the most awful teeth ever seen in a monkey's mouth. This monkey has been credited with having killed two niggers before he was caught; he comes from Malabar."—F. Buckland, in Life, 289.

WANGHEE, WHANGEE, s. The trade name for a slender yellow bamboo with beautifully regular and short joints, imported from Japan. We cannot give the origin of the term with any conviction. The two following suggestions may embrace or indicate the origin. (1) Rumphius mentions a kind of bamboo called by him Arundinarbor fera, the native name of which is Bulu swangi (see in vol. iv. cap. vii. et seqq.). As buluh is Malay for bamboo, we presume that swangi is also Malay, but we do not know its meaning. (2) Our friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie notes: "In the K'ang-hi tse-tien, 118, 119, the Huang-tehlu is described as follows: 'A species of bamboo, very hard, with the joints close together; the skin is as white as snow; the larger kind can be used for boats, and the smaller used for pipes, &c.' See also Wells Williams, Sybllic Dict. of the Chinese Lang., p. 251.

[On this Professor Giles writes: "'Whang' clearly stands for 'yellow,' as in Whangpo and like combinations. The difficulty is with ee, which should stand for some word of that sound in the Cantonese dialect. There is such a word in 'clothes, skin, sheath'; and 'yellow skin (or sheath)' would form just such a combination as the Chinese would be likely to employ. The suggestion of Terrien de la Couperie is not to the purpose." So Mr. C. M. Gardner writes: "The word huang has many meanings in Chinese according to the tone in which it is said. Huang-chi téng or huang-yee-teng might be 'yellow-corticed cane.' The word chuk means 'bamboo,' and huang-chuh might be 'yellow or Imperial bamboo.' Wan means a 'myriad;' ch'i 'utensil'; wan-chi téng might mean a kind of cane 'good for all kinds of uses.' Wan-chuh is a particular kind of bamboo from which paper is made in W. Hapei."

Mr. Skeat writes: "'Buluh swangi is correct Malay. Favre in his Malay-Fr. Dict. has 'suwângi, esprit, spectre, esprit mauvais.' 'Buluh swangi does not appear in Ridley's list as the name of a bamboo, but he does not profess to give all the Malay plant names.']"

WEAVER-BIRD, s. See Baya.

WEST-COAST, n.p. This expression in Dutch India means the west coast of Sumatra. This seems also to have been the recognised meaning of the term at Madras in former days. See Slave.

Mr. Francis Fordye being entered on the Establishment... and having several months' allowance due to him for the West Coast, amounting to Pages 371. 9..."—*St. David's Cons., April 30, MS. in India Office. The letter appended shows that the chaplain had been attached to Bencoolen. See also Wheeler, f. 148.

WHAMPOA, n.p. In former days the anchorage of European ships in the river of Canton, some distance below that city. [The name is pronounced Wongpo (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 631).]

1770.—"Now all European ships are obliged to anchor at Houang-poa, three leagues from the city" (Canton).—Raynal, tr. 1777, ii. 258.

WHISTLING TEAL, s. This in Jerdon is given as Dendrocygna Aurescse of Sykes. Latin names given to birds and beasts might at least fulfil one object of Latin names, in being intelligible and pronounceable by foreign nations. We have seldom met with a more barbarous combination of impossible words than this. A numerous flock of these whistlers is sometimes seen in Bengal sitting in a tree, a curious habit for ducks.

WHITE ANTS. See ANTS, WHITE.

WHITE JACKET, s. The old custom in the hot weather, in the family or at bachelor parties, was to wear this at dinner; and one or more dozens of white jackets were a regular item in an Indian outfit. They are now, we believe, altogether, and for many years obsolete. [They certainly came again into common use some 20 years ago.] But though one reads under every generation of British India that they had gone out of use, they did actually survive to the middle of the last century, for I can remember a white-jacket dinner in Fort William in 1849. [The late Mr. Bridgman of Gorakhpur, whose recollection of India dated from the earlier part of the last century told me that in his younger days the rule at Calcutta was that the guest always arrived at his host's house in the full evening-dress of the time, on which his host meeting him at the door expressed his regret that he had not chosen a cooler dress; on which the guest's bearer always, as if by accident, appeared from round the corner with a nankeen jacket, which was then and there put on. But it would have been opposed to etiquette for the guest to appear in such a dress without express invitation.]

1803.—"It was formerly the fashion for gentlemen to dress in white jackets on all occasions, which were well suited to the country, but being thought too much an undress for public occasions, they are now laid aside for English cloth."—Lo. Valentina, i. 240.

Berncastle, Voyage to China, including a Visit to the Bombay Pres. i. 93.]

WINTER, s. This term is constantly applied by the old writers to the rainy season, a usage now quite unknown to Anglo-Indians. It may have originated in the fact that winter is in many parts of the Mediterranean coast so frequently a season of rain, whilst rain is rare in summer. Compare the fact that shiitâ in Arabic is indifferently 'winter,' or 'rain'; the winter season being the rainy season, Shiitâ is the same word that appears in Canticles ii. 11: "The winter (sethadj) is past, the rain is over and gone."

1513.—"And so they set out, and they arrived at Surat (Carrate) in May, when the winter had already begun, so they went into winter-quarters (polo que envernaran), and in September, when the winter was over, they went to Goa in two foists and other vessels, and in one of these was the ganda (rhinoceros), the sight of which made a great commotion when landed at Goa."—Correa, ii. 373.

1568.—"R. ... In what time of the year does this disease (morzi, Mort-de-chien) mostly occur?"

"O. ... It occurs mostly in June and July (which is the winter-time in this country)."—Garcia, f. 76y.

c. 1567.—"D'Al Bezenerg a Goa son d'estato otto giornate di viaggio; ma noi lo faccessimo di mezo l'inverno, il mese di Luglio."—Cesare Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 386.

1583.—"Il uerno in questo paese è il Maggio, Giugno, Luglio e Agosto, e il resto dell'anno è estate. Ma bene è da notare che qui la stagione nò si può chiamar uerno rispetto al freddo, che nò vi regna mai, mà solo per cagione de' venti, e delle gran pioggie."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 67v.

1584.—"Note that the City of Goa is the principal place of all the Oriental India, and the winter thus beginneth the 15 of May, with very great raine."—Barret, in Hakl. ii. 413.

[1592.—See under PENANG.]

1610.—"The Winter heere beginneth about the first of June and dureth till the twentieth of September, but not with continuall raines as at Goa, but for some sixe or seven days every change and full, with much wind, thundr and raine."—Finch, in Purch. i. 423.

c. 1610.—"L'hyver commence au mois d'Avril, et dure six mois."—Pyrrard de Laval, i. 78: [Hak. Soc. i. 104, and see i. 94, ii. 34].

1643.—"... des Galiottes qui sortent toujours les ans pour faire la guerre aux Malabares ... et cela est enroue la May-Septembre, lors que leur hyuer est passe."—Mocquet, 347.

1653.—"Dans les Indes il y a deux Estez et deux Hyuers, ou pour mieux dire vu Printemps perpetuel, parce que les arbres y sont toujours verds: Le premier Est commence au mois de Mars, et finit au mois de May, que est la commencement de l'Hyuer de pluye, qui continue jusques en Septembre pleuant incessament ces quatre mois, en sorte que les Karauanes, ny les Patmars (see PATTAMAR, a) ne vont ne viennent: i'ay este quarante iours sans pouvoir sortir de la maison. ... Le second Esté est depuis Octobre jusques en December, au quel mois il commence à faire froid ... ce froid est le second Hyuer qui finit au mois de Mars."—De la Boulaye-l'-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 244-245.

1665.—"L' Hyuer se sait sentir. El commencement en Juin per quantité de pluies et de tonnerres."—Thevenot, v. 311.

1678.—"... In Winter (when they rarely stir) they have a Mammama, or Wax Cloth to throw over it."—Pryer, 410.

1691.—"In orà Occidentali, quae Malabarorum est, hyemis à mensa Aprili in Septembrem usque dominatur: in littore vero Orientali, quod Hollandi de F dni in Choromandri, Oram Coromandelense vocant trans illos montes, in Idem latitudinis gradibus, contrarii planè modò à Septembri asque ad Aprilem hyemem habent."—Iobi Ludof, ad saum Historiam Commentarius, 101.

1770.—"The mere breadth of these mountains divides summer from winter, that is to say, the season of fine weather from the rainy... all that is meant by winter in India is the time of the year when the clouds... are driven violently by the winds against the mountains," &c.—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 34.

WOOD-APPLE, s. [According to the Madras Gloss. also known as Curd Fruit, Monkey Fruit, and Elephant Apple, because it is like an elephant's skin.] A wild fruit of the N.O. Averantiaeae growing in all the drier parts of India (Feronia elephantum, Correa). It is somewhat like the bel (see BAEL) but with a still harder shell, and possesses some of its medicinal virtue. In the native pharmacopia it is sometimes substituted (Moodeen Sheriff, [Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 324 seqq.). Buchanan-Hamilton calls it the Kot-bel (Kathbel), (Eastern India, ii. 787)].

1875.—"Once upon a time it was announced that the Pādshāh was about to pass through a certain remote village of Upper India. And the village heads gathered in panchāyat to consider what offering they could present on such an unexampled occasion. Two products only of the village lands were deemed fit to serve as nazrānā. One was the custard-apple, the other was the wood-apple—a wild fruit with a very hard shelly rind, something like a large lemon or small citron converted into wood. After many pros and cons, the custard-apple carried the day, and the village elders accordingly, when the king appeared, made salām, and presented a large basket of custard-apples. His Majesty did not accept the offering graciously, but with much abusive language at being stopped to receive such trash, pelting the simpletons with their offering, till the whole basketful had been squashed upon their venerable heads. They retired, abashed indeed, but devoutly thanking heaven that the offering had not been of wood-apples!"—Some Unscientific Notes on the History of Plants (by H. Y.) in Geog. Mag., 1875, pp. 49-50. The story was heard many years ago from Major William Yule, for whom see under TOBACCO.

WOOD-OIL, or GURJUN OIL, s. [Malay Archipelago, whilst almost unknown in other parts of the world. The celebrated Borneo camphor is the product of one such tree, and the saulwood of India of another. Much wood-oil is exported from the Burmese provinces, the Malay Peninsula, and Siam. It is much used in the East as a natural varnish and preservative of timber; and in Indian hospitals it is employed as a substitute for copaiva, and as a remedy for leprosy (Hanbury & Flückiger, Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 167 seqq.). The first mention we know of is c. 1759 in Dalrymple's Or. Repertory in a list of Burma products (i. 109).]

WOOLOCK, OOLOCK, s. [Platts in his Hind. Dict. gives ulāq, ulāk, as Turkish, meaning 'a kind of small boat.' Mr. Grierson (Bihar Peasant Life, 42), among the larger kinds of boats, gives ulānk, "which has a long narrow bow overhanging the water in front." Both he and Mr. Grant (Rural Life in Bengal, 25) give drawings of this boat, and the latter writes: "First we have the bulky Ooolk, or baggage boat of Bengal, sometimes as gigantic as the Patelee (see PATTELLO), and used for much the same purposes. This last-named vessel is a clinker-built boat—that is having the planks overlapping each other, like those in a London wherry ; whereas in the round smooth-sided oolak and most country boats, they are laid edge to edge, and fastened with iron clamps, having the appearance of being stitched."

[1853.—"... 10 Ulocks for Souldiers, etc."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 76.

[1760.—"20 Hoolucks 6 Oars at 28 Rs. per month."—In Long, 227.]

1764.—"Then the Manjees went after him in a wollock to look after him."—Ibid. 383.

1781.—"The same day will be sold a twenty-oar'd Wollock-built Budgerow..."—India Gazette, April 14.

1799.—"We saw not less than 200 large boats at the different quays, which on an average might be reckoned each at 60 tons burthen, all provided with good roofs, and masted after the country manner. They seemed much better constructed than the unwieldy wullocks of Bengal."—Symes, Av. 233.
WOON, s. Burm. wun, ‘a governor or officer of administration’; literally ‘a burden,’ hence presumably the ‘Bearer of the Burden.’ Of this there are various well-known compounds, e.g.:

Woon-gyee, i.e. ‘Wun-gyi’ or Great Minister, a member of the High Council of State or Cabinet, called the Hot-tan (see LOTO).

Woon-douk, i.e. Wun-dauk, lit. ‘the prop of the Wun’; a sort of Adlatus, or Minister of an inferior class. We have recently seen a Burmese envoy to the French Government designated as ‘M. Woondouk.’

Atwen-wun, Minister of the Interior (of the Court) or Household.

Myo-wun, Provincial Governor (May-woon of Symes).

Ye-wun, Water-Governor, formerly Deputy of the Myo-wun of the Pr. of Pegu (Ray-woon of Symes).

Akaow-kun, Collector of Customs (Akaavoon of Symes).

WOODY-MAJOR, s. The title of a native adjutant in regiments of Indian Irregular Cavalry. Both the rationale of the compound title, and the etymology of wardi, are obscure. Platts gives Hind. wardi or urdi, ‘uniform of a soldier, badge or dress of office,’ as the first part of the compound, with a questionable Skt. etymology, virula, ‘crying, proclaiming, a panegyric.’ But there is also Ar. wird, ‘a flight of birds,’ and then also ‘a troop or squadron,’ which is perhaps as probable. [Others, again, as many military titles have come from S. India, connect it with Can. varadi, ‘news, an order.’] 1784.—‘... We made the wurdee wollah acquainted with the circumstance. ...’—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 323.

1861.—‘The senior Ressaldar (native captain) and the Woody Major (native adjutant) ... reported that the sepoys were trying to tamper with his men.’—Cave-Browné, Punjub and Delhi, i. 120.

WOOTZ, s. This is an odd name which has attached itself in books to the so-called ‘natural steel’ of S. India, made especially in Salem, and in some parts of Mysore. It is prepared from small bits of malleable iron (made from magnetic ore) which are packed in crucibles with pieces of a particular wood (Cassia auriculata), and covered with leaves and clay. The word first appears in a paper read before the Royal Society, June 11, 1795, called: ‘Experiments and observations to investigate the nature of a kind of steel, manufactured at Bombay, and there-called Wootz ... by George Pearson, M.D.’ This paper is quoted below.

The word has never since been recognised as the name of steel in any language, and it would seem to have originated in some clerical error, or misreading, very possibly for wook, representing the Canarese ukku (pron. wukku) ‘steel.’ Another suggestion has been made by Dr. Edward Balfour. He states that uchha and nicha (Hind. ucha-nicha, in reality for ‘high’ and ‘low’) are used in Canarese speaking districts to denote superior and inferior descriptions of an article, and supposes that wootz may have been a misunderstanding of uchha, ‘of superior quality.’ The former suggestion seems to us preferable. [The Madras Gloss. gives as local names of steel, Can. ukku, Tel. ukku, Tam. and Malayal. urukku, and derives wootz from Skt. vucca, whence comes H. uucca.]

The article was no doubt the famous ‘Indian Steel,’ the σιθρος Ἰνδικὸς καὶ σφωνωμα of the Periplus, the material of the Indian swords celebrated in many an Arabic poem, the alkindon of old Spanish, the hundwañi of the Persian traders, ondaniq of Marco Polo, the iron exported by the Portuguese in the 16th century from Baticol (see BATCUL) in Canara and other parts (see Correa passim). In a letter of the King to the Goo Government in 1591 he animadverts on the great amount of iron and steel permitted to be exported from Chaul, for sale on the African coast and to the Turks in the Red Sea (Archiv. Port. Oriental., Fasc. 3, 318).

1795.—‘Dr. Scott, of Bombay, in a letter to the President, acquainted him that he had sent over specimens of a substance known by the name of Wootz; which is considered to be a kind of steel, and is in high esteem among the Indians.

Phil. Trans. for 1795, Pt. ii. p. 322.

[1814.—See an account of wootz, in Heyne’s Tracts, 362 seqq.]

1841.—‘The cakes of steel are called Wootz; they differ materially in quality, according to the nature of the ore, but are generally very good steel, and are sent into Persia and Turkey. ... It may be rendered self-evident that the figure or pattern (of Damascus steel) so long sought after exists in the cakes of Wootz, and only requires to be produced by the action of diluted acids ... it is therefore highly probable that the ancient blades (of Da-maceus) were made of this steel."—Wilkinson, Engines of War, pp. 203-206.

1864. — "Damascus was long celebrated for the manufacture of its sword blades, which it has been conjectured were made from the wootz of India."—Percy’s Metallurgy, Iron and Steel, 880.

WRITER, s.

(a). The rank and style of the junior grade of covenanted civil servants of the E.I. Company. Technically it has been obsolete since the abolition of the old grades in 1833. The term no doubt originally described the duty of these young men; they were the clerks of the factories.

(b). A copying clerk in an office, native or European.

1673. — "The whole Mass of the Company’s Servants may be comprehended in those Classes, viz., Merchants, Factors, and Writers."—Fryer, 84.

[1675-6.—See under FACTOR.]

1679. — "There are some of the Writers who by their lives are not a little scandalous."—Letter from a Chaplain, in Wheeler, i. 64.

1883. — "Mr. Richard More, one that came out a Writer on ye Herbert, left this World for a better. Ye Lord prepare us all to follow him!"—Hedges, Diary, Aug. 22; [Hak. Soc. i. 105].

1747.—"82. Mr. Robert Clive, Writer in the Service, being of a Martial Disposition, and having acted as a Volunteer in our late Engagements, We have granted him an Ensign’s Commission, upon his Application for the same."—Letter from the Council at Ft. St. David to the Honble. Court of Directors, dd. 2d. May, 1747 (MS. in India Office).

1758. — "As we are sensible that our junior servants of the rank of Writers at Bengal are not upon the whole on so good a footing as elsewhere, we do hereby direct that the future appointments to a Writer for salary, diet money, and all allowances whatever, be 400 Rupees per annum, which mark of our favour and attention, properly attended to, must prevent their reflections on what we shall further order in regard to them as having any other object or foundation than their particular interest and happiness."—Court’s Letter, March 3, in Long, 129. (The ‘further order’ is the prohibition of palankins, &c.—see PALANKEN.)

c. 1760. — "It was in the station of a covenanted servant and writer, to the East India Company, that in the month of March, 1750, I embarked."—Grose, i. 1.

1762. — "We are well assured that one great reason of the Writers neglecting the Company’s business is engaging too soon in trade. . . . We therefore positively order that none of the Writers on your establishment have the benefit or liberty of Dusticks (see DUSTUCK) until the times of their respective writings are expired, and they commence Factors, with this exception. . . ."—Court’s Letter, Dec. 17, in Long, 287.

1765. — "Having obtained the appointment of a Writer in the East India Company’s service at Bombay, I embarked with 14 other passengers . . . before I had attained my sixteenth year."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 5; [2nd ed. i. 1].

1769. — "The Writers of Madras are exceedingly proud, and have the knack of forgetting their old acquaintances."—Ed. Teignmouth, Mem. i. 20.

1788. — "In the first place all the persons who go abroad in the Company’s civil service, enter as clerks in the counting-house, and are called by a name to correspond with it, Writers. In that condition they are obliged to serve five years."—Burke, Speech on Hastings’ Impeachment, Feb. 1788. In Works, vii. 292.

b. —

1764. — "Resolutions and orders. —That no Moonshee, Linguist, Baniyan (see BANYAN), or Writer be allowed to any officer except the Commander-in-Chief and the commanders of detachments. . . ."—Pt. William Consns. In Long, 382.

[1860.—"Following him are the kranées (see CRANNY), or writers, on salaries varying, according to their duties and abilities, from five to thirty rupees."—Grant, Rural L. in Bengal, 183-9.]

WUG, s. We give this Belúch word for loot on the high authority quoted. [On this Mr. M. L. Dames writes: "This is not, strictly speaking, a Balochi word, but Sindhi, in the form wag or wago. The Balochi word is bag, but I cannot say for certain whether it is borrowed from Sindhi by Balochi, or vice versd. The meaning, however, is not loot, but ‘a herd of camels.’ It is probable that on the occasion referred to the loot consisted of a herd of camels, and this would easily give rise to the idea that the word meant loot. It is one of the commonest forms of plunder in those regions, and I have often heard Balochis, when narrating their raids, describe how they had carried off a ‘bag.’"]

1845.—"In one hunt after wug, as the Beloochees call plunder, 200 of that beautiful regiment, the 2nd Europeans, marched incessantly for 15 hours over such ground as I suppose the world cannot match for ravines, except in places where it is impossible to march at all."—Letter of Sir C. Napier, in Life, iii. 298.

XERAFINE, XERAFIM, &c., s.
The word in this form represents a silver coin formerly current at Goa and several other Eastern ports, in value somewhat less than 1s. 6d. It varied in Portuguese currency from 300 to 360 réis. But in this case as in so many others the term is a corruption applied to a degenerated value. The original is the Arabic ashrafi (see ASHRAFEE) (or skarifi, 'noble'—compare the medieval coin so called), which was applied properly to the gold dinár, but was also in India, and still is occasionally by natives, applied to the gold mouhur. Ashrafi for a gold dinár (value in gold about 11s. 6d.) occurs frequently in the '1001 Nights,' as Dozy states, and he gives various other quotations of the word in different forms (pp. 353-354; [Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 160, 376]). Aigrefin, the name of a coin once known in France, is according to Littré also a corruption of ashrafi.

1498. —'And (the King of Calicut) said that they should tell the Captain that if he wished to go he must give him 600 xarafins, and that soon, and that this was the custom of that country, and of those who came thither.'—Roteiro de V. da O. 79.

1510.—'When a new Sultan succeeds to the throne, one of his lords, who are called Amirra (Ameer), says to him: 'Lord, I have been for so long a time your slave, give me Damascus, and I will give you 100,000 or 200,000 teraphim of gold.'—Varthema, 10.

"Every Mameluke, great or little, has for his pay six saraphi per month."—Ibid. 13.

"Our captain sent for the superior of the said mosque, to whom he said: that he should show him the body of Nabi—this Nabi means the Prophet Mahomet—that he would give him 3000 seraphin of gold."—Ibid. 29. This one eccentric traveller gives thus three different forms.

1513. —"... hunc regem Affonsus idem, urbe opulètissima et præcipiú cópario Armusio vi capto, quindecim milliá Seraphinorí, ea est aurea moneta duéatis equi- valés annuú nobis tributarí effecerat."—Epistola Emmanuellis Regis, 2b. In the preceding the word seems to apply to the gold dinár.

1523. —"And by certain information of persons who knew the facts... Antonio de Saldanha... agreed with the said King Turuxa (Türûn Shâh),... that the said King... should pay to the King Our lord 10,000 xarafins more yearly... in all 25,000 xarafins."—Tombo da India, Subsidios, 79. This is the gold mouhur.

1540. —"This year there was such a famine in Choromandel, that it left nearly the whole land depopulated with the mortality, and people ate their fellow men. Such a thing never was heard of on that Coast, where formerly there was such an abundance of rice, that in the port of Negapatam I have often seen 'more than 75,000 reis take cargoes amounting to more than 20,000 varos (the varo = 20-39 bushels) of rice... This year of famine the Portuguese of the town of St. Thome did much good to the people, helping them with quantities of rice and millet, and coco-nuts and jagra (see JAGGERY), which they imported in their vessels from other parts, and sold in retail to the people at far lower prices than they could have got if they wished it; and some rich people caused quantities of rice to be boiled in their houses, and gave it boiled down in the water to the people to drink, all for the love of God... This famine lasted a whole year, and it spread to other parts, but was not so bad as in Choromandel. The King of Bisnangar, who was sovereign of that territory, heard of the humanity and beneficence of the Portuguese to the people of the country, and he was greatly pleased thereat, and sent an ola (see OLLAH) of thanks to the residents of St. Thomé. And this same year there was such a scarcity of provisions in the harbours of the Straits, that in Aden a load (ψαρδο) of rice fetched forty xarafins, each worth a cruzado."—Correa, iv. 131-132.

1558. —"The chief and most common money (at Goa) is called Pardauque (Pardao) Xeraphin. It is of silver, but of small value. They strike it at Goa, and it is marked on one side with the image of St. Sebastian, on the other with 3 or 4 arrows in a sheaf. It is worth 3 testoons or 300 Reys (Reas) of Portugal, more or less."—Linschotn (from French ed. 71); [Hak. Soc. i. 241, and compare i. 190; and see another version of the same passage under PARDAO].

1610. —"Inprimis of Serafins Echeiri, which be ten Rupias (Rupee) a piece, there are sixtie Leckes (Lack).—Havckins, in Purchas, i. 217. Here the gold mouhur is meant.

c. 1610. —"Les pièces d'or sont cherafins à vingt-cinq sols pièce."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 49; [Hak. Soc. ii. 69, reading cherafins].

1653.—"Monsnyes courantes à Goa. "Sequin de Venise... 21 tanges (Tanga)...
Reale d'Espagne... 12 tanges. Abassias de Perse... 3 tanges. Pardaux (Pardao)... 5 tanges. Scereph... 6 tanges. Roupies (Rupee) du Mogol... 6 tanges. Tangue... 20 bouserouque (Budgrook)."—De la Bonllaye-le-Gouz, 1657, 530.
c. 1675.—"Coins...of Rajapore. Imaginary Coins. The Pagod (Pagoda) is 33 Rupees. 45 Juttas (see JEETUL) is one Pagod. 10 and 3 Larees (Larin) is 1 Pagod. Zeraphins 2½, 1 Old Dollar. "Coins and weights of Bombay. 3 Larees is 1 Zeraphin. 80 Raies (Reas) 1 Laree. 1 Pice is 10 Raies. The Raies are imaginary.

"Coins and weights in Goa...The Cruzado, 12 Zeraphins. The Zeraphin, 5 Tangoes. The Tango (Tanga), 5 Vintenees. The Vinteen, 15 Barbaros (Budg-rook), whereof 75 make a Tango. And 60 Rees make a Tango."—Fryer, 296.

1609.—dw. gr.
"The Gold St. Thoma...The Sliv. Sherephene...of..." Table of Coins, in Osington.

1727.—"Their Soldiers Pay (at Goa) is very small and ill paid. They have but six Xeraphens per Month, and two Suits of Calico, strict or chequered, in a Year...and a Xeraphen is worth about sixpence half Penny Ster."—A. Hamilton, i. 249; [ed. 1744, i. 252].

1760.—"You shall coin Gold and silver of equal weight and fineness with the Ashrefees (Ashraftee) and Rupees of Moorshedabad, in the name of Calcutta."—Nawab's Perwannak for Estabd. of a Mint in Calcutta, in Long, 227.

c. 1841.—"Sahibs now are very different from what they once were. When I was a young man with an officer in the camp of Latik Sáhib (Lord Lake) the sahibs would give an ashrafti (Ashraftee), when now they think twice before taking out a rupee."—Personal Reminiscences of an old Khanum's Conversation. Here the gold mohur is meant.

XERCANSOR, n.p. This is a curious example of the manner in which the Portuguese historians represent Mahommedan names. Xercansor does really very fairly represent phonetically the name of Sher Khan Srír, the famous rival and displacer of Humayún, under the title of Sher Sháh.

c. 1538.—"But the King of Bengal, seeing himself very powerful in the kingdom of the Patans, seized the king and took his kingdom from him...and made Governor of the kingdom a great lord, a vassal of his, called Cotoxa, and then leaving everything in good order, returned to Bengal. The administrator Cotoxa took the field with a great array, having with him a Patan Captain called Xercansor, a valiant cavalier, much esteemed by all."—Correa, ii. 719.

The kingdom of the Patans appears to be Bebar, where various Afghan chiefs tried to establish themselves after the conquest of Delhi by Baber. It would take more search than it is worth to elucidate the story as told by Correa, but see Elliot, iv. 333.

Cotoxa (Koto shá) appears to be Kutb Khán of the Mahommedan historian there.

Another curious example of Portuguese nomenclature is that given to the first Mahommedan king of Malacca by Barros, Xaquin Dorzà (I. vi. 1), by Albuquerque Xaquendarza (Comm. Pt. III. ch. 17). This name is rendered by Lessen's ponderous lore into Skt. Saknadharu, "d. h. Besitzer kräftiger Besinnungen" (or "Possessor, of strong recollections")—Ind. Alt. iv. 546, whereas it is simply the Portuguese way of writing Sikundar Sháh! [So Linschoten (Hak. Soc. ii. 189) writes Xatamas for Shák Tamasa.] For other examples, see Codo-vascam, Idalcan.

YABOO, s. Pers. yábúh, which is perhaps a corruption of Ar. yá'báb, defined by Johnson as 'a swift and long horse.' A nag such as we call 'a galloway,' a large pony or small hardy horse; the term in India is generally applied to a very useful class of animals brought from Afghanistan.

[c. 1590.—"The fifth class (yábú horses) are bred in this country, but fall short in strength and size. Their performances also are mostly bad. They are the offspring of Turk horse with an inferior breed."—An, ed. Blochmann, i. 284.]

1754.—"There are in the highland country of KANDARAH and CABUL a small kind of horses called Yabous, which are very serviceable."—Hanway, Travels, ii. 367.

[1839.—"A very strong and useful breed of ponies, called Yaboons, is however reared, especially about Baumian. They are used to carry baggage, and can bear a great load, but do not stand a long continuance of hard work so well as mules."—Elphinston, Cabul, ed. 1842, i. 189.]

YAK, s. The Tibetan ox (Bos grunniens, L., Poephagus of Gray), belonging to the Bisontine group of Bosinae. It is spoken of in Bogle's Journal under the odd name of the "cow-tailed cow," which is a literal sort of translation of the Hind. name chotori gáo, chotoris (see CHOWRY), having been usually called "cow-tails" in the 18th century. [The usual native name for the beast in N. India is suraga'th, which comes from Skt. surabhi, 'pleasing.'] The name yak does not appear in Buffon, who calls it the 'Tartarian cow;' nor is it found in the 3rd ed. of Pennant's H. of Quadrupes (1798), though there is a fair account of the animal as Bos grunniens of Lin., and a poor engraving. Although the word occurs in Della Penna's account of Tibet, written in 1730, as quoted below, its first appearance in print was, as far as we can ascertain, in Turner's Mission to Tibet. It is the Tib. gYak, Jäsche's Dict. guag. The animal is mentioned twice, though in a confused and inaccurate manner, by Aelian; and somewhat more correctly by Cosmas. Both have got the same fable about it. It is in medieval times described by Rubruck. The domestic yak is in Tibet the ordinary beast of burden, and is much ridden. Its hair is woven into tents, and spun into ropes; its milk a staple of diet, and its dung of fuel. The wild yak is a magnificent animal, standing sometimes 18 hands high, and weighing 1600 to 1800 lbs., and multiplies to an astonishing extent on the high plateaux of Tibet. The use of the tame yak extends from the highlands of Khokhand to Kukukhotan or Kwei-hwaching, near the great northern bend of the Yellow River.

c. A.D. 250. — "The Indians (at times) carry as presents to their King tame tigers, trained panthers, four-horned oryxes, and cattle of two different races, one kind of great swiftness, and another kind that are terribly wild, that kind of cattle (from the tails of which) they make fly-flaps." — Aelian, de Animalibus, xv. cap. 14.

Again: "There is in India a grass-eating animal, which is double the size of the horse, and which has a very bushy tail very black in colour.† The hairs of the tail are finer than human hair, and the Indian women set great store by its possession. ... When it perceives that it is on the point of being caught, it hides its tail in some thicket ... and thinks that since its tail is not seen, it will not be regarded as of any value, for it knows that the tail is the great object of fancy." — Ibid. xvi. 11.

c. 545. — "This Wild Ox is a great beast of India, and from it is got the thing called Tupsa, with which officers in the field adorn their horses and ponnies. They tell of this beast: that if its tail catches in a tree he will not budge but stands stock-still, being horribly vexed at losing a single hair of its tail; so the natives come and cut his tail off, and then when he has lost it altogether, he makes his escape." — Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. Transi, in Cathay, &c., p. clxxiv. [c. 1500.—In a list of things imported from the "northern mountains" into Oudh, we have "tails of the Kutta cow." — Avn., ed. Jorret, ii. 172; and see 280.]

1730.—"Dopo di che per circa 40 giorni di cammino non si trova più abitazioni di case, ma solo alcune tende con quantità di mandrie di Yac, ossiamo bori pelosi, pecore, cavalli. ..." — Fra Orazio della Penna di Bili, Breve Notizia del Tibet (published by Klaproth in Journ. As. 2d. ser.) p. 17.

1783.—"... on the opposite side saw several of the black chowry-tailed cattle. ... This very singular and curious animal deserves a particular description. ... The Yak of Tartary, called Soora Goy in Hindostan. ... — Turner's Embassy (pubd. 1800), 156-6. [Sir H. Yule identifies Soora Goy with Ch'orti Gāî; but, as will be seen above, the H. name is surdīgo.]"—

In the publication at the latter date appears the excellent plate after a memorable "the Yak of Tartary," still the standard representation of the animal. [Also see Turner's paper (1794) in the As. Res., London reprint of 1795, iv. 365 seqq.]

Though the two following quotations from Abbé Huc do not contain the word yak, they are pictures by that clever artist which we can hardly omit to reproduce:

1851.—"Les bœufs à long poils étaient de véritable caricaresies; impossible de figurer rien de plus drôle; ils marchaient les jambes écartées, et portaient péniblement un énorme systèème de stalactites, qui leur pendiaient sous le ventre jusqu'à terre. Ces pauvres bêtes étaient si informes et tellement recouvertes de glaçons qu'il semblait qu'on les eût mis confus dans du sucre candi." — Huc, Les Souvenirs d'un Voyage, &c. ii. 201; [B.T. ii. 108].

"Au moment oû nous passâmes le Mourou Oussou sur la glace, un spectacle assez bizarre s'offrit à nos yeux. Déjà nous avions remarqué de loin ... des objets immenses et noirs en rangs en file en travers de ce grand fleuve. ... Ce fut seulement quand nous fûmes tout près, que nous prîmes reconnaître plus de 50 bœufs surgis dans la glace. Ils avaient voulu, sans doute, traverser le fleuve à la nage, au moment de la concrétion des eaux, et ils s'étaient trouvés pris par les glaçons sans avoir la force de s'en débarrasser et de continuer leur route. Leur belle tète, surmontée de grandes cornes, était encore découvert; mais la rest du corps était pris dans la glace, qui était si transparente qu'on pouvait distinguer facilement la position de ces imprudentes bêtes; on eût dit qu'elles étaient encore à nager. Les aigles et les corbeaux leur avaient arraché les yeux." — Ibid. ii. 210; [B.T. ii. 119 seq. and for a further account of the animal see ii. 81].
YAM, s. This general name in English of the large edible tuber Dioscorea seems to be a corruption of the name used in the W. Indies at the time of the discovery. [Mr. Platt (9 ser. N. & Q. v. 226 seq.) suggests that the original form was nyam or nyami, in the sense of 'food,' nyami meaning 'to eat' in the Fulah language of Senegal. The cannibal Nyam-Nyama, of whom Miss Kingsley gives an account (Travels in W. Africa, 330 seq.) appear to take their name from the same word.]

1600. — "There are great store of Iniamas growing in Guinea, in great fields." — Purchas, ii. 957.

1613. — "... Moreover it produces great abundance of inhames, or large subterranean tubers, of which there are many kinds, like the cannottes of America, and these inhames boiled or roasted serve in place of bread." — Godinho de Eredia, 19.

1764. — "In meagre lands 'Tis known the Yam will ne'er to bigness swell." — Grainger, Bk. i.

Z

ZABITA, s. Hind. from Ar. zabita. An exact rule, a canon, but in the following it seems to be used for a tariff of assessment:

1799. — "I have established the Zabeta for the shops in the Fort as fixed by Macleod. It is to be paid annually." — Wellington, i. 49.

ZAMORIN, s. The title for many centuries of the Hindu sovereign of Calicut and the country round. The word is Malayal. Sāmmāti, Sāmāri, Tāmāti, Tāmāri, a tadbhava (or vernacular modification) of Skt. Sāmudrī, 'the Sea-King.' (See also Wilson, Mackenzie MSS. i. xvii.) [Mr. Logan (Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.) suggests that the title Samudri is a translation of the Rāja's ancient Malayal. title of Kunnalakkon, i.e. 'King (kon) of the hills (kunu) and waves (ala).'] The name has recently become familiar in reference to the curious custom by which the Zamorin was attacked by one of the candidates for his throne (see the account by A. Hamilton (ed. 1744, i. 399 seq. Pinkerton, viii. 374) quoted by Mr. Frazer (Golden Bough, 2nd ed. ii. 14 seq.).]

c. 1343. — "The sultan is a Kāfir called the Sāmāri. ... When the time of our departure for China came, the sultan, the Sāmāri equipped for us one of the 13 junks which were lying in the port of Calicut." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 89-94.

1442. — "I saw a man with his body naked like the rest of the Hindus. The sovereign of this city (Calicut) bears the title of Sāmāri. When he dies it is his sister's son who succeeds him." — Abdurrazzāk, in India in the XVth. Cent. 17.

1498. — "First Calicut whiter we went. ... The King whom they call Camolim (for Çamorim) can muster 100,000 men for war, with the contingents that he receives, his own authority extending to very few." — Roteiro de Vasco da Gama.

1510. — "Now I will speak of the King here in Calicut, because he is the most important King of all those before mentioned, and is called Samory, which in the Pagan language means God on earth." — Varthema, 134. The traveller confounds the word with tamburān, which does mean 'Lord.' [Forbes (see below) makes the same mistake.]

1516. — "This city of Calicut is very large. ... This King became greater and more powerful than all the others: he took the name of Zomordi, which is a point of honour above all other Kings." — Barboza, 103.

[1552. — "Samorao." See under CELE-BES.]

1553. — "The most powerful Prince of this Malebar was the King of Calicut, who por excellence was called Camarij, which among them is as among us the title Emperor." — Barros, i. iv. 7.

[1554. — Speaking of the Molucuss, "Camarao, which in their language means Admiral." — Castanheira, Bk. vi. ch. 66.]

", "I wrote him a letter to tell him ... that, please God, in a short time the imperial fleet would come from Egypt to the Sāmari, and deliver the country from the hands of the infidels." — Sidi 'Ali, p. 33. [Vambêry, who in his translation betrays a remarkable ignorance of Indian geography, speaks (p. 24) of "Samiri, the ruler of Calcutta, by which he means Calicut."]

1563. — "And when the King of Calecut (who has for title Samorim or Emperor) besieged Cochin. ..." — García, t. 58b.

By Burton:

"When near that splendid couch took place the guest and others further off, prompt glance and keen the Samorin cast on folk whose garb and gest were like to nothing he had ever seen."
1616.—Under this year there is a note of a Letter from Undercecon-Chaste to the Great Samorin or K. of Calicut to K. James.—Sainsbury, i. 462.

1673.—"Indeed it is pleasantly situated under trees, and it is the Holy See of their Zamerhin or Pope."—Fryer, 52.

1781.—"Their (the Christians') hereditary privileges were respected by the Zamorin himself."—Gibbon, ch. xvii.

1785.—A letter of Tippo's applies the term to a tribe or class, speaking of '2000 Samories'; who are these?—Select Letters, 274.

1787.—"The Zamorin is the only ancient sovereign in the South of India."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 59.

1810.—"On our way we saw one of the Zamorin's houses, but he was absent at a more favoured residence of Paniany."—Maria Graham, 110.

[1814.—"The King of Calicut was, in the Malabar language, called Samory, or Zamorine, that is to say, God on the earth."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 203. See quotation above from Varthema.]

"... nor did the conqueror (Hyder Ali) take any notice of the Zamorine's complaints and supplications. The unfortunate prince, after fasting three days, and finding all remonstrance vain, set fire to his palace, and was burned, with some of his women and their brahmins."—Ibid. iv. 207-8; [2nd ed. ii. 477]. This was a case of Traga.

[1900.—"The Zamorin of Calicut who succeeded to the gadi (Guddy) three months ago, has died."—Pioneer Mail, April 18.]

ZANZIBAR, n.p. This name was originally general, and applied widely to the East African coast, at least south of the River Jubb, and as far as the Arab traffic extended. But it was also specifically applied to the island on which the Sultan of Zanzibar now lives (and to which we now generally restrict the name); and this was the case at least since the 15th century, as we see from the Roteiro. The Pers. Zangi-bâr, 'Region of the Blacks,' was known to the ancients in the form Zingis (Ptolomy, i. 17, 9; iv. 7, 11) and Zingium. The Arab softening of the g made the name into Zanjibar, and this the Portuguese made into Zanzibar.

c. 545.—"And those who navigate the Indian Sea are aware that Zingium, as it is called, lies beyond the country where the incense grows, which is called Barbary."—Cosmas, in Costhey, &c., clxvii.

c. 940.—"And the country of the Zanj begins at the channel issuing from the Upper Nile" (by this the Jubb seems meant) "and extends to the country of Sofala and of the Wawak."—Magüdi, Prétrairies d'Or, iii. 7.

c. 1190.—Alexander having eaten what was pretended to be the head of a black captive says:

"... I have never eaten better food than this!
Since a man of Zang is in eating so heart-attracting,
To eat any other roast meat to me is not agreeable!"

Sikundar-Nâmah of Nizâmî, by Wilberforce Clarke, p. 104.

1298.—"Zanghîbar is a great and noble Island, with a compass of some 2000 miles. The people... are all black, and go stark naked, with only a little covering for decency. Their hair is as black as pepper, and so frizzly that even with water you can scarcely straighten it." &c., &c.—Marco Polo, ii. 215. Marco Polo regards the coast of Zanzibar as belonging to a great island like Madagascar.

1440.—"Kalikut is a very safe haven... where one finds in abundance the precious objects brought from maritime countries, especially from Habshah (see HUBSHEE, ABYSSINIA), Zirbad, and Zanzibar." Abdurrazzâk, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 436.

1498.—"And when the morning came, we found we had arrived at a very great island called Jamgiber, peopled with many Moors, and standing good ten leagues from the coast."—Roteiro, 105.

1516.—"Between this island of San Lorenzo (i.e. Madagascar) and the continent, not very far from it are three islands, which are called one Manifa, another Zanzibar, and the other Penda; these are inhabited by Moors; they are very fertile islands."—Barboas, 14.

1553.—"And from the streams of this river Quillimance towards the west, as far as the Cape of Currents, up to which the Moors of that coast do navigate, all that region, and that still further west towards the Cape of Good Hope (as we call it), the Arabians and Persians of those parts call Zanguerab, and the inhabitants they call Zanguy."—Barros, 1. viii. 4.

A few pages later we have "Isles of Pomba, Zanzebar, Monfia, Comoro," showing apparently that a difference had grown up, at least among the Portuguese, distinguishing Zanguerab the continental region from Zanzibar the Island.

c. 1586.

"... And with my power did march to Zanzibar.
The western (sic) part of Afric, where I view'd
The Ethiopian Sea, rivers, and lakes..."

Marlowe's Tamburlaine the Great, 2d. part, i. 3.

1592.—"From hence we went for the Isle of Zanzibar on the coast of Melinde, where at wee stayed and wintered until the beginning of February following."—Henry May, in Hakt. iv. 53.
ZEBU. 979  ZEDOARY.

ZEBU, s. This whimsical name, applied in zoological books, English as well as French, to the humped domestic ox (or Brahminy bull) of India, was taken by Buffon from the exhibitors of such a beast at a French fair, who perhaps invented the word, but who told him the beast had been brought from Africa, where it was called by that name. We have been able to discover no justification for this in African dialects, though our friend Mr. R. Cust has kindly made search, and sought information from other philologists on our account. Zebu passes, however, with most people as an Indian word; thus Webster's Dictionary, says "Zebu, the native Indian name." The only word at all like it that we can discover is zobo (q.v.) or zobo, applied in the semi-Tibetan regions of the Himalaya to a useful hybrid, called in Ladak by the slightly modified form dsomo. In Jäschke's Tibetan Dict. we find "Zé-ba . . . . 1 hump of a camel, zebu, etc." This is curious, but, we should think, only one of those coincidences which we have had so often to notice. Isidore Geoffroy de St. Hilaire, in his work Acclimatisation et Domestication des Animaux Utiles, considers the ox and the zebu to be two distinct species. Both are figured on the Assyrian monuments, and both on those of ancient Egypt. The humped ox also exists in Southern Persia, as Marco Polo mentions. Still, the great naturalist to whose work we have referred is hardly justified in the statement quoted below, that the "zebu" is common to "almost the whole of Asia" with a great part of Africa. [Mr. Blanford writes: "The origin of Bos indicus (sometimes called zebu by European naturalists) is unknown, but it was in all probability tropical or sub-tropical, and was regarded by Blyth as probably African. No ancestral form has been discovered among Indian fossil bovines; which . . . comprise species allied to the gaur and 'buffalo" (Mammalia, 483 seq.).] c. 1772.—"We have seen this small hunched ox alive . . . It was shown at the fair in Paris in 1752 (sic, but a transcript from the French edition of 1837 gives 1772) under the name of Zebu; which we have adopted to describe the animal by, for it is a particular breed of the ox, and not a species of the buffalo."—Buffon's Nat. Hist., E.T. 1807, viii. 19, 20; see also p. 33. 1861.—"Nous savons donc positivement qu'à une époque où l'occident était encore couvert de forêts, l'orient, déjà civilisé, pos-sédait déjà le boeuf et le Zebu; et le consequent c'est de l'orient que ces animaux soit sortis, pour devenir, l'un (le boeuf) cosmopolite, l'autre commun à presque toute l'Asie et à une grande partie de l'Afrique."—Geoffroy St. Hilaire (work above referred to, 4th ed. 1861). [1898.—"I have seen a herd of Zebras (sic) or Indian humped cattle, but cannot say where they are kept."—In 9 ser. N. & Q. i. 463.] ZEDOARY, and ZERUMBET, ss. These are two aromatic roots, once famous in pharmacy and often coupled together. The former is often mentioned in medieval literature. The former is Arabic jadwâr, the latter Pers. zoramddâl. There seems some doubt about the scientific discrimination of the two. Mooden Sheriff says that Zedoary (Curcuma zedoaria) is sold in most bazaars under the name of ainbe-haldî, whilst jadwâr, or zhadwâr, is the bazar name of roots of varieties of non-poisonous aconites. There has been considerable confusion in the nomenclature of these drugs [see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 655, 670]. Dr. Royle, in his most interesting discourse on the Antiquity of Hindco Medicine (p. 77), transcribes the following prescription of the physician Aetius, in which the name of Zedoary first occurs, along with many other Indian drugs:

c. A.D. 540.—"Zador (i.e. zedoariae), galan-

ZEMINDAR, s. Pers. zamīn-dār, 'landholder.' One holding land on which he pays revenue to the Government direct, and not to any intermediate superior. In Bengal Proper the zemindars hold generally considerable tracts, on a permanent settlement of the amount to be paid to Government. In the N.W. Provinces there are often a great many zemindars in a village, holding by a common settlement, periodically renewable. In the N.W. Provinces the rustic pronunciation of the word zamīn-dār is hardly distinguishable from the ordinary Anglo-Indian pronunciation of jama-dār (see JEMADAR), and the form given to zamīn-dār in early English records shows that this pronunciation prevailed in Bengal more than two centuries ago.

1683.—"We lay at Bogaterta, a very pleasant and delightful Country, ye Gemi-dar invited us ashore, and showed us Store of Deer, Peacocks, &c., but it was not our good fortune to get any of them."—Hedges, Diary, April 11; [Hak. Soc. i. 77, also i. 89].

1686.—"He has ordered downe 300 horse under the conduct of three Jemidars."—In ditto, II. lvi.

1697.—"Having tried all means with the Jemidar of the Country adjacent to us to let us have the town of De Calculata at the usual Hire or Rent, rather than fail, having promised him ¼ Part more than the Place at present brings him in, and all to no Purpose, he making frivolous and idle Objections, that he will not let us have any Part of the Country in the Right Honourable Company's name, but that we might have it to our use in any of the Natives Names; the Reason he gives for it is, that the Place will be wholly lost to him—that we are a Powerful People—and that he cannot be possessed of his Country again when he sees Occasion—whereas he can take it from any of the Natives that rent any Part of his Country at his Pleasure.

October 31st, 1698. "The Prince having given us the three towns adjacent to our Settlement, viz. De Calculata, Chuttanuttte, and Gobinapore, or more properly may be said the Jemindarsip of the said towns, paying the said Rent to the King as the Jemidars have successively done, and at the same time ordering the Jemidar of the said towns to make over their Right and Title to the English upon their paying to the Jemidar(s) One thousand Rupees for the same, it was agreed that the Money should be paid, being the best Money that ever was spent for so great a Privilege; but the Jemidar(s) making a great Noise, being unwilling to part with their Country . . . and finding them to continue in their averseness, notwithstanding the Prince had an officer upon them to bring them to a Compliance, it is agreed that 1,500 Rupees be paid them, provided they will relinquish their title to the said towns, and give it under their Hands in Writing, that they have made over the same to the Right Honourable Company."—Ext of Cons., at Chuttanuttte, the 29th December (Printed for Parliament in 1788). In the preceding extracts the De prefixed to Calcula is Pers. deh, 'village,' or 'township,' a common term in the language of Indian Revenue administration. An 'Explanation of Terms' furnished by W. Hastings to the Fort William Council in 1759 thus explains the word:

"Deeh—the ancient limits of any village or parish. Thus, 'Deeh Calcutta' means only that part which was originally inhabited."—(In Long, p. 176.)

ZENANA. s. Pers. zanana, from zan, 'woman'; the apartments of a house in which the women of the family are secluded. This Mahomedean custom has been largely adopted by the Hindus of Bengal and the Mahrattas. Zanana is also used for the women of the family themselves. The growth of the admirable Zenana Missions has of late years made this word more familiar in England. ZEND, ZENDAVESTA. s. Zend is the name which has been commonly applied, for more than a hundred years to that dialect of the ancient Iranian (or Persian) language in which the Avesta or Sacred Books of Zoroastrianism or the old Persian religion are written. The application of the name in this way was quite erroneous, as the word Zand when used alone in the Parsi books indicates a 'commentary or explanation,' and is in fact applied only to some Pahlavi translation, commentary, or gloss. If the name Zend were now to be used as the designation of any language it would more justly apply to the Pahlavi itself. At the same time Haug thinks it probable that the term Zand was originally applied to a commentary written in the same language as the Avesta itself, for in the Pahlavi translations of the Yasna, a part of the Avesta, where the scriptures are mentioned, Avesta and Zend are coupled together, as of equal authority, which could hardly have been the case if Zend the translator meant his own work. No name for the language of the ancient scriptures has been found in the Parsi books; and Avesta itself has been adopted by scholars in speaking of the language. The fragments of these scriptures are written in two dialects of the Eastern Iranian, one, the more ancient, in which the Gāthas or hymns are written; and a later one which was for many centuries the spoken and written language of Bactria.

The word Zand, in Haug's view, may be referred to the root san, 'to know'; Skt. jnd, Gr. γνώ, Lat. gno (as in agnosco, cognosco), so that its meaning is 'knowledge.' Prof. J. Oppert, on the other hand, identifies it with old Pers. zand, 'prayer.'

Zendavesta is the name which has been by Europeans popularly applied to the books just spoken of as the Avesta. The term is undoubtedly an inversion, as, according to Haug, "the Pahlavi books always style them Avistāk va Zand (Avesta and Zend)" i.e. the Law with its traditional and authoritative explanation. Abastā, in the sense of law, occurs in the funeral inscription of Darius at Behistun; and this seems now the most generally accepted origin of the term in its application to the Parsi sacred books. (This is not, however, the explanation given by Haug.) Thus, 'Avesta and Zend' signify together 'The Law and the Commentary.'

The Avesta was originally much more extensive than the texts which now exist, which are only fragments. The Parthian tradition is that there were twenty-one books called Nasks, the greater part of which were burnt by Alexander in his conquest of Persia; possibly true, as we know that Alexander did burn the palace at Persepolis. The collection of fragments which remains, and is known as the Zend-avesta, is divided, in its usual form, into two parts. I. The Avesta properly so called, containing (a) the Vendidad, a compilation of religious laws and of mythical tales; (b) the Visperad, a collection of litanies for the sacrifice; and (c) the Yasna, composed of similar litanies and of 5 hymns or Gāthas in an old dialect. II. The Khorda, or small, Avesta, composed of short prayers for recitation by the faithful at certain moments of the day, month, or year, and in presence of the different elements, with which certain other hymns and fragments are usually included.

The term Zendavesta, though used, as we see below, by Lord in 1630, first became familiar in Europe through the labours of Anquetil du Perron, and his publication of 1771. [The Zend-Avesta has now been translated in Sacred Books of the East, by J. Darmesteter, L. H. Mills; Pahlavi Texts, by E. W. West.]

c. 930.—"Zarādāš, the son of Asbīmām,... had brought to the Persians the book al-Bastāh in the old Farsi tongue. He gave a commentary on this, which is the Zend,... and to this commentary yet another explanation which was called Bazand."—Maydān, p. 167. [See Haug, Essays, p. 11.]

c. 1030.—"The chronology of this same past, but in a different shape, I have also found in the book of Hamza ben Alhusain Alisfahānī, which he calls 'Chronology of great nations of the past and present.' He says that he has endeavoured to correct his account by means of the Abastā, which is the religious code (of the Zoroastrians). 1771.—"Persuadé que les usages modernes de l'Asie doivent leur origine aux Peuples et aux Religions qui l'ont subjuguée, je me suis proposé d'étudier dans les sources l'ancienne Théologie des Nations habituées dans les Contrées immenses qui sont à l'Est de l'Euphrate, et de consulter sur leur Histoire, les livres originaux. Ce plan m'a engagé à remarquer aux Monumens les plus anciens. Je les ai trouvé de deux espèces: les premiers écrits en Samskretan; ce sont les Vedas, Livres sacrés des Pays, qui de l'Indus s'étendent aux frontières de la Chine: les seconds écrits en Zend, ancienne Langue du Nord de la Perse; c'est le Zend Avesta, qui passe pour avoir été la Loi des Contrées bornées par l'Euphrate, le Caucase, l'0xus, et la mer des Indes."—Anquetil du Perron, Zend-Avesta, Oeuvrage de Zoroastre—Documents Préliminaires, p. iii.

"Dans deux cens ans, quand les Langues Zend et Pehlevie (Pahlavi) seront devenues en Europe familières aux Scavans, on pourra, rectifiant les endroits où je me serai trompé, donner une Traduction plus exacte du Zend-Avesta, et ci ce que je dis ici excitant l'émulation, avance le terme que je viens de fixer, mes fautes m'auront conduit au but que je me suis proposé."—Ibid. Preface, xvii.

1834.—"The supposition that some of the books were destroyed by Alexander the Great is contained in the introductory chapter of the Pehlevie Viraf-Name, a book written in the Sassanian times, about the 6th or 7th century, and in which the event is thus chronicled:—'The wicked, accused Guna Mino (the evil spirit), in order to make the people sceptical about their religion, instigated the accused Alexiedar (Alexander) the Ruman, the inhabitant of Egypt, to carry war and hardships to the country of Iran (Persia). He killed the monarch of Iran, and destroyed and made desolate the royal court. And this religion, that is, all the books of Avesta and Zend, written with gold ink: upon prepared cow-skins, was deposited in the archives of Stakhtar (Istakhkar or Persepolis) of Papak. The accrued, wretched, wicked Ashmogh (destroyer of the pious), Alexiedar the evildoer, took them (the books) out and burnt them.'—Doubhal Framji, H. of the Persis, ii. 158-159.

ZERBA, s. Gold-brocade, Pers. zar, 'gold,' baft, 'woven.'

[Z1900.—"Kamkwabs, or kimkhwabs (Kin- cob), are also known as zar-baft (gold-woven), and mushhajjar (having patterns)."—Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk Fabrics, 86.]

ZILLAH, s. This word is properly Ar. (in Indian pron.) žila, 'a rib,' thence 'a side,' a district. It is the technical name for the administrative districts into which British India is divided, each of which has in the older provinces a Collector, or Collector and Magistrate combined, a Sessions Judge, &c., and in the newer provinces, such as the Punjab and B. Burma, a Deputy Commissioner.

[1772.—"With respect to the Talook- darrys and inconsiderable Zemindarrys, which formed a part of the Huzzoor (Huzoor) Zilahs or Districts which paid their rents immediately to the General Cutcherry at Moorshedabad. . . ."—W. Hastings, in Hunter, Annals of Bengal, 4th ed., 388.]

1817.—"In each district, that is in the language of the country, each Zillah . . . a Zillah Court was established."—Mill's Hist. v. 422.

ZINGARI, n.p. This is of course not Anglo-Indian, but the name applied in various countries of Europe, and in various modifications, zincari, zingami, zincoli, clingari, zigeuner, &c., to the gypsies.

Various suggestions as to its derivation have been made on the supposition that it is of Indian origin. Borrow has explained the word as 'a person of mixt blood,' deriving it from the Skt. sankara, 'made up.' It is true that varna sankara is used for an admixture of castes and races (e.g. in Bhâgavad Gîtâ, i. 41, &c.), but it is not the name of any caste, nor would people to whom such an opprobrious epithet had been applied be likely to carry it with them to distant lands. A writer in the Saturday Review once suggested the Pers. žingar, 'a saddler,' Not at all probable. In Sleeman's Ramaseana or Vocabulary of the peculiar Language used by the Thugs (Calcutta, 1836), p. 85, we find:

"Chingaree, a class of Multani Thugs, sometimes called Naks, of the Mussulman faith. They proceed on their expeditions in the character of Brinjars, with cows and bullocks laden with merchandise, which they expose for sale at their encampments, and thereby attract their victims. They use the rope of their bullocks instead of the roomal in strangling. They are an ancient tribe of Thugs, and take their wives and children on their expeditions."

[These are the Chângars of whom Mr. Ibbetson (Panjâb Ethnog. 308) gives an account. A full description of them has been given by Dr. G. W. Leitner (A Sketch of the Changars and of their Dialect, Lahore, 1880), in which he shows reason to doubt any connection between them and the Zingari.]

De Goeje (Contributions to the Hist. of the Gypsies) regards that people as the Indian Zoû (i.e. Jatt of Sind). He suggests as possible origins of the name first shikâri (see SHIKAAREE), and then Pers. chângi, 'harper,' from which a plural changân actually occurs in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 730, note 22. [These are the Al-Jink, male dancers (see Burton, Ar. Nights, viii. 18.).]

If the name is to be derived from India, the term in Sleeman's Vocabulary seems a more probable origin than the others mentioned here. But is it not more likely that zingari, like Gipsy and Bohemian, would be a name given ab extra on their appearing in the West, and not carried with them from Asia?

ZIRBAD, n.p. Pers. zîr-bâd, 'below the wind,' i.e. leeward. This is a phrase derived from nautical use, and applied to the countries eastward of India. It appears to be adopted with reference to the S.W. Monsoon. Thus by the extracts from the Mohit or 'Ocean' of Sidi 'Ali Kapudân (1554), translated by Joseph V. Hammer in the Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, we find that one chapter (unfortunately not given) treats "Of the Indian Islands above and below the wind." The islands "above the wind" were probably Ceylon, the Maldives, Socotra, &c., but we find no extract with precise indication of them. We find however indicated as the "tracts situated below the wind," Malacca, Sumatra, Tenasserim, Bengal, Martaban, Pegu. The phrase is one which naturally acquires a specific meaning among sea-faring folk, of which we have an instance in the Windward and Leeward Islands of the W. Indies. But probably it was adopted from the Malays, who make use of the same nomenclature, as the quotations show.

1442.—"The inhabitants of the sea coasts are everywhere (at Ormuz) from the countries of Tchin, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbad."—Abdurrazzaq, in India in the 17th Cent. 6.

1553.—"... Before the foundation of Malaca, in this Gingapura... met all the navigators of the seas to the West of India and of those to the East of it, which last embrace the regions of Siam, China, Champa, Camboja, and the many thousand islands that lie in that Orient. And these two quarters the natives of the land distinguish as Dybanangüm (di-bawa-angin) and Atan Angüm (atás-angin) which are as much as to say "below the winds" and "above the winds," below being West and above East."—Barros, Dec. II, Liv. vi. cap. i. In this passage De Barros goes unusually astray, for the use of the Malay expressions which he quotes, bawa-angin (or di-bawe) "below the wind," and atas (or di-atás) angin, "above the wind," is just the reverse of his explanation, the former meaning the east, and the latter the west (see below).

c. 1590.—"Kalanbak (see CALAMBAK) is the wood of a tree brought from Zirbad (!)"—Aên, i. 81. A mistaken explanation is given in the foot-note from a native authority, but this is corrected by Prof. Blochmann at p. 616.

1726.—"The Malayans are also commonly called Orang di Bawuh Angin, or 'people beneath the wind,' otherwise Easterlings, as those of the West, and particularly the Arabs, are called Orang Atas Angin, or 'people above the wind,' and known as Westerlings."—Valentijn, v. 310.

"The land of the Peninsula, &c., was called by the geographers Zierbaad, meaning in Persian 'beneath the wind.'"—Ibid. 317.

1856.—"There is a peculiar idiom of the Malay language, connected with the monsoons. The Malas call all countries west of their own 'countries above the wind,' and their own and all countries east of it 'countries below the wind.' The origin of the phrase admits of no explanation, unless it have reference to the most important of the two monsoons, the western, that which brought to the Malayan countries the traders of India."—Crawfurd's Desc. Dict. 288.

ZOBO, ZHOBO, DSOMO, &c., s. Names used in the semi-Tibetan tracts of the Himalaya for hybrids between the yak bull and the ordinary hill cow, much used in transport and agriculture. See quotation under ZEBU.

The following are the connected Tibetan terms, according to Jaeschke's Dict. (p. 463): "mdzo, a mongrel bred of Yak bull and common cow; bri-mdzo, a mongrel bred of common bull and yak cow; mdzo-po, a male; mdzo-mo, a female animal of the kind, both valued as domestic cattle." [Writing of the Lower Himalaya, Mr. Atkinson says: "When the sire is a yak and the dam a hill cow, the hybrid is called jubu; when the parentage is reversed, the produce is called garjo. The jubu is found more valuable than either of the pure stocks" (Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 38). Also see Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 350.]

1298. — "There are wild cattle in that country almost as big as elephants, splendid creatures, covered everywhere but in the back with shaggy hair a good four palms long. They are partly black, partly white, and really wonderfully fine creatures, and the hair or wool is extremely fine and white, finer and whiter than silk. Messer Marco brought some to Venice as a great curiosity, and so it was reckoned by those who saw it. There are also plenty of them tame, which have been caught young. They also cross these with the common cow, and the cattle from this cross are wonderful beasts, and better for work than other animals. These the people use commonly for burden and general work, and in the plough as well, and at the latter they will do twice as much work as any other cattle, being such very strong beasts."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 57.

1554. — "The Zobo, or cross between the yak and the hill-cow (much resembling the English cow) is but rarely seen in these mountains (Sikkim), though common in the N.W. Himalaya." — Hooker's Him. Journals, 2d ed. i. 203.

[1871. — "The plough in Lahouli ... is worked by a pair of dzos (hybrids between the cow and yak)." — Harcourt, Him. Dist. of Kooloo, Lahouli, and Spiti, 150.]

[1875. — "Ploughing is done chiefly with the hybrid of the yak bull and the common cow: this they call zo if male and zomo if female." — Drew, Jummao and Kashmir, 216.]

ZOUAVE, s. This modern French term is applied to certain regiments of light infantry in a quasi-Oriental costume, recruited originally in Algeria, and from various races, but now only consisting of Frenchmen. The name Zouave, Zouavoa was, according to Litttré, that of a Kabyle tribe of the Jurjura which furnished the first soldiers so called.

ZUBT, ZUBTEE, adj. and s. of which the corrupted forms are JUBTEE, JUPTEE. Ar. zabt, lit. 'keeping, guarding,' but more generally in India, in the sense of 'seizure, confiscation.' In the Ain it is used in the sense which is still in use in the N.W.I., 'cash rents on the more valuable crops, such as sugar-cane, tobacco, etc., in those districts where rents in kind are generally paid.'

[1813. — "Zebt ... restraint, confiscation, sequestration. Zebty. Relating to restraint or confiscation; what has been confiscated. ... Lands resumed by Jaffier Khan which had been appropriated in Jaghire (see JAGHEER)."—Glossary to Fifth Report.]

[1851. — "You put down one hundred rupees. If the water of your land does not come ... then my money shall be confiscated to the Sahib. If it does then your money shall be zupt (confiscated)." — Edw^ardes, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 275.]

ZUMBOORUCK, s. Ar. Turk. Pers. zamabarak (spelt zambarak), a small gun or swivel usually carried on a camel, and mounted on a saddle; a falconet. [See a drawing in R. Kipling's Best and Man in India, 255.] It was, however, before the use of gunpowder came in, the name applied sometimes to a cross-bow, and sometimes to the quarrel or bolt shot from such a weapon. The word is in form a Turkish diminutive from Ar. zambâr, 'a horn'; much as 'musket' comes from mosquetta. Quatremère thinks the name was given from the twang of the cross-bow at the moment of discharge (see H. des Mongols, 285-6; see also Doyé, Suppt. s.v.). This older meaning is the subject of our first quotation:

1848. — "Les écrivains arabes qui ont traité des guerres des croisades, donnent à l'arbalette, telle que l'employait les chrétiens, le nom de zenbouruk. La première fois qu'ils en font mention, c'est en parlant du siège de Tyre par Saladin en 1187 .... Suivant l'historien des patriarches d'Alexandrie, le zenbouruk était une flèche de l'épauisseur du pouvoir, de la longueur d'une coude, qui avait quatre faces ... il traversait quelquefois au même coup deux hommes placés l'un derrière l'autre. . . Les musulmans paraissent n'avoir fait usage qu'à assez tard du zembrooruk. Djémal-Eddin est, à ma connaissance, le premier écrivain arabe qui, sous la date 643 (1245 de J.C.), cite cette arme comme servant aux guerriers de l'Islamisme; c'est à propos du siège d'Ascalon par le sultan d'Égypte. . . Mais bientôt l'usage du zembrooruk devint commun en Orient, et dans la suite des Turks ottomans entretinrent dans leurs armées un corps de soldats appelés zembroorekjias. Maintenant . . . ce mot a tout à fait changé d'acceptation, et l'on donne en Perse le nom de zembrooruk à une petite pièce d'artillerie légère."

1707.—"Prince Bedár Bakht . . . was killed by a cannon-ball, and many of his followers also fell. . . . His younger brother Waljaž was killed by a ball from a zumboorák."—Kháfi Khán, in Elliot, vii. 398.

c. 1784.—"Mirza Nedjef Khan, who was preceded by some Zembroorecs, ordered that kind of artillery to stand in the middle of the water and to fire on the eminence."—Sir Mutagharin, iii. 250.

1825.—"The reign of Futeh Allee Shah has been far from remarkable for its military splendour. . . . He has rarely been exposed to danger in action, but, early in his reign . . . he appeared in the field, . . . till at last one or two shots from zumboorucks dropping among them, he fell from his horse in a swoon of terror. . . ."—J. B. Fraser, Journey into Khorasan in 1821-22, pp. 197-8.

[1829.—"He had no cannon; but was furnished with a description of ordnance, or swivels, called zumbooruk, which were mounted on camels; and which, though useful in action, could make no impression on the slightest walls. . . ."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 419.]

1846.—"So hot was the fire of cannon, musquetry, and zumbooraks, kept up by the Khalsa troops, that it seemed for some moments impossible that the entrenchments could be won under it."—Sir Hugh Gough's desp. on the Battle of Sobraon, dd. Feb 13.

"The flank in question (at Sobraon) was mainly guarded by a line of two hundred zumboorucks, or falconets; but it derived some support from a salient battery, and from the heavy guns retained on the opposite bank of the river."—Cunningham's H. of the Sikhs, 322.
